This great Point having been thus eaſily carry'd, the Bridge was remov'd nearer the Town; a Fort was rais'd for the Security of it; and all the Fords and Paſſes were ſecur'd which the Enemy had occupy'd before; and yet, after all, we are told, That on the 17th it was warmly debated in a Council of War, Whether they ſhould proſecute the Siege, or march over the River to deſtroy all the Enemy's Forage in the County of Clare, and then turn the Siege into a Blockade? As alſo, That it was ſo far carry'd for a Blockade, that an Engineer was order'd to go with a Detachment towards Kilmulock, and fortify that Place. But if any ſuch Queſtion did really ariſe, it was decided for the Proſecution of the Siege. And, agreeable to this Deciſion, it was farther reſolv'd, that the General, in Perſon, ſhould paſs the Shannon with a ſtrong Diviſion of the Army: that the Prince of Wirtemberg, Mackay and Talmaſh, with the Remainder, ſhould continue the Siege on that Side; and that the neceſſary Meaſures ſhould be taken to give the Enemy a proper Reception, in caſe they thought fit to make a Sally in the mean time. A. D. 1691.

[Story, Boyer, &c.]

Upon this Plan, Ginkle, on the 22d, paſs'd over the Bridge of Boats, with ten Regiments of Foot, a large Body of Horſe and Dragoons, and fourteen Pieces of Cannon. About Noon they drew up within Cannon-ſhot of the Town, and about four all the Grenadiers, ſupported by four Regiments of Foot, were order'd to attack the Forts which commanded Thomond Bridge; which was no ſooner obſerv'd in the Town, than they brought all the Cannon they could to play upon them, and moreover ſent forth two great Parties to aſſiſt in the Defence of the Places attack'd. The Aſſailants, notwithſtanding, puſh'd on, and made ſuch an Effort as prov'd irreſiſtable; not only carrying the Forts Sword in Hand, but driving the Garriſons, together with their Auxiliaries, before them over the Bridge towards the Town, with ſuch Precipitation, that the Commanding Officer on that Side (a Frenchman) fearing the Purſuers would enter with the Purſued, order'd the Bridge to be drawn up, and thereby abandon'd the whole Party to the Fury of a victorious Enemy, who kill'd ſix hundred of them, and took almoſt two hundred Priſoners; among whom were one Colonel (Shelton, who dy'd ſoon after of his Wounds) two Lieutenant-Colonels, two Majors, nine Captains, ſeven Lieutenants, and ſix Enſigns, and drove a great Number into the Shannon.

The next thing they attempted, was to make a Lodgment within ten Yards of the Bridge Foot; and this they alſo ſucceeded in, tho' they were all the while expos'd to the Cannon of a great Tower, which were play'd upon them without Intermiſſion.

And now the Iriſh, ſeeing themſelves incloſ'd on all Sides, believing they were deſerted by France, and reſenting, beſides, the late Action of the French Officer, who had, with ſo little Remorſe, given up ſo many hundreds of their Countrymen to be cut to Pieces, thought of nothing but a Surrender; and, in order thereto, Colonel Wallop and General Sarsfield, the ſame Day, enter'd into Conference with the Generals Scravenmore and Ruvigny, and having made their Report to their Aſſociates, a Parley was beat the next Day on both Sides of the River, and being accepted, the ſame two Officers came out again, and demanded a three Days Truce, that they might invite Colonel Sheldon, who lay at Six-mile-bridge, with about fifteen hundred Horſe, to participate in the Capitulation. This alſo was granted. On the 25th Sheldon, with ſome of his Officers, came into the Camp, and had Leave to paſs into the Town. The next Day Sarsfield and Wallop din'd with the General, and Hoſtages were exchang'd on both Sides; and on the Morrow, the Iriſh ſent out their Propoſals, which, it is ſaid, were

to

A. D. 1691. so extravagant, that Ginkle rejected them, as inconsistent with the Laws of England; and, at the same time, sent in twelve Articles of his own, which, it is also said, became the Basis of the Capitulation. According to Bishop Burnet, the Irish had been induc'd by the French to insist on those extravagant Demands, on purpose that they might be rejected: But then, says he, the King had given Ginkle secret Directions, that he should grant all the Demands they could make, that would put an End to that War.

What these extravagant Demands of the Irish were, is no where specify'd; but if they went beyond Ginkle's Concessions, it must be allow'd, they were extravagant indeed. It is certain, the Treaty went on as smoothly after the rejecting the former and proposing the Latter, as before; and that the Lords Justices posted from Dublin to give their Sanction to it; as well for the Assurance of the Irish, on the one hand, as to screen the General from the Imputation of having taken too much upon him on the other. They arriv'd in the Camp, October the first, and, on the third following, the whole Capitulation (which extended not only to the Body of Horse, before mention'd, but also to the Castles of Ross and Clare, and, in general, to all the other Places and Castles in the Kingdom that were still in the Hands of the Irish) was finally adjusted, and executed in Form, on the following Terms, which have afforded so much Matter of Exultation to one Party, and of Complaint to the other, that there is a Necessity to insert them entire.

ARTICLES of LIMERICK.

October the 3d, 1691.

The Articles of Capitulation.

I. The Roman Catholics of this Kingdom shall enjoy such Privileges in the Exercise of their Religion, as are consistent with the Laws of Ireland, or as they did enjoy in the Reign of King Charles II. And their Majesties, as soon as Affairs will permit them to summon a Parliament in this Kingdom, will endeavour to procure the said Roman Catholics such farther Security in that Particular, as may preserve them from any Disturbance, upon the account of their said Religion.

II. All the Inhabitants, or Residents of Limerick, or any other Garison now in Possession of the Irish, and all Officers and Soldiers now in Arms, under any Commission of King James, or those authorised to grant the same in the several Counties of Limerick, Clare, Kerry, Cork, and Mayo, or in any of them; and all the Commission'd Officers in their Majesties Quarters, that belong to the Irish Regiments, now in being, that are treated with, and who are not Prisoners of War, or have taken Protection, and who shall return and submit to their Majesties Obedience, they and every of their Heirs, shall hold, possess, and enjoy all and every their Estates of Freehold and Inheritance; and all the Right, Title, and Interest, Privileges and Immunities which they and every, or any of them held, enjoy'd, or A. D. 1691. were rightfully and lawfully intitled to, in the Reign of King Charles II. and shall be put in Possession, by order of the Government, of such of them as are in the King's Hands, or the Hands of their Tenants, without being put to any Suit or Trouble therein: And all such Estates shall be freed and discharg'd from all Arrears of Crown Rents, Quit Rents, and all other public Charges incurr'd and become due since Michaelmas, 1688, to the Day of the Date hereof. And all Persons comprehended in this Article shall have, hold, and enjoy all their Goods and Chattels, real and personal, to them, or any of them belonging, or remaining either in their own Hands, or the Hands of any Person or Persons whatsoever, in trust for, and for the Use of, them, or any of them. And all and every the said Persons, of what Trade, Profession or Calling soever they be, shall, and may use, exercise and practise their several and respective Professions, Trades and Callings, as freely as they did use, exercise and enjoy the same in the Reign of King Charles II. provided that nothing in this Article contain'd, be construed to extend to, or restore any forfeiting Person now out of the Kingdom, except what are hereafter compriz'd: Provided also, that no Person whatsoever shall have and enjoy the Benefit of this Article, that shall neglect or refuse to take the Oath of Allegiance made by Act of Parliament in England, in the first Year of the Reign of their present Majesties, when thereunto requir'd.

III. All Merchants, or reputed Merchants, of the City of Limerick, or of any other Garison now possessed by the Irish, or of any other Town or Place in the Counties of Clare or Kerry, who are absent beyond the Seas, that have not borne Arms since their Majesties Declaration in February, 1689, shall have the Benefit of the second Article, in the same manner as if they were present, provided such Merchants, and reputed Merchants, do repair into this Kingdom within the Space of eight Months from the Date hereof.

IV. These following Officers, viz. Colonel Symon Lutterel, Captain Rowland White, Morrice Eustache of Gormanstown, Chevers of Mayestown, commonly called Mount Leinster, now belonging to the Regiments of the aforesaid Garisons and Quarters of the Irish Army, who were beyond the Seas, and sent thither upon Affairs of their respective Regiments, or of the Army in General, shall have the Benefit and Advantage of the second Article, provided they return hither within the space of eight Months, from the Date of these Presents, and submit to their Majesties Government, and take the abovemention'd Oath.

V. That all, and singular, the said Persons compriz'd in the second and third Articles, shall have a general Pardon of all Attainders, Outlawries, Treasons, Misprisions of Treasons, Premunires, Felonies, Trespasses, and other Crimes and Misdemeanours whatsoever,

A. D. 1691. ever, by them, or any of them, committed since the Beginning of the Reign of King James II. and if any of them are attainted by Parliament, the Lords Juſtices, and the General, will uſe their beſt Endeavours to get the ſame repeal'd by the Parliament, and the Outlawries to be reverſed Gratis, all but writing Clerks Fees.

VI. Whereas the preſent Wars have drawn great Violences on both Parties, and that if Leave were given for bringing all ſorts of private Actions, the Animoſities would probably continue that have been ſo long on foot, and the public Diſturbance laſt. For the quieting and ſettling therefore of the Kingdom, and avoiding thoſe Inconveniences which would be the neceſſary Conſequence of the contrary, no Perſon or Perſons whatſoever, compriz'd in the foregoing Articles, ſhall be ſued, moleſted, or impleaded at the Suit of any Party or Parties whatſoever, for any Treſpaſs by them committed, or for any Arms, Horſes, Money, Goods, Chattels, Merchandizes, or Proviſions whatſoever, by them ſeiz'd or taken during the time of the War. And no Perſon or Perſons whatſoever, in the ſecond or third Article comprized, ſhall be ſued, impleaded, or made accountable for the Rents or mean Rates of any Lands, Tenements, or Houſes by him or them receiv'd or enjoy'd in this Kingdom ſince the Date hereof, nor for any Waſte or Treſpaſs by him or them committed in any ſuch Lands, Tenements, or Houſes. And it is alſo agreed, That this Article ſhall be mutual and reciprocal on both Sides.

VII. Every Nobleman and Gentleman, compriz'd in the ſaid ſecond and third Articles, ſhall have Liberty to ride with a Sword and Caſe of Piſtols, if they think fit, and keep a Gun in their Houſes for the Defence of the ſame or fowling.

VIII. The Inhabitants and Reſidents of the City of Limerick, and other Gariſons, ſhall be permitted to remove their Goods, Chattels, and Proviſions, out of the ſame, without being view'd or ſearch'd, or paying any manner of Duty, and ſhall not be compell'd to leave their Houſe or Lodgings, they now are in, for the Space of ſix Weeks next enſuing the Date hereof.

IX. The Oath to be adminiſtred to ſuch Roman Catholics as ſubmit to their Majeſties Government, ſhall be the Oath abovemention'd and no other.

X. No Perſon or Perſons, who ſhall at any time hereafter break theſe Articles, or any of them, ſhall thereby make, or cauſe any other Perſon or Perſons to forfeit or loſe the Benefit of the ſame.

XI. The Lords Juſtices and General do propoſe to uſe their utmoſt Endeavours, that all Perſons comprehended in the abovemention'd Articles, ſhall be protected and defended from all Arreſts and Executions for Debt or Damage, for the Space of eight Months, next enſuing the Date hereof.

XII. Laſtly, The Lords-Juſtices and General do undertake, that their Majeſties will ratify theſe Articles within the Space of A. D. 1691. eight Months, or ſooner, and uſe their utmoſt Endeavours that the ſame may be ratified and confirm'd in Parliament.

XIII. And whereas Colonel John Brown ſtood indebted to ſeveral Proteſtants, by Judgments of Record, which appearing to the late Government, the Lord Tyrconnel, and the Lord Lucan, (Sarsfield) took away the Effects the ſaid John Brown had, to anſwer the ſaid Debts, and promiſed to clear the ſaid John Brown of the ſaid Debts; which Effects were taken for the public Uſe of the Iriſh, and their Army. For the freeing the ſaid Lord Lucan of the ſaid Engagement, paſt on the Public Account, for Payment of the ſaid Proteſtants; for preventing the Ruin of the ſaid John Brown, and for Satisfaction of his Creditors, at the Inſtance of the ſaid Lord Lucan, and the reſt of the Perſons aforeſaid, it is agreed, That the ſaid Lords-Juſtices, and Lieutenant-General Ginckle, ſhall interpoſe with the King and Parliament, to have the Eſtates ſecur'd to the Roman Catholics, by Articles and Capitulations in this Kingdom, charged with, and equally liable to the Payment of, ſo much of the ſaid Debt, as the ſaid Lord Lucan, upon ſtating Accompts with the ſaid John Brown, ſhall certifie under his Hand, that the Effect taken from the ſaid John Brown, amounts unto; which Accompts are to be ſtated, and the Balance certified by the ſaid Lord Lucan in twelve Days after the Date hereof.

For the Performance whereof, we have hereunto ſet our Hands,

Charles Porter,
Tho. Coningſbey,
Bar. de Ginckle,

Lucan,
Gaimoy,
W. Purſell,
N. Cuſſack,
Theop. Butler,
John Brown,
Ger. Dillon.

The other ARTICLES.

I. That all Perſons, without any Exceptions, of what Quality or Condition ſoever, that are willing to leave the Kingdom of Ireland, ſhall have free leave to go beyond the Seas to any Country (England and Scotland excepted) where they think fit with their Families, and Houſhold-ſtuff, Plate and Jewels.

II. That all the General Officers, Colonels, and generally all other Officers of Horſe, Dragoons, and Foot Guards, Troops, Dragoons, Soldiers of all kind, that are in any Gariſon, Place or Port, now in the Hands of the Iriſh, or encamped in the Counties of Cork, Clare, or Kerry, as alſo thoſe called Rapparees, or Voluntiers, that are willing to go beyond Sea, as aforeſaid, ſhall have free Liberty to embark themſelves whereſoever the Ships are that are appointed to tranſport them, and to come, in whole

A. D. 1691. whole Bodies, as they are now compos'd, or in Parties, Companies or otherwise, without having any Impediment directly or indirectly.

III. That all Persons above-mention'd, that are willing to leave Ireland, and go into France, have leave to declare it at the Places and Times hereafter mention'd, viz. The Troops in Limerick, on Tuesday next at Limerick; the Horse at their Camp on Wednesday; and the other Forces that are dispers'd in the Counties of Clare, Kerry, and Cork the 18th Day of this Instant, and on none other, before Monsieur Tumeron, the French Intendant, and Colonel Withers; and, after such Declaration so made, the Troops that will go into France, must remain under the Command and Discipline of their Officers, that are to conduct them thither: And Deserters of each Side shall be given up, and punish'd accordingly.

IV. That all English and Scotch Officers that serve now in Ireland, shall be included in this Capitulation, as well for the Security of their Estates and Goods in England, Scotland, and Ireland, if they are willing to remain here, as for passing freely into France, or any other Country to serve.

V. That all the General French Officers, the Intendant, the Engineers, the Commissaries at War, and of the Artillery, the Treasurer, and other French Officers, and Strangers, and others whatsoever, that are in Sligo, Ross, Clare, or in the Army, or that do trade and commerce, or are otherwise employ'd in any kind of Station, or Condition, shall have leave to pass into France, or any other Country, and shall have leave to ship themselves, with all their Horses, Equipage, Plate, Papers, and all other Effects whatsoever; and that General Ginckle will order Passports for them, Convoys and Carriages by Land and Water, to carry them safe from Limerick to the Ships, where they shall be embark'd, without paying any thing for the said Carriages, or those that are employ'd therein, with their Horses, Carts, Boats and Shallops.

VI. That if any of the aforesaid Equipages, Merchandizes, Horses, Money, Plate, or other Moveables, or houshold Stuff, belonging to the said Irish Troops, or to the French Officers, or other particular Persons whatsoever, be robb'd, destroy'd, or taken away by the Troops of the said General, the said General will order it to be restor'd, or Payment be made, according to the Value that is given in upon Oath by the Person so robb'd or plunder'd: And the said Irish Troops to be transported as aforesaid: And all Persons belonging to them, are to observe good Orders in their March and Quarters, and shall restore whatever they shall take from the Country, or make Satisfaction for the same, VII. That to facilitate the transporting of the Troops, the General will furnish fifty Ships, and each Ship burthen two hundred Tons; for which the Persons to be transported, shall not be oblig'd to pay; and twenty more, if there shall be Occasion, A. D. 1691. without their paying for them; and that if any of the said Ships shall be of lesser Burthen, he will furnish more in number to countervail, and also give two Men of War to embark the principal Officers, and serve for a Convoy to the Vessels of Burthen.

VIII. That a Commissary be immediately sent to Cork to visit the Transport-Ships, and what Condition they are in for sailing; and that as soon as they are ready, the Troops to be transported shall march with all convenient Speed the nearest way, in order to be embark'd there: And if there shall be any more Men to be transported than can be carry'd off in the said fifty Ships, the rest shall quit the English Town of Limerick, and march to such Quarters as shall be appointed for them, convenient for their Transportation, where they shall remain till the other twenty Ships are ready, which are to be in a Month's time, and may embark in any French Ship that may come in the mean time.

IX. That the said Ships shall be furnish'd with Forrage for Horses, and all necessary Provisions to subsist the Officers, Troops, Dragoons and Soldiers, and all other Persons that are shipped to be transported into France; which Provisions shall be paid for as soon as all are disembark'd at Brest, or Nants on the Coast of Brittany, or any other Port in France they can make.

X. And to secure the Return of the said Ships (the Dangers of the Seas excepted) and for the Payment of the said Provisions, sufficient Hostages shall be given.

XI. That the Garisons of Clare Castle, Ross, and all other Foot that are in Garisons in the Counties of Clare, Cork, and Kerry, shall have the Advantage of this Capitulation; and such part of the Garisons that design to go beyond Seas, shall march out with their Arms, Baggage, Drums beating, Ball in Mouth, Match lighted at both Ends, Colours flying, with all their Provisions, and half the Ammunition that is in the said Garison Towns, with the Horse that march to be transported, or if then there is not Shipping enough for the Body of Foot that is to be transported, next after the Horse; General Ginkle will order, that they be furnish'd with Carriages for that Purpose; and what Provisions they shall want for their March; they paying for the said Provisions, or else, that they may take it out of their own Magazines.

XII. That all the Troops of Horse and Dragoons that are in the Counties of Cork, Kerry and Clare, shall have the Benefit of this Capitulation; and that such as will pass into France, shall have Quarters given them in the Counties of Clare and Kerry, apart from the Troops commanded by General Ginkle, until they can be shipped; and within their Quarters they shall pay for all things, excepting Forrage and Pasture for their Horses, which shall be furnish'd gratis.

XIII. Those of the Garison of Sligo, that

A. D. 1691. are join'd to the Irish Army, shall have the Benefit of the Capitulation; and Orders shall be sent to them that are to convoy them up, to bring them hither to Limerick the shortest way.

XIV. The Irish may have Liberty to transport nine hundred Horse, including Horses for the Officers, which shall be transported gratis. And as for the Troops that stay behind, they shall dispose of themselves as they shall think fit, giving up their Arms and Horses to such Persons as the General shall appoint.

XV. It shall be permittted for those that are appointed to take care for the Subsistance of the Horse, that are willing to go into France, to buy Hay and Corn, at the King's Rates, where they can find it, in the Quarters that are assign'd for them, without any Let or Molestation; and to carry all necessary Provisions out of the City of Limerick: And for this Purpose, the General will furnish convenient Carriages for them to the Place where they shall be embark'd.

XVI. It shall be lawful to make use of the Hay preserv'd in the Stores of the County of Kerry for the Horses that shall be embark'd; and if there be not enough, it shall be lawful to buy Hay and Oats whereever it shall be found, at the King's Rates.

XVII. That all Prisoners of War that were in Ireland the 28th of September, shall be set at Liberty on both Sides; and the General promises to use his Endeavours, that Prisoners that are in England and Flanders may be set at Liberty also.

XVIII. The General will cause Provisions and Medicines to be administer'd to the sick and wounded Officers, Troops, Dragoons, and Soldiers of the Irish Army, that cannot pass into France at the Embarkment; and after they are cured, will order them Ships to pass into France, if they are willing.

XIX. That at the signing hereof, the General will send a Ship express into France; and then, besides, will furnish two small Ships, of those that are now in the River of Limerick, to transport two Persons into France, that are to be sent to give notice of this Treaty; and that the Commanders of the said Ships shall have Orders to put a-shore at the next Place of France where they shall make.

XX. That all those of the said Troops, Officers and others, of what Character soever, that would pass into France, shall not be stopt upon the account of Debt, or any other Pretence.

XXI. If after signing this present Treaty, and after the Arrival of the Fleet, a French Packet-Boat, or other Transport-ship, shall arrive from France, in any other Part of Ireland, the General will order a Passport, not only for such as must go aboard the said Ship, but to the Ships to come to the nearest Port to the Place where the Troops to be transported shall be quarter'd.

XXII. That after the Arrival of the said Fleet, there shall be a free Communication and Passage between it and the abovesaid Troops, and especially for all those that have Passes from the chief Commanders of the said Fleet, or from Monsieur Tumeron the Intendant. A. D. 1691.

XXIII. In Consideration of the present Capitulation, the Town of Limerick shall be deliver'd and put into the Hands of the General, or any other Person he shall appoint, at the Time and Days hereafter specify'd, viz. The Irish Town, except the Magazines and Hospitals, on the Day of signing the present Articles; and as for the English Town, it shall remain together with the Island, and the free Passage of Thomond Bridge, in the Hands of those of the Irish Army that are in the Garison, or that shall hereafter come from the Counties of Cork, Clare, Kerry, Sligo, and other places abovemention'd, until there be Convenience found for their Transportation.

XXIV. And to prevent all Disorders that may happen, between the Garison, that the General will place in the Irish Town, which shall be deliver'd to him, and the Irish Troops that shall remain in the English Town and Island, which they may do, until the Troops be embark'd or the fifty Ships shall be gone for France, and no longer; they shall entrench themselves on both Sides, to hinder the Communication of the said Garisons; and it shall be prohibited on both Sides to offer any thing offensive, and the Parties offending shall be punish'd on either Side.

XXV. That it shall be lawful for the said Garison to march out all at once, or at different times, as they can be embark'd, with Arms, Baggage, Drums beating, Match lighted at both Ends, Bullets in Mouth, Colours flying, six Brass Guns, such as the Besieged will chuse, two Mortar-pieces, and half the Ammunition that is now in the Magazines of the said Place. And for that Purpose, an Inventory of the Ammunition of the said Garison shall be made in the Presence of any Person that the General shall appoint the next Day after the Aricles shall be sign'd.

XXVI. All the Magazines of Provisions shall remain in the Hands of those that are employ'd to take care of the same, for the Subsistence of the Irish Army that will pass into France; and that if there shall not be sufficient in the Stores for the Support of the said Troops while they stay in this Kingdom, and are crossing the Sea, that, upon giving account of their Numbers, the General will furnish them with sufficient Provisions at the King's Rates; and that there shall be a free Market at Limerick and other Quarters where the Troops shall be; and in case any Provisions shall remain in Limerick when the Town shall be given up, it shall be valu'd, and the Price deducted out of what is to be paid for the Provisions to be furnish'd to the Troops a-ship-board.

XXVII. That there shall be a Cessation of Arms at Land, and also at Sea, with respect to the Ships, whether English, Dutch, or French, design'd for the Transportation of

A.D. 1691. of the said Troops until they be return'd unto their respective Harbours; and that on both Sides they shall be furnish'd sufficiently with Passports, both for Ships and Men: And if any Sea Commander, or Captain of a Ship, or any Officer, Trooper, Dragoon, Soldier, or other Person shall act contrary to this Cessation, the Persons so acting shall be punish'd on either Side, and Satisfaction shall be made for the Wrong done: Officers shall be sent to the Mouth of the River of Limerick, to give Notice to the Commanders of the English and French Fleets of the present Conjuncture, that they may observe the Cessation of Arms accordingly.

XXVIII. For the Security of this present Capitulation, and of each Article herein contain'd, the Besieged will give the following Hostages-----and the General will give-----

XXIX. If before this Capitulation is fully executed, there happens any Change in the Government, or Command of the Army, which is now commanded by General Ginkle, all those that shall be appointed to command the same, shall be oblig'd to observe and execute what is specify'd in these Articles, or cause it to be executed punctually; and shall not act contrary on any Account whatsoever.

Baron DE GINKLE."

Reflections thereon.

This is what Father Orleans very justly calls one of the finest Capitulations that ever was made, and from which an Author of our own takes the Hint to write as follows: "The Case of the Irish Nation is so particularly hard, that there is scarce an Instance of the like Nature; most of the Outlawries running for Treasons committed on the 13th Day of February, 1688; which was the Day the then Prince and Princess of Orange accepted the Crown in the Banqueting-House; the News of which could not be known on the other Side St. George's Channel the same Day, without Inspiration: But every body knows, at that time the Government of Ireland was entirely in the Possession of the late King James, by his Lieutenant, the Earl of Tyrconnel, who had an Army on foot to have kept the People in Obedience, tho' they should have had never so great an Inclination to revolt. Soon after, the late King James went over in Person into that Kingdom, where he was, without Dispute, a King de Facto, to whom our own Laws and Principles justify a Submission; upon which this unfortunate People were reduc'd to this Dilemma of being hang'd by one King or the other. But what aggravates the Hardship of this Case, in respect of the Authors of the Oppression, is, That those Irish who were the most forward to fling themselves into the English Protection, as soon as they had an Opportunity, have far'd the worst, and lost their Estates, only for submitting to Civil Authority; whereas, others who held out to the very last, and were the Occasion of shedding more Blood by a Prolongation of the War, are all indemnify'd by the Articles, which they made with Swords in their Hands; by which Example Posterity will be instructed to hope for more Safety and better Quarter, by a desperate Resistance, than an early Submission." Bishop Burnet also admits, That the English in Ireland, though none could suffer more by the Continuance of the War than they did, were yet uneasy when they saw that the Irish had obtain'd such good Conditions: And yet farther, That (notwithstanding Ginkle's affected Tenderness for the Laws of England) the most Violent among them, who were much exasperated with Wrongs they had suffer'd, began to call in question the Legality of some of the Articles. A.D. 1691.

Higgons's short View.

Certain it is, that to those who are too apt to confide in the Professions of Politicians, nothing seems more extraordinary, than to see the very Men who had been hitherto proscrib'd as Rebels, now treated with upon the Level of fair and equal Warriors, who had fought for Dominion only; to see them, vanquish'd as they were, and beset on every Side, dismiss'd with all the Honours of War; and not only so, but deliver'd over in a Body to maintain the same Quarrel under the Ensigns of France; and provided with English Transports and English Convoys, at the Expence of England; to see the same Provision made for the very Rapparees, and Care taken, by an express Clause, that this Body should not be lessen'd by Desertion; to see the Authority of King William engag'd for the Support of the Roman Catholic Religion and Interest in Ireland, on the same Footing that it had been left by King Charles, who had dy'd in that Faith; to see the Professors of that Religion yet farther gratify'd with a Promise of the Royal Endeavours to procure them additional Favours; to see Attainders dispens'd with in Effect, Pardons extended, Forfeitures vacated, and the Course of the Law itself stopp'd to purchase a Pacification; to see many of these things in the first twelve Articles; which are manifestly those that were offer'd at the very Entrance of the Treaty by Ginkle: And finally, in the Irish supplemental Article, added after that which is called the last; to see Sarsfield's Title of Lord Lucan admitted, tho' granted long after the Abdication, and, as a Reward for his Activity in that very War, which was now, at so high a Price, to be extinguish'd.

Some things, it is true, are urged in Excuse of Ginkle and his Associates, namely, The King's peremptory Command, the ill Condition of his Carriage-Horses, which were almost worn out with the Fatigues they had undergone, the Necessity of giving his Soldiers a Recess, the Advance of the Season, and, above all, the daily Apprehension of the Arrival of a Fleet from France to relieve the Place. But what Regard soever these several Circumstances may justly deserve, those who also urge, that a French Fleet did actually arrive in Dingle Bay, two Days after the Capitulation was sign'd, and who from thence infer, that all that was done, was right, deserve no Regard at all; for,

A. D. 1691. for, in the London Gazette, N°. 2711, there is an Article from Dublin, dated October 23, in theſe Words, "The firſt Report we had of the Arrival of the French Squadron in the Bay of Dingle, was a Miſtake: But we have now certain Advice, that they are come upon the Coaſt of Kerry." Whence it is notorious, that from the 22d of September, which was the Day that the General cut off the Communication between the Town and the County of Clare, he had ſufficient Time, at leaſt, to have reduc'd Limerick, and with it the reſt of Ireland, to Obedience, before the Arrival of the French Fleet; without ſubjecting the Government to the Neceſſity of ratifying ſuch Articles, as are ſcarce reconcileable to the Purpoſes of the Revolution, or to any public Act of Government which had taken place in conſequence thereof.

To draw towards a Cloſe upon this Head, the Reduction of Limerick completed the Reduction of Ireland: For though ſo large a Body of Men were ſuffer'd to continue together with Arms in their Hands, no very remarkable Diſorder enſued. "The Articles of Capitulation, ſays Biſhop Burnet, were punctually executed; and ſome Doubts that aroſe out of ſome ambiguous Words, were explan'd in favour of the Iriſh; ſo earneſtly deſirous was the King to have all Matters quieted at home, that he might direct his whole Force againſt the Enemy abroad." And yet we are told by other Writers, that a freſh Rupture had like to have broke out between the two Parties before Limerick was evacuated: The Occaſion this: A Lieutenant-Colonel among the Iriſh, having been confin'd for refuſing to go to France, found Means to make his Complaint to Ginkle, who not only interpos'd for his Deliverance, but actually order'd a new Battery of four Guns to be erected on Boll's Bridge, ſaying with ſome Heat, That he would teach the Iriſh to play Tricks with him. It is added, That a warm Expoſtulation enſued between the General and Sarſfield: That Sarſfield, in the Courſe of it, ſaying, He was now in the General's Power, the General reply'd, Not ſo; you ſhall go in again and do your worſt; and that the Affair was at laſt compromiſ'd, by a Diſcharge of the Colonel, and all that were in the like Circumſtances.

The London Gazette yet farther ſets forth, That the General having iſſued a Declaration on the ſeventh of October, promiſing ſafe Conduct and Protection to all ſuch Officers, Soldiers and Rapparees, as, by a certain Day, ſhould lay down their Arms and repair to their reſpective Habitations, in order to live quietly there, above two thouſand of them came over to him, and among them one Colonel with his whole Regiment; and that in all, above three thouſand had diſpers'd themſelves: And yet, we find it elſewhere aſſerted, That the Numbers of thoſe who adher'd to the late King, were about twelve thouſand. The Gazette is ſilent on this Head, but ſpecifies, That about two thouſand Foot, and three hundred Horſe were perſuaded to march to Cork, in order to take ſhipping there for France; and that the Reſidue who remain'd in the Engliſh Town of Limerick, evacuated that Place November the ſeventh; and the ſame Day embark'd on board the French Tranſports in the Shannon; which, together with the Men of War of that Nation, before ſpoke of, had been ſuffer'd to lye there in peace, to receive them, by virtue of an additional Agreement between General Talmaſh, who was left to command at Limerick, and Mr. de Uſſone: That on the ſaid firſt of November, Part of thoſe perſuaded, as above, to remove to Cork, were ſhipp'd alſo on Engliſh Bottoms for Breſt; that Sarſfield himſelf continu'd with the Reſidue, to hinder them from being farther perſuaded to give up the Cauſe; and that notwithſtanding all his Vigilance and Addreſs, the Regiments of Macclermot, Bryan O' Neale, and Felix O' Neal, not only refus'd to embark, but march'd to Clare, where they deliver'd up their Arms, and diſpers'd to their ſeveral Habitations.

Great Numbers of the Iriſh deſert.

The Reaſon aſſign'd for this ſudden Change of Diſpoſition, is the Intelligence which they receiv'd, at the Return of the Tranſport-ſhips, That the Major-Generals of thoſe already tranſported, had been reduc'd to Colonels, the Lieutenant-Colonel and Majors to Captains, the Captains to Lieutenants, the Lieutenants and Enſigns to private Men; and that all in general were very ill treated by their new Maſters. And yet on their Arrival in France, they were welcom'd by a Letter from King James, directed to General Sheldon, importing, That he was extremely well ſatisfy'd with his Conduct, and that of the reſt of the Officers, as alſo with the Valour of his Soldiers; but more particularly, for their Readineſs to come and ſerve where he was; aſſuring them, he ſhould never forget this Act of Loyalty, nor fail, when time ſhould ſerve, to diſtinguiſh them with particular Favours; and informing them, that they were to ſerve under his Commiſſions and Command; and that his Brother of France had already given Orders for their being furniſh'd with new Cloaths, Neceſſaries of all ſorts, and Quarters of Refreſhment.

[Life of King William, v. II. p. 272.]

But if theſe were ill uſed, the greater Part of thoſe who went into the Service of their Majeſties, were not uſed at all; for, except fourteen hundred that were given to the Emperor, they were diſarm'd and broke, with a ſmall Pittance for their Support, till they had learn'd ſome other Trade.

His Majeſty, who, upon his leaving the Army, had ſpent two whole Months in hunting at Loo, receiv'd the agreeable News of the Surrender of Limerick at the Hague; and having ſettled the State of the War for the next Year with the States Deputies, embark'd in the Maes on the eighteenth of October, O. S. and the next Day landed at Margate.

The King lands at Margate from Holland.

A Proclamation requiring the Attendance of the Members of both Houſes, not only to meet, but actually to ſit for the Diſpatch of divers weighty and important Affairs on the 22d of October, had been iſſu'd the 24th of September

A. D. 1691. September preceding; and the Majority of both Houſes were every Day arriving in Town in Obedience thereto; inſomuch, that had not the King landed as he did, his Royal Conſort might have had one Opportunity of filling the Throne of her Father, with the full and complete Majeſty of a Sovereign.

Of the Compliments which he receiv'd from his Nobility, from the City of London, &c. on his Arrival, there is no need to enlarge, as being Matters of Courſe: But we ought not to forget, That a Proclamation for a public Thankſgiving was ſet forth on the firſt Day of the Seſſion; in which it is declar'd, "That by the wonderful Succeſs of their Majeſties Arms, in reducing Ireland to their Obedience, they were in the full Poſſeſſion of their Three Kingdoms, and in a Condition, with the Bleſſing of God, to ſettle the ſame in a firm and laſting State of Safety, Honour, and Proſperity." Nor that in the ſame Gazette, which contains this Inſtance of Royal Piety, the Story of Captain Siccarde, before recited, had the ſecond Place; poſſibly to keep up the Indignation of the People againſt France in full Ardour, and reconcile them ſo much the better to the Continuance of a bloody and expenſive Land War, in which it was hard to convince them they had any real Concern.

A public Thankſgiving.

According to Biſhop Burnet, a Party was now avowedly form'd againſt the Government, who durſt not ſhew themſelves as long as the Iriſh War continu'd, but who now began to infuſe into all People, That there was no need of keeping up a great Land Army; and that we ought only to aſſiſt our Allies with ſome Auxiliary Troops, and increaſe our Force at Sea. "Many, proceeds his Lordſhip, that underſtood not the State of Foreign Affairs, were drawn into this Conceit; not conſidering, that if Flanders was loſt, Holland muſt ſubmit to take the beſt Terms they could get; and the Conjunction of thoſe two great Powers at Sea, muſt preſently ruin our Trade, and, in a little time, ſubdue us entirely. But it was not eaſy to bring all People to apprehend this aright; and thoſe who had ill Intentions, would not be beaten out of it, but cover'd worſe Deſigns with this Pretence. And this was ſtill kept up as a Prejudice againſt the King and his Government, That he lov'd a great Army about him; and that when they were once modell'd, he would never part with them, but govern in an arbitrary way, as ſoon as he had prepar'd his Soldiers to ſerve his Ends."

A Party form'd againſt the Government.

Who were at the Head of this Party, his Lordſhip does not ſtay to inform us; and we are left to conclude, that they could be no other than Tories and Jacobites; while, on the other hand, the Earl of Warrington, better known by his old Title of Lord Delamere, an Almoſt-Republican Whig, not only places the Land War to the Account of thoſe very Tories and Jacobites, but contends for a Naval War, with as much Warmth, as if the very Being of the Nation depended upon it.

According to him, his Majeſty's Adviſers knew, that the French King could neither have had Money, Men, nor Arms to offend his Neighbours, if the many Millions of Money given by Parliament ſince the Revolution had been ſpent in Naval Forces, put into ſkilful and faithful Hands, which had apply'd themſelves to prevent the Trade of the French with other Nations. A. D. 1691. [Impartial Enquiry, &c. p. 18, 19.]

It would have coſt, continues his Lordſhip, leſs than the Money given, to have ſent out yearly a Royal Fleet of an hundred Sail for our Defence and Glory, as early in the Spring as was needful; and, over and above, to have hired an hundred Sail of the beſt Merchants, to have been wholly employ'd to deſtroy their fiſhing in Newfoundland, and their Intereſt in America; to have cruſh'd their villanous Privateers, and have burnt the Ships of Trade in all their Harbours.

This alone had ſecur'd Europe from the French Tyranny, given Safety, Peace, and Trade to England, and made him ſend King James to a Convent to do Penance for the Ills he hath done.

Theſe Adviſers could not but know, that the Strength and Wealth of England could never have been leſſen'd by a War againſt the French at Sea (unleſs ſome ſpecial Anger of God had been ſhewn againſt us:) Our Country could have afforded better Ships, and Men, and Commanders for the Sea, than was poſſible for the French King to have provided, there had been a perpetual Spring to ſupply our Expences, the Moneys had return'd, as it were, in a Circle, unto the Gentlemen, Tradeſmen and Farmers, becauſe the Beef, the Pork, the Bread, the Peaſe, the very Cloathing of the Seamen, had been of our own Growth and Manufactures, and the more Ships had been equipp'd for Sea, the more had Trade, and the Price of our Commodities been advanc'd, and our Force had been increas'd by uſing it; in regard more of our laborious Youth would have apply'd themſelves to the Sea-Affairs upon ſuch Encouragement; and Increaſe of their Numbers would, naturally and neceſſarily, have promoted Trade and Power, and made all Nations court our Friendſhip.

Surely, theſe things could not have been forgotten, having been ſo lately proved by theſe (meaning Cromwell) who purſued this Courſe, who were without Right and Title to the Government, and yet were ſubmitted to by all the World.

But, on the contrary, theſe Adviſers muſt needs underſtand, that when they counſelled the King to war againſt France at Land, it muſt be upon very unequal Terms, both of Expence and Hazard.

He could not tranſport his Men without great Charge, and muſt ſuffer the Delays and Dangers of the Winds and Seas: He muſt exhauſt his own Kingdom's Money to maintain his Troops abroad, and to be ſpent amongſt Foreigners for the Proviſions of his Army; he muſt expect to loſe many of our Engliſhmen by the ſudden Change of Climate, Air and Diet, and the Ignorance

A. D. 1691. of providing for themſelves amongſt Foreigners.

In all Misfortunes and Accidents of War he muſt want all ſudden Aſſiſtance from his Subjects; he can have no Recruits in his greateſt Neceſſities, unleſs the Winds and Seas ſhall favour him; and his Troops may be utterly deſtroy'd, before it may be poſſible for him to be reliev'd: And they that gave the Advice know, that the People of the Country, that is the Stage of the War, are ſuch bigotted Papiſts as would rather cut the Throats of our Engliſh in ſuch Caſe of Diſtreſs, than afford them the leaſt Succour.

I have often aſked the moſt knowing Men I could meet with, what Benefit our King or Kingdom could expect from this mighty War in Flanders, if it ſhould ſucceed beyond moſt Mens Hopes? And the Anſwer I could ever get, hath been no more, than that we ſhould weaken the Power of France. But I was bold to purſue my Queſtion, and aſk, whether we thought ſo to beat him in Flanders, as that he ſhould give up his Fleet, and his Naval Stores to pacify us? Or whether we hope this Summer or the next, to gain his Frontiers, Cities and Gariſons, which it hath coſt him near thirty Years to complete, and many Millions to fortify? Or was it deſign'd to gain Part of his Country from him, for the Engliſh to inhabit? Or to over-run his whole Kingdom and poſſeſs the Crown of France, and to plant the Proteſtant Religion there, by the Hermophrodite-Swords of Papiſts and Proteſtants?

To all this it was only ſaid, that our King is cloſe in his Councils; but no doubt he hath ſome very great Deſign; I could not forbear replying, that, as far as I can diſcern, whoever put his Majeſty upon winning Towns and Territories from France, and aſpiring to the Crown of that Kingdom, were the moſt deſperate Deſigners againſt the Peace, Liberty and Happineſs of England: And the conſequence of Proſperity therein, would be, to change us from the moſt ancient free Kingdom in the World, to be a miſerable Province of a King of France, under a foreign Army.

[Great Britain's juſt Complaint, 4to p. 55.] Thus far that great Revolutioner, Lord Delamere: And after him Sir James Montgomery, reproaches the whole Nation for the Miſdemeanours of the new Government, as follows: "The Original and Ground of this War is purely private Conteſts betwixt the Crown of France and Houſe of Auſtria, and ſuch other Princes as that Houſe can draw into that Intereſt. Do we not ſee, that the Princes of Germany themſelves, who ſeem to have the moſt immediate Concern in it, and ſhould underſtand and be more alarm'd at the Conſequences of it than we, do but make Merchandize of their Aſſiſtance, and engage in, and withdraw from, this War, as it contributes moſt to their particular Intereſts, and, according as they are beſt paid by the ſeveral Principals? Do not the Northern Crowns, whoſe Territories and Provinces lie more expos'd to the Conſequences of this War than our Iſlands, maintain an exact Neutrality, which will give their Subjects Poſſeſſion of the beſt Part of the Trade of Europe? We are the only Fools who have been prevail'd upon to engage inconſiderately in this War; to be at the greateſt Charge of it; to drain our Blood and Treaſure; and to hazard our Religion and Liberties by it, without propoſing ſo much as any Return to balance this Expence and Danger. Our Conduct is ſuch an Inſtance of Folly and Madneſs, as amazeth the preſent, and will not find Credit in future Ages." A. D. 1691.

Thus we find two oppoſite Parties joining in the ſame Cry; and whether they, or the Biſhop, ought to be moſt regarded, let the Reader decide, when the whole Caſe ſhall be laid before him.

His Lordſhip moreover tells us, That another Prejudice had more Colour, and as bad Effects: The King, ſays he, was thought to love the Dutch more than the Engliſh, to truſt more to them, and to admit them to more Freedom with him. He gave too much Occaſion to a general Diſguſt, which was ſpread both among the Engliſh Officers and the Nobility. He took little Pains to gain the Affections of the Nation; nor did he conſtrain himſelf enough, to render his Government more acceptable. He was ſhut up all the Day long; and his Silence, when he admitted any to an Audience, diſtaſted them as much as if they had been deny'd it. The Earl of Marlborough thought that the great Services he had done, were not acknowledg'd, nor rewarded as they well deſerv'd, and began to ſpeak like a Man diſcontented; and the Strain of all the Nation almoſt was, That the Engliſh were overlook'd, and the Dutch were the only Perſons favour'd or truſted. This was national; and the Engliſh being too apt to deſpiſe other Nations, and being of more lively Temper than the Dutch, grew to expreſs a Contempt and an Averſion for them that went almoſt to a Mutiny. It is true, the Dutch behav'd themſelves ſo well, and ſo regularly in their Quarters, and paid for every thing ſo punctually, whereas the Engliſh were apt to be rude and exacting, eſpecially thoſe who were all this Winter coming over from Ireland, who had been ſo long in an Enemy's Country, that they were not eaſily brought into Order; ſo that the common People were generally better pleas'd with the Dutch Soldiers than with their own Countrymen; but it was not the ſame as to the Officers."

That the King was thought to preſer the Dutch, and that there was ſome Colour for their Prejudice, are very cautious Terms; and argue, that though the Biſhop affects to remove the Veil, he was afraid to let in the Light: But thoſe who are willing to open their Eyes, will find, that what his Lordſhip is pleas'd to call Prejudice, was the Reſult of real Matter of Fact; of which the whole Reign is one continu'd Proof; and that the People were rather too patient in tamely bearing the flagrant and repeated Inſtances of that Preference, than too forward in reſenting them.

In

A. D. 1691. In the same cautious manner, his Lordship proceeds to say, "The King was also believ'd to be so tender in every Point that seem'd to relate to his Prerogative, that he could not well bear any thing that was a Diminution of it: And he was said to have taken a Dislike and Mistrust of all those whose Notions lean'd to public Liberty, tho' those were the Persons that were the firmest to him, and the most zealous for him."

Whether this was only said, or whether it was truly said, we have already, in fact, seen, and shall farther see in the Progress of this Work.

Lastly, in the same Breath that his Lordship observes this Tenderness when speaking of the King, he speaks out thus broadly of his Ministers, that is to say, of the Tory-Part of them, which were now the Majority. "The Men whose Notions of the Prerogative were the highest, were suspected to be Jacobites; yet it was observ'd, that many of these were much courted, and put into Employments, in which they shew'd so little Affection to the Government, and so close a Correspondence with its professed Enemies, that it was generally believ'd they intended to betray it." A. D. 1691.

And, on the other hand, in a Tory-Justification of King William, set forth at a particular Time, to serve a particular End, which will elsewhere be explan'd, we find it suggested, That his Majesty had been forc'd to disengage himself from his quondam Whiggish Co-adjutors, and to accept the Services of the Tories in their stead, because of their (b) scandalous Conduct; which, according to the Writer of that Piece, was not even to be counte-

(b) The Proofs brought in Support of this heinous Charge, are to be seen in the following Passages, which are suppos'd to be Minutes of a Conversation that pass'd between a Court-Lord, and an old Baronet of these Times:

"He (the old Baronet) then asked his Lordship if he did not remember a Complaint against Sir Fleetwood Shepherd, for that a Gentleman had bought of my Lord—a Place in the Houshold, and paid two hundred and fifty Pound for it; and that when he came, by Appointment, to be introduc'd, there was no such Employment ever heard of: That another had bought and paid for a Place of considerable Value, upon Information that the Person who had the Place before was dead, who was so far from being dead, that he had not been indispos'd in the least, or absented one Day from the Duty of his Employ; that when the great Lord was told of the thing, he pretended to know nothing of it, and sent them back to Sir Fleetwood Shepherd, who had receiv'd the Money in his Lordship's Name, who shuffled it back again to my Lord, and he to a third, till the People were ruined by the want of their Money and long Attendance?

His Lordship did not deny these things, but said they were but an Example or two; that there would always be Mistakes and little By-Steps among the Courtiers of every Side, one as well as the other. This moved the ancient Person to tell his Lordship, that had the Examples been few, he would have been of his mind, that it was not worth Notice, and that it would have justify'd his repeating them; neither would it have been a sufficient Reason why the King found himself oblig'd to discard and throw out the Persons who acted in such a manner; but it was well known to his Lordship, that these things were grown to such a height, that the very Court became scandalous, and the Enemies of the Revolution began to open their Mouths, and that with just Reason: That his Majesty was justly provok'd at it; but, taking up a Resolution, both to resent what was past, and to prevent the like, he found it to universally to affect those, who for the former Reasons he had thought to be his best Friends, that it exceedingly troubled him, and at last brought him to the Necessity of displacing some of the most eminent.

He told his Lordship, that for the Reasons mention'd before, he would not name the Person to every Action, but that in general his Lordship might remember how for the whole Court was corrupted, how almost every thing but the King himself, and some thought that Exception needless, was bought and sold; how Places given or Favours obtain'd, but for Money, and oftentimes Places sold, and the Possessors turn'd out, without any Offence, to make good the Sale; and then trifling Occasions were found out to dispossess the new Purchasers, to restore the old ones, and get more Money; Places sold two or three times over, and then Abatements obtain'd, before Men could get their Money again: He instanc'd in the Band of Pensioners, in the Government of Ireland, after the Settlement of it, in the Houshold, in the Treasury, and in several other Cases, too long to be repeated.

He went on to recite some particular Cases, which, for the Reputation of some Men living, I forbear to repeat; how the King was impos'd upon, to advance whoever those Men directed, and what Price they made of their Favours to those who they were obtain'd for; how at last they came that Length, that if his Majesty did not gratify them in every thing they desir'd, they would obligingly threaten to leave him, telling him how necessary they were to him, how great their Interest was in the Country. They had, in short, the Face to hint, that they not only made him King, but that they kept the Crown upon his Head; a thing which the great Genius of the King could not stoop to bear; and, therefore it was no wonder, that his Majesty watch'd his Opportunity to let them know they were mistaken, and that he could reign without them.

When he had gone thro' this Part of the Complaint, he proceeded to mention the Conduct of those great Men to the King in Person; how they continually importun'd him for additional Places, threw back upon him as an Argument, or rather a Reproach, their former Services and Sufferings, and that one came to that Pitch as to tell his Majesty, almost in plain Terms, that he had never been King but for him, and that he did not think himself suitably rewarded, tho' he possess'd at that time about three thousand Pound per annum in Places, and had so sensible an Influence, and became so popular by the King's Favour, as to have the Court of the Mob made to him, and to obtain the name of King of Eltham.

He then ask'd his Lordship, If he did not remember how upon the continu'd Importunity of the said King of Hearts, his Majesty became so uneasy, that he told him one Day, he would be glad that Lord would put all his Demands into one Head, that he might see if the whole Kingdom could satisfy him; that upon the first thing that ever his Majesty thought fit to deny to another great Lord, he return'd short upon the King, that he was very sorry his Service was not agreeable to his Majesty, and beg'd his Majesty's Leave to retire into the Country; to which the King to his Surprize assenting, he withdrew with scarce Restraint enough upon his Passion, to preserve him in his Duty: How upon this Lord's Disgust, another came to his Majesty and made him the like Complaint; to whom his Majesty return'd nothing but this, that seeing that his Lordship was going from the Court, it would be proper to leave his KEY behind him?

His Lordship smil'd at the hearing all this, and only reply'd two or three times as he went on, that Sir——— had a good ill-natur'd Memory.

The Relator proceeded to what I did not expect to hear: For, said he, 'Your Lordship knows very well, that this is not all, for that some of these Men did not content themselves to treat the King in this manner, but went yet farther, viz. to carry their Discontents to some private Consultations, for the forming another Revolution, and to let the King know, that it was more in their Power to make him uneasy, than he thought of. Your Lordship is not ignorant who they were that went this length; nay, more than that, who was the Man who discover'd this wicked Part first to the King, and what Acknowledgment his Majesty made to him for it.

But I have gone far enough, says the Relator: The Indemnity having bury'd all these things in Forgetfulness, I shall not uncover the Carcasses of the Deceased, any farther than Necessity obliges me; besides, says he, your Lordship knows all these things to be true; I need but just name them; that also being sufficient to answer the Complaints of those People, who object against the King's employing Jacobites, and passing an Act of Indemnity: For, my Lords, says he, you may here see the true Reason why the King was oblig'd to employ other People, and, why many of those who came over with him, and were forwarded in the Revolution, were so soon his Majesty's Enemies, and flew in his Face; opposing all his Measures, and giving him all the Uneasiness possible; that is to say, that, having treated him in such a manner as above, and having thereby made themselves intolerable to him, they filled our Ears with Complaints of the King's employing other People, which it is evident his Majesty did not, till having first employ'd these in all the most considerable Posts of the Government, as well for Profit as for

A. D. 1691. countenanc'd by any former Example within the Memory of Man; for not content with making a Market of his Court, where Places of Truſt and Profit were publickly ſold, with riſling his Woods and Foreſts, and practiſing every other Abuſe of the like nature, they betray'd his Councils, treated him rudely to his very Face, and brought the very Government itſelf to the Verge of Ruin. A. D. 1691.

To do Juſtice to both Parties, perhaps, both ought to be believ'd; and though ſome Compaſſion is due to a Prince thus ſorely beſet, much more is due to the People, at whoſe Expence he was to be ſerv'd, and his Inſtruments were to be gratify'd.

But to return: On the 22d his Majeſty open'd the Seſſion with the following Speech:

The King's Speech at the opening of the Seſſion.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I appointed this Meeting of the Parliament as ſoon as ever the Affairs abroad would admit of my Return into England, that you might have the more time to conſider of the beſt and moſt effectual Ways and Means for the carrying on of the War againſt France this next Year.

I am willing to hope, that the good Succeſs with which it has pleaſed God to bleſs my Arms in Ireland this Summer, will not only be a great Encouragement to you to proceed the more chearfully in this Work, but will be look'd upon by you as an Earneſt of future Succeſſes, which your timely Aſſiſtance to me may, by God's Bleſſing, procure to us all. And as I do not doubt, but you will take care to pay the Arrears of that Army, which hath been ſo deſerving and ſo proſperous in the Reducement of Ireland to a peaceable Condition, ſo I do aſſure you, there ſhall no Care be wanting on my Part, to keep that Kingdom, as far as it is poſſible, from being burdenſome to England for the future.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I do not doubt but you all are ſenſible, that it will be neceſſary we ſhould have a ſtrong Fleet next Year, and as early at Sea as we had this Summer. And I muſt tell you, that the great Power of France will as neceſſarily require, that we ſhould maintain a very conſiderable Army, ready upon all Occaſions, not only to defend ourſelves from any Inſult, but alſo to annoy the Common Enemy, where it may be moſt ſenſible to them. And I do not ſee how it is poſſible to do this with leſs than ſixty-five thouſand Men.

I ſhall only add, that by the Vigour and Diſpatch of your Councils, and Aſſiſtance to me in this Seſſion of Parliament, you have now an Opportunity in your Hands, which, if neglected, you can never reaſonably hope to ſee again; not only to eſtabliſh the future Quiet and Proſperity of theſe Kingdoms, but the Peace and Security of all Europe."

Thus by the Reduction of Ireland, we are to underſtand, that there was but one Object in the whole Circuit of Government remaining, that was worth his Majeſty's Attention, or the Deliberation of Parliament; namely, the redoubling our Efforts againſt France, by the Means of a ſtrong Fleet, and ſuch an Army as this Nation had never heard mention'd from the Throne before. Upon this ſingle Hinge the whole Speech turns; and ſo reſign'd were both Houſes to the Opinion of his Majeſty, that in their Addreſſes they not only congratulated him on his happy Return, after ſo many Hazards, as alſo on the Succeſs of his Arms, and made their Acknowledgments to his Queen for her prudent Adminiſtration, but enter'd into a ſort of Engagement to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their Power in carrying on a vigorous War againſt France, in order, indeed, ſay they, to procure an honourable and laſting Peace to his own Dominions, and to ſecure his Neighbours from the Injuries and Invaſions of the common Oppreſſor.

What Oppoſition was made to this general Engagement, or by whom, we do not find ſpecify'd; and how far it was conſtru'd to extend, we ſhall be inform'd by the Money-Bills, as they come before us in the Courſe of the Seſſion.

Points of Oppoſition.

Tho' all agreed in the Proſecution of the War, there was, however, a Diverſity of Opinions as to the Manner: The Courtiers, or the Majority of them, were for gratifying the King in his own way, while thoſe who had been ſhut out of the Court-Paſture, as generally, adopted the true Intereſt of the Nation, if not for Conſcience ſake, at leaſt to give the more Weight and Significancy to their Arguments; and over and above, made it their Buſineſs to explore every Method of making the Poſſeſſion of Power uneaſy to thoſe who held it; under popular Pretences, but with an Eye to their own private Advantage.

The Conduct of the Fleet.

Thus the ſeveral Committees had no ſooner enter'd on their ſeveral Provinces, than the naval Conduct of this Year was brought into queſtion; with a View, perhaps, of revenging on Admiral Ruſſel the Treatment which Lord Torrington had met with, for that of the laſt: But if that was the Caſe, the Experiment did not anſwer; for the Admiral produc'd his Inſtructions, as alſo Copies of his ſubſequent Orders; and, upon the whole Matter, endeavour'd to fix the Blame of every Miſtake and Miſcarriage on the Admiralty-Board and the Dutch: For, being aſk'd, Why he did not ſail ſooner from the Buoy of the Nore, the Fleet being ready, and the Wind being fair, for ſeveral Days together? he anſwer'd, Becauſe he did not think himſelf ſtrong enough, [which was the very Plea of Lord Torrington the Year before] his whole Strength, excluſive of the Dutch, not exceeding fifty Ships, and They refuſing to aſſiſt in the Blockade of Dunkirk, which was abſolutely neceſſary to be maintain'd, till their whole for Truſt; they had taken ſo many ways as I have now mention'd to inform him, that they were not to be depended upon, and that however they might deſerve well of the Government by Suffering, they would never deſerve well by Doing; and that however they had been ill uſed under the old Government, they did not thereby appear qualify'd to be concern'd in the new. [Secret Hiſtory of one Year, &c.

A. D. 1691. whole Complement was come up. Being then ask'd, Why he did not put to Sea immediately on their Arrival? his Answer was, That he then wanted Provisions; And again, Why he linger'd so long in Torbay after the Wind came fair? he said, That he waited for Orders, which he had several times importun'd the Admiralty for, but could not in all that time procure: And that by one of the Clauses in his Instructions whenever he came into Port, he was tied up from sailing without. Thus it was admitted, that there was a Fault somewhere, but no body was punish'd, or even censur'd.: For in the Course of the Controversy, such an artful Cloud was rais'd, that in it both Offender and Offence were lost.

The Oeconomy of the Army was also inspected, and such a Detection was made of Frauds among the Officers in relation to the Fulness of their Corps, that Regulations were made, or pretended to be made, for the future Payment of the Forces, by actual Musters of Effectives only.

Another Debate arose on the Abuses of Place and Office; in the Course of which, so many strong things were urged to shew the Necessity of a Regulation on that Head, that the House was, in a manner, sham'd into the following Orders.

Abuses of Offices. That the Commissioners appointed for taking and stating the public Accounts, should lay before the House, a List of all such Persons as, having Salaries, had procur'd the King to pay the Charge of passing their Accounts, together with the Taxes upon their Offices.

As also, a List of such as, holding great Salaries, had, upon slight Pretences, got them augmented; and who had extraordinary Bills of incident Charges easily allow'd.

As also, a List of such Salaries as were at first granted for special Reasons, and were still continu'd, though the said Reasons had ceas'd.

As also, a List of the excessive Fees which had been exacted by such Officers as had great Salaries annex'd to their Places, and for which Fees no legal Precedent was to be found.

As also, to inspect the Civil List, and specify the several Pensions and Allowances granted to Persons discharg'd of their Offices, by which the Charge of the Civil List had been increas'd.

The Amount of all Salaries above five hundred Pound per ann. vested to the War. And, as if they were one and all convinc'd, that those in Place ought to be made sensible of the Weight of their own Measures by the Diminution of their own Profits, they resolv'd, Nemine Contradicente, That all the Profits arising on every Place in the Gift of the Crown, either by Salary, Fee, or Perquisite, above and beyond five hundred Pound, should be apply'd to the Charge of the War, with an Exception to the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Commissioners of the Great Seal, the Judges, Ministers residing in foreign Courts, and the Officers of the Fleet and Army. It ought, however, to be observ'd, that some Days had interven'd between this seemingly-home Resolution, and the preparatory Orders which precede it; for the first were made December the third, and the last did not take place till the 12th; in which Interval some warm Debates had occur'd on the State of the Nation; and, in the Course of them, those in the Opposition had artfully enough suggested, That if the Power of France was indeed so formidable, and such prodigious Sums were annually necessary to reduce it, we ought to begin with a Reduction of all our Expences at home. In the same Interval also, a Bill was brought in by Sir Walter Young, for the ascertaining both of the Commissions and Salaries of the Judges; by putting it out of the King's Power to stop the Latter, or annul the Former, unless for Mal-Administration; and another to limit and annex the Duchy of Lancaster, together with the Revenues thereof, to the Crown, and also to provide, that the said Revenues should be paid into the Exchequer; possibly, for fear of its being portion'd out among the Minions of the Court. A. D. 1692.

[Burnet.] Our Historian-Bishop, so often quoted, from hence, it must be presum'd, takes Occasion to say, That these Seeds of Discontent (meaning the Prejudices imbib'd against the Dutch and a Land-War) were carefully manag'd by the Enemies of the Government; and that by these Means Matters went heavily on in the House of Commons: But then he is pleas'd to intimate also, That the taking off Parliament Men who complain'd of Grievances, by Places and Pensions, was believ'd to be now very generally practis'd: And, possibly it was owing to this Practice, that the great Resolution relating to Salaries, Fees, &c. was first weaken'd by farther Exceptions; that is to say, the Queen-Dowager, the Princess Anne, and such other Persons as the House should think fit to favour; and at last finally dropt: The whole three Kingdoms, it seems, not being able to furnish Persons disinterested enough, to serve their Country for so small a Consideration as five hundred Pounds a Year.

Proceedings on the Estimates. But how heavily soever Matters went on under these Difficulties and Discouragements, the troublesome Party gave sufficient Indications, that they were not willing to make the Court desperate; for a Motion having been made on the thirtieth of October, for a Supply, it was unanimously resolv'd on the sixth of November following, "That a Supply be granted to their Majesties for the carrying on a vigorous War against France." And when the Estimates for the Navy had pass'd thro' the Forms of the House, one Million, five hundred and seventy-five thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight Pounds was on the ninth voted for the Sea-Service (including Ordnance and the Charge of building one dry Dock and two wet Docks at Portsmouth.) Ten Days after it was farther resolv'd, That an Army of sixty-four thousand nine hundred and twenty-four Men, without including Officers, was necessary for the Service of the Year 1692, in order to the securing the Peace of the Kingdom, and the carrying on a vigorous War against France. And yet when they

A. D. 1691. they had gone thus far in their Compliances with the very Letter of his Majesty's Speech, they proceeded to weigh every Item in the Pay-Master's Lists by Grains and Scruples, and took up so much time on every one of them, as also in adjusting the Proportion that was to be furnish'd towards the Expence out of the Revenue of Ireland, that it was the fourth of January before they finally resolv'd, That a Sum not exceeding one Million, nine hundred and thirty-five thousand, seven hundred and eighty-seven Pounds, together with the Sum of one hundred and sixty-five thousand Pounds to be answer'd out of the Revenue of Ireland, be the Sum for the Land-Forces for the Service of 1692.

That his Majesty might, however, be kept in some tolerable Degree of Temper, during this long Interval of Suspence and Expectation, they dispatch'd two Money-Bills, and sent them to the House of Lords; namely, one for an additional Excise of Nine-pence per Barrel on Beer, Ale, &c. which receiv'd the Royal Assent December 24, and one for a Land-Tax of two Shillings in the Pound; which also receiv'd the Royal Assent on the thirty-first: Upon which Occasion his Majesty was pleas'd to express himself as follows:

King's Speech to both Houses on passing the Money-Bills.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I must not lose this Occasion of returning you my hearty Thanks for the great Proofs you continue to give me, of your Zeal and Resolution to support and assist me in the vigorous Prosecution of the War against France next Year: And I assure you it shall be my greatest Care that the Assistance you give me, may be so apply'd, as to render them more effectual for the Aids you design'd them: But I must take notice to you at the same time, with some Trouble, that the new Year is already come; while our Preparations for it are not only more backward, but those of our Enemies, as we have reason to think, in greater Forwardness, than they were the last Year. I find myself therefore necessitated from this Consideration, most earnestly to recommend to you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, the hastening such farther Supplies as you design for the Prosecution of the War.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Season being so far advanc'd, this present Sessions cannot admit of a much longer Continuance, and therefore I must recommend to you the Dispatch of all such other Bills, that you shall judge necessary for the Public Good."

It is remarkable, that the House which hast hitherto proceeded so deliberately in the great Business before them, appear'd to be now so intent on Dispatch, that they allow'd themselves but a Four Days Recess, during the Christmas Hollidays; whence it must be suppos'd, that his Majesty's quickening Speech was calculated only to countenance what had been resolv'd on before. But if this was really the Case, it was manag'd with great Decency and Address: For though Bishop Burnet observes, all the Money that was asked was granted, the same Face of Opposition was continu'd till the Session broke up. A. D. 1691.

Thus, on the first of January, an additional Bill for continuing the Commissioners of Accounts, which was brought in by Sir Christopher Musgrove, was receiv'd, and after it had gone through all the Forms of the House, was finally sent up to the Lords. Another to lessen the Interest of Money (probably with a view to straiten the Ministry in their Borrowings on the public Funds) from the same Quarter, had the same Success; as also, two others, which were yet of a tenderer Nature, than either of the two former; and these were for vesting the forfeited Estates in England and Ireland, in his Majesty, to be apply'd for the Use of the War: And a fifth to proportion the Pay of the Army to the real Complement of Men, and to prevent false Musters. [1691-2.] Opposition Bills.

But the Majority of the Lords had their Province as well as the Commons, and could put in for their Share of Merit, by refusing, as the Commons by granting. When therefore the Army-Bill came before them, they rais'd such Objections, made such Amendments, and maintain'd them with such Obstinacy, that the Bill was lost. When also the Commons, by repeated Messages, put them in mind of the two Bills, in relation to the English and Irish Forfeitures, they suffer'd them to continue on the Table, without Notice, and, together with the Interest-Bill, to be swept off at the End of the Session among the rest of their Waste Paper. And, lastly, as to the additional Bill for taking the public Accounts, it had a Fate so peculiar, that it deserves a suitable Notice: The Lords send it down to the Commons with Amendments, January the twenty-eighth: The Commons disagree, and signify as much at a Conference; February the fifth the Lords insist on their Amendments: The Commons, at another Conference, insist on their Disagreement; the Lords adhere; the Commons do the same: And thus the Progress of this Bill also, was at at end. But this was not all: After so many Slights and Disappointments, the Commons relapse into their former Sullenness, and suffer'd the Residue of the Supply to remain unprovided for, till they had receiv'd Satisfaction; whether only in their public, or whether in their private Capacities also, cannot be precisely determin'd. On the same Day, a Proclamation was set forth for putting the Laws in force against Prosaneness and Debauchery; which was just as much regarded by those to whom it was address'd, as by those who drew it up. They had on the twenty-third of January adopted the Resolutions of the Committee on Ways and Means, for a Quarterly-Poll; by which all Persons, except Children, Servants, and such as, on account of their Poverty, were exempt from Parish-Dues, &c. were to pay a Shilling every Quarter; every Gentleman, or reputed Gentleman, of three hundred Pounds per ann. twenty Shillings; every Person worth three hundred Pounds ten Shillings; every beneficed Clergyman or Teacher, of eighty Pounds

A Controversy between the two Houses on a Bill for continuing the Commissioners of Accounts.

A.D.1691-92 Pounds a-year, twenty Shillings; every Lord of Parliament ten Pound, and Nonjurors double. A Bill had been drawn up on these Resolutions, and waited for nothing but the Forms of the House. When, therefore, the Lords prov'd thus obstinate in the Matter of the Account-Bill, they made no Scruple to tack the Contents of it, by way of Proviso, to that for the Poll. And this laid their Lordships under a Necessity, either to digest the one, or deprive his Majesty of the Benefit of the other.

The Commons carry their Point by a Tack.

Their Lordships, as it is natural to imagine, were not insensible of the Difficulty; and when it came before them, appointed a Committee to consider of Expedients for the Reservation of their Privileges. Of this Committee the Earl of Mulgrave was Chairman: But the Expedient propos'd by them not being reliss'd by the House, they resolv'd themselves into a general Committee, in which Lord Godolphin presided. And the Result of all was a Resolution, that an Entry should be made in their Books; in the nature of a Protest against a Compliance, which the Necessities of the Times had oblig'd them to make. Accordingly, under this Umbrage, the Bill was pass'd February the 23d, and produc'd the two following Protests (which were sign'd St. Albans, Derby, To. Oxon, Rochester, Aylesbury, T. Jermyn, Scarsdale) Namely, to the Bill.

Protests on this Occasion.

"Because the Substance of the Proviso added at the End of the Bill, for taking the Accounts of the public Moneys, hath been in a Bill by itself this present Session of Parliament, which having not pass'd through the two Houses, by reason of the Disagreement upon some Amendments offer'd by the Lords to the said Bill, ought not, by the known and constant Methods of Proceedings, to be brought in again in the same Session, and, consequently, we conceive the tacking of the said Proviso to this Poll-Bill is unparliamentary, highly prejudicial to the Privileges of the Peers, and may be of dangerous Consequence to the Prerogative of the Crown and to the Entry."

"Because, we conceive, that an Entry on the Journal of this House, to excuse the complying at this time in a thing so unparliamentary, as the Matter now in Question is, upon the Account of the present Necessity or Danger, how pressing or imminent soever, will be of no Force, to prevent the doing the same, when the like Necessity or Danger may be pretended; but the consenting once to such unprecedented Proceedings, may always be made use of, as one Argument more, for the agreeing to them for the future."

By this Bill the additional Duties of Excise granted in the preceding Year, were continu'd to May 17, 1697; and it was farther provided, that if the Poll-Tax, by the Duplicates of Assessments fell short of one Million three hundred and forty-one thousand seven hundred Pounds, the Supplement might be borrow'd and charg'd upon the Credit of the Exchequer in general.

We are now to treat of such other important Matters, as were the Growth of this Session, but not in the manner they are generally treated of; as what unavoidably protracted the Consideration of the Supply: For when the Majority are thoroughly connected with the Crown, and dispos'd to gratify all its Desires in the Gross, That is consider'd as the One Thing Needful; and all other Considerations are made to give way to it. A.D.1691-92

Disputes about the East-India Trade.

And first, of the Attempt that was now made, to subvert the old East India Company, and erect a new one upon its Ruins. This was a Scheme which had been long concerting, and which took its Rise from all the several Motives, which give the strongest Impulse to the human Mind. In the Years 1680, 81, 82, 83, the Price of India-Stock was three hundred and sixty per cent. and their Dividends proportionable. This struck all Europe with Admiration, and our Rivals in Trade, more particularly, with Envy and Malignity: It also enflam'd the Avarice of Individuals among ourselves; prompted many to invade the exclusive Rights of the Company, in order to share in the Profits: And, at last, divided the whole Court and Mercantile Interest into opposite Factions; those in Possession of the Golden Prize striving with all their Might to keep their Hold; and those who coveted that Possession striving as ardently to oblige them to quit it.

The Foundation of this Struggle was laid towards the End of the Reign of King Charles II. and from that time to the Year before us, the Controversy had been kept alive by the Partizans on both Sides, sometimes by the Press, and always by underhand Intrigues and corrupt Applications.

The Company was first incorporated in the forty-third Year of Queen Elizabeth, with an exclusive Right of Commerce, upon a joint Stock for fifteen Years. In the seventh of James I. they obtain'd a Charter, erecting them into a perpetual Body-politic. In the Year 1661, they obtain'd a Confirmation of all their former Privileges, with an express Clause, that none should be permitted to interfere in that Commerce, without Licence from them. The perpetual Propriety of Bombay was granted to them in the twentieth of Car. II. and that of St. Helena five Years after: And, lastly, they receiv'd another Charter of Confirmation in the second of James II. All, however, under a Proviso, that, upon a three Years Notice, it should be in the Power of the Crown to make those Charters void.

That this Company, and that of Holland, should be natural Enemies, those who know the Force of interfering Interests, will naturally believe; That the English Company had suffer'd great Injuries from, or, at least, had made great Complaints of, the Dutch; and that, in the late Reign in particular, these Complaints were very highly insisted upon, we have been already appriz'd: But whether the Dutch, taking the Advantage of their Ascendancy in our Court, had any Share in the Managements we are now to speak of, there is not sufficient Evidence to determine.

The

A. D. 1691-92. The Complaints brought againſt the Directors, were deduc'd from the Year 1682, when, it is ſaid, that Sir Joſiah Child all at once forſook all his old Friends who firſt introduc'd him, with great Difficulty, into the Committee, and afterwards rais'd him to the Honour of Governor, throwing them totally out of the Management; as Sir Samuel Bernardiſton, Sir John Merdant, Sir Matthew Andrews, Sir Humphry Edwin, Thomas Papillion, Charles Thorold, John Page, and Thomas Canham, Eſquires, for not yielding and complying with his new Projects, which were foreſeen and foretold by his ſaid Friends and others, to be fatal and deſtructive: And in the Courſe of theſe Complaints, it is alledg'd, that the ſaid Sir Joſiah, being deaf to the Advice of his Friends, and betaking himſelf to his new Counſellors who were very ignorant in the Trade, proceeded in the next Place, to caſt off Sir John Blakes, Sir Jeremy Sambrooke, Sir Thomas Dacal, Major Robert Thomſon, Edward Rudge, and Colonel Clarke, with others, who had long Experience in that Trade; ſome of whom, however, went too far with him, and many of them did afterwards fall under his Miſrepreſentation at Court, as being ill-affected to the Government, for ſelling and leſſening their Stocks, and not joining in Matters that the Law would not juſtify: That theſe Gentlemen, or ſo many of them that ſtood in his way, being remov'd, the great Miniſters and chief Men at Court, fell in with Sir Joſiah, not doubting but to have found a ſufficient Fund for carrying on any public Deſign either of War or otherwiſe: That by his great, annual Preſents, he could command both at Court and in Weſtminſter-Hall what he pleas'd: That thereupon a great Fleet was prepar'd, with Soldiers and all other warlike Preparations, ſometimes giving out, it was againſt the Dutch; That this Affair was manag'd and conſulted by Sir Joſiah and a private Committee, altho' theſe worthy Gentlemen of the ſaid Committee often declar'd, they knew very little or nothing of what was tranſacted: That in the end, the hopeful Treaty that was then on foot in London, by Commiſſioners appointed from the Dutch Eaſt-India Company for reſtoring and making (e) Satisfaction for Bantam, was rejected, and new Meaſures taken, to the great Surprize of the Dutch Nation, and the conſidering Men amongſt ourſelves, who had any Cognizance of the Affair: That Matters being not yet ripe abroad to fall upon the Proteſtants, all this Warlike Preparation ended in a War with that great and mighty Emperor the Mogul and the King of Siam; in the Proſecution of which, our Ships were employ'd in India for the taking and ſeizing of all their, and their Subjects, Ships and Eſtates, even thoſe in our Ports at Bombay; though they had our Factors Paſſes for Security; without either Declaration of War, or Demand firſt made, which, beſides the great Diminution of the Nation's Honour, had occaſion'd the Ruin of our many beneficial Settlements there (the Fruit of which we had but yet begun to taſte, eſpecially in the Bay of Bengal, then ſaid to be the greateſt and richeſt Province in any known Part of the Univerſe); that in the Space of about twenty-three Years, [No. 26. 60.] our

(e) And yet, in the Anſwer of the Committee of Seventeen, repreſenting the Dutch Eaſt-India Company, to the Engliſh Memorial, their Complaints are treated in expreſs Terms, as frivolous; and inſtead of being liable to ſuch Complaints, we find it aſſerted, that they merited Acknowledgments from the Engliſh; which they endeavour'd to prove, by annexing a brief Account of the War between the King of Bantam and his Son, to whom he had made a voluntary Reſignation of his Dominions, in which the Engliſh had aſſiſted the Former, and Dutch the Latter, in the Manner following:

"The reigning King (the Son) being brought to the utmoſt Exigencity, by reaſon there was no Acceſs to him, but by thoſe well ſtill'd in the Ways, and that by Stealth, he apply'd himſelf to thoſe of Batavia, with earneſt Intreaty for Aſſiſtance from the Companies, and to be taken into their Protection: declaring, That without it, he was not able to defend the Netherland Lodge againſt his Rebels; which Application being made on the tenth of February, 1682, was not precipitately granted by the General and Council; but after long Deliberations, it was reſolv'd to ſend a friendly Mediation both to Father and Son: and two Letters were ſent to Father and Son by Major Stephen Martin, on the fifteenth of March, to Bantam; but the Father would not receive them till the ſeventeenth, and then ſent for them by Engliſh, French, and Danes, but vouchſafed no Anſwer; holding the aforeſaid King, in the mean time, in the aforeſaid Caſtle cluſter and cloſer beſieg'd; ſo that Major Stephen Martin was oblig'd, by many Letters from the young King, to endeavour to head, as being the only Means to free him, but was oppoſ'd and hinder'd that Day by the Rebels, whoſe Cannons were moſt of them directed by Engliſh Commoners, and did much Damage both to the Ships and Men of the Dutch Company. Upon which the aforeſaid Stephen Martin being re-inforc'd with more Men and Ships, as alſo Orders, to attempt again to head and relieve the King that was in the utmoſt Extremity. And at laſt, on the ſeventh of April, they beat off the Rebels for all the great Reſiſtance they made, reliev'd the King, took in the Paſſes with no ſmall Loſs; and drove the old King and his Adherents into Yortſoffe and the Hills adjacent. Few Days after the Relief of the young King, the Engliſh Company reſuming at Bantam four Letters by ſome of their Company, addreſs'd to the General and Council of Batavia; and after Congratulation of our Succeſs, deſir'd them to ſend them a Ship of five hundred Tons, to fetch off, and tranſport, their Effects from Bantam; for which they offer'd to pay the Freight. They alſo deſir'd Liberty to hire a Houſe at Batavia, to put their Goods in: And further declar'd, That they would give Orders to the Servants of the Company to comport themſelves according to the uſual Love and Friendſhip of the Dutch towards them. Upon which, the Generals and Council, to ſhew their Readineſs and Kindneſs, immediately lent them the Europe, a Ship of twelve hundred Tons, and alſo allow'd their Retreat to Batavia; thereupon, they fearing to ſtay in Bantam any longer, with all Secrecy ſhipp'd themſelves on board the ſaid Ship without taking Leave of the King, and retir'd to Batavia on the eighteenth of April, leaving the Groſs of their Effects in Bantam: To fetch which, there were three other Ships ſent, viz. The New Middleburg, the Weſt, and the great Fly-Boat, Delph's-Haven: All which, with ſome of the Engliſh Company that were neceſſary to ſhip the Goods and cover them, return'd to Batavia, full loaden with Pepper, &c. as alſo the Houſhold-Stuff of the aforeſaid Company to Batavia. All which they could not have done, unleſs the Dutch Company had not interceded with the King, and help'd them; for that King and People were ſo fet againſt them, that they could not get a Boat, nor a Porter to help ſhip their Goods, but all was done by help of the Dutch; the King being greatly incens'd at the Conduct of the Engliſh, as to himſelf, and it was greatly wonder'd that the Dutch Companies ſhould ſpeak in their Favour, or be helpful to them, by reaſon it was apparent that they, by their Art in working the Guns, did moſt hurt to our Ships as well as the Dutch. The Dutch Company alſo ſuſtain'd great Loſs for want of four Ships to long; and although the Engliſh were oblig'd to give us our Ships ſooner, eſpecially when they had other Ships of their own from ſeveral Quarters, beſides two Engliſh Ships belonging to particular Perſons that were expreſſly deſir'd by the Dutch Company to ſhip the aforeſaid Goods: But the Engliſh employ'd their Ships in other Expeditions, and let our Ships lye loaden with their Effects and Lumber before Bantam.

The Matter of Fact being laid down in the aforeſaid Relation, we refer it to the Wiſdom of your High and Mighty Lordſhips, to conſider whether or no there be any Foundation for ſuch ſevere Complaints, and Demands of Satisfaction for Damages and Injuries ſuſtain'd, as alſo to withdraw our Troops from thence."

A.D.1691-92 our Trade in that Province alone, hath advanc'd from eight thousand Pounds to upwards of three hundred thousand Pounds per annum: And that if this pernicious War had not interven'd, it might have been advanc'd much farther by a prudent Conduct, to the great Honour and Advantage of the Nation.

[No. 2660.] It having been also inserted in the London-Gazette, that not only a Peace was made between the Great Mogul and the English General at Bombay, but accompany'd with greater Advantages than the Company had enjoy'd before, the adverse Party set forth an exact Copy of the Mogul's (d) Phirmaund or Rescript, for the Re-establishment of the Peace, in the following Words:

"It is directed to Ibrahim Chaune, who is one of the Mogul's great Governors, dated the 27th of April in the 33d Year of his Reign.

"IBRAHIM CHAUNE,

"Know this, That the good Fortune of the English hath directed them the right way to end their Faults; they are sorry and asham'd for what they have done, therefore have sent their Vakeel's [Factors] to our noble Court, with a Petition for a gracious Phirmaund to pardon their Faults; which the King, out of his great Favour and Mercy, always ready to pardon, doth freely forgive them; therefore his clear and unspotted Order is such, which you are to observe as you do his that you pray to, that so soon as this gracious Phirmaund reaches your Hands, you suffer no body in your Jurisdiction to molest, hurt, or hinder the English Nation in their Business, but suffer them to carry it on in the same Manner as formerly. This understand and act accordingly."

The same Persons also set forth the Phirmaund for Surat, which deserves also to be inserted, with a Note of Admiration, that those who consult their Interest so much, should regard their Credit so little.

The PHIRMAUND for Surat.

[White's Account of the East-India Trade, Fol.] "All the English having made an humble submissive Petition, That the ill Crimes they have done may be pardon'd, and requested a noble Phirmaund to make their being forgiven, manifest, and sent their Vakeels to the heavenly Palace, the most illustrious in the World, to get the Royal Favour. And Ettimaud Chaune (the Governor of Surat's Petition to the famous Court, equal to the Skies) being arriv'd, that they would present the great King with a Fine of one hundred and fifty thousand Rupees to his noble Treasury, resembling the Sun, and would restore the Merchants Goods they took away, to the Owners of them, and would walk by the ancient Customs of the Port, and behave themselves for the future no more in such a shameful manner. A.D.1691-92

Wherefore his Majesty, according to his daily Favour to all People of the World, hath pardon'd their Faults, mercifully forgiven them, and out of his princely Condescension agrees, That the Present be put into the Treasure of the Port, the Merchants Goods be return'd, the Town flourish, and they follow their Trade as in former Times; and Mr. Child, who did the Disgrace, be turn'd out and expell'd.

This Order is irreversible."

"These, says the Publisher of these Papers, are their new Patents, but may much more properly be styl'd Gracious Pardons: And although I am well assur'd the Mahometans will religiously observe them, if the Christians that are concern'd do punctually perform the Conditions on their Part; yet, certainly, there is no Class of Mankind but must needs be affected with most passionate Resentments, to see the Honour of our Mother-Country expos'd to this Contempt and Ignominy, and our common Name stigmatiz'd with such opprobrious Epithets. But what still makes the Consideration much more sad, is, that the black Characters are, in a manner, indelible; for these Instruments are repositted amongst the Records in the Court of that great Prince, where they are like to remain as long as God continues a Being to the World; and so the Reproach will be entail'd on our Posterity."

It was yet farther objected to the Company

(d) Which was farther commented upon, as follows:

"This is the Instrument that stands upon Record in the Court of the great Prince, to the eternal Infamy of the English Nation; as the Effect of our most unjust and unaccountable War, whereby not only the Honour of the English (before in the highest Esteem) but the Interest of the Company in particular, hath suffer'd an immense and irreparable Damage; tho' some few Managers, by unwarrantable and indirect Means, have gain'd prodigious Estates: For, as to the Nation and Company, after the Loss of six Years Trade, and the Destruction of many considerable Ships, and the Death of many hundred of our best Seamen; the Condition on which we are now re-admitted to trade, is, That full Restitution be made to the Mogul's Subjects for all the Ships and Goods the Company have taken, according to the Accounts which shall be given in by the Crannies (or Parsees) of the Ships taken by the English: And though we cannot yet tell the certain Sum which must be made good, we may shrewdly guess at it from the Evidence given in the Cause now depending between their Majesties and the Company, on account of those Prizes, wherein a great Number of Witnesses have depos'd to the Value of above one Million Sterling: Besides which, they are likewise indebted in India, at no small Interest, above three hundred thousand Pounds more, and no less a Sum here at home, on Bond, and for Freight and Demurrage; whilst all their Stock in England will not extend to discharge their late made Dividend; nor all their Effects abroad, to load home one third of the Shipping, now in India, besides the great Sums they owe to those Ships for their Service and Demurrage; which is not only manifest by the Liberty and Encouragement they give to private Men to return their particular Estates on those Bottoms, but especially by the general Letter which accompany'd the Phirmaund, written to the Company by their Factors at Surat, whereby they earnestly press for a large and speedy Supply to support and carry on the Trade.

In consideration of these exorbitant Impositions on the Nation, and from a true Affection to their Country, there are some Gentlemen and Merchants who have long apply'd their Thoughts to the restoring this so considerable a Trade; and in order thereto, are prepared to lay before our honourable Representatives in Parliament, at their next Session, a clear and ample Account by what Ways and Means the Credit and Interest of the English Nation in India, hath been reduc'd to so miserable a Condition; and, in the Interim, they hope it may not be an unacceptable Service to the Public, That they offer this brief Advertisement for Caution against the presumptuous Impositions of daring and arbitrary Men, who have of late Years increased their Estates by the Ruin of their Fellow-Subjects, and have been the Instruments of this great Dishonour and Detriment to their Country. [Out of Lord Somers's Collection, vol. XXIV.

A.D. 1691-92 pany by their Adversaries, That thro' the most scandalous Neglect, they had lost the Spice Island of Polleroon to the Dutch, in the Year 1664, which, though of inestimable Value, was held only by twelve People, who had their Residence in a Wooden Fort, set up for Shew, and incapable of Use: That they had accepted about three thousand Pounds for their Right to a Moiety of the Customs of Gombron in Persia, granted to their Predecessors for assisting the Sophi to take Ormuz from the Portuguese, and which in the Years 1671 and 1672, amounted to about eighty thousand Pounds per. ann. That by annexing Votes to Shares, instead of Persons, after the Rate of a Vote for every five hundred Pound Stock (on these narrow Maxims, That the Stock ought to govern the Stock, and that he who had most Money in it, ought to have most Power over it) they had enabled one Person (Child) to usurp an absolute Dominion over the other Adventurers: That in two or three Years last past, it could be prov'd, that the Joint-stock had been wrong'd above one hundred thousand Pounds by the Means of private Contracts, and unheard of Deductions afterwards, not without the most iniquitous Frauds in both: That the Trade had not only been let out to particular Men among ourselves, but to Foreigners, who had been invited into England to assist in freighting the Company's Ships, to the Detriment of the Company, and the Discredit of the Nation: That, whereas they had committed a fundamental Error in taking in but one half of the Sum at first subscrib'd, instead of calling in the rest, they had generally taken up two Millions at Interest, which had thrown the Company into a deep, and almost incurable, Consumption: That the Stock had been devour'd wholesale, by unjust and unreasonable Dividends, which were made without the least Regard to any real Advance produc'd by the Trade, but as Ambition and Avarice were pleas'd to command: That in the Compass of five Years, that is to say, from February, 1676-7, to January, 1681-2, they drew out seven hundred and forty-one thousand six hundred and forty-seven Pounds; and in two Months after doubled their Stock, which together, made one Million one hundred and nine thousand six hundred and seventy-three Pounds; and all this from a Capital of three hundred sixty-nine thousand eight hundred and ninety-one Pounds, which was the principal Money paid in by the Adventurers, and while they were over and above at the Charge of three hundred thousand Pounds for Interest and Compliments to Friends at Court. That by these Ways and Means the Stock fell into so languishing a Condition, that, instead of preserving the Purity of their Virgin Credit, by a Continuance of punctual Payments, they made it a Prostitute, by fixing a Paper on the Treasury-Door, declaring, They could pay no more till a certain time; which, say they, for the Presumption and Scandal of it, was, perhaps, without Precedent, and certainly prov'd, That those in the Direction had been so busy in (e) dividing, that the Obligation of paying was forgot: And, lastly, which are called the two great Articles of Charge against them, That they had seiz'd and condemn'd the Ships and Goods of Interlopers, without having sufficient A.D. 1691-92

(e) "And here (says Mr. White) we have found the right Key to the Mystery of the War with the Mogul; for things being brought to this sad Pass, it was now high time to call about how to repair the Ruins: And the happy Expedient resolv'd on, was to seize on the rich Fleets belonging to Surat, and more especially those that traded to Arabia and Persia: But there was also an ingenious Contrivance antecedent to this Enterprize, and that was, to gain an Advantage by the Friendship we had with these People, before we treated them as Enemies; in making use of the Compan'ys Credit, to borrow about three hundred thousand Pounds, and then retire to Bombay to make Spoil of their Ships and Goods. And to stimulate their chief Factor, Mr. Child, to prosecute this great Work with the highest Degree of Zeal and Diligence, there was procured for him a Patent for a Baronet, with a Commission, stiling him General of all his Majesty's Forces by Sea and Land, in the Northern Parts of India, Persia, and Arabia, &c. The Commanders of the Ships had likewise the King's Commission, with leave to wear the Royal Ensigns. All which together appear'd so absurd and ridiculous, that as an ingenious Gentleman writes from thence, Our Neighbours the French and Dutch could not put themselves into a Posture of laughing enough at it: But while they laugh'd, our Company won (at least it was then thought so) for besides a great Number of smaller Vessels they took about thirteen considerable Ships to the Amount of above a Million Sterling, as has been sworn in their Majesties Court of Exchequer, and the Value of about three hundred thousand Pound of it has been brought home, as can be prov'd, by the Confession of one of the prime Agents in the present Committee.

Now all these Proceedings were not only most unjustifiable, for that they had not, in Reality, receiv'd any Injuries that requir'd such Reparations. Nor did they apply to the Mogul for Redress of their pretended Grievances, before they acted those Hostilities on his Subjects: But the Violence is still farther aggravated, in regard that several of the Ships they took, had the Security of their own Passes, and they have made Seizure of some Goods which were laden on board their own Ships on Freight. And although the prevailing Interest of some Members of the Committee did in the time of the late King, procure a Commission to set up a Court of Admiralty on their Island of Bombay, which they made use of to confiscate the Estates of their Fellow-Subjects; yet to the Ships and Goods belonging to Surat, they did not allow so much as the Formality of a Trial and Condemnation, which makes these Captures look more like plain Piracy, than lawful Prize. Indeed the whole thing together is such a complicated Evil, that I want a Name for it: Crimen Laesæ Majestatis & proditæ Patriæ, will scarce reach it: And that our Legislators have not provided a particular Statute against it, and appointed a Punishment suitable to so heinous an Offence, there can be no other Reason assign'd, but what the Historian tells us was the Cause, that, till after the second Punic War, there was in the Roman Constitutions no particular Law against Parricide.

And here after this Account of the Ground and Progress of our Martial Exploits, it may not be amiss to subjoin an Estimate of the Advantages that have accru'd to us thereby, which may be summ'd up in the following Particulars;

It has cost the Company above four hundred thousand Pound in sundry Expences and Charges, as Advance on the Rate of their Tonnage for supernumerary Seamen, transporting Soldiers from England, with their Pay, and the like of great Numbers raised in India, vast Quantities of Ammunition and extraordinary Charges of Garison in Fort St. George and Bombay, together with those heavy Articles of dead Freight and Demurrage.

It has interrupted the Course of our Traffic for four or five Years, whereby the Company (supposing they had a sufficient Stock to manage the Trade) cannot be computed to have lost less than eight hundred thousand Pounds, and the Crown about two hundred thousand Pounds in Customs.

It has occasion'd the Loss of some thousands of our good Soldiers and able Seamen.

It has been the Means of destroying five considerable Ships that we know of, besides what may be doubted of those which have been so long abroad in that unhappy Service.

But above all, we have thereby lost that invaluable Jewel, our Reputation and Respect; and of the most below'd and favour'd, are justly become most abhorr'd and infamous in the Esteem of that People." (White's Account of the India Trade.

cient Authority ſo to do; and that they put ſeveral Perſons to death at St. Helena by Martial Law, in Contempt of the known Conſtitution of the Kingdom.

The Company's Vindication.

This was the Sum of the Charge againſt the Company; and what they thought proper to urge in their own Juſtification was to the following Effect, viz. Firſt, in general, That they had neither exceeded their Power, nor abus'd their Truſt, nor any ways expos'd the Honour of the Nation; and that the Outcry rais'd againſt them at home, was owing to thoſe very Interlopers who had occaſion'd that Rupture abroad, of which they now complain'd: Then, more particularly, That the Rights they held, and the Powers they had exercis'd, were not only deriv'd from the Crown, but were abſolutely neceſſary for continuing the Trade of India upon an equal Footing with their Neighbours, and to ſecure it againſt the avaricious Encroachments of the Indian Governors: That among theſe Powers, was that of holding Court-Martials, and of military Puniſhments: That it did not become them to diſcuſs the Queſtion, Whether the Crown had ſufficient Authority to grant them ſuch a Power, or not? That, however their Charter had once been judicially affirm'd in Weſtminſter-Hall: That, for a long while, there was no occaſion for the exerting that Power; nor was it exerted till the Interlopers broke in upon them, and both embroil'd them with the Natives, and with their own Servants and Settlements: That it was in the Year 80, when the whole Nation was in a Ferment, that theſe Intruders firſt ſhew'd themſelves: That on the firſt Notice of their illicit Practices, the Company made their Application to the late King Charles for ſuch farther Powers as might obviate the Inconvenience ariſing from them: That they did actually obtain ſuch further Powers accordingly, which were renew'd and confirm'd by the late King James: That even in the Affair of St. Helena, which had been cenſur'd by the Houſe of Commons, they were juſtify'd by an expreſs Commiſſion from the laſt of thoſe Princes, and alſo by his Orders for the putting it in force: That the Temper of the Court was ſuch, at the time when theſe farther Powers were granted, that if they had preſum'd to queſtion their Validity, or even to inſinuate the Expediency of their being ratify'd in Parliament, they had exchang'd Protection for Indignation, and had been infallibly expos'd to all the Rigours of a Quo Warranto: That in this Circumſtance, they were under a Neceſſity to make uſe of the Power they had, or to ſacrifice their Truſt and abandon all to the Mercy of their Adverſaries, both foreign and domeſtic: That as they had both foreſeen and foretold in their Petition to his Majeſty (James II.) all their Settlements and Factories were fill'd with Diſorders and Deſtructions, as ſoon as the Interlopers had got a Footing in India: That the Latter, to procure themſelves Credit, and to blaſt the Company, gave out on their Arrival, That the old Company was fallen under the Diſpleaſure of the King for being in Rebellion againſt him: That they themſelves were the new Company: That ſuch of the Company's Servants as had Reaſon to apprehend the Conſequences of a juſt Reſentment for their unfaithful Dealings, join'd them: That the Engliſh Intereſt being thus divided, the Indian Governors made uſe of all Opportunities to oppreſs the Company, to ſink their Credit, to embarraſs their Dealings, and leſſen their Profits: That the French, Dutch, and Danes, at the ſame time, took their ſeveral Advantages of all this Confuſion: That, under ſuch a Variety of Preſſures, it was no wonder that their Returns grew leſs and leſs conſiderable, and the Management more difficult: That nevertheleſs the Company was ſo far from being in a Bankrupt Condition, that they were abundantly able to ſatisfy all Demands, and to carry on their Trade with as large a Stock, and to as much Advantage, as ever: That, in truth, it was not on account of their ſuppos'd Poverty, but their ſuppos'd Wealth, that all this Clamour had been let looſe againſt them: That as to their poſtponing their Payments, it was no more than had been done, not only by the Chamber of London, but even the Exchequer itſelf: That as to the War with the Mogul, it was ſo far from being perfidious, unprovok'd, and piratical, as it had been repreſented, that it was (f) juſt, neceſſary, and unavoidable: That upon the whole, they had done nothing to forfeit

(f) Which they undertook to prove as follows:

"Upon this (the Arrival of the Interlopers, and the Slanders propagated by them) Captain Keigwin, with other Confederates, ſet up for themſelves at Bombay; and, under a Pretence, that our Nation was together by the Ears, and that the Company was in Rebellion againſt his Majeſty, they declar'd for the King excluſive to the Company, impriſon'd the Company's Deputy-Governor there, refus'd Obedience to the Company's Preſident, ſeiz'd on the Company's Treaſure, and took the Company's two Ships, arming and manning them againſt the Company, particularly, the Hunter and Return, and ſome other ſmaller Ships. And our Rivals in Trade took the Advantage of dividing the Engliſh Intereſt in India, which was not to be let ſlip, to poſſeſs themſelves of Bantam, and drive the Engliſh from thence.

The like Conſequences upon the Report and Suggeſtion of the Interlopers, follow'd at St. Helena, where almoſt the whole Iſland ran into an open Rebellion, and attempted to take the Company's Caſtle by force of Arms; and by Imitation of the Rebels at Bombay, declared for the King, ſet up the Union Flag, and, with Colours flying, aſſaulted the Fort; but, by God's good Providence, were prevented: for had they ſucceeded therein, not being able to maintain it themſelves without Support from England, they muſt and would have ſold it to Foreigners, and run away with the Moneys to have ſecur'd themſelves.

In Bengal, where the Company's chief Trade was, the Nabob, or Governor, and thoſe under him, took the Advantage of thoſe Reports, and the dividing of the Engliſh Intereſt in India, to break all their Agreements formerly made with the Company, and their Predeceſſors, and deprive them of all thoſe very great Privileges, which the Engliſh had ſo long enjoy'd under former Stipulations, drew great Sums of Money from both Parties, by ſuch oppreſſive Ways of Violence, Injuſtice, and open Hoſtilities, as, at another time, when the Engliſh were united under the prudent Conduct of the Company, would not have been, nor never was before attempted; which they were encourag'd to do, becauſe the Interlopers, that they might carry on their Trade, ſubmitted to any Impoſitions the Moors would lay upon them, tho' never ſo much more than the Company by their Agreements were bound to pay.

The Particulars of the Injuries ſuſtain'd, and of the ſeveral Sums of Money extorted from them, as they were then faithfully repreſented by them to his then Majeſty and Council, are too long here to inſert; but ſuch as they were, as toge-

A.D.1691-92 forfeit the Protection of the Government, the good Opinion of the People, or the Powers and Privileges granted to them by their Charters; and whatever national Improvements the Trade was capable of, might be as well obtain'd on the present Model, as under any other.

But, as in all similar Cases, where Interest excites Opposition, their Adversaries affected to give no Credit to their Allegations; nor would allow any Force to their Arguments: On the contrary, one Pamphlet on their Side produc'd three Answers; and as By-standers are generally pleas'd with the Sport, the Public made it their Business to keep up the Contest, and next to the War, plac'd it among the great Topics of the Day.

These Adversaries of theirs were not, however, all of one Mind; those who had small Stocks in Trade, and were yet willing to become great Adventurers, were for laying the Trade (g) open; while those who aspir'd to Power and Importance, as well as Wealth, were for continuing the Pale under the Sanction of Parliament, and transferring the Direction to themselves and their Friends: But the first, after some feeble Attempts, were soon overpower'd by the last; and it seem'd to be the general Opinion, That the East-Indian Trade, under a proper Management, was highly beneficial to the Nation; that it could not be properly manag'd, except by a Joint-Stock and Joint-Adventurers trading in a Body: That a Joint-Stock and a Joint-Interest A.D.1691-92 ther with the Apprehension of losing the whole English Interest in India, did so far prevail with his Majesty, as to consider what proper Remedies to apply to such an inevitable Mischief, and made use of these two; the one, the preventing the further Trade of Interlopers, which had been the Root of all the Mischiefs; which he did, by issuing out his Proclamation to restrain them, and order all the English Nation in India, either to come home, or put themselves in the Service of the Company, that the English Interest might not be divided, but united in one. And further, in order to the preventing so great a Mischief, and the better to countenance the Company in their Proceedings, he sent one of his own Ships of War into India, with Commission to seize upon all English Interlopers that he could meet withal there.

As to the Injuries the Company sustain'd by the Natives taking away all their Privileges, tho' never so firmly stipulated by former Agreements (which certainly being once gone, could never be again recover'd by Compliments) and exacting from them several great Sums of Money: The Remedy pitch'd upon by his then Majesty, was by directing the Company to put themselves in a Posture to right themselves, and withstand the like for the future; and to that end, he granted them such new Powers as were necessary for the carrying on so great a Work, as appeareth by the Supplements to their Charter, viz. The erecting of Courts of Admiralty in India in several Places, and empowering all the Company's Ships with Commissions of War from himself, who also had particular Power, Order, and Direction from his said Majesty to seize all Interlopers in India, and to compell them by Force of Arms, in case of Resistance, to go up to such Places where the Company had their Residence and Garisons, that so the English Interest might be no longer divided, which had been the Root of all the Mischief, to the Hazard of the Loss of the whole Trade.

Pursuant to whose Direction, and empower'd by the Authority of their said Sovereign (which might very well be by them thought sufficient for their Justification, it being never yet question'd, but that the Power of making War and Peace was vested in the Crown) the Company were at very great Charges in sending out divers great Ships fitted with all manner of warlike Provisions, furnish'd with Land-Soldiers, in order first to reduce their own Factories of Bombay and St. Helena, which were then in Rebellion; and afterwards by appearing so formidable, it might the better incline the Moors to come to an amicable Agreement with them, by restoring them their former Privileges, which they had so unjustly depriv'd them of, and give them some Satisfaction for those Extortions they had exercised upon them, which they were to endeavour first by all fair Means imaginable.

According to which, the Islands of Bombay and St. Helena were reduc'd, and settled under the Government of the Company. Some of the Interlopers were seiz'd on by his Majesty's Ship the Phœnix, Captain Tyrrel Commander. The King's Proclamation was issued out, and proclaimed, for all Englishmen to withdraw themselves out of the Service of foreign Princes, and to come into the Company's Garisons and Residences, that so the English Interest might no more be divided, and all amicable Means made use of to come to a just Agreement with the Natives: Nor was there by the Company any hostile Act committed (though thereunto sufficiently provok'd by many great and repeated Injuries) until the Business which happen'd at Hughly, wherein the Moors were the Aggressors, as doth appear by a particular Narrative of the said Action, extracted out of the Company's Letter how that began, which is as followeth:

'The 28th of October, 1686, at Hughly in the Bay of Bengal, three of the Company's Soldiers going into the Bazar, or Market-place, as usual, to purchase Victuals in the Morning, were not only deny'd the same, but were violently set upon by the Governor's Peons, or Soldiers, were sorely beat and cut (of which one of them dy'd of his Wounds then receiv'd) then bound, and carry'd Prisoners to Abdel Gunny, the Governor of the Place. The News of which immediately arriv'd at the English Factory in the said Town of Hughly, in these Terms: That two Englishmen were set upon by the Governor's Peons, or Soldiers, and were desperately cut and wounded, and lay a dying in the Highway; upon which Captain Losse was immediately order'd out with a Party, with Orders, to bring in their Bodies dead or alive; but to offer Violence to no Man, except they were assaulted; which they attempting to do, were upon the way set upon by a Body of Horse and Foot, in a hostile manner, whom they receiv'd as Men not willing to be wanting in their own Defence; and, after some Skirmish, put them to flight; having in the Engagement kill'd and wounded several of them: The whole Town being immediately upon this alarm'd, set fire to those of their own Houses, which were nearest the English Factory, by which many of the Company's Goods were consum'd.' What followeth in the said Narrative, is but a further Prosecution of repeated Acts of War and Hostility, each against the other; and it being not the Intent of this Discourse to give you a full History of the War, which possibly hereafter may be done by another Hand, and the Proceedings in it, but only the true Occasions of the Rise of it, I thought it needless to carry it on further; so much of it as is here inserted, being sufficient to give you a true Account how it began, whereby it appeareth, that the Moors were the first Aggressors, and the first Blood shed in this War, was by them." [Modest and just Apology for the East-India Company, &c.

(g) As appears by the following Paper:

"Reasons against abolishing an East-India Company with a Joint-Stock, exclusive to all others.

First, Such a Company would be a great Monopoly, which hath always been justly odious in the Eyes of the Law; for there would be in such a Case but one Buyer of all the English Manufactures sent to India, and but one Seller of the Commodities from thence.

Secondly, This will give such a Company Opportunity to buy the English Commodities cheap, and to sell the foreign imported Commodities dear; both which are to the Detriment of England. But, on the contrary, the more Buyers there are of English Commodities, and the more Sellers of foreign, the first will be sold the dearer, and the latter the cheaper; and to have foreign Commodities cheap, and our own dear, will by all Men be allow'd to be our Advantage.

Thirdly, If all were admitted to trade thither, the Trade would be much enlarg'd, the Industry of particular Persons would find out more Places of Trade (when themselves shall reap the Benefit of their own Acquisitions) which a Company with a Joint-Stock will not be induc'd to do, because they can get as much by a small Trade as by a greater.

Fourthly, It seems against Common Justice, and the Birthright of Englishmen, to exclude any of them from so great a Part of the Trade of the Nation, and that Bristol, Exeter, Plymouth, Hull, Yarmouth, &c. should not trade to the East-Indies from their own Ports as well as from London.

Fifthly, The Dutch do indeed trade with a Joint-Stock, but they give Liberty to their own Subjects to import all sorts of East-India Goods into their Country from England, or any other Parts, except India; whereas by the Act of Navigation, no East-India Goods may be brought into this Kingdom but directly from thence: So that it will be in such Company's Power to make us pay what they please for their imported Commodities, without any Remedy against it, which makes it plain that the Subjects of England will then be in a far worse Condition than those of Holland are under their Company. [Lord Somers's Collect. Vol. xxx. Tract 54.

A.D.1691-92 Intereſt were incompatible with interloping: That, therefore, no Company could ſubſiſt unleſs Interlopers were excluded; and that Interlopers could no otherwiſe be excluded, than by lodging ſuch ſufficient Powers in ſuch a Company, to vindicate their own Rights, to defend themſelves from Encroachments, and to carry on their Commerce by ſuch fix'd Laws, as ſhould ſecure it againſt the Craft and Avarice of the Indian Nabobs, or Governors, and the Counter-Practices of their foreign Rivals.

Theſe were the general Sentiments of the Public on this important Point; and theſe being alike favourable to thoſe in Purſuit, and thoſe in Poſſeſſion, both ſo far reaſon'd in the ſame manner, and join'd Iſſue in the ſame Concluſions; but then it was urg'd by the Former againſt the Latter, That they were not legally veſted with theſe ſufficient Powers; and that in exerciſing them without proper Authority, they had forfeited all their other Rights, and, in point of Equity, were actually diſqualify'd for any ſuch Truſt for the time to come.

In this Light the Affair came before the Convention-Parliament; and as it appear'd to be an Object truly National to the Undeſigning, and what was very well worth the Attention of thoſe that were otherwiſe, a Committee was appointed to take Cognizance of it, who proceeded ſo far as even to demand a perfect State of the Company's Accounts, an Eſtimate of their Stock, Goods, Caſh, Debts, and a View of their Correſpondences both here and abroad; which the Company not only comply'd with, but made a voluntary Offer to ſubmit their very Books and their laſt Advices from India to the Inſpection of the Chairman, or ſuch two or three of the Committee as the Houſe ſhould pleaſe to nominate; as alſo, to be directed in all things by the Pleaſure of the Houſe: And, as a Reaſon for limiting the Offer of their Books to the Inſpection of two or three only, they tell us, That a Copy of that very individual State, or Account, which they laid before the Houſe, was immediately ſent into Holland, for the Dutch to make what Advantages of it they could, to the Prejudice of the Company; as appear'd by a Tranſcript of that Copy, which was remitted from Amſterdam to ſome Jews reſiding in London, together with a Deſire, to be inform'd by them, whether it agreed with the Account deliver'd in by the Company.

But tho' the Convention-Parliament were ſo forward to engage in the Purſuit, they were not able to run down the Game; they were ſtopt, as we have ſeen, in the Midſt of their Career; and the Company continu'd to defend themſelves on every Side with ſo much Addreſs, and ſo much Vigour, and found or made ſo many Friends, that till the third Seſſion of the next Parliament, their Adverſaries did not think it adviſable to renew their Attack in Form: But then, having found means to obtain the Countenance and Aſſiſtance of ſeveral of the Nobility and Gentry, they apply'd themſelves to the Taſk with more Eag neſs than ever; and to render their Motions ſo much the more regular A.D.1691-92 and certain, erected themſelves into a ſort of proviſional Company, by entering into the following Engagements:

"Whereas the Trade to Eaſt-India is of very great Importance to this Nation, and yet, through the many Abuſes and Unlawful Practices of the Managers of the preſent Joint-Stock, both at home and abroad, is like to be utterly loſt, if ſome ſpeedy Care be not taken, by Application to their Majeſties and the Parliament, to procure a regular and lawful Eſtabliſhment of the ſame, which cannot be completed without a new and ſufficient National-Joint-Stock, clear of all Incumbrances: And, whereas divers eminent Merchants and Traders in and about the City of London, are accordingly endeavouring to procure ſuch an Eſtabliſhment for the Benefit and Advantage of all Perſons who ſhall or will be concern'd in the ſaid Trade; we, the Subſcribers, being willing to promote ſo good a Work, and deſirous to preſerve a Trade ſo highly beneficial to their Majeſties, and this Kingdom in general, do hereby ſeverally promiſe and oblige ourſelves, ſo ſoon as ſuch an Eſtabliſhment ſhall be made, to pay the ſeveral Sums of Money by us ſubſcrib'd towards raiſing the ſaid Stock, at ſuch Time and Place as a Committee to be choſen by the major Part of us the Subſcribers, ſhall direct and appoint. And we do hereby make it our Requeſt to thoſe Perſons, who have engag'd themſelves by a certain Writing under their Hands, bearing Date the eighth Inſtant, to endeavour the procuring ſuch Eſtabliſhment and to purſue thoſe their Endeavours to perfect and complete the ſame. And we do hereby further promiſe to allow and pay them out of the ſaid Joint-Stock (when the ſame ſhould be ſettled as aforeſaid) all ſuch Sums of Money, as ſhould be thought neceſſary by them to be laid out and diſburs'd in obtaining the ſaid Eſtabliſhment, according to the true Intent and Meaning of this Preamble; ſo as the Account thereof be allow'd and ſign'd by the major Part of thoſe who have ſubſcrib'd the Writing above-mention'd."

Their next great Step was to preſent a Petion to the Houſe of Commons, ſetting forth the imminent Danger that the Eaſt-India Trade was expos'd to, by the manifold Abuſes and unlawful Practices of the preſent Company, for their own private Gain; and praying, that a new Company, on a new Joint-Stock and Conſtitution, might be erected, in ſuch manner, and with ſuch Powers and Limitations as, in their great Wiſdom, ſhould be thought moſt conducing to the Intereſt of the Nation.

This Petition was preſented October the 28th, and attended by a Counter-Petition of the Company: Both were refer'd to the Conſideration of a Committee of the whole Houſe; and to the end that the whole Caſe might be thoroughly underſtood, the ſeveral Heads of Complaint againſt the Company were drawn up; the Company put in their Anſwer; this Anſwer was deliver'd to the Petitioners; and the 20th of November was

A.D. 1691-92 appointed for a Hearing on both Sides. In the mean time alſo, the State of the Company's Stock, Debts, &c. as deliver'd in by Sir Joſeph Hern, their Governour, was taken into Examination, and certain Petitions from the Linen-Drapers and Clothiers (the one contending for a free Exportation of woollen Goods to the Indies, and the other complaining, that they were not ſupply'd with Calicoes and other India Goods as they ought) were receiv'd; and, after a tedious and intricate Diſcuſſion, which laſted many Days, the Houſe came to the following Reſolutions:

"1. That a Sum not leſs than one Million five hundred thouſand, and not exceeding two Millions, was a Fund neceſſary to carry on the Eaſt-India Trade in a Joint-Stock. 2. That no one Perſon ſhould have any Share in a Joint-Stock for the Eaſt-India Trade exceeding five thouſand Pound, either in his own Name, or any other in Truſt for him. 3. That no one Perſon ſhould have above one Vote in the ſaid Company, and that each Perſon who had five thouſand Pound Stock therein, ſhould have one Vote. 4. That the Company to trade to the Eaſt-Indies, ſhould be oblig'd to export every Year of their Trade, Goods being the Growth and Manufacture of this Nation, to the Value of two hundred thouſand Pounds, at leaſt. 5. That no private Contracts ſhould be made, but all Goods ſold at public Sales by Inch of Candle, except Salt-Petre, for the Uſe of the Crown. 6. That the Eaſt-India Company be oblig'd to ſell to the King yearly, Salt-Petre refin'd (the Refraction not exceeding four or five per cent. out of one hundred and twelve) five hundred Tons at the Rate of thirty Pounds per Ton. 7. That no Lot ſhould be put at any Sales in the Eaſt-India Company, at one time, exceeding five hundred Pounds. 8. That no Perſon ſhould be Governor or Deputy-Governor of the Company to trade to the Eaſt-Indies, who had leſs Share in the Stock than two thouſand Pounds, or Committee-Man that had leſs than one thouſand Pounds. 9. That the Election of Governor, Deputy-Governor, and Committee for the Company, to trade to the Eaſt-Indies, be made every Year. 10. That all Dividends be made in Money. 11. That no Dividends be made, without leaving a ſufficient Fund to pay all Debts, and carry on the Trade. 12. That a Valuation of the Stock be made every five Years by the Accomptant of the Company upon Oath, to be ſeen by all ſuch as are concern'd therein. 13. That no Ships, either with Permiſſion or without, for the future, be allow'd to go to the Eaſt-Indies, except only ſuch as ſhould be of A COMPANY, or be eſtabliſh'd by Act of Parliament. 14. That no By-laws ſhould be binding to the Company, but ſuch as were approv'd by a general Court of Adventurers, and were not repugnant to the Laws of the Land. 15. And, laſtly, That the Joint-Stock of A COMPANY to trade to the Eaſt-Indies, be for twenty-one Years, and no longer. Thus far the Houſe ſeem'd to regard the Trade only, and not the Perſons in whom it was to be veſted: But the next Day, being the 18th of December, having receiv'd new Lights, it muſt be ſuppos'd, they farther reſolv'd, "That all Perſons now having above the Sum of five thouſand Pounds in the Stock of the preſent Eaſt-India Company, in their own or other Perſons Names, be oblig'd to ſell ſo much thereof, as ſhould exceed the ſaid Sum of five thouſand Pounds, at the Rate of one hundred Pounds for every hundred: That the Members of the Committee of the Eaſt-India Company, be oblig'd to give Security, to be approv'd of by the Houſe, that the Stock and Eſtate they now had, ſhould be made good ſeven hundred and forty-nine thouſand Pounds, all Debts paid: And, laſtly, That, Security being firſt given, an humble Addreſs be preſented to his Majeſty, to incorporate the PRESENT Eaſt-India Company by Charter, according to the Regulations agreed upon by the Houſe, that the ſame might paſs into an Act."

A.D. 1691-92

This was plainly giving the preſent Company the Option of the Bargain; and, how hard ſoever they might think it, they nevertheleſs proceeded, as if they thought it worth their Acceptance: For on the 23d following, Sir Thomas Coke, and two more of their Committee deliver'd in their Propoſals concerning the Security requir'd; alſo when the ſaid Propoſals were rejected by the Houſe, and the Company were farther directed to produce the Perſons of their Bondſmen, together with an Account of the reſpective Sums which they reſpectively undertook to anſwer, They again ſhew'd a ready Compliance: And the Scruples of the Houſe being now, in all Appearance, remov'd, a Committee was appointed to prepare and bring in a Bill to eſtabliſh an Eaſt-India Company, according to the Regulations and Reſolutions of the Houſe. This was done January the eighth, and on the 16th the ſaid Bill was brought in accordingly, but not read for the firſt time, till the 22d following; which indicated, that ſome new Remora was hung upon it; and that the Company had new Meaſures to take, if they expected to have it diſpatch'd this Seſſion. As a farther Manifeſtation of this, yet other Petitions were receiv'd againſt them; their Anſwers were deem'd unſatisfactory; and, laſtly, the whole Game was play'd into the Hands of the Court, by the Means of the following Reſolution, viz. "That an humble Addreſs be preſented to his Majeſty, to diſſolve the PRESENT Eaſt-India Company, according to the Powers reſerv'd in their Charter, and to conſtitute another Eaſt-India Company, for the better preſerving of the Eaſt-India Trade to this Kingdom in ſuch manner as his Majeſty, in his Royal Wiſdom ſhould think fit. This Vote was accordingly preſented to his Majeſty by the whole Houſe; and the Anſwer they receiv'd was to this Effect, "That it was a Matter of very great Importance to the Trade of this Kingdom, That he would conſider of it; and, that in a ſhort time he would give the Commons a poſitive Anſwer." But, undetermin'd as his Majeſty now ſeem'd, he

An Addreſs to conſtitute another Company.

A.D.1691-92 he was so far pleas'd to countenance the present Company, as to bestow the Honour of Knighthood on Mr. Goldsborough, then going to India, in the Quality of their Commissary-General.

The Affair transferr'd to the Privy-Council.

To close on this Head, for the present, the farther Management of this intricate Affair was now transferr'd to the Privy Council, and the Company, in Writing, signify'd A.D.1691-92 their Readiness to submit the whole Dispute to their Arbitration: But when the Earl of Nottingham, as Secretary of State, in the May following, sent them a Copy of the Conditions agreed upon by the Lords of the Council, instead of accepting them, they (b) objected to almost every Article, and accompany'd

(b) As appears by the following Paper, which contains both the Propositions and Answers; and which was presented by the Company to Lord Nottingham, May 28:

The Humble Answer of the Governor, Deputy-Governor, and Court of Committees of the East-India Company, to a Paper of Propositions for Regulation of the East-India Company, received from the Right Honourable the Earl of Nottingham, their Majesties principal Secretary of State.

I. Proposition. The Fund to be made up of 1,500,000*l.* at least, and not to exceed two Millions.

Answer. The Company do humbly own, and are ready to prove to the King's Most Excellent Majesty's Satisfaction, That their present quick and dead Stock and Revenue is of more real Value than the said Sum of 1,500,000*l.*

II. Prop. The Stock of the present Company to be Part of this Fund, and to be rated at 744,000*l.* if they can give Security, that it shall effectually produce that Sum; or else, at so much less, as they will engage to make good, after all Debts paid and Satisfaction made to the Mogul and his Subjects; against whose Pretensions the new Stock to be indemnify'd by the like Security.

Answer. The Company recommending their righteous Cause to God, and his Majesty's known and famous Justice in the whole Course of his happy Life, say, That the Value of every thing is what it will sell for; and their Stock, under all the Calumnies and Prefarications of their Adversaries, now currently sells for 150*l.* per Hundred; and they know and can prove it to be intrinsically more worth than that current Price: But they know no Law or Reason why they should be dispossessed of their Estates, at any less Value than they are really worth in ready Money, by all the Measures any thing is valued in any Part of the World.

They humbly say, as to Security, They know no Reason why they should give Security for their own Estates.

They affirm, that they owe not a Penny to the Great Mogul, or any of his Subjects, other than their running Accounts with their own Banyans and Brokers, which are changing daily, like Merchants running Cash in a Goldsmith's Hand.

Altho' the Company owe nothing to the Mogul, as aforesaid, yet the bare mentioning any such thing by a public Act of his Majesty, would be enough to persuade him to invent Demands upon the Company, for Transactions and Pretences done in Ages past, before any of the present Adventurers were born; and therefore that Part of the Proposition seems manifestly impossible, as well as unjust; neither the Mogul nor any of his Subjects having made any Complaint to his Majesty of the Company's being in Debt to him or them; that being only a Suggestion of the Interlopers and their Adherents, not only now, but for many Years past.

As to that Hypothesis, if they can give Security, it will not become the Company to lay what they might, of their own Ability, or the Ability or Disability of their Adversaries; they are on both Sides well known upon the Exchange.

III. Prop. That the said Stock or the present Company shall be brought home at any time within Years in the Ships abroad, or those to be sent on account of the new Stock, paying the same Freight, and disposed of at public Sales by the Members of the present Company, and the nett Proceed thereof to be taken as Part of the 744,000*l.* as shall also the Value of their Forts, &c. to be estimated by indifferent Persons, and put into the Hands of the New-Charter Company. But after Days, no Goods to be exported to the East-Indies on account of the old Stock.

Answer. The Company, say they, have as real a Right to all their Forts, Cities, Towns, and Territories in India, to them and their Successors for ever, as they have to their purchased Lands and Ware-houses in England belonging to the Company's Joint-Stock, or other private Lands or Manors belonging to the particular Adventurers: Res Dei Gratia being originally the Title by which very many Manors and Lands, Court-Leets and Court-Barons are held in England. And as the Company are not willing to be dispossessed of their said real Estate, until they are paid for them; which they believe in their Consciences, hath cost them at several times above a Million in ready Money Sterling, besides the Interest. But for the Price that should be paid them for their said real Estates, it is were come to that Issue Point, they would refer themselves to, and rely upon his Majesty's Justice, as aforesaid.

IV. Prop. That whatever the quick and dead Stock shall thus produce more than 744,000*l.* shall be divided wholly between the Members of the present Company, proportionable to their respective Stocks.

V. Prop. Books to be provided for new Subscriptions within, and then the Books to be closed.

VI. Prop. If the Subscriptions exceed two Millions, each Subscriber to be reduc'd proportionably till the whole make but two Millions.

VII. Prop. That every Subscriber pay in his Money, upon pain ——

To the fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh Proposition, the Company humbly answer, That they do as little understand the new Subscribers, as they suppose most of those Subscribers know the Affairs of India: But the Company know the late new way of subscribing, without Authority from his Majesty, is an old Practice of Interlopers and others, emulous of the Company's Prosperity; and hath formerly been debated upon the like voluntary Subscriptions several times, and many Years since in the Reign of King Charles the Second, when some of the Lords of his now Majesty's most Honourable Privy Council were present; but it always ended in only giving unnecessary Trouble to his Majesty and the Company.

VIII. Prop. No one Person to have above 10,000*l.* in this Stock, in his own or others Name, in trust for him; and every Subscriber shall make Oath accordingly, and that it is his own Money.

Answer. This Proposition, in Duty to his Majesty, and in Love to our native Country, the Company must freely declare against, as being notoriously prejudicial to the Nation, whoever the Adventurers are. First, because Trade is a Free Agent, and must not be limited or bounded; if it be so in any Nation, it will never prosper. Secondly, It is against the Laws and Customs of England, and all Nations upon the Face of the Earth, That any Man that buys a Commodity, and pays honestly for it in ready Money, should be compell'd to swear it is his own Money, or whole it is; this being only a Trick of the first Projectors, to serve their particular Turn, without any rational or other Regard to Right or Public Good. Thirdly, If such a Limitation were allowable, certainly some Nation or other would have hit upon the Expedient before this time; whereas, on the contrary, the wise Dutch indulge and favour the very Jews, and the more for buying the greater Stock; of whom one Man, by Name Soasso, had at one time about 85,000*l.* Stock. The French King likewise, for the Encouragement of large Subscriptions in that Stock, propounded many considerable Privileges and Immunities, both to Natives and Foreigners, proportionable to the Greatness of their said Subscriptions. The Danes likewise, it is said, made a Law not long since, That such as would not add a certain Proportion to their Stock already wrote, should forfeit their Stock; which was a Contribution on the other hand, and as erroneous as that in the aforesaid Proposition. Fourthly, Such Kind of levelling or limiting Personal Estates, was never known in Commonwealths, much less in Monarchies. Our Levellers in England, and anciently the Tribunes of Rome, never pretended to the Limitation of Personal Estates, but of Possessions in Land, and not of all Lands (not in their Provinces) but only the Lands of Italy, which was the Seat or Country of the Commonwealth. Fifthly, No considerable Man of Fortune or Experience will ever endure the Fatigue of continual Study in the East-India Company's arduous Affairs, but he will find his Account some way; and that must be either by a great Reward, or by a great Stock, or by other and worse ways of paying himself. The most English Companies give a Committee-Man, is about fifty Pounds per ann. whereas we have heard the Dutch allow Mr. Pitt's Van Dam about eight hundred Pounds, and about four hundred Pounds a year to his Son: But such an able active Man's having a great Stock of his own, is better for the public Society than any Reward can be allow'd him; because such a Man that is oblig'd by Reward only, so to attend the Company's Business, is tied only by one Cord; but he that expects all Satisfaction to arise from the Profit of his own Stock, is tied with the two great Cords, which do almost the whole Business of the World, viz. Reward, by the Profit of his own great Stock, and Fear of great Loss, if his own Stock should miscarry by ill Conduct.

IX. Prop. That every Member of the present Company who hath above 10,000*l.* Stock, shall sell forthwith the Overplus at the rate of one hundred Pounds for an hundred Pounds; but so that if the whole nett Proceed of the present Stock

A.D. 1691-92 pany'd those Objections with a Paper of their own, tending to shew, that neither the Management nor Constitution of the Company could be mended. And in this Suspence, A.D. 1691-92

Stock exceeds 744,000 Pounds, this Overplus shall go to the Person that hath sold his Overplus Stock, proportionable to the Stock he had before such Sale.

Answer. The Company can see no Shadow of Reason or Equity in this Proposition; but a direct Contradiction to common Right, and the admirable Laws of this Kingdom for Preservation of Property.

X. Prop. No Person to have a Vote, that hath in his own Right, and not in Trust, less than 500 l. Stock, nor more than one Vote, unless he hath 4000 l. and then two Votes, and if 6000 l. three Votes, 8000 l. four Votes, and 10,000 l. five Votes.

Answer. The Company are humbly of Opinion, This is more justly and equally provided for already in their present Charter; this Proposal of giving Advantage to the small Stock, being but a Hysteron Proteron, never known before in any Part of the World in Merchants Affairs, wherein, as far as the Sun shines, all Men vote according to their proper Shares in Shipping, or as they are interested more or less, and not otherwise.

XI. Prop. All Members of the present Company, and new Subscribers to be incorporated by the Name of

XII. Prop. All who have, or subscribe 500 l. Stock, to meet and choose a Governor, Deputy, and 24 Committees, to manage the Trade; none to be Governor or Deputy, who hath subscrib'd less than 2000 l. Stock nor Committee 1000 l. Stock.

XIII. Prop. The Governor, Deputy, and Committees to be chosen every Year; and if any die within the Year, others to be chosen by a general Court.

XIV. Prop. The Governor, Deputy, and Committees to take the Oaths of Fidelity; and also an Oath for the faithful Discharge of their Trust.

XV. Prop. That every one purchasing any Stock, shall take his Freedom, and before his Admittance pay for a Fine, and take the Oaths appointed.

Answer. In the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth Propositions, the Company can see nothing new, but all is already provided for in the same manner, or better, by their present Charters.

XVI. Prop. That all free of the former Company, or capable to be so, and all subscribing to the present Stock, shall be admitted gratis.

Answer. In this there is but a trivial Difference from the Company's present Charter, which enjoins all new Adventurers, except the Sons and Servants of Freemen, to pay five Pounds each for their first Admittance. The old Adventurers have paid their respective five Pounds; and we can see no Reason, if new Men be admitted, why they should not pay the same.

XVII. Prop. That the Company hereby establish'd may make By-laws for their better Government: That no by-laws shall be binding to the Company, but such are approv'd by a general Court of Adventurers, and are not repugnant to the Laws of the Land.

XVIII. Prop. That every general Court and Committee be call'd by the Governor or Deputy; at all which the Governor or Deputy shall be present, and in case of Equality of Voices, shall have a casting Voice.

XIX. Prop. That the Company shall enjoy the sole Trade to the East-Indies in the several Countries lying between the Cape de Bona Esperanza, and the Streights of Magellan.

XX. Prop. That it shall not be lawful for any, save the said Company only, directly or indirectly, to trade within the Limits granted to the said Company, on pain of forfeiting——

Answer. As to the seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth Propositions, the Company can observe nothing in them that is not already in the same manner in their Charters.

XXI. Prop. That no License or Permission shall be granted to any Persons or Ships, to trade to the East-Indies on any private Account, and that all such Permissions shall be void.

Answer. This is an unreasonable Proposition, and against the Sense of all Charters, and ought, for the Public Good, to be left to the Company's Discretion for some time (as in the late War with the Mogul) permissive Ships have been of great Use and public Benefit at this time, now Peace is restor'd, they are of no Use, except in particular Instances which might be given, and, in settling of new Plantations, which the Company best know when and how to effect; and no East-India Company in any Part of Europe have any such Shackles imposed upon them, which would but hinder their Progress for the Public Good and Honour of their Country in many Cases.

XXII. Prop. That there shall be no private Contract for the Sale of any Goods, but they shall be all sold in public, by Inch of Candle for the Company's Account.

XXIII. Prop. That no Lot of any Goods to be sold, shall exceed the Value of 500 l.

Answer. These two are Novelties, and such as were never impos'd upon any East-India Company in Europe, and are against natural Right, and, if eſtabliſh'd, would tend to the national Prejudice of England, as the Company doubt not to make evident to his Majesty by irrefragable Instances and Examples. Trade must be free for the Public Good, otherwise it will die or fly away.

XXIV. Prop. Every Year the Company shall deliver to their Majesties Use five hundred Tons of Salt-Petre at per Ton, if requir'd, the Refraction not exceeding

Answer. The Company will always serve their Majesties with Salt-Petre as cheap as they can afford it, and doubt not but to please their Majesties therein, as they have done all their Royal Predecessors: But to be limited to a certain Price or Quantity or Refraction, it is a Novelty that was never impos'd upon this or any East-India Company; and if had been an unhappy Accident for England if such an Imposition or Constraint had been laid upon the Company ten or twenty Years past, for if that had been done, there could not have been one fourth Part of the Petre in England as the Company had in store (which was about three thousand Tons) when this War with France begun. There is a famous Story confirming the Truth of this, in the Reign of King James I. There was at that time a great Dearth of Corn, which occasion'd his Majesty to send for the Eastland Company; and his Majesty told them, That in regard of the present Dearth of Corn, and for Relief of the Poor, they must load all their Ships homeward-bound with Corn; which they promis'd faithfully to do, and were so dismiss'd; but one of the Lords of the Council told his Majesty such a Promise signify'd nothing, because they had not promis'd at what Rate they would sell their Wheat when it came; on which they were call'd in again, and told the King was not satisfy'd with that Answer: To which the Deputy, who was a famous Hunter, reply'd, 'Sir, we will freight our Ships and buy our Corn as cheap as we can, and sell it here as cheap as we can afford it; but, to be confin'd to any certain Price, we cannot.' That Lord press'd the Deputy for a more certain Answer; on which the Deputy said further to the King, 'Sir, your Majesty is a Lover of the noble Sport of hunting, and so am I, and I keep a few Dogs, but if my Dogs do not love the Sport as well as I, I might as well hunt with Hogs as with Dogs. The King reply'd, 'Say no more, Man, thou art in the Right; go and do as well as you can, but be sure bring Corn.'

XXV. Prop. That the Company shall yearly export to the East-Indies not less than the Value of 100,000 l. in Goods, of the Product and Manufactures of England.

Answer. The Company may do this in some Years, and sometimes more, and sometimes not so much, when their Cloth lies unsold, and eaten up with Moths and white Ants in India. This ought, for the Public Good, to be left to the Company's Discretion.

XXVI. Prop. That all Dividends be made in Money.

Answer. This is commonly done here and beyond Sea, in other Companies; but some Instance may be given, wherein it would be highly prejudicial to make this Confinement of the Company's Liberty. So it ought to be left to Discretion, as it is now here and in all other Nations.

XXVII. Prop. That no Dividend be made without leaving the original Fund, or at least 1,500,000 l. besides what is necessary to pay their Debts.

Answer. This is a discretionary Rule the Company do now observe; but it was never enjoyned them by any Charter; neither is there any Company in the World so circumscrib'd, nor ought to be, for the Public Good. It is against natural Right, that any Men should be barr'd from doing what they think fit with their own Estates.

XXVIII. Prop. That the said Company's Accomptant keep a Book to enter the Value of the Stock upon Oath, to lie open for the Perusal of all Persons concern'd.

XXIX. Prop. That all Transfers of Stock shall be registred and entred in a Book, to lie open to all Persons concern'd.

Answer. The 28th and 29th Propositions are provided for in the same manner already by the Company.

XXX. Prop. That the said Joint-Stock shall continue for twenty-one Years, and no longer.

XXXI. Prop. That a Book of new Subscriptions be laid open for a succeeding new general Joint-Stock before the Expiration of the said twenty-one Years appointed for this Stock.

Answer. This is so strange, that if it should be admitted, would make the Company ridiculous all the World over; and is as much as to say, a Man shall be oblig'd to plant a great Orchard, and remove his Trees, or depart from his Possession at the End of twenty-one Years, or to build a famous Mansion-House, a Town, or City upon such Terms.

The

pence, the Conteſt hung till the next Seſſion, when we ſhall again find it brought upon the Carpet, and occaſioning as much Clamour as ever.

Bill to regulate Trials in caſe of Treaſon.

The Public was yet farther amus'd, by a long Conteſt between the two Houſes, which was occaſion'd by a Bill, ſent up by the Commons to the Lords, for regulating Trials in Caſes of High Treaſon; or, according to the plauſible Pretences that were given out concerning it, for preſerving the Subject from the Hardſhips and Rigours which they had been expos'd to in the late Reigns: And indeed it appears, that ſomething of this nature was really intended by it: For it provided, That the Priſoner ſhould have a Copy of his Indictment, as alſo, a Copy of the Pannel, ten Days before he was requir'd to plead: That his Witneſſes ſhould have the Privilege to be examin'd upon Oath, in common with thoſe of the Crown, &c.

But theſe Indulgences, ſuch as they were, regarded the Commons only; and the Lords thought it expedient, to make a ſuitable Proviſion for themſelves, which was contain'd in the following Clauſe, viz. "That upon the Trial of any Peer or Peereſs, for any Treaſon or Miſprilion of Treaſon, ALL THE PEERS, who have a Right to ſit and vote in Parliament, ſhould be duly ſummon'd, twenty Days before every ſuch Trial, to appear at every ſuch Trial; and that every Peer ſo ſummon'd, and appearing on ſuch Trial, ſhould vote in the Trial of ſuch Peer or Peereſs ſo to be try'd, he and they firſt taking the Oaths, &c."

A Clauſe added by the Lords in their own Favour.

With this Amendment, and ſome others of leſs Conſequence, the Bill was return'd to the Commons, who rejected it, and gave their Reaſons at a Conference for ſo doing: But theſe not ſatisfying the Lords, the Diſpute was at laſt brought to a free Conference, which was manag'd with equal Addreſs, and maintain'd with equal Firmneſs on both Sides: The Commons inſiſted, That their only Deſign in the Bill was to reſtrain the and rejected by the Commons.

The Dutch Company have ſtrat within theſe forty Years paſt, above 700,000 l. upon Surplus, and have not yet ſeen their Principal by about 400,000 l. to this Day. This Company have been hoping and forſaying at Batavia about ten or eleven Years, and they muſt proceed in building and fortifying there for twenty or thirty Years to come; and in this chargeable and dangerous Work, they have ſpent from two hundred and fifty to three hundred thouſand Pounds Sterling. And though indeed by that neceſſary Work they have preſerved the proper Trade to this Nation, yet they have not receiv'd any thing towards the Charge of their Diſbursments; and that Place will coſt the Company two hundred thouſand Pounds more, before it can be made a compleat, ſecure, and, morally ſpeaking, an impregnable Aſylum to the Engliſh Nation. It is a moſt impolitic Notion, That any Company can thrive by frequent Change of Conſtruction and Conduct, any more than a Nation by often changing the fundamental Laws. The Dutch Company ſtands as it did from the beginning, and the Engliſh have never been chang'd, that the Company knows of, but once in O. Cromwell's time; and then it was done with their own Conſent. The Company, by the true Rules of Policy, ought never to alter, nor any Man be forc'd to ſell his Stock, any more than he can be forc'd to buy a Stock that hath none, or any Gentleman that hath an over-grown Eſtate in Land in any Country, can be forc'd to ſell Part, to make way for ſome new Purchaſers, that pretend they will buy Land in that Country.

XXXII. PROP. That the Company be oblig'd, for the better and more ſecure carrying on of this Trade, to have Ships of their own.

Anſwer. This is ſuch a conſtraining Propoſition, as was never made to any Company; all Companies having Ships of their own, and hired Ships, and beſt know when to uſe the one or the other; and there are few Merchants conſiderable in Europe, that have not both. And it was never thought or hinted politick to put Trade into ſuch ſtraitlac'd Bodies, which inſtead of making it grow upright and proſper, will either kill it, or force it to go awry."

"Having anſwer'd the aforeſaid Propoſitions, the Company humbly offer the following Propoſitions may be conſider'd.

Firſt, If any Alteration ſhould be made of the preſent Conſtitution by his Majeſty, the ſame muſt, was Interlopers, and their Adherents, and ſuch as have ſold their Stock at high Rates, and then cry down the Company, to fright the Adventurers, and come in again at low Rates: whether ſuch ſort of Men, after his Majeſty hath granted a new Charter, will not, to ſerve another Turn, exclaim againſt it, in Deſtruction of his Majeſty's juſt Prerogative?

Secondly, Whether, any thing ſuch Men have ſaid, that carries any Appearance of Truth, be not the ſame again which was ſaid above twenty Years paſt, and many times ſince in the two laſt Reigns, and as often anſwer'd and confuted?

Thirdly, Whether the Spirit of Clamour and Oppoſition againſt the Company, which centers in ſome few known Perſons, whether thoſe Perſons be Men of better Fortune, or more regular Lives, or greater Prudence, or otherwiſe preferable to the preſent Adventurers in the Eaſt-India Company-Stock?

Fourthly, Whether, conſidering the two Wars this Company have grappled with in India, and a worſe kind of civil Broil the Interlopers forc'd them to, more pernicious to the Company than both the Wars in India; the Company, notwithſtanding their laid Preſſures, hath not manag'd their Affairs to as much national Advantage and Profit to their Fellow-Adventurers, as any Eaſt-India Company in Europe?

Fifthly, That without Retrench, cramping, or taking care for Reaſons as Charges in the Eaſt-India Company, the whole Stock, without ſuch forc'd political Reſtrictment or Limitation, is in a kindly, natural, and continual changing Motion, inſomuch, that the Value of the Stock, once in two Years or thereabout, changes Owners; and there is not now in the preſent Committee three Men that were of the Committee above twenty Years paſt.

Sixthly, That the preſent Governor, Sir Thomas Cook, about nine Years paſt, had no Stock at all, nor Sir Joſeph Herne, the late Governor, about twenty Years paſt, nor Sir William Langhorne; now one of the greateſt Adventurers, but about two Years paſt, they came in by ſeveral Purchaſes, and many at much dearer Rates than the preſent Rate current of the Stock; and there is now of the preſent Committee five worthy Perſons very late Purchaſers, which were never of the Committee before this Year.

Seventhly, If it be thought by any that envy the Company's good Fortune, that ſome few of the Company are too rich and powerful in the Committee, the Company anſwer, that to cure this, if it be a Fault, there needs no new Laws nor Articles in any Charter, for a very few Years will cure that without ſuch preternatural Forces: for that the Sons of ſuch Men were never known to ſucceed their Fathers in the painful Fatigue of the Company's Affairs, but did always ſettle themſelves upon an eaſier Courſe of Life by a Revenue in Land.

Eighthly, If there be ſome of the preſent Adventurers that had Courage enough to keep their Stock, and never ſold any Part thereof during all thoſe violent and unreaſonable Attempts that have been made againſt the Company, whether ſuch Perſons do not rather deſerve the Thanks which the Roman Senate gave, Ne reſpublica Detrimentum caperet, quod non Diſſenſiſſet in Republica, than any Blame.

Ninthly, The Company, nor, peradventure, any great Buſineſs in the World, did ever thrive where ſome one or two Men, or very few, did not arrive to ſo much Reputation, as Machiavel calls it, as to be able to moderate the Councils of the Community with or Society: It is not in the Netherlands' Eaſt-India Company; and ſo it was ever in the Engliſh Eaſt-India Company, except for the laſt ſeven Years after the laſt Change; in which ſeven Years the Stock and the Company's Affairs dwindled almoſt to nothing, until Sir William Thompſon, deceas'd, a Gentleman of famous Prudence and Integrity, aris'd at that Reputation, that, in effect, he govern'd the whole Affair of the Company until the Day of his Death, and under his ſaid Conduct, the Company's Affairs did revive and proſper, and have ſince his Death more increaſed by happy Methods deriv'd from his Wiſdom originally; his worthy Sons and Poſterity are now ſettled upon Eſtates in Land, and have no Concern in the Company.

Sign'd by Order of the Court of Committees.

20th May, 1692. ROB. BLACKHORN.

A.D. 1691-92 The Matter argued at a free Conference.

the Abuſes, which, during the Violence of the late Reign, had been practic'd in the inferior Courts, and which not affecting the Lords, their Lordſhips had no immediate Concern in: That even in the Remedies which the Commons had introduc'd, they had been directed by the Current of the Conſtitution in thoſe Times when it had ran the ſmootheſt: That their Lordſhips, without any Complaint of the Method of Trial now in uſe, with regard to themſelves, or having the Terror of any ugly Precedent hanging over them, undertook to give that Current a Direction of their own; and, in ſo doing, were endeavouring to deprive the Crown of one of its moſt eſſential Prerogatives, namely, that of conſtituting Courts and Offices of Juſtice; or, at leaſt, of exempting themſelves from the Force of it: That, as the Matter now ſtood, it was in the Breaſt of the King to conſtitute a High Steward, with Power to ſummon a competent Number of Peers to form a Court: That the Clauſe, on the contrary, depriv'd the High Steward of that Power, and render'd the Trial of every Peer a Matter of as much Ceremony as the calling a Parliament: That as the Difficulty of bringing a Peer to the Bar would be augmented, ſo that of obtaining Juſtice againſt him, would be augmented likewiſe; for as the moſt indifferent would be the leaſt conſtant in their Attendance, ſo Thoſe who by Blood, Alliances, or Dependance, were actually Parties in the Cauſe, would, perhaps, be the only Judges: That this had a Tendency to let in Impunity for Treaſon, which they thought was a Privilege that even the Peerage was not entitled to: That, unleſs twelve Peers ſhould be found ſo abandon'd to all Senſe of Virtue and Honour, as, for Revenge or Intereſt, to ſacrifice an innocent Perſon, which, in Compliment to that noble Body, they did not care to ſuppoſe, their Lordſhips had nothing to apprehend from the Method of Trial now in uſe: And, laſtly, that the Commons could not tell how to think, that their refuſing to adopt any thing which might endanger the Conſtitution, would give any Interruption to the good Correſpondence of the two Houſes, which was ſo neceſſary for the Welfare of the Nation.

The Lords reply'd, in effect, That as they had not differ'd with the Commons in any thing which they had propounded for their Security, ſo they hop'd the Commons would ſhew the ſame Conſideration to theirs: That as the Liberties of the People might be endanger'd by ſome future Prince, and in ſuch Caſe, the People might be glad to have the Lords concur with them in their Defence, it was but reaſonable, that the Lords ſhould be at leaſt as ſecure from the Vengeance of the Crown, as the Commons: That as a Peer, obnoxious to thoſe in Power, might be taken off by a Junto (perhaps of ſo few as ſeven Perſons, for ſeven might be held a competent Number) appointed not to try, but condemn him, ſo, notwithſtanding the Proviſo in Caſes of Impeachment, when the whole Peerage were to ſit in Judgment, an ill Miniſter might elude a parliamentary Proſecution, by being tried and acquitted before a Parliament could reach him: That the Method of Trial now in Uſe, was no ancienter than Henry VIII. and was introduc'd to take off thoſe he did not like: That the Clauſe no otherwiſe alter'd the Conſtitution, than every new Law might be ſaid to alter the Conſtitution: That, as in time of Parliament, it was admitted, that Trials of this nature might be by the whole Houſe, it was but a ſmall Favour that the Lords contended for, to be tried at all times, as in Parliament; eſpecially, ſince, according to the preſent State of Things, the Term of Privilege was never ſuffer'd to lapſe: That the Argument brought by the Managers againſt the Clauſe, becauſe it had a Tendency to let in Impunity, concluded equally againſt the Bill itſelf; for by granting a Copy of the Indictment, and admitting Witneſſes upon their Oaths, a guilty Man might eſcape; and that a Lord had a much leſs Chance to eſcape with his Life from the Sentence of a pack'd Committee of Lords, than a Commoner from the Verdict of a Jury taken according to Preſcription, out of the Vicinage. A.D. 1691-92

The Commons, again, inſiſted, That every new Law did not alter the Conſtitution; for ſome were calculated only to amend or reſtore it; but that the Clauſe in queſtion, inſtead of amending and reſtoring, did actually alter the Conſtitution, and that for the worſe: That they were ſurpriz'd to hear the Method of Trial now in uſe, treated as the Creature of Henry the VIIIth's Tyranny, when there was manifeſt Proof of the contrary, by the Statute made 1 Edw. III. and many other Authorities: That the very Clauſe in queſtion did affirm the Legality of the ſaid Method, by diſtinguiſhing Treaſons which corrupted the Blood from other kinds of Treaſons: That as to the Apprehenſion dropt by the Lords, that ſeven might be thought a competent Number of Tryers, it was a Maxim in the Law, that no Man can be convicted of a Crime but by the unanimous Judgment of twelve unexceptionable Perſons: That if the Lords have not the Liberty of challenging, as Commoners have, it is becauſe every Peer is eſteem'd unexceptionable and above the Reach of Corruption: That therefore it was ſo much the more ſtrange, that the Suppoſition made by their Lordſhips, that even a Junto might be corrupted, which would have been unwarrantable in others, ſhould eſcape from them: That if all Power was to be aboliſh'd which was liable to Abuſe, all Government would be at an end: That perhaps no harder Caſes were to be found, than thoſe in which King, Lords, and Commons had all concurr'd; as in that of Cromwell Earl of Eſſex, who was condemn'd without a Hearing: That becauſe in Trials upon Appeal, the Lords themſelves were to be tried by Freeholders of the Vicinage, their Lordſhips would ſcarce allow it to be inferr'd, that they ought to be tried in the ſame manner upon Indictments of Treaſon: That the Method appointed by the Clauſe, was even more defective than that contended for by the Commons: For, whereas in Trials by Parliament,

A.D.1691-92 liament, the Lords have a Power to compel their Members to attend; and in those, by the King's Commission, the Lord Steward hath the same Authority over those to whom it is directed, in the present Case, Attendance is voluntary, and as the Commission lasted but a Day, the Issue of every Cause would be directed either by Violence or Favour, according to the Humour of the Majority: That with regard to the present State of the Peerage, they did not find the Lives and Fortunes of any innocent Lord expos'd to the Will of any great and malicious Minister, and, consequently, there was not that Necessity for the Clause which their Lordships suggested: That even if it was necessary, it would not be effectual, since it extended but to some Treasons, and to no Felonies: That if the Lords would never adventure to serve the Public, but on Terms of perfect Safety to themselves, such Service did not merit the Name of an Adventure: And, lastly, That the Peers had Power enough: That the Crown had not too much: That more given to the Former, might endanger the Latter; and that, therefore, the Commons would insist upon the old Ways, keep the Ballance of the Government even as they found it, and not change the Laws of England, which had been hitherto used and approv'd.

Both Parties adhere, and the Bill dropt.

Here the Conference broke up; and the Reports made on each Side serv'd rather to inflame the Dispute, than facilitate an Accommodation; insomuch, that, after three other free Conferences, both Houses adher'd, and the Bill dropt of course; the Commons chusing to remain in their present Condition, rather than purchase an Amendment by granting a new Privilege to the Lords, and the Lords resolving not to relieve the Commons, unless they might derive some Advantage from it to themselves.

Fuller's Imposture.

Another of the Amusements of the Session was occasion'd by one Fuller, a recorded Cheat, and then a Prisoner for Debt in the King's-Bench, who, thinking the Times favourable to the Trade, set up for a Discoverer, in hopes to have found a Market in the House of Commons; to whom he apply'd early in the Session, and to whom he had not only the Boldness to communicate certain Papers, as Vouchers for the Truth of his Informations, but to undertake to make all good by living Witnesses, in case he might be furnish'd with a blank Pass for two Persons to come from beyond Sea, &c. The amazing Confidence of the Fellow carried his Point: The House interpos'd with his Majesty for the Pass requir'd; which was granted; and on the 20th of February following, the Speaker acquainted the House, That he had receiv'd two Letters from Fuller, signifying, that his Witnesses were arriv'd, &c. Whereupon an Order was made for his and their Attendance on the Monday following, being the 22d; which he endeavour'd to evade, by sending word, that he was ill: But this Pretence would not serve; for the House suspecting an Imposture, immediately dispatch'd several of their Members, properly attended, to secure his Papers, and to examine him upon Oath, Who his Witnesses were? Where they were to be found, &c. Thus hard drove, he gave in the Names of Mr. James Hays, and Colonel Delaval, describ'd their Persons, Habits, directed the Committee to their very Lodgings, and, moreover, named one Jones, as a Person who could give them yet farther Intelligence: All which Particulars being reported the next Day to the House, the same Committee were directed to go in quest of these Persons; and on their Return signify'd, That no such Persons were to be found; an Order was then made for Fuller to produce them on the Morrow by ten o'Clock peremptorily; and he not being able to fulfil it, the House finally proceeded to declare nem. con. That the said Fuller was a notorious Impostor, a Cheat, and a false Accuser, having scandaliz'd their Majesties and their Government, abused the House, and falsly accused several Persons of Honour and Quality; for all which Offences, they voted an Address to his Majesty, to command his Attorney-General to prosecute him; which was done accordingly; and he underwent the Disgrace of the Pillory; which, to one so insensible of Shame, was no Punishment.

It is, however, remarkable, that Fuller made his first Appearance at the Bar of the House of Commons on the Day appointed for deliberating on the State of the Nation; and that, in the Close of the Debate, a Hint was taken from his pretended Informations to call for the Packet, which contain'd certain Letters that had been intercepted during the Summer preceding, and Lord Preston's Examinations thereon. These Letters were six in all; three of which, we are told, were written with King James's own Hand; the other three were seal'd with his Seal; and all had relation to a Conspiracy said to be then on foot, for exciting a new Rebellion in Scotland and the North of England. Nor was this all; for several Persons were referr'd to as Agents; and among the Chief, Legg, Lord Dartmouth, and one Crone, against whom Warrants were immediately issued; and though Crone could not immediately be found, Lord Dartmouth was committed to close Custody in the Tower. This made some Noise; and it was given out, that other Persons had disappear'd to avoid the like Treatment: Unluckily, no living Witness appear'd in support of these Letters, and Part of them were not sufficiently plain for want of a Key to the Cypher: The Expedient in this Case was to send for Lord Preston, who, having been Secretary of State under the late Government, and lying at the Mercy of this, it was thought would be equally able and willing to remove this Difficulty; but in making the Experiment, he either was, or affected to be, invincibly ignorant both of the Character and all it conceal'd: This was a new Mortification; and that Lord Preston might be more at Leisure to recollect himself, he was committed to Newgate; where, having continued for some time without obtaining or revealing any new Lights,

[State of Europe for September, 1691, p. 345.]

A.D. 1691-92 Lights, he was at last admitted to bail. The whole Affair had lain asleep ever since; and upon this Miscarriage of Fuller's Attempt, seem'd to have obtain'd a Quietus for good and all.

As to the Articles of Limerick, illegal as they had been represented, the Commons did not think fit to enter into a Discussion of them; on the contrary, having in October brought in a Bill, to abrogate the Oaths of Allegiance and Fidelity, and to substitute the Oaths to King William and Queen Mary in their Place, in the January following, they order'd the Lord Castleton and five other Members to attend General Ginkle, now made Earl of Athlone, with the Thanks of the House to himself and his Officers, for the great Services they had done towards the Reduction of Ireland; to which the General had the Address to reply in the following Terms: "I acknowledge this distinguish'd Honour done me by the House of Commons, and value it above a Triumph: The Success of their Majesties Arms in Ireland, was owing chiefly to the Valour of the English; and I will take care to communicate the Vote of the House to the Officers that serv'd in Ireland, and always endeavour the Prosperity of their Majesties and their Government."

And as to the Fate of Sir Walter Young's Bill, for ascertaining the Salaries of the Judges, we shall chuse to express ourselves in the [Burnet.] Words of the Historian-Bishop, who writes concerning it, as follows: "Among the Bills that were offer'd to the King at the End of the Session, one was to secure the Judges Sallaries, &c. The Judges had their Commissions during their good Behaviour; yet their Sallaries were not so secur'd to them, but that they were at the King's Pleasure. But the King put a Stop to this, and refus'd to pass the Bill; for it was represented to him by some of the Judges themselves, That it were not fit they should be out of all Dependance on the Crown; though it did not appear that there was any Hurt in making Judges in all re- A.D. 1691-92. spects free and independent."

It appears also by a Paper of (i) Reasons presented to the Members of both Houses, that their Lordships, the Judges, had their Share of Concern in another Bill, at this time depending, against the buying and selling of Offices; but whether the Lords, to whom it had been sent up by the Commons, suffer'd it to be lost, in Compliment to them, we have not sufficient Light to decide.

And now the great Affair of the Supply being dispatch'd, and Ways and Means provided for the raising 3,411,675*l.* for the current Charge, his Majesty, as usual, grew so impatient to go abroad, that though he had just recommended the Case of the French Refugees to the Consideration of the Commons, and they had actually begun to deliberate upon it, he came to the House, February the 29th, and, having given the Royal Assent to all the Bills presented to him, but that relating to the Judges, put an End to the Session, with the following Speech:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I return my hearty Thanks to you all, The King's Speech. for the great Demonstrations you have given me of your Affections in this Session, and of your Zeal for the Support of the Government.

And I must thank you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, in particular, for the great Supplies you have granted for the Prosecution of the War. I assure you I shall take care so to dispose of the Money you have given me for the public Occasions, as that the whole Nation may be entirely satisfy'd with the Application of it.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I think it proper to acquaint you with my Intentions of going beyond Sea very speedily, which, I am afraid, has been retarded more than is convenient for the present Posture of Affairs; and upon that account I think it necessary to put an End to this present Meeting; the

(i) Viz. The Statute of 18 Edward III. Cap. 4. provides, That the Judges shall be sworn to take no Fee, Robe, or Gift of any but the King.

The Statute, 20 Edward III. Cap. 1. provides against Judges taking Fee, Robe, or Gift, of any Subject whatsoever.

The Statute of 12 Richard II. Cap. 2. provides, That such as have the ordaining, naming, and making of any Officer under the King, shall not for Money, Favour or Affection, make any Officer, but upon pure Merit and Desert.

The Lord Chief-Justice Coke saith, that Justice will never be administred 'till unless the Golden Law, 12 Richard II. be observ'd. Coke's Institutes, Part I. Fol. 234.

It was adjudg'd Bribery for any in Judicial Office, to take Fee, Robe, or Gift of any private Person. Coke's III. Inst. Fol. 145, 148.

So that the seventh Proviso in the Statute of 5 and 6 Edward VI. Cap. 16. for the Judges to do as they might have done before, cannot be construed for them to sell: For the Administration of Justice is a Trust in them reposed, which they are bound to discharge, according to the Laws in being. And whenever any Person's private Interest comes in Competition with the Public Good, the Public shall be preferr'd: So that if the Judges had good Right and Title to sell Offices, yet as the same are incident to the Administration of Justice, which both Crown and People are bound to support, certainly buying and selling Offices ought to be prohibited, because destructive to the Administration of Justice.

Hence may appear what Caution Law-makers ought to have of Exceptions and Provisoes in Laws, lest selfish Persons, by Colour thereof, take Licence to break in upon former Laws: as both often been done by Colour of the forementioned seventh Proviso. And how can that Judge that sells Offices, punish another for so doing?

If Offices be sold, Money, not Merit, will give Preference. If the Officer, by Ignorance commit an Error, it may be as fatal to the Party griev'd, as if done on purpose to ruin him. Vide The Secondary Sheriffs of London, and Lord Montgomery's late Case, &c. If the Fault be wilfull and corrupt, while the Person that sells the Office has a Trust repos'd in him to correct the Offender, the Money given by the Purchaser, may blind, or rather put out the Eyes, and stop the Ears, and take away the right Judgment of the Judge.

To alledge, that the Judges now have their Sallaries paid by Tallies, and not in ready Money; therefore they ought to be excepted out of this Act: This is no more than may be alledg'd by most of the King's Officers, Soldiers (which would not be liked, if ased by these as a Pretence to free Quarters) Creditors by Loan, &c. And is only the unavoidable Consequence of amending the ill State of the Coin, which a short time, and good Management, will fully Remedy.

The Sale of Offices and Places in the City of London, hath there, in fact, this Piece of ill Husbandry consequent, viz. That for every hundred Pounds the Mayor or Sheriffs receive for many of the said Places, the Citizens, Inhabitants, &c. are mulcted to pay again ten times so much to the extraordinary Exactions, &c. of the Officers. [Out of Lord Somers's Collection, vol. XIII.

A.D.1691-92 the Seaſon of the Year being now ſo very far advanc'd, that it may prove of the laſt ill Conſequence to continue it any longer."

The Lord Chief Baron Atkins then declared, That it was his Majeſty's Pleaſure, that the two Houſes ſhould adjourn themſelves to the 12th Day of April following; which they did accordingly: And on the 19th of March a Proclamation was iſſued for proroguing the Parliament from the ſaid 12th of April to the 24th of May; and further ſignifying, that their Majeſties would then expect the Attendance of ſuch Members only as were reſident in the Cities of London and Weſtminſter; and that convenient Notice ſhould be given, by Proclamation, of the time of meeting for the Diſpatch of Buſineſs.

Several Alterations at Court.

His Majeſty, notwithſtanding the Seaſon was ſo very far advanc'd, did not, however, embark for Holland on the very Inſtant that he had thus diſmiſs'd his Parliament, but continu'd at Kenſington till the fourth of March; in which Interval he was pleas'd to gratify the Tories yet farther, by admitting the Earls of Rocheſter and Ranelagh, the Lord Cornwallis, and Sir Edward Seymour (who, according to Burnet, had, in a very injurious manner, not only oppos'd every thing, but reflected on the King's Title and Conduct) to his Council-Board; by conſtituting the Earl of Pembroke Lord Privy-Seal, and appointing Lord Cornwallis to ſucceed the Earl, as a Commiſſioner of the Admiralty. His Majeſty was, moreover, induc'd to make ſome Alterations in the Treaſury, but without altering the Balance of Parties there; for Lord Godolphin remain'd firſt Commiſſioner; Sir John Lowther, who was diſplac'd to make Room for Seymour, was a Tory; and Pelham, a Whig, was ſucceeded by Charles Montagu, Eſq; a Gentleman nobly deſcended, of great Parts, refin'd Addreſs, and who began now to be as eminent among the Men of Buſineſs, as he had been, for ſome Years before, among the Men of Genius and Speculation: And, laſtly, the Lieutenancy of Ireland was conferr'd on Lord Sydney.

The Diſgrace of the Earl of Marlborough, which happen'd in January, deſerves to be made an Article by itſelf: Of what Uſe he had been to his Majeſty, there is no need to repeat; what Pleaſure it afforded the Jacobites to ſee his Services ſo rewarded, it is eaſy to imagine: And as to the Impolicy of diſobliging him, on account of his Abilities, and the ſupreme Aſcendancy that his Lady and he maintain'd over the Princeſs of Denmark, it will be ſo much the leſs wonder'd at, when we conſider, that thoſe Abilities of his could not fail to excite the Jealouſy of the King's Dutch Favourites, at leaſt, that his Majeſty, Politician as he was, at Times, ſacrificed all Conſiderations to the Pleaſure of gratifying his own Humours, and that he now thought himſelf in a Condition to give what Scope to thoſe Humours he pleas'd; for not to inſiſt alone on the Credit he had newly acquir'd by the Reduction of Ireland, the Highland-Chiefs were at this very Inſtant entering into his Pay, and ſwearing Allegiance to him, as we ſhall ſee in its Place; ſo that he had, in all appearance, ſcarce any thing to apprehend at home, except a Parliamentary Oppoſition; and that Experience had already ſhewn him, that while he conſented to a Diviſion of the Game, he ſhould never want a Pack to run it down. A.D.1691-92

The Earl was on the Liſt of Generals to accompany the King to Flanders, and ſeem'd to be, at leaſt on as good Terms with him, as any other Engliſh Commander: He had made his Court in the Circle on the very Day of his Diſgrace, and had been receiv'd as at other times: But ſcarce had he turn'd his Back before the Earl of Nottingham was ſent after him to demand all his Commiſſions (for he was at once Colonel of Fuſileers, Colonel of the third Troop of Guards, and Gentleman of the Bedchamber) and to tell him, his Majeſty had no farther Occaſion for his Service.

To account for this ſudden Turn, Biſhop Burnet firſt ſays, It ſeem'd ſome Letter was intercepted, which gave Suſpicion; but then he does not explane of what, nor between whom, this Letter was ſuppos'd to paſs. His Lordſhip adds, "It is certain, that he, the Earl, thought he was too little conſider'd, and that he had, on many Occaſions, cenſur'd the King's Conduct, and reflected on the Dutch;" which it ſeems was the Criterion of Court-Favour. But, after all, he imputes the Original Cauſe of his Diſgrace to the Affair of the Princeſs's Settlement, formerly diſcours'd of at large; which was held to be his Lady's Sin, and therefore to be puniſh'd in him.

His Lady's own Words on this Topic are, "This Event might, perhaps, be well enough accounted for, by ſaying, That Lord Portland had ever a great Prejudice to my Lord Marlborough; and that my Lady Orkney (then Mrs. Villiers) tho' I had never done her any Injury, except not making court to her, was my implacable Enemy: But I think it is not to be doubted, that the principal Cauſe of the King's Meſſage, was the Court's Diſlike, that any Body ſhould have ſo much Intereſt with the Princeſs as I had, who would not implicitly obey every Command of the King and Queen."

Others ſuggeſt, that the Earl having been entruſted by the King, together with the Marquis of Caermarthen and Lord Shrewſbury, with the Secret of a Deſign upon Dunkirk, he had communicated it to his Wife, and ſhe to her Siſter, Lady Tyrconnel; by whoſe Means it reach'd the Court of St. Germains, time enough to occaſion a Diſappointment.

But there is no Proof of any ſuch Deſign to be found, much leſs of any ſuch Diſcovery; and the Truth, in the main, is, That there had been a growing Coldneſs between the two Courts ever ſince the King had let the Princeſs know, by his Behaviour both to her and her Huſband, That he could ſupport himſelf without them: And the time was now come when his Majeſty thought he might ſafely lay aſide all that Conſtraint, which, we find by Biſhop Burnet, was ſo uneaſy to him.

A.D.1691-92 Lady Marlborough herſelf relates the Progreſs of this Coldneſs, and, as one of the Stages, inſerts the following Occurrence:

"The next Difference that happen'd between the Siſters, was upon the Prince's Deſign of going to Sea. He was carry'd to this Reſolution by his Unwillingneſs to ſtay at home, while there was ſo much Action abroad; and by the Remembrance of the extreme ill Uſage he had met with, when, at a great Expence, he attended his Majeſty into Ireland.

You will allow, I believe, that it was very natural for the Prince to chuſe a Sea-Expedition, rather than expoſe himſelf again to the like contemptuous Uſage. On his taking leave of the King, who was going to Flanders, he aſk'd his Majeſty's Permiſſion to ſerve him at Sea as a Volunteer, and without any Command. The King ſaid nothing; but immediately embrac'd him by way of adieu. Silence in ſuch Caſes being generally taken for Conſent, the Prince prepar'd his Equipage, and ſent every thing on board: But the King, as it afterwards appear'd, had left Orders with the Queen, that ſhe ſhould neither ſuffer the Prince to go to Sea, nor yet forbid him to go, if ſhe could ſo contrive Matters as to make his ſtaying at home his own Choice.

The Queen obſerv'd the King's Directions very exactly: She ſent a great Lord to me, to deſire I would perſuade the Princeſs to keep the Prince from going to Sea; and this I was to compaſs, without letting the Princeſs know that it was the Queen's Deſire. I anſwer'd, That I had all the Duty imaginable for the Queen, but that no Conſideration could make me ſo failing to my Miſtreſs, as I ſhould think myſelf, if I ſpoke to her upon that Occaſion, and conceal'd the Reaſon of it: That it was natural for the Princeſs to wiſh the Prince might ſtay at home, and be out of A.D.1691-92 Danger; but whether ſhe could prevail in that Matter, I did very much doubt: That nevertheleſs I would ſay to the Princeſs whatever her Majeſty pleas'd, provided I might have the Liberty to make uſe of her Name. After this, the Queen ſent my Lord Rochester to me, to deſire much the ſame thing. The Prince was not to go to Sea, and his not going was to appear his own Choice. But after ſo much Noiſe as had been made about his going, the Prince thought, that to ſend for his Things back, without giving any Reaſon for changing his Deſign, would be making a very ridiculous Figure, and therefore he would not ſubmit. Upon which the Queen ſent my Lord Nottingham in Form, poſitively to forbid the Prince of Denmark's going to Sea."

Her Grace (for ſhe had been half an Age a Ducheſs before ſhe condeſcended to turn Author) adds, That notwithſtanding all theſe things, the Queen and Princeſs liv'd, in all Appearance, as if nothing had happen'd, till the King was pleas'd, without publicly aſſigning any particular Reaſon, to remove Lord Marlborough. And, afterwards, That ſhe never could learn what Cauſe the King aſſign'd for his Diſpleaſure. She alſo adds, That the being turn'd out was ſo diſagreeable to her Temper, that, ſhe believes, it was three Weeks before her beſt Friends could perſuade her, that it was fit for her to go to a Court, which, as ſhe thought, had uſed Lord Marlborough very ill: That under the Umbrage of a Diſtinction made by Lord Godolphin, viz. That in attending the Princeſs, ſhe was only paying her Duty where it was owing, ſhe was at laſt prevail'd upon to go: That the Queen, taking her Appearance at Court for an Inſult, requir'd her Siſter, by (k) Letter, to diſcard her: That the Princeſs (k) Which, together with the Princeſs's Anſwer, though both are familiar to the preſent Age, are here inſerted for the Information of thoſe to come.

Kenſington, Friday the 5th of February.

"Having ſomething to ſay to you, which I know will not be very pleaſing, I chuſe rather to write it firſt, being unwilling to ſurprize you; though, I think, what I am going to tell you, ſhould not, if you give yourſelf the time to think, that never any body was ſuffer'd to live at Court in my Lord Marlborough's Circumſtances. I need not repeat the Cauſe he has given the King to do what he has done, nor his Unwillingneſs at all times to come to ſuch Extremities, tho' People do deſerve it.

I hope, you do me the Juſtice to believe, it is as much againſt my Will, that I now tell you, that, after this, it is very unfit Lady Marlborough ſhould ſtay with you, ſince that gives her Huſband to juſt a Pretence of being where he ought not.

I think, I might have expected you ſhould have ſpoke to me of it. And the King and I, both believing it, made us ſtay thus long. But ſeeing you was to far from it, that you brought Lady Marlborough hither laſt Night, makes us reſolve to put it off no longer, but tell you, ſhe muſt not ſtay; and that I have all the reaſon imaginable to look upon your bringing her, as the ſtrangeſt thing that ever was done. Nor could all my Kindneſs for you (which is ever ready to turn all you do the beſt way, at any other time) have hindered me ſhewing you that Moment, but I conſider'd your Condition, and that made me maſter myſelf ſo far as not to take notice of it then.

But now I muſt tell you, it was very unkind in a Siſter, would have been very uncivil in an Equal, and I need not ſay I have more to claim: Which, though my Kindneſs would make me never exact, yet when I ſee the Uſe you would make of it, I muſt tell you, I know what is due to me, and expect to have it from you. 'Tis upon that Account, I plainly tell you, Lady Marlborough muſt not continue with you in the Circumſtances her Lord is.

I know this will be uneaſy to you, and I am ſorry for it; and it is very much ſo to me to ſay all this to you, for I have all the real Kindneſs imaginable for you, and as I ever have, ſo will always do my Part to live with you as Siſters ought; that is, not only like ſo near Relations, but like Friends: And, as ſuch, I did think to write to you; for I would have made my ſelf believe your Kindneſs for her made you at firſt forget that you ſhould have for the King and me: and reſolv'd to put you in mind of it myſelf, neither of us being willing to come to harſher ways.

That the Sight of Lady Marlborough having chang'd my Thoughts, does naturally alter my Stile: And ſince by that I ſee how little you ſeem to conſider what even in common Civility you owe us, I have told it you plainly; but withal aſſure you, that let me have never ſo much reaſon to take any thing ill of you, my Kindneſs is ſo great, that I can paſs over moſt things, and live with you as becomes me. And I deſire to do ſo merely from that Motive: For I do love you as my Siſter, and nothing but yourſelf can make me do otherwiſe: And that is the reaſon I chuſe to write this, rather than tell it you, that you may overcome your Thoughts; and when you have well conſider'd, you will find, that tho' the thing be hard (which I again aſſure you I am ſorry for) yet it is not unreaſonable, but what has ever been practiſed, and what you yourſelf would do, were you in my Place.

I will end this with once more deſiring you to conſider the Matter impartially, and take time for it. I do not deſire an Anſwer preſently, becauſe I would not have you give a raſh one. I ſhall come to your Drawing-room to-morrow before you play, becauſe you know why I cannot make one: At ſome other time we ſhall reaſon the Buſineſs calmly, which I will willingly do, or any thing elſe that may

A.D.1691-92 Princeſs refuſing to do ſo, a Meſſage was ſent by the Lord Chamberlain (Dorſet) forbidding her (Lady Churchill) continuing any longer at the Cockpit (then the Reſidence of her Highneſs, and ſettled upon her and her Heirs, by her Marriage-Articles:) That the Princeſs choſe to leave her Houſe, rather than part with her Friend: That having borrow'd Sion Houſe of the Duke of Somerſet, the King endeavour'd, tho' in vain, to make his Grace retract the Promiſe he had made. And that the Princeſs, before ſhe remov'd from the Cockpit, waited upon her Majeſty, and made her all the Profeſſions imaginable; to which the Queen was as inſenſible as a Statue.

To clear up what has been hinted above, in relation to Highland-Chiefs, it is now neceſſary to inſert two Paſſages out of the London-Gazette, viz. "Moſt of the Highlanders have laid hold of their Majeſties gracious Indemnity, and, particularly, Cameron of Lochiel, one of their principal Leaders, is going for England to give his Majeſty all Aſſurance of his Sincerity: And we are told, that ſeveral others are inclinable to ſubmit, and deſire ſome farther time may be allow'd them for their coming in; ſo, that it is believ'd, there will be no Occaſion for our Forces to march towards the Highlands." This was dated January the ſeventh, and that which follows January the eleventh. "It is now confirm'd, That the Earl of Brodalbin's Negotiations with the Highlanders has had its intended Effect; for Sir Ewan Cameron of Lochiel, Chief of that Clan, and the principal Leader of that Party, the Laird of Macnaughton, Chief of his Clan, the Macdonalds of Kippoch, Ferquarſon of Inerey, with that Clan, the Stuarts of Appin, the Clan of Gregor, and many others, both Highlanders and Lowlanders, who were the principal Leaders and Actors in the late Highland-Rebellion, are now come in, and have taken the Oaths, in the Terms of, and within the Time prefix'd by, their Majeſty's Indemnity. Macdonald of Glengary, and ſome others, who were deluded to ſtand out till the Expiration of the Time appointed for them to come in, are now ſenſible of their Folly, and have offer'd to ſubmit to the Government, and to give Bond for their peaceable living under it: And, thereupon, all the late King James's Officers, particularly, Bochan and Canon, have A.D.1691-92 deſir'd Paſſes to go out of the Country; ſo that now we have no fear of any Diſturbance within this Kingdom."

Thus the King had reaſon to think, that he ſtood upon higher and ſafer Ground than he had ever done before: And whereas Bp. Burnet, ſpeaking of his Majeſty's going over to Holland to prepare for an early Campaign, makes uſe of theſe Words: "He intimated ſomewhat in his Speech to the Parliament of a Deſcent deſign'd upon France; but we had neither Men nor Money to execute it." In the Copies of his Speech now extant, we can find no ſuch Intimation: And as to his Majeſty's not having Men nor Money for ſuch a Project, the Biſhop himſelf has before acknowledg'd, he had as much of the Latter as he aſked; and it is notorious, that upon the Reduction of Ireland, the far greater Part of the Forces employ'd in that Service, were recall'd as ſoon as it was over, and together with ſeveral other Regiments from Scotland, were waſted over to Flanders; whence, and from the Proviſion made by the Commons for upwards of ſixty-five thouſand Men, we are authoriz'd to ſet aſide this ſtrange Paragraph, as void of all Foundation.

To proceed with the Affairs of Scotland, it Affairs of Scotland. now appear'd, that his Majeſty was as weary of playing the Preſbyterian there, as the Reforming Whig in England; or rather, that, like a prime Politician, he ſhifted his Sails as the Wind requir'd; for, having made all the Uſe he could of the refractory Spirit of that Faction, and finding it now became troubleſome to himſelf, he open'd his Arms to their Adverſaries, and made a very conſiderable Alteration in their Favour: Nay, according to the Prelate laſt quoted, ſome of thoſe who had been in Montgomery's Plot, were brought into the Council and Miniſtry, and had ſome of the chief Poſts in the Government aſſign'd them, tho' his Lordſhip aſſures us, it was very viſible, that thoſe pretended Converts came into his Service only to have it in their power to deliver up that Kingdom to King James; in which, it ſeems, they were ſo open, that they ſcarce diſguis'd their Deſigns: And yet at the Head of this motley Adminiſtration, were plac'd the Maſter of Stair, and James Johnſton, Eſq; his Majeſty's late Envoy to the Elector of Brandenburgh, may ſhew it ſhall never be my Fault if we do not live kindly together; nor will I ever be other by choice, but your truly loving and affectionate Siſter,

THE ANSWER.

"Your Majeſty was in the right to think your Letter would be very ſurprizing to me: for you muſt needs be ſenſible enough of the Kindneſs I have for my Lady Marlborough, to know, that a Command from you to part with her muſt be the greateſt Mortification in the World to me; and indeed of ſuch a nature, as I might well have hoped your Kindneſs to me would have always prevented. I am ſatisfy'd ſhe cannot have been guilty of any Fault to you: And it would be extremely to her Advantage, if I could here repeat every Word that ever ſhe ſaid to me of you in her whole Life. I confeſs, it is no ſmall Addition to my Trouble to find the want of your Majeſty's Kindneſs to me upon this Occaſion, ſince I am ſure I have always endeavour'd to deſerve it by all the Actions of my Life.

Your Care of my preſent Condition is extremely obliging; And if you would be pleas'd to add to it ſo far, as upon my account to recall your ſevere Command (as I muſt beg leave to call it a Matter ſo tender to me, and ſo little reaſonable, as I think, to be impoſed upon me, that you would ſcarce require it from the meaneſt of your Subjects) I ſhould ever acknowledge it as a very agreeable Mark of your Kindneſs to me. And I muſt as freely own, that as I think this Proceeding can be for no other Intent than to give me a very ſenſible Mortification, ſo there is no Miſery that I cannot readily reſolve to ſuffer, rather than the Thoughts of parting with her. If after all this that I have ſaid, I muſt ſtill find myſelf ſo unhappy as to be farther preſs'd in this Matter, yet your Majeſty may be aſſur'd, that as my paſt Actions have given the greateſt Teſtimony of my Reſpect both for the King and you, ſo it ſhall always be my Endeavour, wherever I am, to preſerve it carefully for the time to come, as becomes

Your Majeſty's
Very affectionate Siſter

From the Cockpit, Feb. 5th, 1692.

A.D.1691-92 denburgh, as joint Secretaries. The Biſhop indeed does not ſpecify this Partition of Power, but ſays, Johnſton was call'd home to be made Secretary, and Melvil had a leſs important Poſt given him. But in this Matter it is ſafeſt to follow the Gazette: The inferior Poſt beſtow'd on Lord Melvil, was that of Lord Privy-Seal; Tweedale was made Lord-Chancellor, Crawford continu'd to preſide at the Council-board, Lothain had the Honour to repreſent his Majeſty's Perſon as High Commiſſioner to the General-Aſſembly: And becauſe the Parliament were not as yet in a Temper to be met with Safety, nor the Country to be entruſted with a new Election, it was farther adjourn'd from the 28th of January to the 15th of April.

Our Hiſtorian-Biſhop, however, acknowledges, that the great Drift of his Majeſty's Scotiſh Politics was now to remove the ill Impreſſions, which, from his paſt Conduct there, had been entertain'd of him in England: That this, and the Diſpleaſure he had conceiv'd againſt the Preſbyterians, induc'd him to make the Change above mention'd, and farther to recommend to the General-Aſſembly to receive the Epiſcopal Clergy, upon their Deſire to be admitted, and to concur with them in the Government of the Church; as alſo to order the ſaid Aſſembly to be diſſolv'd, in caſe they did not think fit to comply with this Expedient of his Majeſty's, to ſmooth the Current of his own Affairs at their Expence.

But, according to his Lordſhip, there was no Likelihood that this Expedient ſhould take place; for, ſo violent was the Animoſity of the two Parties againſt each other, that neither would liſten to any Propoſal of Accommodation; and ſo implacable the Spirit of their Leaders, that they made uſe of all their Credit and Intereſt to widen the Breach which it was their Duty to cloſe. The Prelatiſts gave out, That the King was now theirs, and that they ought to have the full Benefit of their Majeſties favourable Diſpoſition towards them; and the Preſbyterians, that the Law was theirs, and that what they were authoris'd to keep, they would not part with in Compliment to any body. The Prelatiſts did indeed profeſs, That they were willing to come to a Concurrence with Preſbytery; but then, ſays our Right Reverend Author, It was with a Deſign to bring about Epiſcopacy; which may be true enough; for Power is of an encroaching nature, and thoſe who contend for a little, will ſcarce be ſatisfy'd with all. The Preſbyterians, however, whom he characteriſes as ſtiff and peeviſh always, were now more than ordinarily ſo: "They were jealous of the King, continues his Lordſhip; their Friends were now diſgrac'd; their bittereſt Enemies were coming into Favour; ſo they were ſurly, and would abate in no Point of their Government; and upon that the Aſſembly was diſſolv'd [without naming any other time or Place of meeting] but they pretended, that by Law they had a right to an annual Meeting, from which nothing could cut them off; for they ſaid, according to a Diſtinction much uſed among them, that the King's Power of calling Synods and Aſſemblies, was cumulative, and not privative; that is, he might call them if he would, and appoint Time and Place; but that if he did not call them, they might meet by an inherent Right that the Church had, which was confirm'd by Law; therefore they adjourn'd themſelves. [having firſt proteſted againſt the Diſſolution.] This was repreſented to the King as a high Strain of Inſolence, that invaded the Rights of the Crown, of which he was become very ſenſible: Moſt of thoſe who came now into his Service, made it their Buſineſs to incenſe him againſt the Preſbyterians; in which he was ſo far engag'd, that it did alienate that Party much from him."

Thus we find our Deliverer-King at Variance in both Kingdoms with, and oppos'd by, his Firſt Friends; and his own Apologiſt allowing, in effect, that in prerogative Points King James himſelf had hardly a quicker Feeling. The ſame Author after this makes a Tranſition to another Affair, which he introduces in the following Words: "There was, at this time, a very barbarous Maſſacre committed in Scotland, which ſhew'd both the Cruelty and Treachery of ſome of thoſe who had unhappily inſinuated themſelves into the King's Confidence." The Maſſacre, it is true, was barbarous beyond Imagination; but whether the Guilt and Scandal of it ought to be faſten'd on ſome of his Majeſty's new Friends only, as the Biſhop would apparently have it believ'd, ought to remain a Queſtion till we know the whole of the Story; which is thus recited by his Lordſhip:

The Maſſacre of Glencoe.

"The Earl of Braidalbin formed a Scheme of quieting all the Highlanders, if the King would give twelve or fifteen thouſand Pounds for doing it, which was remitted down from England: And this was to be divided among the Heads of the Tribes or Clans of the Highlanders: He employ'd his Emiſſaries among them, and told them, the beſt Service they could do King James, was to lie quiet, and reſerve themſelves to a better time; and if they would take the Oaths, the King would be contented with that, and they were to have a Share of this Sum, that was ſent down to buy their Quiet: But this came to nothing; their Demands roſe high; they knew this Lord had Money to diſtribute among them; they believ'd he intended to keep the beſt Part of it to himſelf; ſo they aſked more than he could give. Among the moſt clamorous and obſtinate of theſe, were the Mackdonalds of Glencoe, who were believ'd guilty of much Robbery, and many Murders; and ſo had gain'd too much by their pilfering War, to be eaſily brought to give it over. The Head of that Vally had ſo particularly provok'd Lord Braidalbin, that as his Scheme was quite defeated, by the Oppoſition that he rais'd, ſo he deſign'd a ſevere Revenge. The King had, by a Proclamation, offer'd an Indemnity to all the Highlanders that had been in Arms againſt him, upon their coming in, by a prefix'd Day, to take the Oaths: The Day had been twice or thrice prolong'd; and it was at laſt carry'd as related by Burnet.

A.D.1691-92 carry'd to the end of the Year 1691, with a poſitive threatning, of proceeding to Military Execution againſt ſuch as ſhould not come into his Obedience, by the laſt Day of December.

All were ſo terrify'd that they came in; and even that Macdonald went to the Governor of Fort William, on the laſt of December, and offer'd to take the Oaths; but he, being only a military Man, could not, or would not, tender them: And Macdonald was forc'd to ſeek for ſome of the legal Magiſtrates to tender them to him. The Snows were then fallen, ſo four or five Days paſs'd before he could come to a Magiſtrate; he took the Oaths in his Preſence on the fourth or fifth of January, when, by the Strictneſs of Law he could claim no Benefit by it; The Matter was ſignify'd to the Council; and the Perſon had a Reprimand for giving him the Oaths, when the Day was paſt.

This was kept up from the King: And the Earl of Braidalbin came to Court to give an Account of his Diligence, and to bring back the Money, ſince he could not do the Service for which he had it. He inform'd againſt this Macdonald, as the chief Perſon who had defeated that good Deſign; and that he might both gratify his own Revenge, and render the King odious to all the Highlanders, he propos'd, that Orders ſhould be ſent for a Military Execution on thoſe of Glencoe. An Inſtruction was drawn by the Secretary of State to be both ſign'd and counterſign'd by the King (that ſo he might bear no Part of the Blame, but that it might lie wholly on the King) that ſuch as had not taken the Oaths by the time limited, ſhould be ſhut out of the Benefit of the Indemnity, and be receiv'd only upon Mercy: But when it was found that this would not authorize what was intended, a ſecond Order was got to be ſign'd and counterſign'd, that if the Glencoe-Men could be ſeparated from the reſt of the Highlanders, ſome Examples might be made of them, in order to ſtrike Terror into the reſt. The King ſign'd this, without any Enquiry about it; for he was too apt to ſign Papers in a hurry, without examining the Importance of them. This was one Effect of his Slowneſs in diſpatching Buſineſs; for as he was apt to ſuffer things to run on till there was a great Heap of Papers laid before him, ſo then he ſign'd them a little too precipitately. But all this while, the King knew nothing of Macdonald's offering to take the Oaths within the time, nor of his having taken them ſoon after it was paſt, when he came to a proper Magiſtrate. As theſe Orders were ſent down, the Secretary of State writ many private Letters to Leving ſtoun, who commanded in Scotland, giving him a ſtrict Charge and particular Directions for the Execution of them: And he order'd the Paſſes in the Valley to be kept; deſcribing them ſo minutely, that the Orders were certainly drawn by one who knew the Country well. He gave alſo a poſitive Direction, that no Priſoners ſhould be taken, that ſo the Execution might be as terrible as was poſſible: He preſs'd this upon Leving- ſtoun with Strains of Vehemence that look'd A.D.1691-92 as if there was ſomething more than ordinary in it; he indeed grounded it on his Zeal for the King's Service, adding, that ſuch Rebels and Murderers ſhould be made Examples of.

In February, a Company was ſent to Glencoe, who were kindly receiv'd and quarter'd over the Valley; the Inhabitants thinking themſelves ſafe, and looking for no Hoſtilities, after they had ſtaid a Week among them, they took their time in the Night, and kill'd about ſix-and-thirty of them, the reſt taking the alarm and eſcaping. This rais'd a mighty Outcry, and was publiſh'd by the French in their Gazettes, and by the Jacobites in their Libels, to caſt a Reproach on the King's Government, as cruel and barbarous; though in all other Inſtances it had appear'd, that his own Inclinations were gentle and mild, rather to an Exceſs. The King ſent Orders to inquire into the Matter; but when the Letters writ upon this Buſineſs were all examined, which I myſelf read, it appear'd that ſo many were involv'd in the Matter, that the King's Gentleneſs prevail'd on him to a Fault, and he contented himſelf with diſmiſſing only the Maſter of Stair from his Service. The Highlanders were ſo inflam'd with this, that they were put in as forward a Diſpoſition as the Jacobites wiſh'd for, to have rebell'd upon the firſt favourable Opportunity: And indeed the not puniſhing this with a due Rigour, was the greateſt Blot in this whole Reign, and had a very ill Effect in alienating that Nation from the King and his Government."

Thus we are to conclude, if we can, that the Jacobites made no Scruple to cut one-another's Throats for the Advancement of their Cauſe: But if Lord Braidalbin was a Jacobite, the Maſter of Stair was not; and his Brother-Secretary, Johnſton, had been one of the moſt active Inſtruments in the Revolution: Beſides, Stair was not one of thoſe lately taken into his Majeſty's Confidence, for he had poſſeſs'd a large Share of it from the Beginning: He had ſerv'd as Joint-Secretary with Melvil, before the Latter was ſet aſide, to make Room for Johnſton: And how far ſoever Braidalbin might have been inſtrumental to the Maſſacre, by his Repreſentations at Court, Stair was the Man who took ſuch Pains to make it as terrible as poſſible; which will be prov'd beyond all Contradiction in the Sequel, when the Deciſion of this Affair in the Scottiſh Parliament comes to be treated of. The Biſhop's Account is indeed liable to many Objections, both on account of Partiality and Inconſiſtency; for, not to inſiſt any farther on his Injuſtice in warping the Fact in ſuch a manner as to make it reflect on the Jacobites, he has omitted many material Circumſtances, he has ſoften'd others; and tho' he cannot wholly ſuppreſs the Horror of the Proceeding, he ſeems diſguſted that it ſhould raiſe a mighty Outcry, or that it ſhould be made a Reproach on the King's Government: Whereas, no Government ought to be facred on ſuch infamous Occaſions as theſe; which authoriſe

A.D. 1691-92 authorise their Enemies to expose them, their Friends to desert them, and lay an indispensible Obligation on the Historians to set them forth in their proper Colours, as a Warning to Posterity.

In Contradiction to what the Bishop says, we have seen it affirm'd in the Gazette, That Braidalbin's Negotiations had succeeded; that several of the Clans had made their Submission; and that those who had been deluded to stand out were sensible of their Folly, and were willing to submit. This Article is dated from Edinburgh, January the 11th, and was publish'd at London on the 18th following. His Lordship acknowledges, that Macdonald came to Colonel Hill, Governor of Fort-William on the last Day of December, being also the last of the Indemnity, in order to take the Oaths; and tho' he postpones his actual taking of them to the fourth or fifth of January following, he also acknowledges, that this Delay was occasion'd by the Rigour of the Season: But the Jacobites affirm, That, notwithstanding the Season was so rigorous, he made such haste to Inverary, the Capital of Argyleshire, that the Term prescrib'd by the Proclamation was elaps'd but one Day; that if the Extremity of the Weather had not hinder'd, he had arriv'd there within the said Term: That Sir Colin Campbell, the Sheriff of the County, to whom he apply'd, at first scrupled to administer the Oaths, alledging, that Macdonald was no longer entitled to the Benefit of them; but was at last overcome, on his threatning to protest against the Severity of such Treatment; and that when he and his Company had thus made their Submission, he return'd to his own Habitation, in full Confidence, that being now a sworn Subject, he was no longer liable to the Penalties he had incurr'd as a Rebel.

and by the Jacobites. [Gallienus Redivivus, 4to. 1695.]

The Jacobites, moreover, affirm, That the Soldiers came into the Valley, under the Pretence of levying Arrears of Cess and Hearth-Money: That, upon their Entrance, either Macdonald or his Sons demanded, If they came as Friends or Enemies? That the Officers answer'd, as Friends; and gave their Parole of Honour, That they would do no Injury either to him or his: That upon this, they were promis'd the best Entertainment the Place afforded: That this Promise was punctually fulfill'd: That they lived together fifteen Days or thereabouts, in mutual Friendship: That on the Day before the Massacre, Captain Campbell of Glenlyon, who commanded the Corps, and old Macdonald, play'd at Cards together till between six and seven o'Clock in the Evening: That they parted with the kindest Professions on both Sides: That the younger Macdonald mistrusting Campbell's Sincerity, hid himself that Night near their Main-Guard, and perceiving it to be doubled, made his Brother acquainted with it first, and then his Father: That the two Latter could not be brought to adopt the Suspicions of the Former: That the Brothers then going out to make farther Discoveries, found eight or ten Sentinels posted where there used to be only one: That the Discourse among these was, "That they liked not the Work; that though they would willingly have fought the Men of Glen, they held it base to murder them, but that their Officers were answerable for it, not they, &c." That hereupon returning to apprize their Father of the Danger, they found the House surrounded, heard the Discharge of Muskets, and the Shrieks and Clamours of those within; and, being unarm'd, fled for their Lives, and had the good Fortune to escape the Perils they were surrounded with: That old Macdonald was shot thro' the Head, and fell dead in his Lady's Arms, who also died the next Day, under the Horror of this Tragedy: That the Laird of Archintrinken, a Guest of Macdonald's, who had submitted to the Government, and receiv'd Colonel Hill's Protection (which was then in his Pocket) three Months before, met with the same Fate: That a Boy of eight Years old, who fell at Campbell's Feet, crying for Mercy, and offering to be his Servant for Life, in Case he might obtain it, was, in that Posture, stabb'd to the Heart by one Drummond, an Officer employ'd in this infernal Service: That the Number thus butcher'd were thirty-eight; most of whom were surpriz'd in their Sleep, and dispatch'd without allowing them time to implore the Forgiveness of their Sins: That the Order extended to all the Males thorough the whole Valley, under Seventy, who were two hundred in Number; and that if it had been possible for the Parties appointed to assist Campbell, to have come up time enough, to secure the several Passes, not a single Man had escap'd: That Campbell's Men were so cruelly punctual in their Obedience, that they put some to death who were above seventy: That after the Massacre, they set all the Houses on fire, drove off all the Cattle amounting to nine hundred Cows, two hundred Horses, and abundance of Sheep and Goats to the Garison of Inverlochey, where they were divided amongst the Officers: That the Women and Children, after the Murder of their Fathers and Husbands, were almost stript and turn'd out in a violent Storm to seek for Shelter where they could find it; all the Mountains round being cover'd with Snow, and not one House nearer than six Miles. That in the midst of such a Variety of insupportable Calamities, the greatest Part of them perish'd by the Way: That two Officers who refus'd to obey the inhuman Orders they had receiv'd, or to break their Parole to Macdonald, were sent Prisoners to Glasgow: That Campbell, or Glenlyon himself, as he was called by the Scots, justify'd the Action publicly, saying in the Royal Coffee-house at Edinburgh, "That he would do it again, if it were again to be done: Nay, that he would stab any Man in Scotland or England, without asking, why? if he was commanded so to do; such absolute and implicit Obedience being, as he thought, every good Subject's Duty." That the Gentleman to whom this Narrative was sent, did on Thursday, June 30. 1692 go to Brentford, where Lord Argyle's Regiment of Highlanders,

A.D. 1691-92

A.D. 1691-92 Highlanders, who had the Honour of this Service, were then quarter'd, in order to be farther satisfy'd of the several Particulars, by the Confession of the Actors: That all these several Particulars were verify'd accordingly by their own Confession: That Glenlyon and Drummond were both there at the same time; and that, notwithstanding the confident Discourse of Glenlyon concerning the Massacre, one of the said Highlanders, endeavouring to express the Consciousness of Guilt that was visible in Glenlyon, said, "Glencoe seems to hang about Glenlyon Night and Day; and you may see it in his Face."

It is thus this horrid Tale is told by those who are as much dispos'd by their Prejudices to vilify the Transactions of those Times, as the Bishop to extenuate them. The Reader will moderate between both, as he finds Cause: But surely, according to the most favourable Representation that can be given of this Action, it must appear, that, either for Barbarity or Perfidy, it is scarce to be paralleld in History: For not to insist on Macdonald's Submission to the Government, and the good Reception he had given such unwelcome Guests, it may be reasonably urged in his Behalf, that he had, from the Beginning, consider'd the Prince of Orange as an Invader; that he had assisted in maintaining a fair and open War against him, on a Presumption, that his Duty and Allegiance to King James requir'd it; and that if in the Course of it Blood had been spilt, and other Acts of Violence and Reprisal had been committed, he was no more to be esteem'd a Thief and a Murderer, than other Gentlemen-Adventurers in the Military Trade; who are, in the general, but too apt to think, that a State of Hostility will justify any Outrage whatsoever.

The particular Quarrel between Braidalbin and him, was no more than this: Macdonald's Men had plunder'd Braidalbin's of their Cattle; and at the Meeting held by the Latter for purchasing the Submission of the Clans, he insisted on Restitution out of Macdonald's Share of the Money; and rather than comply, the Other broke off the Negotiation: And as to what is farther alledg'd, that he and his Clan had been active in the former Reigns, in persecuting the Field-Conventiclers, though it may prove, that the Glencoe-Men had more Zeal than Humanity, it by no means authorises their Extirpation.

To close on this Topic, for the present: That the Highlanders should be enflam'd with this Execution, can scarce be doubted, unless we can suppose they were insensible: But whatever Disposition it put them into, the Terror which accompany'd it, and the Bargain they had so lately made with the Court, kept them in Obedience, and answer'd all the Ends which the Court expected from those several Expedients.

Arbitrary Proceedings in Ireland.

It is now proper to take a transient View of the Settlement in Ireland; and the first Object that naturally presents itself before us, is another extraordinary Strain of Power, that has been coupled with the Massacre of Glencoe, because of the same tyrannical nature, and equally incapable of Excuse or Palliation. A.D. 1691-92

Mention has already been made of eight [P. 99.] Soldiers that had been strangled in a Church near Dublin: The Bodies of these Men were found in the Yard of one Sweetman, and their Clothes in his House; upon which he was apprehended, together with one Gafney, his Servant. Both, it may be suppos'd, were concern'd in the Murder; but there was not sufficient Proof against either: However, being thrown into Prison, Gafney offer'd to turn Evidence; which so frighten'd Sweetman, that he set his Agents to work, to compound for his Life, by a Surrender of his Estate, which was worth 3000 l. This tempting Bribe was first tender'd to Captain Fitzgerald, one of the Privy-Council; but whether he boggled at the Terms, or had not Interest enough to make them good, the Jobb fell next into the Hands of one Mr. Culliford, who found Ways and Means to complete the Bargain, and also to squeeze out 500 l. more, as a Fee for Mr. Fielding, Secretary to the Lords Justices. All that now remain'd, was to provide for the Security of Sweetman; according to Covenant, and, withal, find a Victim to appease the Soldiery; which was done in the manner following: The Council being set, Gafney was call'd in; and having been asked three or four Questions by Mr. Coningsby, one of the Lords-Justices, tending to saddle him with the Murder, which he utterly disclaim'd, his Excellency was pleas'd to order a Provost-Martial, who had been call'd in for that Purpose, and attended the Examination, such as it was, to hang him up immediately: The Provost, startled at this summary way of Proceeding, which he was not prepar'd for, answer'd, That it would take some Time to make a Gallows; and his Excellency, as the most adroit Executioner of the two, reply'd, Hang him on the Carriage of a Gun! which was done immediately, in Violation of all the Forms, as well as the Essentials of Civil Government: And how it was resented in Ireland, and treated in England, we shall see in its proper Place.

It is not, perhaps, to be suppos'd, that this was the only Instance in which Coningsby play'd the Bathaw. No Man grows shameless at once; and we cannot help concluding, that he who could presume to stretch his Power so far in a Case where a Subject's Life was concern'd, would not scruple to make as free with their Liberty and Property. Accordingly, we find him and his Colleague chusing to govern after the military Mode, and not only practising all manner of Expedients to make themselves both rich and formidable, but actually enslaving the Militia themselves by the Imposition of illegal Oaths, and subjecting them to martial Law, in order to make them the Instruments, to enslave the rest of their Fellow-Subjects.

What was still worse, such Examples above, produc'd the most pernicious Effects imaginable below; for the Justices of Peace, and other subordinate Magistrates, thinking that all Law was at an end, and that Will and

A.D.1691-92 and Pleasure was, for the future, to be the only Measure of their Administration, made no Difficulty to proceed in their several Capacities, in the same summary way, and thereby occasion'd such a Variety of Clamours, and brought the whole Government into such Disgrace, that the Lords-Justices found themselves under a Necessity to set forth a Proclamation, in which they were forc'd to acknowledge, that the Grievances the People so loudly complain'd of, were too heavy to be borne, and too notorious to be deny'd; for, therein they make use of these very Words, viz. "That the Lords-Justices being inform'd, that several Justices of the Peace, Sheriffs, and other Magistrates, presuming on their Power in the Country, have, by colour of their Authority, in a most illegal and arbitrary manner, and contrary to the known Laws of this Kingdom, dispossess'd several of their Majesties Subjects, not only of their Goods and Chattels, but of their Lands and Tenements; they, therefore, command and require all Justices of the Peace, Mayors, Sheriffs, &c. to forbear such illegal Proceedings, and not to intermeddle with the Property, Right, Title, or Possession of the Estate, Goods or Chattels of their Majesties Subjects, other than as by due Course of Law they are requir'd, and shall be able to justify." It was also order'd, that this Proclamation should be publicly read in every Market-Town, for three Days successively; to the end, that such as had been any ways aggriev'd, might have Notice thereof, and might, if they thought fit, make their Complaint to the next sitting Judges, at the respective Assizes, in order to have Redress for the Injury done them, and that the Offenders might be dealt with according to Law.

But whether their Majesties were unapprized of the Disorders of Ireland, or were not willing to countenance the Clamours which arose thereupon, they were pleas'd to make Coningsby a Baron of that Kingdom; which seem'd to be a Mark of Approbation and Favour, and to continue him in the Administration till the Arrival of Lord Sydney, which was not till the 25th of August following; in which Interval, he presided, together with his Collegue, Porter, in the Court, which was held for adjusting the Clames of those comprehended in the Articles of Limerick and Galway; and lost no Opportunity of enriching himself that offer'd, either at the Expence of the Crown or the Subject.

Sir Rowland Gwynn falls into Disgrace.

And, possibly, it was under the Umbrage of the universal Disrepute that the Government of Ireland was in, that Sir Rowland Gwynn, Treasurer of the Chamber, took the Liberty to tell the Queen, in so many Words, That Lord Sydney sold all the Places in Ireland. But, however notorious the Practice was, nothing could be more indiscrete, if not unfair, than to charge the Infamy of it on the new Lieutenant, without being provided with such Evidence as would serve to warrant his own Information; for the Queen, in Compliment to that Favourite, immediately imparted what she had been told to his Excellency, who made use of the Intelligence A.D.1691-92 to ensnare his Antagonist; for having caus'd Mr. Pultney, whom he had made his Secretary, to be present, he sent for Sir Rowland, who came without Mistrust, and consequently fell into all the Surprize and Confusion that Men are subject to on such Occasions. To evade one Difficulty, he fell into another, and was finally dismiss'd by the great Lord, with a Menace, That he should make his Appeal for Justice to the Council-Board. Accordingly, the whole Board being conven'd, Lord Sydney himself making one, and the Queen presiding, who was both Witness and Judge, Sir Rowland was call'd in, was charg'd in her Majesty's Name, with having utter'd such defamatory Words of the Lord-Lieutenant; and, unhappily for himself, to rid his Hands of his Excellency, enter'd the Lists with the Queen; for he would not allow, that he had said, Lord Sydney sold the Places, but only, that it was reported the Places were sold: But Lord Sydney giving an Account of what had pass'd between them at his House, and Mr. Pultney confirming it; one Mr. Murray also witnessing, That Sir Rowland himself, had, in his Company, acknowledg'd what was now laid to his Charge, the whole Board, with one Voice, declar'd against him; and, upon the Issue, her Majesty was pleas'd to pronounce, That the said Words were false and groundless; and that she was fully satisfy'd of the Falsehood of the same. This was publish'd in the Gazette, and to make a thorough Example of the Offender, he was depriv'd of his Place.

This is the Sum of the Story, as we find it told by the small Courtiers of those Times; but, probably, this is not the whole of it; for, if it had been usual to punish Whisperers in this severe manner, the whole Breed had, before this time, been extirpated; and as it was otherwise, we may reasonably conclude, that tho' this was the Outside of the Matter, there was something more at the Bottom. [Letters of Mr. Watt to Sir W. Dutton Colt at Hanover, inserted in Mr. Tindal's Notes.]

This Incident occurr'd, April the seventh; and that we may dispatch all that important Branch of Court-Business, which turns upon Disgraces and Preferments, at once, we must farther remember, That about this time also, John How, Esq; Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen, who had first been a zealous Patriot, then a Courtier, and now began to lean towards Patriotism again, receiv'd a Message from her Majesty, importing, That she had no farther Occasion for his Service. It is insinuated, that, presuming on the Familiarities which his Office entitled him to, he had ventur'd to make some Advances to her Majesty; which justly drew down upon him the whole Weight of her Displeasure: And, again, that Lord Portland and He happen'd to interfere in the same Job; that is to say, in soliciting a Grant of the waste Ground on which the Seven Dials now stand; and that the King, not caring to disoblige How, and yet resolving to gratify his Favourite, asked the Former, What the Grant might be worth? who, to make it pass the easier, answer'd, About one thousand Pounds. Upon which his Majesty reply'd, Why then And John How, Esq; [1692.] [Oldmixon.]

you

A. D. 1692. you shall have a thousand Pounds without putting your self to any farther Trouble. However this may be, if the Queen, or the Favourite, or Both, were offended on one hand, he was as much disgusted on the other; and we shall now find him as forward to oppose the Court upon all Occasions, as upon all Occasions hitherto, he had been to assist it.

We are farther to add, that upon the Death of Sir Henry Pollexfen, Sir George Treby was made Lord Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas; that Sir John Somers was made Attorney-General, in the room of Treby; that Thomas Trevor, Esq; was made Sollicitor in the Room of Somers; and that Sir John Trevor, the Speaker, who was also a Privy-Counsellor, was made Master of the Rolls in the room of Powle deceas'd.

Foreign Affairs. We must now, according to the Course of Time, and the new System of Politics which had obtain'd among us, intermix with almost all the Pursuits of all the Courts of Europe, that we may the better comprehend the general Movements of Christendom, which comprehend our own. It had been the Glory of England in former Times, to take such a Part in the Business of the Continent, as only serv'd to secure and aggrandize herself: While her Interposition was bounded within such wholsome Limits, she became important on one hand, without endangering herself on the other; but when she took upon her to be the Master-spring of Europe, it was thought by some, that she went beyond her natural Strength; that, consequently, instead of governing the Machine, she was govern'd by it; and without a Possibility of acquiring any adequate Advantage, she became expos'd to Dangers she could not foresee, and to Mischiefs she could not remedy.

To preserve the Residue of Flanders under the Dominion of Spain, or, rather to redeem what had been lost, out of the Hands of France, and to set a Limit, if possible, to her Encroachments, as we all know, was the profess'd Object of the War. As yet, instead of redeeming any Part, more had been lost, and consequently greater Efforts were necessary to be made, than at the Beginning. All the Powers concern'd in the League were convinc'd of this; but each was for taking as little on himself as possible: The Emperor's favourite Point was still to make Conquests on the Side of Hungary; the Princes of Germany nearest the Enemy could not stir but under the Protection of the rest; and those who were farthest from the Danger, could not be prevail'd upon to take their Share in it, without a valuable Consideration. This the Head of the Empire could not give, nor could the Country raise, and, consequently, that Burden fell on Spain and the Maritime Powers (for England was far from being excus'd, tho' no more than a Voluntier in the Quarrel) Savoy was a Mercenary, and to be held only by his Interest. The Switzers study'd only to make the most of their Neutrality, as did also the Powers of the North: Spain seem'd to have lost the use of all her Powers and Faculties; or if she had any Feeling left, it was plain she had neither Strength nor Vigour: And even among the Dutch, tho' fundamentally concern'd both in the Origin and Issue of a War, there was a Party, who affected to think it inconsistent with the Interest of a trading People, and consequently grew impatient for a Peace. The King of England, as well as the English Nation, seem'd to have the least personal Concern in the Continuance of it; his Principality of Orange was a Trifle not worth contending for; his Ambition had been gratify'd, if Ambition can be gratify'd, with the Imperial Crown of three Kingdoms; he had no Successor, nor a Prospect of enjoying long either what he possess'd, or what he farther aspir'd to: But Passion is a Tyrant as well as Interest; and it is plain, that, next to the running down Louis le Grand, he took more Pleasure in the Chace, than in any other Enjoyment that the World had to bestow: For how little soever he could hope to acquire by the War, it was he that of the whole Confederacy, was the most zealous to continue it: For this he bore the Petulance of the Party at home that oppos'd him under the fairest Pretences, and, as he very well knew, for the most sordid Considerations: For this he stoop'd to bribe a People with their own Money, and to employ Servants that he hated and despis'd: For this he underwent the Pain of a perpetual Struggle with the Louvestein Faction, those inveterate Enemies to the Grandeur of his House: For this he took upon him to reconcile the jarring Interests of the German Princes, and to purchase, at any Expence, those that were inaccessible by any other way: For this he temporiz'd with the insatiable Ambition of the Emperor, and suffer'd him to co-operate by Halves in the War with France, rather than disoblige him, by insisting on an immediate Accommodation with the Turks: For this he made it his Endeavour to satiate the Cravings of Savoy, by out-bidding the extravagant Offers of France: And for this he not only bore with the dilatory Proceedings with Spain, but exhausted every Expedient that could be conceiv'd to give new Life and Vigour to that lethargic Monarchy.

A. D. 1692.

Concerning his Efforts under the last of these Heads, Bishop Burnet is pleas'd to write as follows:

The Elector of Bavaria made Governor of the Spanish Netherlands.

"The greatest Danger lay in Flanders, where the Feebleness of the Spanish Government did so exhaust and weaken the whole Country, that all the Strength of the Confederate Armies was scarce able to defend it: The Spaniards had offer'd to deliver it up to the King, either as he was King of England, or as he was Stadtholder of the United Provinces. He knew the Bigottry of the People so well, that he was convinc'd it was not possible to get them to submit to a Protestant Government; but he propos'd the Elector of Bavaria, who seem'd to have much Heat, and an Ambition of signalizing himself in that Country, which was then the chief Scene of War: And he could support that Government by the Troops and Treasure that he might draw out of his Electorate:

A. D. 1692. Besides, if he govern'd that Country well, and acquir'd a Fame in Arms, that might give him a Prospect of succeeding to the Crown of Spain, in the Right of his Electoress, who, if the House of Bourbon was set aside, was next in that Succession. The Spaniards agreed to this Proposal; but they would not make the first Offer of it to the Elector, nor would he ask it; and it stuck for some time at this: But the Court of Vienna adjusted the Matter, by making the Propositions, which the Elector accepted: And that put a new Life into those oppress'd and ruin'd Provinces."

Thus far his Lordship: But surely the Offer made to the King, thus loosely treated of, was no more than the Guardianship or Government of those Provinces, which the Elector afterwards accepted of; for the Catholic Kings were of no Part of their Dominions so tenacious, as of Flanders; both because it was their ancient Patrimony, and because their Connections with the rest of the Powers of Europe depended principally on their Rights of Sovereignty there. Then, with regard to the manner of putting the Elector in Possession of that Government, tho' it may be true, that the Proposal came first from the King, and that the Terms were adjusted by the Interposition of the Emperor, it is certainly so, that his Electoral Highness was prevail'd upon to comply so far with the Humour of the Court of Spain, as to make a formal Application to his Catholic Majesty, by a Letter under his own Hand, for the Government of the Netherlands; in which he signify'd, That he was willing to accept it on what Conditions his Majesty should think fit; and that he had no other Aim than to restore these Countries to their ancient Splendor, and to manifest his Zeal and Affection to his Majesty's Interests, &c.

On the other hand, those Conditions in point of Dignity and Splendor, at least, were made as agreeable as possible to the Elector; and in order to render the Entrance of his Administration smooth and easy, no sooner had the Spanish Government replenish'd their Coffers by Means of the Indulto on the Merchandizes and Money from their Colonies, and such other Expedients as were found practicable, than they dispatch'd large Remittances to Brussels, and apply'd themselves in earnest, to make such Provisions of all sorts as should enable his Electoral Highness to act up to the Expectations that he had rais'd.

This Affair, which had been long depending, was settled before the Close of the last Year; and together with the Period of the War in Ireland (which left King William at Liberty to devote his whole Attention, in a manner, to that in which he was engag'd on the Continent) gave such an Alarm to the Court of France, that they thought themselves more than ordinarily oblig'd, to be as active in the Cabinet as in the Field; and to divert, if possible, one Part of the Storm, while they collected their whole Strength to encounter the other.

It began now to appear that the new Pope deserv'd the Nomination of the French Cardinals more than had been at first imagin'd. Towards the End of the preceding Year, he had, in his Apostolic Character, call'd upon the Emperor, and the King of Spain, and all the Catholic Princes of the Confederacy, to sheath the Sword, and give Peace to the Christian World, but without Effect: Those Princes, in their Answers, gave him to understand, That France was the Aggressor, and that if his Holiness could prevail with the most Christian King to re-establish the Treaties he had violated, and to resign the Conquests he had made, nothing should be wanting on their Parts to fulfil his pious Intentions, &c. It is reasonable to think the Sovereign Pontif made the like Application at the same time to the Eldest Son of the Church; and, possibly, his most Christian Majesty's Reply had more of Honey, and less of Gall, than those of the Confederate Princes: For soon after, his Holiness, at the Instance of that Prince, and by the Management of his Emissaries, the Cardinals Fourbin, Janson, &c. was induc'd to grant his Bulls to such of the French Bishops as had neither sign'd nor approv'd the Propositions of the Clergy, to fill up the vacant Benefices, on Condition they paid their Fees. In vain the Zealots and the Partizans of the House of Austria endeavour'd to dissuade him from this Step, which favour'd so strongly of an Accommodation between the two Courts: In vain they afterwards remonstrated that he was ill us'd by the Court of France in several respects; particularly, 1. That instead of making such Returns to this Strain of Indulgence, as Fourbin had promis'd, and the Merit of it deserv'd, the French Bishops sent a large Complaint against the Apostolical College, on account of the Exorbitancy of the said Fees. 2. That his most Christian Majesty had affronted him in the Person of Nicolini his Nuncio, who, lying on his Death-bed, desir'd the Archbishop of Paris to administer the Sacrament to him; but could not obtain that Favour: He pretending to be indispos'd; and no other Person being permitted to officiate except the Curate of the Parish. His Holiness turn'd a deaf Ear to all; and having us'd some slight Endeavours to mollify the Austrians, persisted in the Course which he had taken, and in which he was directed, as he said, by Motives of Piety and Charity only.

A. D. 1692. The Pope takes some Steps in Favour of France.

At the same time also that his Holiness was induc'd to make this notable Concession to the French Court, he took upon him to intercede with Caraffa, the Imperial General, before spoken of, in Behalf of the Princes and States of Italy, who had made grievous Complaints to him of the Exactions of the Imperialists: And all these several Measures, which seem'd to indicate very strongly, that the Partiality of the Holy See to the House of Austria, was drawing towards an end, we find plac'd to the Account of Cardinal Altieri, Cardinal Spada and the Pope's Auditor and Confessor, who were the governing Cabal, and were all in the French Interest.

But

A. D. 1692. But these Measures, favourable as they were to the Interest of France, did not come up to the Wishes of France: Not satisfy'd to see the Stream at a Stand, they wanted to give it as violent a Turn in their own Favour. Taking Advantage, therefore, of the ductile Disposition of his Holiness, Mr. Rebenac, so famous for his Negotiations, was sent to the Assistance of Cardinal Fourbin. This Minister had a Commission-general to all the neutral Powers of Italy: And the Drift of his Instructions was, to negotiate a Defensive League amongst them against the Emperor and his Allies, in concert with, and under the Protection of, the King his Master: But tho' he had found them much exasperated with the Treatment they had receiv'd from Caraffa, he did not find them so forward as he could have wish'd, to expose themselves to much worse, by embracing the Proposals he had Orders to make. In hope, therefore, that his Holiness might be prevail'd upon, for the sake of the Repose and Freedom of Italy, to join his Instances to those of the King his Master; and that under the joint Sanction of Both, his Negotiations, would be crown'd with Success, he repair'd to Rome in the Beginning of January; and after several Conferences with the whole French Faction, accosted his Holiness with a set Speech, in which, tho' he affected to treat the Emperor and King of Spain, personally, with extraordinary Respect, he not only treated their Measures, but the whole Line of Austria, with the utmost Bitterness. According to him, an unbounded Ambition was to be traced in every Branch of it. In virtue of the Title of Emperor, which by their Intrigues they had, in a manner, made hereditary, he suggested, they form'd Pretensions on all those Countries which anciently compos'd the Empire of Charlemagne, and, as often as Opportunity offer'd, made use of those Pretentions to insult the Princes to whom they belong'd, and to exact Contributions from their Subjects. The entire Reduction of Italy under their Yoke, he discours'd of as one of those Projects which they had most at heart, and most steadily pursu'd. And as to their Zeal for the Catholic Faith, he would not allow it to be more than a political Mask, which they put on, and laid aside at Pleasure. This he endeavour'd to prove, by urging, That in order to obtain their End, they never made any Scruple about the Means: That even in their present Attempt on the Liberties of Italy, they had made no Difficulty to colleague themselves with Heretics, and to suffer the Contagion of Heresy to accompany the Progress of their Arms: That, not content with the Encroachments they had made on the temporal Estates of Italy, they had invaded the Rights of the Church, by seizing the Duchies of Parma and Placentia, which were Fiefs of the Holy See: That it was but one Step farther, in the same Track, to attack the very Patrimony of St. Peter, which their Heretical Colleagues would not only do without Remorse, but with all the Pleasure imaginable: That without re-establishing Heresy in Italy, it was easy to foresee, that they would never be able to carry their Point of subjecting it to the Austrian Yoke: That while they were thus impell'd by their Interest, Conscience would prove too weak a Curb to stop their Career: That if their Piety had not been dissembled, and they had not preferr'd their Interest to every other Consideration, they would not have countenance'd the Prince of Orange in his Expedition to England against his Father, and the Catholic Interest in that Kingdom; more especially at a time when the Zeal of that King for its Re-establishment, was the only Pretence on which the said Expedition was founded, and when his most Christian Majesty had made so effectual a Provision to render the Downfal of Heresy unavoidable: That for the sake of assisting the said Prince in his unnatural Design, by which a lawful Sovereign was tumbled from his Throne, they suffer'd an Opportunity to destroy the Turkish Empire in Europe to slip out of their Hands: That by this Division of their Forces, they had never since been able to face the Infidels upon equal Terms: That their late Victory in Hungary was the Result of a peculiar Providence, in which human Prudence had not the least Concern: That while his most Christian Majesty made it the chief Glory of his Life to extirpate Heresy, and to establish the true Religion wherever his Arms have prevail'd, the Austrians have taken the Heretics banish'd out of his Dominions into their Service, and have made use of them to be the Scourge of Italy; after the Example, and at the Instance of the Prince of Orange, who had made the like use of them against the Catholics of England and Ireland: That even in their Pretentions of making this Inroad into Italy, they had deceiv'd those who had put their Trust in them; for they did not arrive till the End of August; and they quitted the Field by the Middle of October; and instead of making it their Business to deliver Savoy out of the Hands of France, they apply'd themselves only to that which was their true Errand, namely, the enslaving of Italy: That the Slanders they had rais'd, and all the unfair Artifices they had put in practice, to traverse his most Christian Majesty's Endeavours, to close the Breach between him and the Holy See, which was a Matter of so much real Consequence to the whole Christian World, furnish'd another Proof of their pernicious Designs on the Repose of Italy, which, unless the Breach was continu'd, they could never hope to bring to Perfection: That since these Facts were too notorious to be disputed, it was incumbent on his Holiness to finish the good Work he had so piously begun, and to co-operate with his most Christian Majesty in providing for the Tranquility of that Side of Europe, while he alone undertook to bring his Enemies to Reason on the other: That all the King his Master requir'd, was, that the Austrians should be oblig'd to withdraw their Troops out of Italy; in which Case, he engag'd to do the same: That his Holiness should interpose with his fatherly Authority to bring about

A. D. 1692.

Mr. de Rebenac's remarkable Speech to his Holiness. [Memoirs of Europe, &c.]

A. D. 1692. about this neceſſary Event: That in caſe they ſhould refuſe to comply with his Requiſition, which was to be fear'd, if the ſeveral Princes and States of Italy, with the Holy Father at their Head, would take ſuch Reſolutions as the Continuance of the Inſult deſerv'd and their own immediate Intereſt demanded, his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty would ſend a ſufficient Army to their Succour, and moreover provide for the Security of their Coaſts, by covering them with ſuch a Fleet, as it ſhould not be in the Power of the Enemy to face: That this Propoſal was ſo far from proceeding from any narrow, ſelfiſh Purpoſe of his own, to leſſen the Number of his Enemies, that he did not deſire to leſſen them: That it was his Glory to ſtand ſingle againſt them all, and his Happineſs, that, ſingle as he was, he had not only been able to withſtand their utmoſt Efforts, but to defeat them; and that as to being under any Pain for his own Territories, he rather deſy'd them to come, than dreaded their coming; as being every where alike prepar'd to defend himſelf and annoy his Enemies.

This was the Sum of his Harangue, except of ſuch Parts of it as conſiſted of Invectives only, and which, for fear of giving Offence to his Holineſs, were levell'd chiefly at King William and his Proteſtant Allies. The Pope heard all patiently, and for Form's ſake took time to deliberate on the Propoſal before he choſe to return an Anſwer: But though his Holineſs was willing to be well with the Court of France, he could not prevail on himſelf to break with the Houſe of Auſtria, under whoſe Dominion he was born, and to whom he ſtood ſo greatly oblig'd: The thing propos'd was, beſides, beyond the Compaſs of his Genius; he had not enough of the Great in his Compoſition, to venture upon it: To find out ſuch a Medium as ſhould ſerve to unite all the the jarring Intereſts of Italy, requir'd more Experience in political Proceſſes than he was Maſter of; and to induce ſo many Princes and States to think their general Intereſt could be ſecur'd under the Umbrage of France; he thought exceeded all the Power of Perſuaſion. When, therefore, Mr. de Rebenac had his Audience of Leave, his Holineſs gave him to underſtand, That it did not become him in his private Capacity, as a Subject of the Houſe of Auſtria, to be concern'd in a League againſt it: That he thought the Charge brought againſt that Houſe not ſufficiently grounded: That he could not be brought to think they had any Deſigns on the Liberties of Italy: That for the Patrimony of the Church, he choſe to recommend it to the Protection of the Almighty: That, as tenderly concern'd for the Princes of Italy, he would omit nothing in his Power which might contribute to their Welfare: That, as the common Father of Chriſtendom, he was ſtill to act as the common Mediator: But that if the Peace of Chriſtendom could be no otherwiſe reſtor'd, than by his Endeavours to ſet all Italy in Arms, he could not prevail upon himſelf to adopt ſuch a Scheme; and that he ſhould, on the contrary, think his own Duty beſt diſcharg'd by the Fervency of his Prayers, and by his Reſignation to the Will of Providence in all things. A. D. 1692.

All hope of ſpiriting up the Princes of Italy to take Sanctuary in the Arms of France againſt the Oppreſſions of the Houſe of Auſtria, or to divert the Pope from the Neutrality which he had reſolv'd to obſerve, ſeeming thus, for the preſent, at an End, Mr. de Rebenac was inſtructed, in the next place, to repair to Venice; and while he was there employ'd in exhauſting the ſame Arguments to induce the Republic to come to a ſeparate Peace with the Porte, Mr. de Chanlay was ſecretly diſpatch'd to the Duke of Savoy, with a Letter from the moſt Chriſtian King, writ all with his own Hand, preſſing him to deſert the Confederacy, and to embark once more in the Service of France; and making him very large and tempting Offers by way of Conſideration. Secret Application of France to the Duke of Savoy.

This was a very effectual Conſolation to his Royal Highneſs for the Loſs of Montmelian. Such Conceſſions from ſuch any Enemy, gave him a very ſenſible Pleaſure; and ſo much the more, as they afforded him an Opportunity of riſing in his Demands on the Allies, and of becoming more conſiderable by refuſing thoſe of France; for refuſe them he did, and that with an Air of uncommon Sincerity and Gallantry; ſaying, That how great ſoever he eſteem'd the Honour of a Letter from his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, he could not accept it for fear of giving Umbrage to his Allies: But then he not only ſuffer'd Mr. de Chanlay to continue about him, but to explane and inforce in Letters of his own, the very Propoſitions which he ſeem'd to overlook from the Hand of the King his Maſter.

All Europe, in the mean time, rung with this ſingular Inſtance of Firmneſs and Fidelity; and even the French themſelves involuntarily contributed to the Fame of it, by ſetting forth a Memorial, which they caus'd to be tranſmitted to the Swiſs-Cantons, as alſo to every neutral Court; and in which they recite all the Advances they had made to the Duke, as ſo many Proofs of his Infatuation, and the Sincerity of their own Intentions with reſpect to the Security and Repoſe of Italy. At the Head of theſe, Mention is made of his Majeſty's Royal Condeſcenſion in writing to the Duke with his own Hand, and of his Royal Highneſs's refuſing to receive the Letter. The Offers made by Mr. de Chanlay follow next, and conſiſt of the following Articles, viz. 1. That Savoy, with all its Revenues and Rights of Sovereignty, ſhould be immediately reſtor'd. 2. That at the End of the War, Montmelian, Suza, Nice, and Villafranca, ſhould be reſtor'd likewiſe, in the ſame Condition they were then in; though the two laſt of thoſe Places unqueſtionably belong'd to Provence. 3. That in the mean while, Montmelian and Suza ſhould be aſſign'd over to the Pope or the Republic of Venice, as the Duke ſhould pleaſe, and Nice and Villafranca to the Switzers. 4. That the King would be at the Expence of the ſeveral Garriſons. 5. That there ſhould be a Neutrality for the Duchy of The Memorial publiſh'd by the French Court on it's being rejected.

A. D. 1692. of Milan: And to the end that all Jealousy might be remov'd with relation to Casal, his Majesty was willing to resign that Place also, together with the Citadel to the Pope, or the Venetians, till a Peace should be made: Lastly, To secure the Performance of these Conditions, they were accompany'd with an Offer of the Guaranty of the Pope, the State of Venice, the Swiss Cantons, and, in general, of all the Princes and States of Italy: And to give them the greater Weight, an Insinuation was dropt, that, in case they were refus'd, Nice and Montmelian would be raz'd; France having no need of those Fortresses for the Security of her Frontier, tho' they were of such Importance to his Royal Highness.

The whole Piece was founded on the old Supposition, That the Emperor had chose to spare the Turks, that he might be able to reduce Italy: And, in some of the Paragraphs, it was, with great Bitterness, farther suggested, That his Troops had made the Duchy of Milan serve them as a Road to the Empire of Italy: That as to the Pretence of their coming to the Succour of Piedmont, it was notorious, that, instead of attempting to rescue Nice, Villafranca, or Susa out of the Hands of the French, or to raise the Siege of Montmelian, which was the only Place the Latter wanted to secure them in the Possession of all Savoy, they contented themselves with pillaging the wretched People they came to defend: That if they wasted the Summer without incommoding their Enemies, they had been sufficiently diligent during the Winter to prey on their Friends: That the Republic of Genoa and the Dukes of Mantua, Parma, and Modena were but too well convinc'd of the Honour and Happiness of being Feudataries to the Empire: That besides the Subsistence they had procur'd, the Havock they had made, and the Disorders and Cruelties they had committed, they had exacted four hundred thousand Pistoles for the use of their military Chest: That the Princes and States of Italy would do well to consider what they had farther to expect from such domineering Guests, who, after thus plundering them of all their Money, had the Boldness to declare, that if they met with the least Resistance, they would make them know they were Masters before the End of the Year; and whether under all these Pressures they could still be satisfy'd with being told, That all they suffer'd was for their Good, and in order to deliver them from the Tyranny of the French.

As to the Resentment of France against the Duke for refusing the King's Letter, it was at first talk'd of in very high Terms: But, whether it was the Effect of Moderation or Policy, the Storm blew over without leaving such a Track of Ruin behind it, as the World was taught to expect. All the Revenge his most Christian Majesty thought fit to take, was contain'd in this Memorial: And though the Duke was therein charg'd with running blindfold on his Ruin, and, in effect, with being the grand Incendiary of Italy, for the trifling Consideration of commanding the Forces of the Allies, in quality of Generalissimo, his Royal Highness would not enflame the Quarrel by publishing such a Reply as such Provocations seem'd to deserve. The Truth is, that the two Parties were still like to be necessary to each other. France foresaw, that a Time might come when the Duke would be worth purchasing at any Rate; and the Duke was Politician enough to know, that it was not worth his while to break through his Engagements, till that Time should come. It was in this very Light his Conduct was consider'd in the French Cabinet; and, agreeable thereto, no sooner were the first Transports of his Majesty's Indignation allay'd, than Mr. de Chanlay had Orders to revive the Negotiation, and to add to his former Offers, the additional one, of considerable Sums, to re-imburse him for all his Expences, Losses, and Damages, as the Price of an Accommodation: But his Royal Highness continu'd immoveable for the same Reasons as before; and upon imparting Mr. Chanlay's Applications from time to time to the Confederates, not only receiv'd new Compliments, but new Advantages in Acknowledgment of this steady Adherence to the Common Cause: For not only all the Contributions levy'd by Caprara in Italy, but all that could be squeezed out of the Milanese, Naples, and Sicily by the several Spanish Governors, were appropriated, if not to his immediate Use, to the Service in which he was most concern'd. Care was also taken by the Emperor and the Kings of Spain and Great Britain to recruit and reinforce the several Corps, which they had sent to his Assistance. The Germans, in particular, were augmented with several thousands, which were to be replac'd by other Troops provided for that Purpose. Lastly, Caprara, who had render'd himself so odious to the Italians, by observing his Instructions with a criminal Fidelity, was recall'd; not as a Mark of the Emperor's Displeasure, but that the Duke of Savoy might have the chief Command without the Shadow of a Rival: And it was accordingly bestow'd on him with all the Powers and Privileges which had been connected with it, when held by the Elector of Bavaria.

A. D. 1692.

What Share King William had in these Transactions, is no other ways to be trac'd than by Circumstances: (For as to the original Treaty of Subsidy between the Maritime Powers and the Duke, by which it was provided, that England should pay him twenty thousand Crowns a Month, and Holland ten thousand, it was in force but for six Months; and whether it was barely renew'd, or whether with any additional Douceurs to his Royal Highness, we have no Memorial.) Duke Schomberg was all this while a close Observer of all that pass'd at Turin, and, no doubt, was sufficiently empower'd to outbid the Emissaries of France, if possible; for we shall find his Majesty had it much at heart, to play the Deliverer in France as well as England: And so great was the Dependence plac'd on the Assistance of his Royal Highness, that he was call'd the Right Hand of the Confederacy.

When

A. D. 1692. When he (the King) pass'd over to Holland, all the Wheels of the political System were hard at work, and almost every Hour produc'd some great Event: His Majesty and the States, as usual, met like Lovers; all was Joy on their Side, and Acknowledgment on his: They welcom'd him at his landing, and he return'd their Compliment from the Stadtholders Chair; upon which Occasion he express'd himself to the following Effect:

The Stadtholders Speech to the States. [Memoirs of Europe for the Year 92.]

"That he had dispatch'd the Affairs of his Kingdoms with the utmost Diligence, that he might the sooner return to his Duties there, and co-operate with their Lordships in a vigorous Prosecution of the War, for the sake of obtaining a speedy and solid Peace: That towards this great End, which was the only one he had in View, he had caus'd all the Troops that could be spar'd from the necessary Defence of his Dominions, to cross the Seas to join the Army of the Confederates: That such Care had been taken of his Fleet, that it was almost in Readiness to put to Sea, and, in point of Strength, was sufficient, in concert with that of the States, and with the Favour of Providence, to withstand the utmost Efforts of their Adversaries: That with regard to what was farther to be done, he was come to risque his Person once more in the Common Cause, and, in particular, to manifest his Zeal for the Prosperity of the Republic: That his Affection towards them was as ardent as ever, and that he should never forget the Obligations they had conferr'd upon him." To these endearing Expressions, the President made a suitable Return in the Name of their Lordships: And though it is usual to consider Passages of this nature as merely Matters of Form and Ceremony, it may be fairly inferr'd from the very emphatical Mention which his Majesty was pleas'd to make of a speedy and solid Peace, that a Suspicion prevail'd in Holland, as well as England, that he had nothing less in View.

How Princes are Peace-makers.

Princes, indeed, pursue Peace by ways of their own: According to his Majesty's Sense of Things, even his Fleets and Armies were Peace-makers; and Battles by Land and Sea were no other than laudable Attempts to bring about an Accommodation. Under this Gloss it may be truly said, that no Prince in Europe was a more active and zealous Peace-maker than himself; and, probably, if it had been in the Power of Man to have directed the whole Force of the Confederacy with one and the same Motion, invariably to one and the same End, his manner of making Peace would have been the most effectual; and his great End of setting Bounds to the Power of France, would have been really obtain'd: But for want of adjusting the Ballance of Germany, before he undertook to adjust the Ballance of Europe, the several Members of that vast Body could never be brought to concur: If in one Place it was strong and active, in others it was weak and lifeless; and the Dead Weight of one Side, was sure to enfeeble the Vigour of the other. A. D. 1693.

Thus, at the opening of the present Year, when, by the Reduction of Ireland, and the Measures which had been taken with Savoy and Bavaria, his Majesty had Reason to form great Expectations from the ensuing Campaign, he had the Mortification to find his Measures as much disjointed in Germany, as they were enforc'd in Flanders and Italy.

A separate Concert form'd between the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh.

The Electors of Saxony and Prussia, both Protestants, and two of the most considerable Powers of the Empire, had an Interview at Torgaw towards the latter end of January, and form'd a Concert of their own; which, if not absolutely inconsistent with, was, at least highly detrimental to, that call'd the Common-Cause. General Schoening, formerly mention'd, who had been gain'd by France, was at the Bottom of it: Having obtain'd Leave to pass out of the Prussian into the Saxon Service, he was in the Secret of Both, and had the Address to make his own Use of it. What Pretences he made use of, or what real Grounds of Complaint were administer'd; whether his Sacred Cæsarian Majesty had so long consider'd those Princes as Vassals, that he had forgot to treat them as Friends; whether in the dispensing his Imperial (l) Favours he had bestow'd upon their Neighbours what they believ'd to be due to themselves, or whether the Preference they contended for was like to produce worse Effects from the Resentments of their Rivals, was not easily ascertain'd: But it soon appear'd that a Breach was open'd, and that, in all Probability, it would not be easily clos'd. The Conference between the two Princes continu'd for several Days: It was said, that in the Course of them they were not unmindful of the Succession of Saxe-Lawenburgh; and, at parting, they constituted an Order of Knighthood, which was conferr'd on six Persons of each Court, and seem'd to denote a League offensive as well as defensive; for the Badge of it was a Bracelet and a Medal of Gold, with this Device, Two Swords across, and two Palm Branches; and on the Reverse, the Cyphers of the two Electors intermingled, together with Inscriptions, importing, that their Union was to last for ever. Nor was this all, for about the Middle of next Month (February) the Elector of Saxony paid a Visit to his Brother of Brandenburgh, at Berlin, with a Train of an hundred Persons; and, having broke off the Treaty of Marriage which his Father had set on foot for him with the Princess Royal of Denmark, made his Addresses to the Relict of the Margrave of Brandenburgh-Anspach; said to be in the Meridian of her Beauty, tho' in the thirtieth Year of her Age, and the Mother of (l) The Duke of Savoy complain'd, That the Emperor favour'd the Circles of Suabia and Franconia so much, that he could have no good Quarters assign'd him for his Army: And upon this Occasion, it was said, That the Emperor drew much Money from those Circles, that they might be cover'd from Winter-Quarters; and that he apply'd all that to carrying on the War in Hungary, and to lift the Weight of the War with France to lye very heavy on the Princes of the Empire. of ſeveral Children. Two Days were ſpent in feaſting upon this gallant Occaſion; in which Interval, it muſt be ſuppos'd, the Lady was won; for, in April his Highneſs of Brandenburgh accompany'd the future Electreſs to Tergaw, where the Marriage was conſummated upon the 27th: And upon the laſt Day of the ſame Month, the Saxon Troops that had their Winter-Quarters aſſign'd them in Eppingben, Hailbron, and the Places adjacent (which had been all alike exhauſted and ruin'd by the French in the Courſe of the War) and whoſe Term of continuing there expir'd that Day, inſtead of advancing towards the Rhine, retir'd towards their own Country, to the general Surprize of Europe; for till then, few Perſons had any Apprehenſion, that the Miſunderſtanding between the Imperial and Saxon Courts would have been carry'd to ſuch Extremities.

The Saxon Troops return home.

That there was a growing Coldneſs between them, was, however, no Secret any where; and from the Moment that the firſt Symptom of it appear'd, it became one of the principal Concerns of the principal Powers of the Confederacy, to provide againſt the worſt that could happen. To interpoſe with their good Offices, to draw ſome Conceſſions from the Emperor, and to procure ſome Abatements in the Elector's Demands, were probably the Drift of their firſt Endeavours: And when they found Haughtineſs on one Side, Obſtinacy on the other, and Intractability on both, the only remaining Expedient was, to ſubſtitute ſome other Power of equal Strength in the Elector of Saxony's Place: The two Northern Crowns found their Account in this Neutrality, and therefore could not be prevail'd upon to break it: And Sweden, in particular, ſeem'd to grow more and more ſuſceptible of Impreſſions of France. It was not without Difficulty, that his Swediſh Majeſty could be prevail'd upon to conſent that his Quota of Troops ſhould take the Field time enough to be of Service; and all that Denmark could be prevail'd upon to contribute to the Service, was a Regiment of Foot and another of Horſe, with an expreſs Proviſo, that they ſhould be employ'd againſt the Turks only. King William had not only augmented the Body of Iriſh, which he had given to the Emperor, to two thouſand, but had been at the Expence of tranſporting them to Hamburgh, that their March might be ſo much the ſhorter to the Scene of Action, and had, beſides, devoted the whole Strength of his Kingdoms both by Land and Sea to the Support of the Cauſe. The States General declar'd the ſame. Spain had ſo exhauſted herſelf to make a Figure in Flanders and Italy, that ſhe could ſcarce defend her own Frontiers againſt the feeble Attempts of the French in Catalonia. And as to the Switzers, what with the Flatteries, and what with the Subſidies of France, we ſhall find, that, inſtead of taking part with the Confederates, they were abundantly more inclin'd to throw their Weight and Intereſt into the oppoſite Scale.

It follow'd, therefore, that the Loſs on the Side of Saxony could only be ſupply'd by the Princes of Lunenburgh: And notwithſtanding their Inaction during the laſt Campaign, and the Negotiation they had enter'd into with the French Court, they were well enough inclin'd to ſeize the Opportunity thus unexpectedly thrown into their way, to improve their Intereſt in the Empire, and, in particular, by obtaining a Seat in the Electoral College.

A. D. 1692.

Conduct of the Dukes of Zell and Hanover at this Criſis.

By the Princes of the Houſe of Lunenburgh, muſt, however, be underſtood the two Brothers of Zell and Hanover only; for the other Branches of the Family were ſo far from co-operating with them in their Purſuits, that they dreaded the Succeſs of them; and conſequently made it their great Buſineſs to throw all imaginable Obſtacles in their way.

It has been already hinted, that Prince Maximilian, the ſecond ſurviving Son of the Duke of Hanover, thought himſelf injur'd by the Proviſion which had been made between his Father and Uncle, to concenter their two Duchies in the Perſon of his eldeſt Brother, and actually refus'd to accept of the Appennage which was offer'd to him in lieu of it. The Perſons by whom he was adviſ'd to this Proceeding, were the Huntſmaſter of Hanover, de Molke or Molken, his Brother, who was a Lieutenant-Colonel, the Secretary of the Duke of Wolfenbuttle, and certain Malcontents of Zell; and who had form'd a Deſign of removing him into the Dominions of ſome neighbouring Prince, under whoſe Protection he might ſafely proteſt againſt the new Settlement, and proſecute his own Claims: But the Cabals which this gave riſe to, ſoon created a Suſpicion of the Truth, and that Suſpicion made way for a Diſcovery: Letters were ſeiz'd, the whole Vein of Correſpondence was open'd; the two Molks and the Secretary were ſeiz'd and impriſon'd; Prince Maximilian himſelf was alſo ſent under Reſtraint to Hamelin, under the Charge of Mr. de Placten; and, probably, had ſo continu'd for Life, if the Duke of Zell had not, in Perſon, poſted to Hanover (though for a Conſideration which regarded himſelf ſomewhat nearer than the Liberty of his Nephew) and procur'd his Diſcharge, on Condition of a ſolemn Renunciation of all his Rights in favour of his elder Brother; which was at laſt made in Preſence of the two Dukes, moſt of their Privy-Counſellors, and three of the principal Nobles of each Duchy. But even this Renunciation was not thought meritorious enough to ſave his Accomplices; Molke, the Huntſmaſter, was ſentenc'd to loſe his Head (it was ſaid) for endeavouring, to ſow Diviſion between ſeveral Princes of the Empire, and excite a Revolt of the Duke his Maſter's Subjects againſt their Sovereign; and the Colonel his Brother and the Secretary, were ſent into Baniſhment. This Affair broke out in December, and the Renunciation was made about two Months after: But the Execution, for Reaſons of State, was deferr'd till the 24th of July.

And, in this Interval, when all things ſeem'd to conſpire to the Aggrandizement of

A. D. 1692. They conclude two Treaties with the Emperor and King William.

of this Houſe, it was, that the Negotiation, above-mention'd, between the two Dukes and the principal Powers of the Confederacy was reviv'd. It conſiſted of two Parts, and gave riſe to two Treaties: By the firſt, which was with the Emperor, it was provided, that their Highneſſes ſhould furniſh and maintain a Body of ſix thouſand Troops for the Emperor's Service in Hungary: And, in return, his Imperial Majeſty gave his Conſent, and engag'd his good Offices, to erect a ninth Electorate in favour of the Hanover-Branch, tho' the youngeſt, on account of the Succeſſion, and their Deſcendants, and to give them the Inveſtiture, before the Expiration of the Year: And by the ſecond, which was with the King of Great-Britain, they agreed to ſend four thouſand Foot, and four thouſand Horſe into Flanders; but on what Conditions, for want of a Copy of the ſaid Treaty, we are not able to explane. Probably, it was a Treaty of Subſidy; for tho' the Electoral Cap was the Conſideration of the Former, we are not to preſume that the Crown of England had the leaſt Concern in the Latter. A Copy of the ſaid Treaty was alſo laid on the Table before the Houſe of Commons in the next Seſſion of Parliament: But being ſuffer'd to continue there, produc'd neither Motion nor Reſolution. As little are we able to trace the Progreſs of theſe two important Affairs, or through whoſe Hands they paſs'd; and, therefore, to cloſe this imperfect Account, we can only add, That they were put into Motion as ſoon as the Diſcontents of the Saxons firſt broke out: That there is a Paragraph in the London-Gazette, which intimates, That the Treaty with the Emperor was ſign'd Feb. the 9th: That the Lunenburgh Reſident at Paris was immediately recall'd: That an Intimation was given to the French Reſident at Hanover to return home: That then, and not before, the two Brothers broke off all Connection with, or Dependence on, his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, tho' Biſhop Burnet places this Change in the Lunenburgh Politics among the Occurrences of the preceding Year: That Sir W. Colt the Engliſh Reſident at Hanover, on the King's Arrival in Holland, waited upon him at Loo (poſſibly to receive new Lights and additional Inſtructions) where he continued till the 13th of April, N. S. at which time he return'd to his Station: That the Baron de Gorts, Envoy Extraordinary to his Majeſty from the Lunenburgh Courts, did not receive his firſt Audience till the 21ſt of May; and that, about the ſame time, another of the Lunenburgh-Miniſters, was ſent with the ſame Character, and with a Train more than ordinarily ſplendid, to pay the Court of the Family at Vienna, and ſolicit the grand Affair of the Electorate.

His Majeſty's other Connections with the German Princes.

As to the reſt of his Majeſty's Efforts to ſupply every other Deficiency on every Side, they were ſuch as are ſcarce reconcileable to the Indolence imputed to him by Biſhop Burnet: For, over and above the ſeveral Difficulties which he had to ſurmount in his own peculiar Province, which was the Service in Flanders, we find him beſet even in his darling Retirement at Loo, with all the Miniſters of all the ſeveral Powers of the Empire. All had their Suits to prefer, or their Markets to make: And whether the Emperor was to be mov'd, or to be ſerv'd, his Majeſty was to be the Agent on one hand, and the Advocate on the other. Biſhop Burnet informs us, that he concurr'd with the Lunenburgh Houſe in their Solicitations at Vienna: And when his Imperial Majeſty wanted no leſs than four thouſand Men to recruit the Brandenburgh-Corps, in his Service in Hungary, and the Elector, in Conſequence either of his new Engagements with the Elector of Saxony, or his own Reſentments, appear'd intractable on that Head, his Majeſty was call'd upon to interpoſe with his good Offices; but probably excus'd himſelf; as ſtanding in need of all his Intereſt in that Prince for his own immediate Service: For his Electoral Highneſs not only perſiſted in refuſing that Demand, but actually recall'd the Reſidue of thoſe Forces. What Concern his Majeſty had in a Convention, which, about this time, was made between the Emperor and the Biſhop of Munſter, does not ſufficiently appear: That Prince, like the Houſe of Lunenburgh, had affected a Neutrality, and was now induc'd, like them, to devote Part of his Forces to the Emperor's Service in Hungary, and Part to join the Confederates on the Moſelle; where it was reſolv'd to have an Army of Obſervation, which was to be compos'd of the Palatine Troops, and thoſe of Cologne, Triers, &c. As to the Elector Palatine, he came, in Perſon, to Loo, and was either ſo entirely ſatisfy'd with the Reception he met with, or the Conſideration aſſign'd him, that he gave up all his Troops to the King's Diſpoſal.

A. D. 1692.

Liege being alſo menac'd with a ſecond Viſitation of the French, and a Body of their Forces lying in ſuch a Situation as kept that Place under continual Terrors, it was neceſſary that a Proviſion ſhould be made for its Security; and this could only be done by the main Body of the Brandenburgers under the Command of Count Fleming, in Conjunction with the Troops of that Principality, under Count Tilly: Accordingly, at his Majeſty's Inſtance, all thoſe Troops were deſtin'd to that Service, and withal, ſuch a Diſpoſition was made of them, that they might be ready, on any Emergence, to re-inforce the grand Army under his Majeſty.

All theſe ſeveral Connections, as it is eaſy to imagine, were extremely troubleſome: The ſatisfying one Party ſerv'd only to make the reſt more clamorous: And, after a thouſand Trials, it appear'd, that there was no Expedient in Policy, of Virtue enough, to produce a thorough Union among ſo many Co-Rivals, even for ſo ſhort a time as a ſingle Campaign.

It was much the ſame caſe on the Upper Rhine: The Emperor himſelf had but ſix thouſand Men in the whole Empire, if his Corps had been complete; which was far from

A. D. 1692. from being the Caſe. The Elector of Saxony could not be brought to furniſh any more than his Quota, which was three thouſand; and a Medley of (m) Bavarians, Heſſians, Breminers, Wirtemburghers, Swabians and Franconians being the Troops of the Aſſociated Circles, were to make up the reſt. Theſe were ſcatter'd through various Provinces, and lay ſo wide of each each other, that it requir'd half the Summer to bring them to their Rendezvous. Nor was this all; it was held neceſſary to divide them into two ſeveral Bodies, in order to occupy both Sides of the River, and thereby to prevent the French from giving them the Slip, and committing ſuch Ravages as they had done the Year before. This introduc'd a Neceſſity to have two Generals; and out of many Candidates, the Landgrave of Heſſe and the Margrave of Barvith were choſen; and in the Re-Partition of their ſeveral Lots of Strength and Power, ſuch Miſunderſtandings aroſe, as had a natural Tendency, not only to retard, but even to fruſtrate, the Endeavours of the Campaign.

France, on the other hand, to compenſate the Perplexity of having ſo many Enemies to deal with at once, had it not only in her Power to derive continual Advantages from their Diſſentions, their Infatuations, their Selfiſhneſſes, and all the unavoidable Miſchiefs that aroſe from Councils ſo indigeſted, and Powers ſo diffus'd; but being abſolute Miſtreſs of her own Meaſures, and all the Reſources neceſſary for the Support of them, had only to will, and the Act follow'd; ſo that while the Lightening glar'd, the Bolt fell.

When the Pope inſinuated to Cardinal d'Eſtrees, That the moſt Chriſtian King ſeem'd deſirous of Peace, becauſe he was unable to ſupport any longer the Expence of the War, his Eminency reply'd, with a Smile, That ſuch was his Majeſty's Oeconomy, and ſo vaſt his Revenues, that he was able to maintain three hundred and fifty thouſand Men in conſtant Pay, without impoſing any additional Tax upon his People: But if this was not in all Circumſtances true (for the French Court, as well as their Neighbours, were, at this time, oblig'd to raiſe Money by extraordinary Means) ſo vaſt were their Preparations for the opening the Campaign, and ſo ſpeedily and effectually were all Difficulties remov'd, that War ſeem'd to be their Element, and every Motion of the military kind but a natural Exerciſe of the Powers of their Conſtitution.

Diſpoſition of France for the opening the Campaign.

On the Savoy-Side, indeed, as if his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty affected to ſpare the Duke, or to think he had nothing to fear from the Conduct of ſo young a General, or elſe to leave the Italian Princes at the Mercy of the Germans, that the Smart of their Sufferings might make them more ſenſible of the Offers they had rejected, or becauſe of the prodigious Expence of the War in that Province, he choſe to lye on the Defenſive: Neither was his Conduct very different in Catalonia; but in Germany, in Flanders, and even on the Ocean, in which Places the moſt Oppoſition was to be expected, he omitted nothing that was requiſite to give him the Superiority. A. D. 1692.

The Marſhal de Lorges had the Command on the Upper Rhine, and at the opening the Campaign, was poſted at Neder-Ulm: The Marquis de Joyeuſe, with another Body of Troops, occupy'd the Country of Eyefeldt: Mr. de Bouffliers, who had the Reputation of being the moſt active Lieutenant-General in the French Service, was poſted between the Sambre and the Meuſe; and the Duke of Luxemburgh under the Dauphin, who was Generaliſſimo, continu'd to command in Flanders: And to the Honour of the French Council, it muſt be allow'd, that all theſe numerous Forces were ſo diſpos'd, that they could communicate Relief and Succour to each other, upon any Emergency.

Foreign Affairs partially recited in our Gazettes.

It is, however, remarkable, that in all the Repreſentations that were given by Authority, on our Side of the Water, of the Efforts making by the Allies on one hand, and the Enemy on the other, the Partiality was ſo apparent, that it diſguſted thoſe that read, and diſgrac'd theſe that publiſh'd them: For Example, it was, over and over again, aſſerted, that the whole Body of the Saxons would again co-operate on the Rhine: That the Elector of Brandenburgh had granted the four thouſand Recruits demanded by the Emperor: That the ſaid Elector would take the Field in Perſon, &c. And on the contrary, That the French were at a loſs for their Supplies both of Men and Money: That their Cavalry was diſmounted: That the People were exhauſted: That their Troops were mutinous, and deſerted by whole Companies: That they were in want of Proviſions: That they had broke no leſs than thirty-eight Regiments of Horſe, Foot, and Dragoons, to make up the Deficiencies of others; and, in general, whatever elſe had a Tendency to render them cheap and deſpicable: An Artifice which ſcarce deſerv'd that Name! For oftentimes the Bubble broke in blowing: Never did the Amuſement it gave laſt long: And the Diſappointment of thoſe Expectations, which it was calculated to raiſe, was ſure to produce Indignation in the firſt Inſtance, and Incredulity in the End.

Preparations for a Deſcent on England.

What is yet more extraordinary, while the Public were thus led into a Perſuaſion, that nothing was wanting to complete the Ruin of the French, but the ſtriking a Blow in Flanders, and the making a Deſcent on their Coaſts, the French were actually meditating a Deſcent on ours, and making ſuch a Proviſion for it, as ſhew'd, that they did not ſo

(m) Between ſix and ſeven thouſand, which, together with fifteen hundred Curaſſiers, which his Electoral Highneſs carry'd with him as a Life-Guard into Flanders, were the whole Strength which he contributed to the Quarrel.

A. D. 1692. so much intend to ſtrike a Panic and create a Diverſion, as to bring about another Revolution.

It was too notorious to be conceal'd, that the Nation was far from being of one Mind: The Care of Foreign Affairs had been more regarded than the removing domeſtic Evils: Our Hero and Defender was abſent in purſuit of other Adventures: The far greater Part of our beſt Troops were engag'd in the ſame Queſt: The Reins of Empire were in the Hands of a Woman, whoſe Councils were embarraſs'd with the Feuds of two irreconcileable Parties: The Majority of the Invaders were thoſe very Iriſh ſo liberally furniſh'd to his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty by the Articles of Limerick: The abdicated King was now to act the Part of a Deliverer in his Turn, who had many plauſible things to urge, as well to blunt the Oppoſition of his Adverſaries, as to beſpeak the Endeavours of his Friends: And to crown all, if Biſhop Burnet is to be depended upon, both the King and the Secretary's Office were ſo ill furniſh'd with Intelligence, that, if the Winds had favour'd, the French themſelves would have brought the firſt News of the Purpoſe they had in hand.

Articles of Intelligence in the L. Gazette, [Numb. 2728. —2729, —2730, —2741, —2745, —2748, —2750, —2752, —2754, —2763.]

But this laſt Circumſtance is ſcarce credible, not only from the Nature of Things, but from the very Hints which were publiſh'd from time to time in our own Gazettes, and which prove, That it was known in the Beginning of January, that the French Court had already diſtributed all the chief Commands on board their Fleet: That Orders were given for fitting out the Toulon Squadron, together with Frigates, Fireſhips, and Gallies: That this was confirm'd by ſubſequent Advices: That in the Beginning of February it was farther known: That all the French Privateers were recall'd; and an Embargo was laid on all Merchantmen, for the ſake of the more ſpeedy and effectual manning their Fleet: That on the 23d of the ſame Month, N. S. Mr. d' Eſtrees ſet out from Paris to take upon him the Command of the Toulon-Squadron: That Mr. de Tourville, who was to command in the Ocean, ſet out on the 14th of March, N. S. for Breſt: That all the Officers of the Marine had receiv'd Orders to repair immediately to their Poſts: That it was the general Belief at Paris, that the Toulon Squadron was already at Sea: That all the Men of War at Breſt, Rochford and Port Louis were fitting out as faſt as poſſible: That, when ready, they were to ſail as far as Cadiz to meet Mr. d'Eſtrees: That the Marſhal de Belfonde was to command a Body of eight or ten thouſand Men on the Coaſt of Normandy, and Mr. de Larre another on the Coaſt of Guienne: And again, That inſtead of eight or ten thouſand Men, Mr. de Bellfonde was to have under his Command twenty-ſix Battallions of Iriſh, and eight thouſand French, Horſe and Foot: And, laſtly, that Mr. de Tourville lay in Breſt-Road, with forty-five Men of War; the reſt of the Fleet not being ready.

Thus it appears by a Courſe of Advices ſet forth by Authority, that our Miniſters were no Strangers either to the naval Preparations of France, or their Diſpoſitions in Normandy: And if they ſuffer'd themſelves to be amus'd with a Notion, that ſo large a Body of Forces was collected there, only to withſtand the Invaſion threaten'd by us, or that ſo great an Effort was made by Sea, only for the ſake of an Attempt on ſome of the Spaniſh Ports, as we find it alſo ſuggeſted, it muſt argue a greater Degree of Infatuation than ever diſgrac'd any ſet of Miniſters before. A. D. 1692.

Counter Preparations of the Engliſh and Dutch.

But if it ſhould be admitted, that they were not in the Secret of Mr. de Bellfonde's Commiſſion, it is certain, that they made it one of their principal Endeavours to render the Fleet as ſtrong, and to put it in a Condition to ſet ſail, as early as poſſible; which was the beſt Expedient, perhaps, that could have been made uſe of to render the Project abortive. Even before the End of December they had made an Offer of ſix Weeks Pay, by way of Bounty, to ſuch able Seamen as ſhould enter Voluntarily into the Service, together with Conduct-Money: When alſo it appear'd, that this did not ſufficiently anſwer the Purpoſe, another Proclamation was ſet forth, which partook as much of Terror, as the former of Indulgence; for therein, all Seamen, not already enliſted, were ſtrictly charg'd and commanded to enliſt forthwith, on pain of being proceeded againſt with the utmoſt Severity; and not only all Magiſtrates were requir'd to make a ſtrict Search after all abſconding Seamen, and to apprehend all looſe, unknown Perſons who might be juſtly ſuſpected as ſuch, but all Perſons whatſoever were ſtrictly charg'd and commanded, not to conceal any of the Perſons thus deſcrib'd, or to favour their Eſcape, on pain of being committed to Priſon by the next Juſtice of the Peace, or other Magiſtrates, and proſecuted with all Severity ACCORDING TO LAW, as Perſons conſpiring againſt their Majeſties, and the Safety of the Kingdom: And by a third Proclamation, all ſuch as had left the Ships they had belong'd to, were requir'd to return to their ſaid Ships, on pain of being puniſh'd as Deſerters: And all Captains, Commanders, &c. were directed to make diligent Search on board all Merchant-Ships after ſuch Abſentees or Deſerters, and to ſecure all they ſhould find, in order to their being brought to condign Puniſhment. Accordingly, all the Merchant-Ships in all the Ports thro' the Kingdom were viſited; all the Reſorts of Seamen were thoroughly ſearch'd; and till the Navy was completely mann'd, all that were fit for the Service, were forc'd into it, without Exception. This continu'd through the whole Month of February, and in the mean time, ſuch Expedition was uſed at the ſeveral Docks and Yards, that before the King's Departure to Holland, all the Ships of Force, but one, were come round from Portſmouth, and ſo many had fallen down from Deptford, Woolwich and Chatham, to the Nore, that

A. D. 1692. his Majesty was sufficiently authoriz'd to assure the States, that his Fleet was almost in Readiness to put to Sea. It is farther to be remember'd, that, towards the End of April, two new Ships of eighty Guns, and one of seventy-nine Guns, as also two rebuilt Ships, viz. one of an hundred Guns, and one of seventy, were launch'd and equipp'd, with such almost-incredible Dispatch, that an express Article is to be found in the Gazette, N°. 2762, signifying, That the Royal William was launch'd at Chatham on the 21st, fell down to Black-stakes on the 25th, and, on the 30th, was completely fitted, having on board an hundred and six Guns, all her Stores, Provisions, and full Compliment of Men, in order to join the Fleet the next Day.

During this Interval also, it appears, that his Majesty, immersed as he was, in the Affairs of the Continent, found sufficient Leisure to quicken the Dutch Preparations by Sea: In consequence of which, the Amsterdam Squadron, which consisted of fourteen Men of War, three of them of ninety-two Guns each, and three Fire-ships, came to anchor in the Downs on the 27th of April, and was follow'd close at the Heels by the Maese-Squadron, which consisted of five capital Ships, and two Fire-ships: Seven Dutch Men of War came also, about the same time, to the same Road, from Spithead; and the North-Holland and Zealand Squadrons were not long behind them: So that if it really was the Purpose of the French, as Bishop Burnet suggests, to embark their Troops at Cherbourgh, la Hogue, and other adjacent Places in Normandy in the End of April, in order to make their Descent on the Coast of Sussex, as the nearest way to London, it appears that our Fleet was early enough in a Condition, not only to dispute the Passage, but to deter them from attempting it. Besides, even the Bishop himself (who seems to have two Ends in exposing the profound Security of our Court at this time, namely, to reflect on the Earl of Nottingham's Tory-Administration, and to insinuate, that the Government was under the peculiar Care of Providence) is pleas'd to allow, "That, in the Beginning of May, about forty of our Ships were on the Coast of Normandy, and were endeavouring to destroy the French Transport-Ships; which had been impossible, if the Ministry had been so careless of the Public, as he represents them; or if they had been appriz'd of the French Designs but a very few Days before they reckon'd they should be on our Coast; which is one of the Circumstances insisted upon by his Lordship, and which will appear yet more improbable in the Sequel.

It was the 21st of April, N. S. when King James set out from St. Germains in his way to Normandy: And on the 10th of May following, his most Christian Majesty, who had also resolv'd to have a personal Share in the Glory of this Campaign, with a Train of Court-Lords and Ladies, began his Journey to Flanders. Wide as their several Routs lay, we are to understand, that both terminated in the same Point of Sight. A. D. 1692.

"He (the French King) says a Writer of these Times, intended to invade England, if our Army continu'd in the Netherlands; or to make himself Master of those Provinces, if we should be oblig'd to recall our Forces." And after him, says the Prelate last quoted, "At the same time (while King James ferry'd over from la Hogue, that is to say) the King of France was to march with a great Army into Flanders; and he reckon'd, that the Descent into England would either have succeeded, since there was a very small Force left within the Kingdom, or, at least, that it would oblige the King to come over, with some of his English Troops; and in that Case, which way soever the War of England had ended, he should have master'd Flanders, and so forc'd the States to submit." [History of the late Conspiracy, 8vo, p. 40.]

Not only these two Writers, but all others, take it for granted, that there was an Understanding between King James and his Partizans in England; but then they do not wholly agree in their Manner of attesting it, or indeed with themselves; for while Bishop Burnet, in one Place, says, "The French were to bring over only a small Number of Horses; for their Party in England undertook to furnish them with Horses at their landing;" which implies a Treaty and Concert between them of some standing: He says in another, as hath been already in part quoted, "They sent over some Persons to give their Friends notice but a very few Days before they reckon'd they should be on our Coast. One of these was a Scotchman, and brought the first Discovery to Johnston," the Scotish Secretary: Others say, that one Lunt, who will be frequently mention'd hereafter, brought Intelligence to the Jacobites, in December, of a Project for an Invasion in the Spring: And that Walmsley and Parker, in February, came to England by King James's Order; and not only imparted the Design at a Meeting of the principal Persons of the Faction, but distributed among them Commissions and Presents, which they had also been charg'd with. Others, again, fix this Meeting in January; and both alike serve to confute the Bishop's Suggestion, That the Notice so very few Days preceded the time prefix'd for the Event. The Jacobites charg'd with being in the French Secret.

Again, the same thing is made yet farther evident by the following Facts, viz. 1. There is an Article in the London-Gazette, N°. 2758, dated from Deal, April 15, in these Words; "Rear Admiral Carter is going with a Squadron to the Westward." Now, in all Probability, this is the very Squadron which the Bishop says was sent to destroy the French Transports in Normandy; tho' it seems somewhat strange, that he should be sent on such an Errand, when the same Author farther relates, That the Heavens fought against them more effectually than we could have done; for, continues he, "There was, for a whole Month together, such a Storm that lay upon their Coast, that it was not possible for them to come out of their Ports." But, not to insist on this Circumstance, for the Storms his Other Proof that the Court were better on their Guard than Burnet suppose.

Lordship

A. D. 1692. Lordship talks of were in March, the Admiral came to Spithead on the 19th, and continu'd there till the 25th at Night, when he again ſtood to the Weſtward; and, we hear no more of him till the ninth of May, except by an Article from Paris inſerted in the London-Gazette, N°. 2766, dated May the 16th, N. S. which ſays, That by an Expreſs of that Day from (n) Dieppe, there was Advice, that a Fleet of fifty Engliſh Men of War had appear'd off that Place; and which may be underſtood either of him or Admiral DelaVal, who, with all the (o) Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Rates, &c. ſail'd through the Downs on the 29th of April, and on the firſt of May was ſeen off Dungeneſs. 2. Mr. Johnſton having imparted the Intelligence he had receiv'd to the Regency of Scotland, and accompany'd it with ſuitable Inſtructions, we have Advice from Edinburgh, dated April 30, which imports, That the Privy Council of that Kingdom had already obey'd thoſe Inſtructions, by publiſhing a Proclamation, requiring all Magiſtrates to make due and exact Trial what Miniſters did not, in expreſs Words, pray for King William and Queen Mary, to the end, that they might be proſecuted with all Rigour: That they had order'd the Magiſtrates of Edinburgh to re-inforce the Town-Company of Soldiers with a Detachment of Train'd-Bands, who were to be upon Duty every Night, and to give to the Lord-Chancellor a daily Liſt of all Lodgers, ſuſpected and unknown Perſons: That they had enjoyn'd the Governor of the Caſtle to remove all Perſons out of it, not belonging to the Gariſon, and to command all his Officers to repair to their Poſts: That they had ſummon'd the Heritors of the Shires of the Three Lothians, Fyfe, Sterling, Clackmanan, Lanark, Peebles, Tweedale, and Berwick, to meet their Officers, and to be ready to appear with their Arms on the firſt Warning: That Letters had been ſent to the Burghs-Royal, or Sea-Towns, to take an Account of all Arms, Powder, Ammunition, &c. and that the ſaid Counſel had authoriz'd the Lord-Chancellor to ſearch for, and ſecure ſuſpected Perſons, together with their Horſes, Arms, &c. And, thirdly, we find, that Intelligence of the Diſcoveries made in England, had even reach'd the King at Loo before the End of April: Or elſe how was it poſſible for the Earl of Portland to arrive at Whitehall, May the third, with ſecret Inſtructions to the Queen (that ſhe might not, even in his Abſence, ſays an Author before quoted, be oblig'd to depend upon the Advice and Opinions of any other Council but himſelf) as he actually did? Or for General Talmaſh to follow him with three Regiments of Foot, in leſs than ten Days more?

The Earl of Portland ſent over with ſecret Inſtructions to the Queen.

Not to be too circumſtantial, the Queen, in concert with her Miniſters, had taken all the neceſſary Precautions before the Favourite's Arrival; for, over and above the Meaſures already mention'd, Admiral Ruſſel, who had again the Command in chief of the Navy, had taken his Leave of her Majeſty, April the 30th, with Orders to ſet ſail as ſoon as poſſible in queſt of the Enemy: Orders had been ſent to the Lieutenancy to raiſe the Militia; ſix Regiments that were on the point of embarking for Flanders, were countermanded; Proviſion was made for draughting others from Ireland; a Train of Artillery was provided; a Camp was order'd to be mark'd out between Petersfield and Portſmouth; and, for fear the Preparations of France ſhould be only againſt the Iſlands of Guernſey and Jerſey, Care was alſo taken for their Security.

A. D. 1692.

But, after the Favourite's Arrival, and he had imparted his Secret Inſtructions to her Majeſty, all Papiſts and reputed Papiſts, were oblig'd, by Proclamation, to remove ten Miles from London: Both Houſes of Parliament were requir'd to meet on the 24th, and to ſit for the Diſpatch of ſuch weighty and important Affairs, as might be requiſite for the Safety of the Kingdom, at a time, when it was threaten'd with a powerful Invaſion from abroad: The Arms and Horſes of ſuſpected Perſons were ſeiz'd: "Divers Lords and others were taken up and committed to the Tower and other Priſons, for High Treaſon, in abetting and adhering to their Majeſties Enemies." Theſe are the Words of the London-Gazette, N°. 2794: Other Papers of thoſe Times ſpecify the Earl of Marlborough and Huntington, as alſo Fergu ſon, one Ridley, in whoſe Chambers, it is ſaid, was found a conſiderable Sum of Money, and others: And, laſtly, a Proclamation was iſſu'd, for apprehending the Earls of Scarſdale, Litchfield, Newburgh, Middleton, and Dunmore; the Lords Griffin and Forbes; John Griffin, Eſq; Sir John Fenwick, Sir Theophilus Oglethorp, Sir Andrew Forreſter, Colonel Slingſby, James Grahme, Eſq; ——— Orby, Eſq; Colonel Sackville, Oliver St. George, Eſq; Major Souper, Charles Adderley, Eſq; David Lloyd, Eſq; George Porter, Eſq; and Edward Stafford, Eſq; by Name, who had abſconded, and againſt whom it was ſaid, their Majeſties had receiv'd Information (upon Oath is not mention'd) that they had conſpir'd together, and with divers other diſaffected Perſons, to diſturb and deſtroy the Government, &c.

Suſpected Perſons ſeiz'd.

A Proclamation againſt others.

It may, and ought to be, preſum'd, the Government had ſufficient Grounds for this Charge; for the Outed Party not only thought they had a Right, but were forward enough to become Revolutioners in their Turn; and it is to be lamented, that thoſe Grounds have not been more diſtinctly and ſolemnly ſpecify'd; for as to the Circumſtances above recited concerning

The Charge againſt the Jacobites reſum'd.

(n) At which Place, Catharine, the Queen-Dowager of England, landed on the ninth, N. S. in her way to Portugal, whether ſhe was going to ſpend the reſt of her Days; according to ſome, from an Apprehenſion of a Civil War in England.

(o) The Author of the Lives of the Admirals confounds this fighting Squadron with another ſmall one of five Men of War and two Fireſhips, commanded by the ſame Admiral, which ſail'd as a Convoy from Plymouth for Cadiz, January the 13th, and which came to an Anchor again in the Downs, March the 17th.

A. D. 1692. cerning Lunt, Parker, and Walmsly, they are taken from subsequent Depositions; and the Credit of Court-Witnesses in Court-Causes will ever be liable to Suspicion. When therefore we find it farther asserted in the said Depositions, That the two last of those Persons desir'd their Party, at that Meeting, to be in Readiness to join the Invaders; that Soldiers were accordingly levy'd, Arms distributed, &c. As also, That Lloyd, one of the Persons named in the Proclamation, was sent over to the Earl of Melfort, to acquaint his Lordship, That they had corrupted several of the English Sea-Commanders, particularly Rear-Admiral Carter; that this Intelligence was accompany'd with a List of the Number and Rates, of the Ships under his Command, a Computation of the time it would take up before the English and Dutch Fleets could join, and a Request, that his Lordship would procure positive Orders from his most Christian Majesty to Mr. de Tourville to engage the English Fleet in this Interval, without waiting any longer for the Toulon-Squadron, under Mr. d'Estrees; we continue unsatisfy'd in spite of ourselves, and thereby experience the Necessity of more unquestionable Authorities.

[P. 46. 47. It is true, in the History of the late Conspiracy, we find the following Passages: "He (the King) hasten'd the sailing of the Dutch Fleet, and fitted out his own with such Diligence and Expedition, that, notwithstanding the utmost Efforts the French could make to prevent us, they were oblig'd to encounter with two Fleets, when they expected only to have met with one. When his Enemies had recourse to their wonted Artifices, and endeavour'd to corrupt the Officers of his Navy, he not only defeated their treacherous Project, but made their Stratagem fatal to themselves: For Admiral Carter was order'd to treat with them, and amuse them with a seeming Compliance, till they fell into the Snare which they had provided for us."

But then Bishop Burnet, who rarely forgets or overlooks any Incident of this nature, never once mentions it, and accounts for Mr. de Tourville's entering the Channel without Mr. d'Estrees, on quite another Principle: Namely, Our sending a Squadron of Ships on the Coast of Normandy to destroy the French Transports. "Upon which (says he) Orders were sent to Marshal Tourville, to sail to the Channel, and fight the English Fleet." It is, indeed, farther added in the Depositions, That, upon Lord Melfort's Application, the King of France did actually dispatch fighting Orders to Tourville: That a false Report prevailing, that the English and Dutch Fleets were join'd, and the Jacobites apprehending it would occasion a Revocation of the said Orders, they sent Sir Adam Blair, expres, to contradict it: That, nevertheless, before the said Gentleman could reach Dover, the two Fleets did actually join: That hereupon they sent over one Mr. Clark with the News, to prevent any Mischief which might arise from the Message sent by Blair; and that Blair persisting in his own Story, in Opposition to Clark, the Latter was imprison'd as a Spreader of false News, and did not obtain his Liberty, till the Fact was authenticated from all Quarters. And yet, as the Junction of the said Fleets was made in the Downs, and both sail'd on to the Westward the same Day it was made, how is it to be conceiv'd that any Man could pass thro' Dover after the said Junction, as Blair is said to have done, without being inform'd of so important an Event, and which related so fundamentally to the very Commission he was charg'd with? Besides, it is abundantly more reasonable to suppose, that the French Court govern'd their Motions by the Reason and Nature of Things, than the partial Advices of their Confederates here. Mr. d'Estrees had met with such unfavourable Winds, that it was the sixteenth of April, N. S. before he reach'd Malago. In his way, he had fallen in with a little Fleet of English Merchant-Ships, under the Convoy of the Portland and Phœnix: All of which, except three, together with their Convoy, chose rather to run themselves ashore, than to fall into his Hands: But scarce had he Leisure to reflect on this Success before he was visited with a far greater Misfortune: For, at the Entrance of the Streights, he was surpriz'd with a violent Storm, which drove two of his Capital Ships on the Rocks, where they were beat to Pieces, and so disabled the rest, that they were glad to make the best of their way to the next Port, to refit, instead of attempting to prosecute their Voyage. Thus it appears, that by waiting any longer for Mr. d'Estrees, they must have lost the Crisis of Action, and with it, all Probability of finding their Account in the vast Sums they had disburs'd, and the mighty Preparations they had made.

But tho' we are not able to trace the Correspondence between the French and the Jacobites, Step by Step, and many Objections may possibly be rais'd to the Accounts we have been hitherto furnish'd with, we ought not therefore to pronounce, that there was no such Correspondence at all; for, in all Likelihood, there was. King James's Queen was again with Child (a Circumstance which Bishop Burnet has more politically than candidly, suppress'd.) It was presum'd this new Conception would confirm the Reality of the Former. A solemn (p) Invitation to the Birth, in King James's Name, dated from St. Germains,

A. D. 1692. mains, April the second, N. S. was distributed in England to all the Lords and others, late of his Privy-Council, as also to several Ladies, and to Dr. Chamberlain the celebrated Man-Midwife. This was follow'd, at the Distance of eighteen Days, with a (q) Declaration preparatory to his Landing; in the Preamble to which it is avow'd, That the most Christian King, agreeable to many obliging Promises, had lent him as many of his Troops as were abundantly sufficient to untye the Hands of his Subjects, and make it safe for them to return to their Duty, and repair to his Standard, tho' not so many as to make them jealous, that he intended to take the Work wholly out of their Hands, or deprive them of their Share in the Glory, of restoring their lawful King and their ancient Government: And the whole Drift of the Paper was not only to spirit up his own Party to come in to his Assistance, but the Majority of the Nation: For, after an explicit Promise, that, as soon as he should be fully settled in the peaceable and quiet Possession of his Kingdoms, his (r) foreign Auxiliaries should be sent home, and that, in the mean time, they should observe such exact Discipline, that none of his Subjects should receive the least Injury from them, he proceeds to say in Substance, That tho' an Affair of this nature spoke for itself, and tho' he did not think himself oblig'd to say any thing more, than that he came to assert his just Right, and to deliver his People from the Oppressions they lay under: Yet when he consider'd how miserably many of his Subjects had been cheated into the late Revolution by the Arts of ill Men, and particularly by the Prince of Orange's Declaration, which was taken upon trust, and easily believ'd then, tho' consisting of Assertions that had been evidently disprov'd, and Promises that never were intended to be perform'd, he had thought fit to do what lay in his Power to open the Eyes of his Subjects, that they might no more have Ignorance to plead for any future Steps, they might make hereafter towards the Ruin of themselves and their Country: That to take the Matter from the Beginning, it could not be forgot, that when he had certain Notice of the Prince of Orange's unnatural Design, he chose, next to the Divine Protection, to rely on the Courage and Fidelity of the English Army (which had been with so much Care and Tenderness form'd and oblig'd by him) for his Defence: That this Reliance had induc'd him to refuse the considerable Succours both by Sea and Land offer'd him by his most Christian Majesty: That when he was ready to oppose Force with Force, he apply'd himself to give all reasonable Satisfaction to the Minds of his good Subjects, by endeavouring to undeceive them, and by letting them see, while time was, what Ruin they would bring upon their Country, by countenancing the vain Pretences of the Prince of Orange: That, however, such was the Infatuation of the Time, that he was not believ'd till it was too late: That when he, the Prince, had thrown off the Mask, and it appear'd plainly, that it was not the Reformation of the Government, but the Subversion of it, that he aimed at, and when his Majesty was universally deserted and betrayed by his Army, his Ministers, his Favourites, and, his very Children, and at last rudely forc'd by a Guard of Foreigners from his own Palace, it was high time for him to provide for his own Security, which he could no otherwise do, than by taking Refuge in France: That how this Escape of his came to be treated as an Abdication, and what a strange Superstructure had been rais'd upon it by a Company of Men, illegally met, who, without Power to alter the Property of the meanest Subject, had taken upon them to destroy the whole Constitution, and to make an hereditary Monarchy become elective, &c. were Transactions too well known to need Repetition: That by this time, no doubt, the Nation had cast up the Account, on considering their Losses and Expences, which had been greater in the three last Years, than during the whole Reigns of many of his Predecessors put together, and were convinc'd that the Remedy was worse than the Disease: That when they farther consider the Temper and Complexion, the Methods and Maxims of the present Usurper, they would find all the Reason in the World to believe, that the Beginning of his Tyranny, like the five first Years of Nero, was like to prove the mildest Part of it; and that even those who were most instrumental in the Establishment of it, might live to be Sufferers under porter of Truth, to give us Hopes of future Issue, our dear Consort, the Queen, being big, and drawing near her Time; we have thought fit to require such of our Privy-Council, as can come, to attend us here at St. Germains, to be Witnesses of our said Consort the Queen's Labour. We do therefore hereby signify this our Royal Pleasure to you, that you may use all possible Means to come with what convenient Haste you can, the Queen looking about the Middle of May next. And that you may have no Scruple on our Side, our dear Brother, the most Christian King, has given his Royal Word and Promise to you, as we hereby do, that you shall have leave to come, and, the Queen's Labour being over, to return with all Safety. The Iniquity of the Times, the Tyranny of Strangers, and misled Party of our own Subjects, brought us under the Necessity of using this unusual way; yet we hope it will convince the World of the Truth and Candour of our Proceedings, to the Confutation of our Enemies. We, not doubting of your Compliance herewith, bid you heartily farewell. Given at our Court at the Castle of St. Germains, the 2d of April N. S. 1692, and in the eighth Year of our Reign."

(q) This Declaration is to be found at large, in Darby's Collection of State-Tracts, Vol. II. together with an Answer to it by Dr. Lloyd, Bishop of St. Asaph. Supposing it therefore to be genuine, it must be allow'd the Government shew'd no small Degree of Courage and Ingenuity in suffering the Bishop to make it public, while the Terror of the Invasion was yet depending, and thereby leaving the People to be their own Judges: and as no Information has been made to the contrary, we ought to conclude, that the Author of the Memoirs of Europe for this Year, tho' no Friend to King James, was either greatly mistaken, or greatly impos'd upon, in asserting, p. 193, that one of the Articles in the said Declaration contain'd a Promise, to exempt his People from all sorts of Imposts for seven Years: Of which there is no Trace in the Copy given by the Bishop.

(r) There is a remarkable Fallacy contain'd in these Words: For the greater Part of the Army employ'd in this Service being Irish, they would have paid for their own, and, consequently, not comprehended under this Article. In which Case he would have been left with such a Corps about him, as would have fully answer'd any Purposes he had to serve.

A. D. 1692. under it: That if it should please God, as one of his severest Judgments upon these Kingdoms, for the many Rebellions and Perjuries they had been guilty of, to continue the Usurpation during his Life-time, an indisputable Title would survive in his Issue, which would not fail to expose the Kingdom, as in the long and bloody Contentions between the two Houses of York and Lancaster, to all the Miseries of a new Civil War: That the calamitous Condition of Europe, and the fair Prospect of enlarging the Bounds of the Christian Empire, ought to be weighty Motives with all Christians for his Restoration, since no rational Prospect of a Treaty could be form'd without it; but that once done, the thing would be easy, for he was ready to offer his Mediation: That since he came with so good Purposes, and so good a Cause, and since the Peace of Europe, as well as that of his own Kingdoms was concern'd in his Success, he hoped he should meet with little Opposition, and that all his loving Subjects, according to their Duty and their Oaths, would join with, and assist him, to the utmost of their Power. He also added his Commands to fortify his Hopes; and then, laying aside the Pleader, and assuming the Monarch, strictly forewarn'd and prohibited all his Subjects, from collecting or paying any of the illegal Taxes lately impos'd on them, or any Part of the Revenue, or contributing to abett and support the Usurpation: And, that none might be forc'd to continue in Rebellion by Despair of Mercy, and that he himself might, if possible, have none but the Usurper and his Foreign Troops to deal with, promis'd and declar'd, by the Word of a King, that except certain (s) Persons, there enumerated, all, who by an early Return to their Duty, and giving any signal Mark of it, should manifest the Sincerity of their Repentance, should not only have their respective Pardons under the Great Seal, but be farther consider'd and rewarded. He also promis'd to provide an Act of Indemnity in his first Parliament, in favour of those who should not appear in Arms against him, provided that all Magistrates should, immediately after Notice of his Landing, make some public Manifestations of their Allegiance and Submission to his Authority; and also to cause this his Declaration to be publish'd as soon as it came to their Hands; and that all Keepers of Prisons immediately set at Liberty all Persons committed to their Custody, on account of their Allegiance or Affection to him. He farther declar'd and promis'd, That all Officers and Soldiers, either by Sea or Land, who should quit the Service of the Usurper, and return to their Duty, should not only have their Pardons, but the Arrears of their Pay; and, that even the Foreigners themselves might not be driven to Despair, that A. D. 1692. all such as should lay down their Arms and claime the Benefit of this Declaration, should be paid their Arrears and transported to their respective Countries, or wherever else they should reasonably desire. His next Paragraph ran in these Words: "And we do farther declare and promise, That we will protect and maintain the Church of England, as it is by Law establish'd, in all their Rights, Privileges and Possessions; and, that upon all Vacancies of Bishoprics and other Dignities and Benefices within our Disposal, Care should be taken to have them fill'd with the most worthy of their own Communion." After which he proceeds to say, "That for preserving the Peace of the Kingdom, and that Men of all Opinions in Religion might be reconcil'd to the Government, as also, being convinc'd in his Judgment, that Liberty of Conscience was most agreeable to the Laws, and the Spirit of the Christian Religion, and most conducing to the Wealth and Prosperity of the Kingdom by encouraging the Natives of all Countries to trade with and settle among us, he was resolv'd most earnestly to recommend to his Parliament the settling Liberty of Conscience in so beneficial a manner, that it might be a lasting Blessing to this Kingdom. Lastly; That it should be his great Care, by the Advice and Assistance of Parliament, to repair the Breaches, and heal the Wounds of the late Distractions, to restore Trade, by putting the Act of Navigation in effectual Execution, which had been of late so much violated in Favour of Strangers, to put the Navy and Stores into as good a Condition as he left them, to find the best ways of bringing back Wealth and Bullion to the Kingdom, which, of late, had been so much exhausted; and that generally it should be his Delight to spend the Remainder of his Reign, as he had always design'd since his coming to the Crown, in studying to do every thing that might contribute to the Re-establishment of the Greatness of the English Monarchy upon its old and true Foundation, the united Interest and Affection of the People." Thus, says he, for a close of all, having endeavour'd to answer all Objections, and to give all the Satisfaction we can think of to all Parties and Degrees of Men, we cannot want ourselves the Satisfaction of having done all that can be done on our Part, whatever the Event shall be, the Disposal of which, we commit with great Resignation and Dependence to that God who judges right. And as, on the other side, if any of our Subjects, after all this, shall remain so obstinate, as to appear in Arms against us, they must needs fall unpity'd under the Severity of our Justice, after having refus'd such gracious Offers of Mercy, so they must be answerable to Almighty God for all the Blood

(s) Namely; the Duke of Ormond, the Marquis of Worcester, the Earls of Sunderland, Bath, Derby, and Nottingham, the Lords Newport, Dillamere, Willoughby, Colchester, Cornwallis, Dunblane and Churchill, the Bishops of London and St. Asaph, Sir Robert Howard, Sir John Trevor, Sir Samuel Grimstone, Sir Stephen Fox, Sir George Treby, Sir Basil Dixwell, Sir James Ogleby, Dr. Tillotson, Dr. Burnet, Francis Russel, Richard Lowdes, John Trenchard, Esqrs; Charles Duncomb of London, Edward Napleton and Hunt, Fishermen, and all those who offer'd him personal Indignities at Feversham, also all Persons who, as Judges, Jurymen, &c. had a hand in the barbarous Murder of Ayloff, Cruft, &c. and all Spies.

[A. D. 1692.] Blood that ſhall be ſpilt, and all the Miſeries and Confuſions in which theſe Kingdoms may happen to be involv'd by their Deſperate and unreaſonable Oppoſition."

Thus it appears that every Article in this Paper was calculated to clear the way for a Deſcent: And as it is out of all Diſpute, that this unhappy Prince had a Party here, on whoſe Countenance and Aſſiſtance he depended, and whoſe Hopes were grafted only on his Succeſs, it cannot be ſuppos'd, that they were ignorant of his Purpoſe, or wholly unprovided to act in the Support of it: Beſides, both this Paper and his Letter of Invitation to the Delivery of his Queen, were circulated through the Kingdom; and nothing was omitted to beſpeak them a favourable Reception; which could not have been done by a few, nor by any that were not reſolv'd to embrace all Opportunities of rendering them effectual.

[State of Europe for May, p. 179. Memoirs of Europe, p. 193.] There are thoſe who, moreover, aſſure us, That, after the Example of the Prince of Orange, Papers of the like Tendency were ſcatter'd among the Seamen and Soldiers, in hope of the like Succeſs: And, either alluding to thoſe, or to the Affair of Admiral Carter, before ſpoken of, Dr. Lloyd, Biſhop of St. Aſaph, the Author of two Papers call'd, A Firſt and Second Letter to a Friend concerning a French Invaſion, ſuggeſts, that no Arts nor Endeavours were wanting to debauch them from their Duty.

A Court-Artifice. Laſtly, a Paper was publiſh'd in the London-Gazette of May 19, but dated the 16th, in her Majeſty's Name, and by her Direction, which manifeſtly ſhew'd, that there had been a Doubt in the Cabinet of the Fidelity of the Fleet: and that it had been held neceſſary to draw ſuch Aſſurances from the principal Officers and Commanders, as ſhould ſerve as a ſort of Security for their good Behaviour. But, that the Reader may judge for himſelf, the ſaid Paper is here inſerted as follows:

Whitehall, May 16. "The Queen being inform'd of a ſcandalous and malicious Report that was ſpread abroad, as if ſome of the Officers of their Majeſties Fleet were diſaffected, or not hearty in their Service, and that her Majeſty had thereupon order'd the Diſcharge of many of them from their Employments; her Majeſty was pleas'd to command the Earl of Nottingham to write to Admiral Ruſſel, and to let him know, That her Majeſty was ſatisfy'd that this Report was rais'd by the Enemies of the Government; and that ſhe repos'd ſo entire a Confidence in their Fidelity and Zeal for their Majeſties Service, and the Defence of their Country, that ſhe had reſolv'd not to diſplace any of them. Which being communicated to them by the Admiral, they made and ſent up the following Addreſs, which was this Day preſented to the Queen by the Lords Commiſſioners of the Admiralty:

'We your Majeſties moſt Dutiful and Loyal Subjects and Servants, Flag-Officers and Captains in your Majeſties Fleet, out of the deep and grateful Senſe we have of your Majeſties good and juſt Opinion of our Loyalty and Fidelity, imparted to us by the Right Honourable Admiral Ruſſel, in a Letter to him from my Lord Nottingham; do, in the Behalf of ourſelves, and all the other Officers and Seamen, humbly preſume to addreſs ourſelves to your Majeſties at this Juncture, to undeceive the World in thoſe falſe and malicious Reports that have been lately ſpread in Prejudice of your Majeſties Service by People of an unreaſonable Diſaffection to your Majeſties Government, and an obſtinate Averſion to the Quiet and Good of our Country, That there are ſome amongſt us that are not truly zealous for, and entirely devoted to your Majeſties Service: We do therefore moſt humbly beg your Majeſties Leave to add to our repeated Oaths this Aſſurance of our Fidelity, That we will with all imaginable Alacrity and Reſolution venture our Lives in the Defence of your Majeſties undoubted Rights, and the Liberty and Religion of our Country, againſt all foreign and popiſh Invaders whatſoever: And that God Almighty may preſerve your Majeſties moſt Sacred Perſon, direct your Counſels, and proſper your Arms by Sea and Land againſt your Majeſties Enemies, let all the People ſay Amen, with your Majeſties moſt Dutiful and Loyal Subjects.

Dated on board the Britannia at St. Helens this 15*th Day of* May, 1692.'

This Addreſs was ſign'd by Sir John Aſhby, Admiral of the Blue; Sir Ralph Delaval, Vice-Admiral of the Red; Mr. Rook, Vice Admiral of the Blue; Sir Cloudeſly Shovel, Rear-Admiral of the Red; Mr. Carter, Rear-Admiral of the Blue; and the other Commanders of their Majeſties Fleet: And her Majeſty accepted it very graciouſly, being pleas'd to ſay, That ſhe always had this Opinion of the Commanders, but was very glad this was come to ſatisfy others."

Who theſe others were, thoſe Commanders, which is ſtrange, never deſir'd to know; and her Majeſty never thought fit to explane. As to Admiral Ruſſel himſelf, we are to ſuppoſe, that he was above Suſpicion, and therefore was not oblig'd, like the reſt, to join in any Act of Purgation; or elſe, that in the Diſpoſition he was in, he could not prevail with himſelf to do the Court ſuch a Favour: For we are told by Biſhop Burnet, That he had put himſelf on ill Terms both with the King and the Earl of Nottingham; with the King, by preſſing to know the Grounds of the Earl of Marlborough's Diſgrace, and upbraiding him with his Services, who, as he ſaid, had ſet the Crown upon his Head; and with Lord Nottingham, for ſupporting Faction among the Flag-Officers againſt him. "He ſell, indeed, continues that Prelate, into ſo ill a Humour on many Accounts, that he ſeem'd to be for ſome time in doubt whether he ought to take the Command of the Fleet upon him or not." But, whether he was not requir'd to ſign the Addreſs, or whether it was the Effect of his Reſentment that he did not, no Exceptions were taken: And it appear'd, that the Court had, by this time, not only got rid of their Panic, but were willing to make the Recovery of Admiral Ruſſel on ill Terms with the King and the Earl of Nottingham.

A. D. 1692. of their Spirit as public as they had made their Fears: For, on the ſame Day that the Paper was ſet forth, in relation to the Commanders of the Fleet, a Proclamation was alſo ſet forth in the Gazette, ſignifying, That the Navy being now at Sea, and join'd with that of our Allies, and in a Readineſs, by the Bleſſing of God, to reſiſt and repel the Deſigns and Attempts of our Enemies, it was her Majeſty's Pleaſure to prorogue the Parliament till the 14th of June.

Mention has already been made of the Admiral's taking his Leave of the Queen April 30, and of his ſailing through the Downs, May the 8th: But even in this ſhort Interval, it remains to be told, ſome Diverſity of Opinions appear'd between him and thoſe above. By his Orders of the fifth, he was directed to ſail from the Nore, and place himſelf between Cape la Hogue and the Iſle of Wight, in order to join the Squadrons of Delaval and Carter; In anſwer to which, he gave it as his Opinion, That Dungeneſs or Beachy-Head would be properer Places for that Service. Having thus put in his Proteſt, he, however, yielded Obedience; for, being ſenſible, ſays Mr. Burchet, of what Importance it was to the Nation, that the great Ships ſhould join the others as ſoon as it was poſſible, he ply'd it down through the Sands with a very ſcanty Wind, contrary to the Opinion of many of the Officers, and all the Pilots, who were againſt venturing ſo many of the largeſt Ships of England, without a more favourable Opportunity."

On the ſame Day that he paſs'd thro' the Downs, he came to anchor off of Rye, from whence he diſpatch'd another Squadron of ſmall Ships in ſearch of Delaval, with Orders, for him to join the Fleet off of Beachy, or ſend a Frigate with Advice where he was, that, ſo, there might be no Uncertainty of their meeting. The next Day a Council of War being held, of all the Flag-Officers, both Engliſh and Dutch; and the ſaid Orders to Delaval being taken into Conſideration, it was held adviſeable to continue in Rye Bay forty-eight Hours, to wait the Effect of them; under this Precaution, that a Frigate ſhould be forthwith ſent off of Beachy in queſt of him, which, upon diſcovering his Flag, was to make a Signal to another Frigate, ſtation'd between Beachy and Rye, that ſhe might alſo give the like Notice to the Fleet.

That Time being expir'd, and the Admiral having ſent a Frigate to the French Coaſt to Carter, with Orders to join him, and left Inſtructions for all the Engliſh and Dutch Ships which ſhould come into Rye Bay, to follow him to St. Helens, that ſo the Fleet might be entire, he weigh'd Anchor on the 11th; and on the 13th following, was join'd by Delaval and Carter, who had fallen in with each-other four Days before, between la Hogue and the Iſle of Wight; after which, the whole Fleet came to anchor at St. Helens. A. D. 1692.

The whole Fleet join'd.

And now the Admiral having been thus greatly re-inforc'd, and thinking himſelf in a Condition, not only to provide for the Security of our own Coaſts, but to inſult thoſe of France, ſent up the following Propoſal to Court; namely, That ſix or eight Frigates might be ſtation'd on the Coaſt of Normandy: That while they amus'd the Enemy there, and from time to time gave Intelligence of their Motions, a Body of Land-Forces might be tranſported to St. Maloes; and that the Main Body of the Fleet ſhould cover their Deſcent, by lying weſtward of that Place; which he thought would not only contribute to our Succeſs on Shore, but alſo oblige the French Fleet to riſque an Engagement: But the Court did not care to expoſe themſelves for the ſake of annoying the Enemy: That Part of his Project, therefore, relating to the Land-Forces, they choſe to drop: And as to the reſt, they left him to proceed in ſuch manner as ſhould be agreed at a Council of War; the Opinion of which was, Not to proceed Weſtward, till there ſhould be certain Advice of the Enemy; but, in the mean while, to ſtretch over to the Coaſt of France, near the Capes of la Hogue and Barfleur, there to ply for four Days, if the Weather gave leave, and then to return to St. Helens; which was judg'd, at that Criſis, to be the only proper Place of Rendezvous.

The Admiral's Propoſal to make a Deſcent at St. Maloes rejected at Court.

Agreeable to this Opinion, on the 18th they ſet ſail, and by three the next Morning were appriz'd by the Signals of their Scouts, that the Enemy was in ſight. As fighting was the Admiral's Buſineſs, he made his Diſpoſitions accordingly; and as the French, more bravely than wiſely, choſe to make it their Buſineſs likewiſe, it was not long before they were in a Condition to gratify each other. On the Side of the Allies, the (t) Dutch, conſiſting of nine Firſt Rates, ten Second Rates, nine Third Rates, and eight Fourth Rates, carrying two thouſand four hundred and ninety-four Guns, and twelve thouſand nine hundred and fifty Men, led the Van: The (u) Admiral himſelf, with the Red Squadron, conſiſting of five Firſt Rates, three Second Rates, ſixteen Third Rates, and ſeven Fourth Rates, carrying two thouſand two hundred and twenty Guns, and thirteen thouſand eight hundred and ninety-five Men, had the Center: And Sir (w) John Aſhby, with the Blue Squadron, of one Firſt Rate, ſeven Second Rates, eighteen Third Rates, and ſix Fourth Rates, carrying two thouſand three hundred and ten Guns, and fourteen thouſand ſix hundred and ſeventy-five Men, had the Rear; in all, ninety-nine Ships of the Line. The French, on the other hand, had not half this Number: Their Van, which was commanded by the Marquis d'Amfreville

A. D. 1692. ville, was compos'd but of fourteen Ships; their Center, under Mr. de Tourville, of twenty-six; and their Rear, under Mr. Gabaret, of fourteen. By a Liſt, indeed, which is ſtill extant, Mr. de Tourville was to have had ſixty-three Ships of the Line under his Command, excluſive of the Toulon Squadron; but, by whatever Accidents he was diſappointed of the reſt, it is certain, that he ventur'd to engage the united Strength of the Allies with no more than forty-four; which was ſo much the more wonder'd at, becauſe, having the Wind in his Favour, it was in his Power to have avoided an Engagement; and, poſſibly, this Temerity of his has contributed more than any thing elſe to the Suſpicion, that ſome of our Commanders had ſuffer'd themſelves to be corrupted by the Enemy. That, indeed, Mr. de Tourville's Conduct on this Occaſion, differ'd widely from the uſual Politics of France, cannot be deny'd; but then it is thus accounted for by the French themſelves: They ſay, That Mr. de Tourville receiv'd no Intelligence of the Strength of the Allies: That he had, in particular, miſs'd the Barco-longes ſent from Cherbourgh and la Hogue, to adverti'e him of their Junction: That the Weather being hazy, as all agree it was, to an uncommon Degree, they did not diſcover the Enemy till they were within a League and a half of them, nor were able to count their Number till, in a manner, cloſe aboard; and that it was believ'd, a ſudden Tack would have ſtruck ſuch a Terror into their Men, as, in caſe of a forc'd Engagement, would have prov'd more fatal to them than the Superiority of the Enemy. Biſhop Burnet, whoſe Account of this Affair is not only that of a Landman, but of a Churchman, ſays, The King of France ſent Orders to Tourville not to fight: That the Veſſel which carry'd theſe Orders was taken; and that the Duplicate of the ſaid Orders did not reach him till the Day after the Engagement. Mr. Burchet, in his Naval Hiſtory, alſo touches on the ſame Circumſtance, but not altogether in ſuch poſitive Terms; as we ſhall ſee preſently. According to him, the Reſolution with which the French bore down upon our Fleet, was not a little ſurpriſing, and could not be attributed to any other Reaſon than the poſitive Orders which he, Mr. de Tourville, had from his Maſter to fight the Engliſh Fleet;" Which, continues he, had he thought fit, he might have avoided, even after we ſaw each other; for he was ſeveral Leagues to windward [which is not only irreconcileable with the French Account, above recited, but even with the Hazineſs of the Weather, call'd a Fog by Mr. Burchet himſelf.] And as I am credibly inform'd, when he call'd his Flag-Officers together, they did unanimouſly give their Opinions not to engage; but that he, at laſt, produc'd an Order under the French King's own Hand; which ſhew'd them the Neceſſity there was for their ſo doing." He then ſuppoſes, that theſe Orders were given upon a Preſumption, that our great Ships and the Dutch could not join Delaval and Carter's Squadrons, then cruizing on the French Coaſt, before their Fleet could come up with them; ſuggeſts, That if Mr. Ruſſel had not ſail'd from the River, as he did, againſt the Opinion of the Pilots, the Winds, which afterwards happen'd, would have prevented his coming timely to their Aſſiſtance; and concludes with theſe Words: "Not but that the French Court (by what Means I know not) had ſuch early Notice of the Junction of our Fleet, or, at leaſt, of the ſailing of our great Ships, that I could almoſt affirm the Veſſel, which Captain Wivel took off Cape Barfleur, had Orders from the King to Mr. Tourville, contradicting thoſe poſitive Directions he had receiv'd for fighting: But the Maſter of the Veſſel threw the Packet into the Seas when he found himſelf in Danger of being taken." But ſurely Orders to fight the Engliſh did not oblige them to fight both Engliſh and Dutch: And it is ſomewhat ſtrange, that the French Court ſhould preſume ſo ſtrongly on an Event that depended on the Courteſy of the Winds and Waves, as not to make any Proviſion in their Orders in caſe of a Diſappointment. It is but ſeldom that the Odds, in point of Conduct, is on our Side; and yet both Carter and Delaval were furniſh'd with ſuch proviſional Orders, as it ſeems the French wanted: They were inſtructed to be ſecure againſt a Surprize; to retreat if they were overpower'd, &c. Then as to the Circumſtance of the Wind, ſo much inſiſted upon, if it continu'd at Eaſt, as it actually did for ſome Days, it was in the Teeth of the French; and if it came about towards the Weſt, the ſame Wind which brought them up the Channel, would have alſo brought the Admiral out of the River, and equally favour'd the Retreat of the other two Squadrons towards the Flats of the Foreland, where they were ſure to meet with a ſufficient Re-inforcement: And as to the Affair of the Deſcent, whatever our Fears might ſuggeſt, it was utterly impracticable, till the French were manifeſtly Maſters of the Sea.

A. D. 1692.

Our Way being thus clear'd, it is now time to proceed to the Engagement: And, not to amuſe ourſelves with Terms of Art, which, if ill underſtood, ſerve rather to perplex Matters, than to explane them, it appears the firſt Care of both Admirals, as uſual, was to make their reſpective Diſpoſitions to the beſt Advantage. This took up ſeveral Hours: Admiral Ruſſel acknowledges, That his Line was but indifferently form'd at eight o'Clock, tho' the Enemy was diſcover'd at four: And even at ten, when the French, who had the Wind, which was at S. W. were bearing down upon him, with the Signal of Battle flying, he was forc'd to call upon Admiral Aſhby, who was ſtill at ſome Diſtance a-ſtern, to make ſail and cloſe the Line: For the reſt, he choſe to lye by with his Foretop-ſail to the Maſt, in Expectation of the Onſet: That Mr. de Tourville, who was pleas'd to ſelect him for his particular Antagoniſt, might alſo come up as cloſe as he pleas'd, he defer'd his Orders to hoiſt the Bloody Flag, till they were within Three Quarters Muſket-ſhot; and then, it being

The two Fleets engage.

A. D. 1692. being Half an Hour after Eleven, the Action began with great Fury on both Sides; but, if Admiral Ruſſel obſerv'd right, the Engliſh fir'd faſteſt. At the ſame time, the French Vice and Rear Admirals of the White, de Villette and Landeron, attack'd Delaval and Shovel; and, in general, every Ship of the two Centers did their beſt to have their Share of the Danger and Glory of the Day.

The Vans of the two Fleets had, all this while, a Diſpute of a different nature to manage: Admiral Ruſſel, deſirous to make the utmoſt Uſe of his Superiority, had directed Admiral Allemonde, as ſoon as any of his Squadron could weather that of the Enemy, to tack and get behind them. This depended on Seamanſhip: And though the Dutch Commander did all he could to obey him, the French had the Addreſs to diſappoint him: But then their Endeavours were greatly aſſiſted by the frequent Calms which fell during the Engagement. Some Fighting, however, there was alſo on that Side; but the French challeng'd the Advantage: And Admiral Allemonde, in his Letter to the States, without pretending to any Trophy acquir'd, acknowledges, that two of his Squadron were ſo diſabled, that he was oblig'd to ſend one of them to Portſmouth to refit, and to withdraw the ſecond out of the Line till ſhe was repair'd.

As to the two Rears, part of the French, under Mr. Gabaret, and Mr. Coetlogon, aſſiſted Mr. de Tourville againſt Mr. Ruſſel; and part under Mr. Panetier could not come up for want of Wind; which was alſo Sir John Aſhby's Caſe, when he receiv'd the Admiral's Orders at nine o'Clock to cloſe the Line. About two, however, the Wind veering from S. W. to N. W. he made a ſhift to cut off Mr. Panatier's Diviſion from their Main Body; and, inſtead of falling upon Gabaret and Coetlogon, which was now in his Power, made it his Buſineſs to hold the ſaid Diviſion in check only; which was all the Share he had in the firſt Stage of the Engagement. Whether his Conduct in all this was faulty or not, it is, at this time, hard to determine: But that the Commander in Chief of a Diviſion is anſwerable for the Direction of it, is out of all queſtion: Now Mr. Rooke was only Vice-Admiral: And yet Biſhop Burnet, without deſcending to any Particulars, is pleas'd to ſay, Rooke, one of his (Ruſſel's) Admirals, was thought more in Fault.

Thus it appears, that the Struggle lay between the Center of the Allies and that of France, aſſiſted by Two Thirds of their Rear: And as to the Progreſs of it, till the Wind chang'd, Mr. de Tourville and his Diviſion had the whole Red Squadron to deal with: But then it was that Meſſieurs Gabaret and Coetlogon came in to his Aſſiſtance; and the Cannonading was maintain'd with great Vigour on both Sides till four; at which time ſo thick a Fog aroſe, that neither Party could diſcern Friend or Foe; and both, as if by Conſent, gave over till Day-light, and Diſtinction ſhould be reſtor'd.

Tourville quits the Line. This Receſs, however, laſted but a little while; for the Fog ſoon diſpers'd; and Mr. Ruſſel obſerving, that the French Admiral was towing away to the Northward, in great Diſorder, he did the ſame, and gave the like Orders to all his Diviſion; which was the Proceeding on both Sides till Half an Hour after five, when a ſmall Breeze at Eaſt ariſing, the Signal was given for chaſing; and Notice was ſent by the Admiral to all the Ships within his Reach, That the Enemy was running. Theſe are his own Words; and he immediately adds, "About this time I heard ſeveral Broad-ſides to the Weſtward, and tho' I could not ſee the Ships that fir'd, I concluded them to be our Blue (Aſhby's Squadron) that, by the Shift of Wind, had weather'd the Enemy: But, continues he, it prov'd to be the Rear-Admiral of the Red (Shovel) who had weather'd Tourville's Squadron, and got between them and their Admiral of the Blue (Panatier's Diviſion, it muſt be underſtood; for the two other Diviſions continu'd to ſupport Tourville through the whole Action) where they lay firing for ſome time, and then Tourville anchor'd with ſome Ships of his Diviſion, as alſo the Rear-Admiral of the Red, with ſome of his." is attack'd by Shovel.

Thus it appears, that Tourville had no ſooner ſlipt out of the Hands of one Enemy, than he fell into thoſe of another: And, according to the French Account, was not diſabled till now. This happen'd about ſeven in the Evening; and about eight, Rear-Admiral Carter, who is not ſo much as mention'd by Mr. Ruſſel, came in with Part of the Blue, and anchor'd, as Shovel had done before. The French are expreſs, that he, the Rear-Admiral of the Blue, together with his two Seconds, and five Fireſhips, beſet Tourville at once; that he never was in ſo much Danger as now; that no leſs than five of the Latter were let looſe upon him; that two of thoſe drove down upon his Prow, and were diſengag'd by the Intrepidity and good Conduct of three of his Lieutenants; that the third oblig'd him to cut his Cables; that the fourth and fifth being ill directed, ſpent themſelves without Effect; and that, during the whole time of theſe Experiments, the Rear-Admiral and his Aſſociates fir'd moſt furiouſly on all Sides to facilitate their Succeſs. Of theſe Fire-ſhips, not the leaſt Mention is made in our Accounts: And what is yet ſtranger, tho' Rear-Admiral Carter was kill'd upon this Occaſion, and with his laſt Breath, directed his Captain to fight his Ship as long as ſhe could ſwim, Mr. Ruſſel, in his Account, never names him; but only ſays, "About eight I heard a Firing to the Weſtward, which laſted about Half an Hour; it being ſome of our Blue fallen in with ſome of the Ships of the Enemy in the Fog." He adds, "It was foggy, and very little Wind all Night." And in the Paragraph immediately preceding, expreſſes himſelf in theſe Words, "I ſent to all the Ships that I could think were near me, to chuſe to the Weſtward all Night, telling them, I deſign'd to follow the Enemy to Breſt: And ſometimes we could ſee a French Ship, two or three, ſtanding away with all the ſail they could make to the Weſtward." And Mr. Burchet undertakes and alſo by Carter. who is kill'd.

A. D. 1692. takes to account for these Orders of his, by saying, That he, the Admiral, believ'd it more proper to chase than to anchor; and that it prov'd so, because he found himself the next Morning nearer the Enemy than those Ships which had drop'd their Anchors. The French, on the contrary, alledge, That the Commanders of those Ships committed a considerable Error in not continuing at anchor; for, according to them, had they so done, Mr. Tourville and his Squadron would have found it a very difficult Matter to escape; and, by passing through them, as they did, in their way to re-join the Body of the Fleet, every Ship receiv'd the Fires of two, and, as they presume, were terribly damag'd thereby: But if they were, those Damages have never been acknowledg'd on our Side; and all we have to lament under this Head, is the Death of Captain Hastings of the Sandwich, who was kill'd in driving thro' them in the Beginning of the Evening, not by choice, but because his Anchors were not clear, and he had no other Course to take.

This is the Sum of the first Day's Adventure: And whereas Bishop Kennet and other English Writers, assert, That the French lost four Ships in the Course of it, they have no better Authority for saying so, than these doubtful Expressions in Mr. Russel's first Dispatch to the Earl of Nottingham: "I saw, in the Night, three or four Ships blow up; but I know not what they are." In his subsequent Detail of the whole Affair, he says nothing of this Circumstance; nor does Mr. Burchet in his History: And neither would have omitted the fullest Confirmation of it, if it had been capable of any: Besides, the French are not only positive that they did not lose one, but, adopting this very Passage of Mr. Russel's, infer, That if three or four Ships were blown up, as he alledges, they were of his own Fleet, and not of theirs.

It is true, the same Commander, in his said Detail, farther suggests, that when he discover'd the French Fleet the next Morning, they made but thirty-four Sail; whereas it is certain they were forty-four at first; and even in their own Accounts, they are rated at no more than thirty-five: But then they account for the nine other, by saying, That Mr. Nesmond had retreated with six towards la Hogue, and Mr. Gabaret, with three more towards the Coast of England, in his way to Brest. The second Day produc'd nothing extraordinary; unless it should be thought so, that the two Fleets should continue in sight of each other all Day, without renewing the Engagement. They were first discover'd by the Dutch, which argu'd they were nearest to them. The Admiral had taken in his Signal for the Line, that every particular Ship might be at Liberty to make the best of her way. And when they became visible to him, they were not three Leagues asunder: The French say but one League: And, whereas, according to our Account, the Allies continu'd the Chace before the Wind (which was E. N. E. till between eleven and twelve o'Clock, and then shifted to the S. W.) with all the Sail they could spread; they alledge, That Tourville's Ship, having suffer'd much, could carry but little Sail; that the whole Fleet were forc'd to govern their Motions by that of their Flag; that in the Evening they came to anchor off of Cherbourgh, within half a League of the Allies; and that soon after Mr. de Tourville resolv'd to get out of the Soleil-Royal, which was the Pride of France, into the Ambitieux, and to make into the Race Blanchard, or the Race of Alderney; in hope by the Benefit of the Tide and the Violence of the Currents, not only to get safe thro', but to leave the Pursuers in Despair of overtaking them. A. D. 1692.

Part of the French escape through the Race of Alderney.

Both Fleets weighed again between ten and eleven, and ply'd to the Westward; the Wind continuing as before. About twelve the Admiral's Fore-topmast came by the board: By which means both the Dutch and Ashby, with a Part of the Blue, had got a great way to Windward of him: But, instead of following the French thro' the dangerous Race, before spoken of, they bore away for the Casquets: In Consequence of which, a great Part of the French Ships were four Leagues a-head of them by five o'Clock in the Morning: But the rest, among whom was Tourville himself, not being able to recover the Race before the Ebb was over, had no other Expedient left than to come to anchor; which fail'd also; for the Ground being bad, and the Current irresistible, their Anchors gave way, and they were driven up the Channel. And now it appear'd, that the Accident which had retarded Admiral Russel in the Chace, was of the most fortunate kind; unless it can be suppos'd, that the same Reasons which deterr'd the Dutch and the Blue from following the French through the Race, would not have had the same Weight with him; for by that means, he found himself in the only Situation proper to intercept the said Ships, thus separated from the rest, and reduc'd to such an Extremity, and of which he did not fail to make the proper Use: For no sooner did he perceive that they were driven so far to the Eastward that he could reach them, than he made a Signal to his Squadron to cut and give them chace. This was done, he tells us, between Eight and Nine o'Clock in the Morning; about eleven he saw three of them, all great Ships (which were so inclos'd with Enemies both to the Eastward and Westward, that they found it impossible to escape, and fruitless to resist) stand into the Shore in the Bay of Cherbourg, where one of them ran aground, and was presently oblig'd to cut away all her Masts; and, having directed Vice-Admiral Delaval, with a sufficient Force, to destroy them, he himself, with Rear-Admiral Shovel, and Vice-Admiral Rooke of the Blue, pursued the rest, which being to the Eastward of Cape Barfleur, hawl'd in for la Hogue. According to Mr. Russel's Account, these were at first eighteen; only, five of them found means to slip away in the Night to the Eastward: But, according to the French Accounts, they were but ten, which were join'd in the Road by two of Mr. Nesmond's Division, before spoken of, that had put in there before.

Delaval

A. D. 1692. Delaval burns three capital Ships at Cherbourgh.

Delaval found the three Ships firſt mention'd, not only drawn cloſe into Shore, but cover'd with certain Rocks, as alſo the Cannon of a neighbouring Fort; and judging it unſafe to attack them till he had inform'd himſelf of the Road, he reſolv'd to attend the Soundings in Perſon. Accordingly, having order'd all the great Ships to continue without, he hoiſted his Flag for the Encouragement of the Seamen, on board the St. Albans, and together with the Ruby, two Fire-ſhips, and his Boats, ſtood in, and continu'd ſounding, not only within Gun-ſhot of the Enemy, but ſo near, that their Fire gall'd them extremely, and at laſt oblig'd them to retire. He then caſt Anchor, and ſummon'd all the Captains of his Squadron on board him; among whom it was reſolv'd, to make the Attack the next Morning with all the Third, Fourth-Rates, and two Fire-ſhips: But the Attempt fail'd of Succeſs; for tho' the French Pilots had carry'd thoſe great Ships over the Shallows, ours could not follow them: As a laſt Expedient, therefore, the Admiral gave Orders to three Fire-ſhips to bear down upon them; and for his own Province, undertook with all his Boats and Tenders to cover the Enterprize, and take up the Men, in caſe they ſhould miſcarry. No Service could be more deſperate than this, and yet none was ever more bravely or chearfully perform'd: The Enemy ply'd all their Guns and all their ſmall Arms without Intermiſſion, and had alſo the utmoſt Aſſiſtance that the Fort could give them: Thro' all, the Fire-ſhips continu'd their Courſe; and not a Man on board either of them forſook his Poſt, till he had fulfill'd his Duty, tho' beſet with ſuch a Variety of Horrors. One of them, commanded by Captain Greenway, faſten'd on the Conquerant, a Ship of eighty-four Guns, and, in a Moment, ſurrounded her with Deſtruction. Captain Heath made the like Attempt on the Soleil-Royal; but was himſelf ſet on fire in his Approaches, by the Shot of that almoſt-inacceſſible Ship: But Captain Foulis, unterrify'd by that terrible Event, ruſh'd into the ſame Danger, and had not only the good Fortune to eſcape it, but the Glory to carry Vengeance along with him, and to be the Inſtrument of burning the proudeſt Pile that ever inſulted the Ocean. The Admirable, of ninety Guns, ſtill remain'd; but ſhe was aſhore; and conſequently not to be reduc'd by theſe Means: Such ſmall Ships, therefore, as could run up cloſe enough to reach her, were order'd to ply her with all their Guns; and at laſt, the Admiral himſelf boarded her with his Boats; and having clear'd her of her Hands, many of whom were wounded, ſet her alſo on fire: And having thus completed the Service, and ſent an Account of it to Lord Nottingham (in which he contends with uncommon Earneſtneſs, that the Bravery of the ſeveral Captains, &c. of the Fire-ſhips, might be ſuitably rewarded) proceeded to the Eaſtward to rejoin Mr. Ruſſel, together with Sir John Aſhby and the Dutch, who had given over the Chace, without obtaining a ſingle Trophy.

The Admiral, in the mean while, had come to anchor at la Hogue, where lay the reſt of the French Ships under Mr. de Tourville, and which, like thoſe at Cherbourgh, were haul'd ſo cloſe within Shore, that none of ours could come within reach of them. The firſt Day, nothing was attempted; but the next, Vice-Admiral Rooke, with ſeveral Men of War, Frigates and Fireſhips, together with all the Boats, were order'd to attack them. The Men of War had, however, no Share in the Service, for the Reaſon above mention'd; and as to the Frigates, they could only cover the Approaches of the Boats, which bore the brunt of all. The French Ships were divided, ſix lay on that Side next to Fort de Liſſet, and ſix behind the Fort de la Hogue: Platforms were rais'd on Shore, and planted with Cannon to protect them on one hand, and as many Chaloups as could be provided, were fill'd with Officers and Men to defend them on the other: And King James, Marſhal de Bellefonde, Mr. de Tourville, Mr. Bonrepos, and, in general, all the Troops, with which the Coaſts was cover'd, were Spectators of the Action; which, according to the uſual manner of the Seamen, ſhew'd more of Vivacity and Intrepidity, than Diſpoſition and Conduct: The neareſt way to the Enemy was the beſt; that Boats-Crew was happieſt that was foremoſt; the Air was rent with Shouts of Alacrity; no ſooner had they reach'd the Ships, than they attack'd them in Swarms; the Enemies Chaloups were routed at the firſt Onſet; and there was ſcarce an Interval between their riſing from below, and their appearing Maſters above; which was immediately proclam'd by their turning the Guns on the Platforms: And all Oppoſition being thus diſarm'd, they burnt the Ships at their Leiſure, and with another general Shout of Triumph and Exultation, return'd to the Fleet.

A. D. 1692. and Rooke twelve more at la Hogue.

The Diviſion of the Enemy under Fort de Liſſet were the firſt that ſuffer'd; and the Remainder, under Fort de la Hogue, were reſerv'd for the Buſineſs of the next Day; when the ſame enterpriſing Spirit was again exerted with the ſame Succeſs: Twelve capital Ships from eighty-four to ſixty Guns each, according to the Confeſſion of the French, or thirteen, according to Admiral Ruſſel's Account, were thus deſtroy'd to the very Keel, together with ſeveral Tranſports, and Store-ſhips, or, as the French ſay, certain Merchant-Veſſels that lay neareſt them.

It is alſo ſuggeſted, in a Letter from Admiral Allemonde, to the States, that ſome Thoughts were entertain'd by the Admiral, of ſending in his Boats a third time to deſtroy between two or three hundred Tranſports that lay in a Creek within Shore, under the Cover of ſeveral Batteries, and the Muſkets of the Army: But the French make no Mention of any ſuch Tranſport-Fleet; and it is certain that no ſuch Attempt was made.

Beſides, on the ſame Day that the ſecond Diviſion of French Ships was burn'd, a general Council of War was held on board the Admiral; in which it was reſolv'd to de-

A. D. 1692. tach Sir John Aſhby and the Dutch Vice-Admiral Callemberg, with twelve Engliſh and twelve Dutch Men of War, and three Fireſhips, to ſcour the Channel, for Ten Days, as far as Ushant: That another leſs conſiderable Squadron ſhould be ſent to the Eaſtward in queſt of the French Ships which had taken that Courſe; and that the reſt of the Fleet ſhould repair to St. Helens; which the next Day they did accordingly.

Admiral Ruſſel returns to St. Helens.

As to the cruizing Squadrons under Aſhby, &c. they had no better Luck than before; and no better could be reaſonably expected, conſidering the ſhort Time allotted them for that Service. Mr. Burchet, however, on the whole of his (Aſhby's) Behaviour and that of the Dutch, expreſſes himſelf as follows: "I cannot proceed without lamenting the Eſcape of thoſe which the Dutch and our Admiral of the Blue were left to look after: I ſhall not lay the want of Judgment, Diligence, or aught elſe, to any one's Charge; but ſince ſo fair an Opportunity offer'd itſelf for deſtroying the moſt conſiderable Part of the French King's Navy, ſuch ill Succeſs in that Affair, was the greateſt Misfortune to us; for had a happy Puſh been made, the Maritime Power of France could not, in this Age, whatever it might in the next, have given England any great Diſturbance." This has all the Air of a ſtiff'ed Reproach. But another Writer of Naval Hiſtory, after ſuggeſting, that Aſhby had been cenſur'd for not making this happy Puſh, more candidly, endeavours to extenuate the Charge brought againſt him, by urging the Opinion of his Pilots, who were pleas'd to think the Example of the French, in paſſing thro' the Race of Alderney, too raſh to be follow'd, and by giving it as his own, That tho' Deſpair might juſtify them, as he was not in the like Extremity, he was not to incur the like Danger.

Burchet's Remark on the Behaviour of Aſhby and the Dutch.

[Lives of the Admirals.]

Even Mr. Ruſſel himſelf, with all the Merit and Glory of his Victory, did not wholly eſcape the Rancour of the Times. "It was believ'd, ſays Mr. Burnet, that if this Succeſs had been purſu'd with Vigour, conſidering the Conſternation with which the French were ſtruck, upon ſuch an unuſual and ſurprizing Blow, that this Victory might have been carry'd much farther than it was; but Ruſſel was provok'd by ſome Letters and Orders that the Earl of Nottingham ſent him from the Queen, which he thought were the Effects of Ignorance; and upon that he fell into a Croſſneſs of Diſpoſition; he found fault with every Order that was ſent him, but would offer no Advices on his Part; and he came ſoon after to St. Helens, which was much cenſur'd; for tho' the diſabled Ships muſt have been ſent in, yet there was no ſuch Reaſon for bringing in the reſt that were not touch'd." But the Biſhop ſtumbles at the very Threſhold, in taking it for granted, as by eſpouſing the Belief of others, he manifeſtly does, that the Admiral return'd with the whole Fleet; whereas, the contrary has been demonſtrated above. In ſending two ſufficient Squadrons to ſcour the Channel both to the Eaſtward and Weſtward, it muſt be acknowledg'd, that he made all the Uſe of his Ships that could be requir'd of him, ſeeing it was impoſſible to burn the French Tranſports, as is aſſerted by the Dutch Admiral, Allemonde; and in returning home, as he did, he not only had the good Fortune to eſcape the ill Weather that ſet in immediately afterwards, but actually put it into the Power of the Cabinet to make that very Uſe of the Victory which his Lordſhip contends for. He knew the Project of a Deſcent on the Coaſts of France had been long entertain'd; he knew, that by the Addition of the three Regiments from Flanders under Talmaſh, and thoſe from Ireland, her Majeſty was in a better Condition than ever to proſecute it; as alſo the Nation had nothing, in the mean while, to apprehend from the Enterprizes of France; and his great End in coming home, was to co-operate in it. "The Court of France, ſays Mr. Burchet, being now in no little Conſternation, the Admiral thought it the moſt proper time for making the intended Deſcent on their Coaſt; for although not only King James himſelf, but the French alſo, had great Numbers of Men encamp'd at la Hogue and the adjacent Places, yet the little or no Interruption they gave us in deſtroying their Ships, would incline any one to believe, that a Body of regular Troops might have made a very conſiderable Progreſs into their Country." But not to lay too great Streſs on the whole of this Paſſage, the Admiral's Zeal for the Service, is yet further demonſtrated by what follows, which, in Subſtance, is deriv'd from the ſame Author.

and Burnet's cenſure of Ruſſel.

who repairs to St. Helens.

A. D. 1692.

He had not been long at St. Helens before he receiv'd Advice, by the Maſter of a French Snow, which had been ſent out for Intelligence, and which fell into the Hands of an Engliſh Privateer, that the French Vice-Admiral of the Blue, with twenty-five or twenty-ſix Sail of Men of War, including Frigates and Fireſhips, lay at St. Maloes, and waited only for an Opportunity to ſail away for Breſt, which was alſo confirm'd by Captain Mees, whom the Admiral had ſent on purpoſe to look into that Port, with four Engliſh and four Dutch Frigates, with theſe farther Particulars, That eighteen of them lay in a Range in the Road: That the other eight lay within them, nearer the Town: That the Marſhal de Bellefonde lay ſtill upon the Coaſt with his Army; but that all the Tranſports were diſpers'd. Hereupon, the Admiral finding the Project for a Deſcent was ſtill an Embrio, ſet Sail from St. Helens on the twenty-fourth of June, with ſuch Ships as were in the beſt Condition, and ordered Sir Cloudeſly Shovel to follow him as ſoon as poſſible with the reſt; his Deſign being to keep to the Weſtward of St. Maloes, in order to intercept thoſe Ships, if poſſible, in their way to the Ocean; or when he came to a proper Place, to adviſe with the Flag-Officers on the Practicability of attacking them where they lay: But, on the 21ſt following, he receiv'd an Expreſs from Court, ſignifying, that all the Tranſport-ſhips were order'd to Portſmouth, where it was intended but ſets ſail again in a few Days.

and is recall'd to aſſiſt in a Deſcent:

A. D. 1692. our Forces ſhould embark; and that her Majeſty would not give any Directions for the Diſpoſal of them, till ſhe had firſt receiv'd the joint Opinion of the commanding Officers to be employ'd in it both by Sea and Land. The Admiral had, by this time, put into Torbay, where he held a Council of War upon this new Diſpatch, and the Means of obeying the Queen, by repairing to Portſmouth, and alſo of holding the French in Cheque at St. Maloes: And, upon the Iſſue, it was reſolv'd, That a conſiderable Part of the Fleet ſhould be appointed to lye about fifteen or twenty Leagues North from the Iſle of Baſs, to intercept the French Ships; and that the Reſidue ſhould forthwith proceed to Spithead to join the Tranſports; under this Proviſo, that if the Wind happen'd to hang Weſterly, the whole Fleet ſhould repair to Spithead, or if Eaſterly, continue at Torbay, in order to be join'd by the Tranſports there.

Agreeable to this Concert, the Fleet again put to Sea, but met with ſuch rough Weather, as drove them twenty Leagues Weſt off Uſhant, and did great Damage to their Maſts and Rigging. By the third of July, however, they made a ſhift to recover the Road of Guernſey, but durſt not proceed to St. Maloes (which the Court, notwithſtanding their late Orders, it ſeems, with great Impatience expected) becauſe the Weather being thick, the Pilots, conſcious of their own Ignorance, would not venture upon the Coaſt; and becauſe two Maſters of Ships who had long uſed that Trade, aſſur'd the Admiral, that there was not good Ground for more than forty Ships to ride. This made it adviſeable to call another Council of War; at which it was reſolv'd, "That Part of the Fleet ſhould proceed to St. Maloes, to inform themſelves, whether the whole or what Number of Ships might ride there?" The Part ſo detach'd was put under the Command of Vice-Admiral Rooke and Vice-Admiral Callemberg; for the Dutch and the other Part were again forc'd by bad Weather into Torbay.

Sends a Detachment under Rooke to St. Maloes.

And now it may be conjectur'd the Admiral fell into that Croſſneſs of Diſpoſition, complain'd of by Dr. Burnet. He was ſtill for lying in wait for the French in Camaret Bay, at the Entrance of Breſt; or if an Attempt was to be made upon them at St. Maloes, he was for having the Aſſiſtance of the Land-Forces; which were ſo far from being in Readineſs to embark in May, as had been agreed in the Winter, that the Tranſports did not arrive at Portſmouth from London, till many Days in July were advanc'd: He was, beſides, in pain for Rooke and his Detachment, who was expos'd to much Danger on ſo unfriendly a Coaſt in the late Storms: He thought nothing could equal the Abſurdity of providing a Fleet and an Army without determining the Service they were to be employ'd in, but the Meanneſs of putting the Difficulty on the Commanding-Officers of employing them properly. He foreſaw the Inconveniencies that were likely to ariſe from Difference of Opinion; and he apprehended that the Fears of the Enemy had put them upon taking ſuch Precautions for their Defence, that our whole Force would not be able to make that Impreſſion now, as half of it would have done a Month ago. A. D. 1692.

In this Perplexity, the only Conſolation he receiv'd, was the ſafe Return of Rooke; who rejoin'd him in Torbay on the 13th; and, together with the ſeveral Soundings which he had made, gave in the following Report, viz. 1. The Ground is flat and even from Guernſey to Cape Frehelle, ſhoaling a Fathom or two every two or three Miles, all the way over to the Cape: And it is alſo generally very rough, and in ſome Places rocky, eſpecially near Seſembre. 2. The Tides run very quick in the Offing on the Coaſt of St. Maloes; but to the Eaſtward of Cape Frehelle, within three or four Miles of the Shore, not above two and a half or three Knots at Spring Tides. 3. There are ſome ſandy Bays between Cape Frehelle and St. Maloes, but not very commodious for putting Men on Shore, becauſe the Land riſes in moſt Places quick from the Strand: Beſides, the River of Dinant, or the Rance, muſt be paſs'd, before they can come to St. Maloes. 4. There are about thirty-five or thirty-ſix Sail of Ships rigg'd, of which twelve lay in the Rance; and of them four or five great Ships, the reſt being up at Saladore. 5. Not one of the Pilots would undertake to carry in any Ship of War or Fireſhip, to make any Attempt on the French Ships at St. Maloes, tho' I offer'd an hundred Pounds Encouragement to each Man." This was ſign'd with Rooke's own Hand: And, hereupon, all Thoughts of forcing St. Maloes, ſeem to have been given over, and one would almoſt think of joining the Tranſports too: For, at a Council of War, which was held the ſame Day, it was agreed to ſtation Captain Nevil with thirty Engliſh and Dutch Ships, on the old Principle, of intercepting the Enemy, in caſe they made to the Weſtward, and to beſet the Coaſt with Frigates, which were to ſerve as Scouts both to Captain Nevil's Detachment, and the Body of the Fleet under the Admiral, who choſe to lye at ſome other commodious Station, or to cruiſe to and fro as Wind and Weather ſhould permit. Accordingly, on the 15th they ſet ſail; but no Intelligence arriving either from Nevil or the Frigates; it being alſo generally believ'd, that the Enemy would not quit their Place of Refuge till towards Winter, when, it was reaſonable to think, our great Ships would be laid up; the Wind moreover proving Weſterly, the Weather foggy, and the Admiral fearing he ſhould drive to the Eaſtward of Torbay, he return'd on the 19th to that Harbour, and victualed his Ships, with an Intention, as we are told, to get under ſail again as ſoon as poſſible, in order to relieve the Squadron on the French Coaſt, which was already in want both of Proviſions and Water. But while he was thus employ'd, he receiv'd Advice, that the Land-Forces were embark'd, and poſitive Orders from the Queen, to co-operate with them in the Deſcent.

Rooke's Report.

A. D. 1692. cent. This occasion'd the holding another Council of War, which ended in the Renewal of a former Resolution; namely, to proceed to Spithead, if the Wind continu'd Westerly, and to remain at Torbay if it veer'd about to the East, and the dispatching an Express to the Duke of Leinster (Son of Duke Schomberg, who had the Command in Chief) to make his Grace acquainted with it.

The Men of War and Transport-Fleet join.

This was the Business of the 25th; on the 26th the Transport-Fleet, and Squadron of Men of War appointed to be their Convoy, set sail from St. Helens; and, on the 28th following, the whole Fleet being join'd, a general Council of both Sea and Land-Officers, was held on board the Breda, which was the General's Ship; whether in Compliment to his Rank or his Commissions, is not determin'd; nor does it appear, that the Admiral (piqued, as he undoubtedly was, to see the Chief Command bestow'd on a Foreigner, which was due to his Friend Lord Marlborough, at that time not only in Disgrace, but under Confinement) rais'd any Dispute about the Precedency, or made any Scruple to sacrifice his own peculiar Claims to the Furtherance of the public Service.

The Persons which compos'd this Council, were the Admirals Russel, Delaval, Rooke, and Captain Mitchell (English;) the Admirals Allemonde, Callemberg, (x) Vandergoes, Evertsen and Muys (Dutch;) the Duke of Leinster, the Earl of Galway, Mr. de la Melloniere, and Mr. du Cambon (French Refugees;) the Earl of Argyle and Sir David Collier (Scots;) and Sir Henry Bellasise, and Colonel Beveridge, Colonel Selwin (English.)

The Point of Debate was, the Destination of the Force under their Command; and of what Nature that Debate was, may be collected best from the Paper, which they all sign'd upon the Issue of it, and which was conceiv'd as follows:

The Opinion of the Sea and Land-Officers at a joint Council of War.

"The Matter of burning the Ships at St. Maloes being maturely consider'd, Vice-Admiral Rooke and Vice-Admiral Callemberg (who were lately sent with a Squadron of Ships before that Port) representing the great Difficulty of carrying the Ships in there, by reason of the Multitude of Rocks, and the Rapidity of the Tides, and the Pilots refusing to conduct any Frigates or Fireships into the Harbour, because the Marks might be remov'd, it was the Opinion of the Flag-Officers, That it was not practicable to attempt any thing against the Enemy's Ships at St. Maloes, with any Part of the Fleet, until the Town itself should be so far reduc'd by the Land-Forces, as that the Ships might not receive any great Annoyance from the Enemy's Guns in the Attempt: And the General and Field-Officers were of Opinion, that the Troops could not do any Service at that Place without the Assistance of the Fleet.

It was then consider'd, whether it was feasible to make any Attempt on the Enemy's Ships at Brest? and, altho' the Flag-Officers were of Opinion, that an Attempt might be made there with some Hopes of Success, if the Summer had not been so far spent; yet, considering the Winter was approaching, they did not think it proper to attack the Enemy's Ships in that Port, since the Fleet might be expos'd to very great Inconveniencies, should they be wind-bound near that Place. And it was the Opinion of the General and Field-Officers of the Army, that they should not be able to do any Service there against the Enemy, unless they could be protected by the Fleet. The Flag-Officers likewise thought it not safe for the Fleet to attempt any thing against the Enemy at Rochfort, the Season of the Year being so far spent, and the Place itself being so deep in the Bay. A. D. 1692.

The separate Opinion of the Flag-Officers.

It was in the next Place consider'd, whether the Fleet might lie with Safety on the Coast of Normandy to protect the Army, either at Havre de Grace, la Hogue, or any Place thereabouts: And the Flag-Officers judg'd it might lie with Safety on that Coast until the latter End of the next Month, in case their Majesties Service should require it."

The Flag-Officers also came to the following separate Resolution (which being apparently calculated to reflect the Blame and Odium of all Disappointments on the Cabinet, seems to argue, that they were more at the Devotion of Mr. Russel than Lord Nottingham, notwithstanding the Insinuation dropt by Dr. Burnet to the contrary) "That since the Transport-Ships and Land-Forces were come to the Fleet, in order to try what might be done against the Enemy, either at St. Maloes, Brest, or Rochfort, it was their Opinion, that something might have been attempted, with Probability of Success, were not the Season of the Year so far spent, as not to admit of the Fleet's going with Safety thither."

Thus it appears, that as the Ministers endeavour'd to make the Sea and Land-Officers, who had the Command in this Expedition, answerable for the Success of it, so they reciprocally endeavour'd to saddle the Burthen upon one another: And under this universal Defect of Wisdom, Courage, and public Spirit, both the Interest and Glory of the Commonwealth was sacrific'd: For, how cautious soever Mr. Burchet has been, in communicating the Lights he had before him in relation to this Subject, it is apparent, that, after the Commanders on both Sides had come to these Explanations, they sought only to amuse the Nation, and skreen themselves from the Reproach, which all, in their several Capacities, were liable to.

Ashby, who, for what Reason has not been explan'd, did not assist at the joint Council of War, was order'd to stretch over to the Coast of France, with one First Rate, six Seconds, seventeen Thirds, one Fourth, and four Fireships, together with several Dutch Ships, to relieve Captain Neville, and take the proper Measures for the same Service: And it was agreed

A. D. 1692. agreed that the reſt of the Fleet ſhould proceed towards la Hogue or thereabouts: But in their Paſſage from Torbay, Mr. Ruſſel receiv'd Orders from the Queen; which we are to ſuppoſe were of Revocation; for we are told by our Naval (y) Hiſtorian, above quoted, "That hereupon he came with the Tranſport-Ships to St. Helens." And all he thinks proper to add concerning this wild Affair is contain'd in the following Words: "And there lay a conſiderable time wind-bound; inſomuch, that the Winter-Seaſon being very far advanc'd, the great Ships were order'd to Chatham, the Land-Forces put on Shore, and the Fleet divided into Squadrons, according as it was judg'd moſt for the Advantage of the Service."

But this is ſo far from being the whole Truth, that Part of it does not ſquare with the Truth at all: For, not to inſiſt on what is affirm'd by other Authors, viz. That on the laſt of July, O. S. or ninth of Auguſt N. S. a Council of War was held, at which it was reſolv'd to return for England, it is certain, that, except two Regiments, the Forces (z) were NOT put on ſhore: That the Lords of the Cabinet, namely, the Lord-Steward Devonſhire, the Lord-Chamberlain Dorſet, and the Lords Nottingham, Rocheſter, Sydney, and Cornwallis, poſted down to Portſmouth, as ſoon as their Return was known at Court: That a new Concert was fram'd: That, in Purſuance thereof, the Tranſport-Fleet ſet ſail again, as ſoon as the Wind gave leave, under the Convoy of a Squadron of Men of War, commanded by Sir Cloudeſly Shovel: That they arriv'd in the Downs on the eighth of Auguſt: That on the 19th following, the Duke of Leinſter having receiv'd Orders to ſail on the 19th, did actually ſail the next Day; and that they arriv'd at Oſtend on the 22d, with what Deſign will be unfolded in the Sequel.

They return to St. Helens, and at laſt ſet out for Flanders.

It remains, in the mean while, to be told, to the Honour of the Queen, that when the Fleet came firſt to St. Helens after the Engagement, ſhe order'd 30,000 l. to be diſtributed among the Seamen, in Acknowledgment of their gallant Behaviour: That ſhe beſtow'd Medals of Gold upon the Officers; and that ſhe caus'd the Bodies of Admiral Carter and Captain Haſtings to be interr'd at the Expence of the Crown, with all the Honours that could influence the Living to behave as well: And that, on the other hand, when the Tranſports for the Victory were over, and the Expectations which had been rais'd of a Deſcent upon France, were thoroughly damp'd by ſo unexpected a Diſappointment, as alſo, that the French, who had loſt but few Men in the late Action, inſtead of expoſing themſelves to a ſecond Blow, let looſe their Privateers on all Sides to make Reprizals upon our Commerce, Thoſe who were hurt, grew louder in their Clamours than ever; which were aggravated in the Report by the Diſaffected, and, at laſt, echo'd all over the Nation; inſomuch, that under the Senſe of their daily Loſſes, they ſeem'd to have loſt all Remembrance of their late Deliverance. "The common Reflection that was made on our Conduct, ſays the Hiſtorian of his own Times, was, That the Providence of God, and the Valour of our Men, had given us a Victory, of which we knew not what Uſe we ſhould make." And again: "By an odd Reverſe of things, as we made no conſiderable Loſſes while the French were Maſters of our Seas two Years before, ſo now, when we triumph'd, our Merchants ſuffer'd the moſt. The Concluſion of all was, Ruſſel complain'd of the Miniſtry, and they complain'd no leſs of him; and the Merchants complain'd of the Admiralty; but they, in their own Defence, ſaid, That we had not Ships nor Seamen both to furniſh out a great Fleet, and, at the ſame time, to ſend out Convoys for ſecuring the Trade."

A. D. 1692.

To cloſe on this Head, as ſoon as it appear'd, that the French had nothing farther to apprehend with regard to their Coaſts, their ſeveral Camps in Normandy were broke up, and King James in a Fit (a) Deſpair return'd to St. Germains; where his Queen had, in this (y) The Paſſage ſtands together thus, "In fine, altho' upon the Admiral his parting with Sir John Aſhby, it was agreed at a Council of War, That the reſt of the Fleet ſhould proceed to the French Coaſt off of la Hogue and thereabouts; yet in his Paſſage from Torbay, he receiv'd Orders from the Queen; whereupon, he, with the Tranſport-ſhips came to St. Helens, &c." Now, the Author of the Lives of the Admirals, treating of this Circumſtance, uſes theſe Words, "Secretary Burchet ſays poſitively, That in his Paſſage he receiv'd Orders from the Queen to return." But ſurely there is nothing poſitive in what the Secretary ſays on this Head; and that there is not, ſeems to argue, that ſome ſecret Bias's induc'd him not to be ſo.

(z) In the Lives of the Admirals it is ſaid, That the Lords found all the Troops, except two Regiments, on Shore. But the Words of the Author of the Memoirs of Europe for the Month of Auguſt, are theſe: "In the mean while, the Troops, ſaving two Regiments, were NOT put on Shore."

(a) A Letter, in his Name, of the moſt abject kind, to King Lewis on the Affair of la Hogue, is inſerted in the State of Europe, and the Memoirs of Europe: In the Former with this Introduction,—— "There are many People who will have it to be a fictitious Letter; but I know not upon what Grounds they hold this Belief: However it be, we receiv'd it from Paris for Truth; and with this Circumſtance, That it was ſent by the Lord Melfort, and thought proper to be made public." And in the Latter with this, "There has gone about this Country (France) a pretended Letter from King James to the French King upon the Defeat of the French Fleet. I muſt confeſs to you, that I was, at firſt, ſo prepoſſeſs'd againſt that Piece, that I did not ſo much as caſt my Eyes upon it. I could not imagine it to be other than a mere Forgery, much like to ſo many others of that nature as are daily vended. But I was much ſurpriz'd to find a Copy of it in a Packet I receiv'd from Paris, together with a ſmall Adverriſement, wherein I am told, that there is nothing more true than this Letter. I muſt own to you that this has ſuſpended my Judgment, whereas, that before, I thought it altogether falſe, nay, and compos'd eſtroberre." But tho' neither of theſe Writers have the Courage to inſiſt on its being genuine, Kennet, Boyer, Oldmixon, Tindal, and, in general, all our profeſs'd Hiſtorians, except Burnet, ſwallow'd it whole: But, without requiring our Readers to do the ſame, the Tranſlation of it is here inſerted, viz.

"MONSIEUR, My Brother,

"I have hitherto with ſomething of Conſtancy and Reſolution ſupported the Weight of all the Misfortunes, which it hath pleas'd Heaven to lay upon me, ſo long as myſelf was the only Sufferer: But I muſt acknowledge this laſt Diſaſter utterly overwhelms me; and I am altogether comfortleſs, in reference to what concerns your Majeſty through the great Loſs that has befallen your Fleets. I know too well, that unfortunate Star it is, that has drawn down this Misfortune upon your Forces, always victorious, but when they fought for my Intereſt. And this is that which plainly tells me, that I no longer merit the Support of ſo great a Monarch, and who is always ſure to vanquiſh when he fights for himſelf: For which Reaſon it is that I requeſt your Majeſty no longer

A. D. 1692. this Interval, brought him a Daughter; who was born in the Preſence of the Archbiſhop of Paris (who chriſten'd the Infant the ſame Day) the Keeper of the Seals, &c. but not of the Princeſſes appointed by the moſt Chriſtian King to be preſent, becauſe the Birth was ſo quick and ſudden, that they could not come time enough to do Credit to the Fact by their Teſtimony.

It is now incumbent on us to reſume the great Buſineſs of the Continent, which, notwithſtanding the Menaces of France, and the Apprehenſions which prevail'd at home, continu'd alſo to be the great Buſineſs of his Majeſty.

On the very Day that King Lewis ſet out for Flanders, King William left the Hague; but tho' the Latter was nearer the Scene of Action, the Former made his Entrance firſt: It had hitherto been ſuppos'd, that the enterprizing Spirit of the French Court had expir'd with Mr. Louvois; and it ſcarce enter'd into any body's Imagination, that now, when his Britannic Majeſty was ſurrounded with his own victorious Troops from Ireland, and was aſſiſted both in the Cabinet and the Field with the Abilities, Power, and Credit of ſo great a Prince as the Elector of Bavaria, France would act offenſively on that Side, or that the great Buſineſs of the Confederates would be only to check the Progreſs of their Succeſſes, inſtead of attempting to wreſt their former Acquiſitions out of their Hands: Yet ſo it was: The Mantle of Louvois had fallen upon ſome other State-Prophet; and no ſooner was his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty arriv'd at his Army, which he found already at their Rendezvouz, in excellent Order, and furniſh'd with all things neceſſary for great Exploits, than ſuch Motions were made as open'd the Eyes of all Europe, and effectually convinc'd them, not only that the Genius of France was ſtill as active and vigorous as ever, but that even her Power had been meaſur'd by a very partial Standard.

On the 20th of May, N. S. King Lewis arrived in his Camp; and having review'd his Army, put the whole in Motion on the 23d following: The Confederates were immediately in pain for Charleroy: It appear'd to them, that the Storm was directed that way: But all at once it took another Turn: A Body of nine thouſand Horſe paſs'd the Sambre, and inveſted Namur on one Side, while Mr. de Boufflers, with the flying Army under his Command, did the ſame on the other. The King himſelf, aſſiſted by Mr. de Vauban, his great Engineer, with about forty-five thouſand Men, undertook to proſecute the Siege: And Mr. Luxemburgh, with upwards of ſixty thouſand more, had the Honour to cover it. It muſt be own'd, the Enterprize was worthy of ſo great a Prince and ſo great a General: The Place is one of the moſt conſiderable in Flanders: It is ſituated, as every body knows, between two Hills, at the Conflux of the Meuſe and the Sambre: The Citadel was deem'd one of the ſtrongeſt in the Netherlands; yet was cover'd with a new Work, which had been rais'd by Mr. Coehorn at the Inſtance of King William: And this new Work, Mr. Coehorn himſelf was now employ'd to defend: The Prince de Barbaſon was Governor, with a Garriſon of between nine and ten thouſand Men, furniſh'd with all the Requiſites for a long and obſtinate Defence: And what was of more Conſequence than all, it was expected, that King William, for the ſake of his own Glory, as well as the common Intereſt, would make all the Efforts in his Power to collect the whole Force of the Allies, and even run the Riſque of bringing the Enemy to a Battle, in order to raiſe the Siege. A. D. 1692.

Namur inveſted.

The French, however, reſolv'd to encounter all theſe Obſtacles, and to ſurmount them if poſſible: They open'd their Trenches on the 29th at Night: Mr. de Boufflers made himſelf Maſter of one of the Suburbs the next Day: In two Days more they carry'd the Counterſcarp by Aſſault; and having made three other terrible Attacks at the Gate of St. Nicholas, which was the weakeſt Part (in the laſt whereof the grand Magazine of the Town took fire and blew up) the Beſieged found themſelves under a Neceſſity to capitulate; which they did on the fifth of July, N. S. under the following Conditions: That the Burghers ſhould be maintain'd in their Privileges: That the Burgomaſters ſhould not be chang'd: That the Garriſon ſhould be allow'd forty Hours to retire into the Caſtle; during all which time there ſhould be a Ceſſation of Arms; and that in the Proſecution of the Siege of the Caſtle, there ſhould be no Firing on the Town from the Caſtle, nor on the Caſtle from the Town. The Town ca-pitulates.

King William was ſtill on his March between Meldart and Ville towards the Mehaigne, when he receiv'd Advice of this Event: And having been join'd, about the ſame time, by the Troops of Brandenburg and Liege, conſiſting, as we are told, of fifty Squadrons, and twenty Battalions, under the Counts Fleming and Serclaes de Tilly, which render'd his Army almoſt an hundred thouſand ſtrong, came in ſight of Mr. de Luxemburgh's Lines immediately afterwards, and encamp'd within Cannon-ſhot; nothing dividing the two Armies but the little River Mehaigne, King William marches towards the Enemy.

to concern yourſelf for a Prince ſo unfortunate as my ſelf; but permit me to retire with my Family to ſome Corner of the World, where I may ceaſe to obſtruct the uſual Courſe of your Proſperities and Conqueſts, which only my Misfortune could interrupt. It is not juſt, that the potenteſt Monarch in the World, and the moſt flouriſhing above all others, ſhould ſhare in my Diſgrace, becauſe you are too generous: 'Tis better much, that I ſhall only retire till it pleaſe Omnipotent Providence to be more propitious to my Affairs. But howſoever it pleaſes over-ruling Heaven to diſpoſe of me and mine, or into whatever Recels I may be thrown, I can aſſure your Majeſty, that I ſhall always preſerve, to the laſt Gaſp of my expiring Breath, that due Acknowledgment which I ſtill retain of your Favours and conſtant Friendſhip. Nor can any thing more contribute to my Conſolation, than to hear, as I hope to do, when I have wholly quitted your Dominions, of the quick Return of all your wonted Triumphs both by Sea and Land, over your Enemies and mine, with my Intereſt ſhall be no longer intermix'd with yours.

JAMES REX.

A. D. 1692. baigne, and about as much Ground of each Side, as would ſerve for the reſpective Diſpoſitions of the two Generals, to attack and defend the Paſſage.

All Europe was ſoon appriz'd of this near Neighbourhood of theſe formidable Enemies, and with every new Diſpatch expected to hear of a deciſive Battle: Our own Gazettes, and thoſe of Holland, were, in particular, fill'd with ſuch Articles as ſerv'd to heighten this Expectation. It was ſaid, The Allies had taken Poſſeſſion of all the Poſts on the River, without Oppoſition: That when the Cannonading betwixt the two Armies began, ſome of our Guns had not only diſmounted theirs, but thrown certain Squadrons of their Horſe into Diſorder: That Marſhal Luxemburgh had contracted his Lines, to prevent the Deſertion of his Troops: That Orders were given for laying Bridges over the River: That theſe Bridges were finiſh'd: That nothing was wanting but the laſt Orders to march and attack the Enemy: That by our lying ſo near the Enemy, we had given them ſo great a Diverſion, that they had been oblig'd to demand a Re-inforcement of fifteen thouſand Men: That the Coeborn, as the new Fort was ſometimes call'd, held out to Admiration, &c.

But while the Confederates were kept in Humour from time to time, with theſe and the like Amuſements, the French preſs'd the Coeborn in earneſt, not only by all the Methods and Expedients that ſuch a Maſter-Genius as Mr. Vauban could put in Practice, but with all the Vigour and Intrepidity that the Preſence of their Great Monarch could inſpire. There lay between them and the Coeborn, a ſort of Spur-Work of Paliſſadoes, call'd the Devil's Houſe, which was cover'd, both on the Side of the Sambre and the Meuſe, with ſtrong Outworks, and garriſon'd with three hundred Spaniſh Veterans. This they attack'd with all their Grenadiers, ſupported on the Right with the King's Muſketeers, and on the Left with the Horſe Grenadiers: And after an obſtinate Diſpute, in which they were ſeveral times repuls'd with great Slaughter, carry'd it Sword in Hand. The Coeborn was now open to their Approaches; and on the 13th their Batteries began to play upon it with great Fury; and ſo continu'd to do till the 19th, when Mr. Coeborn made a Sally at the Head of about three or four hundred Men, drove the Beſiegers from their Poſts, and deſtroy'd many of their Works. But this little Succeſs coſt more than it was worth; a Battalion of Swiſs oblig'd Mr. Coeborn and his Party to retire with Loſs; the Miſchief they had done was ſoon repair'd; and on the 22d following, fifteen Companies of Grenadiers, ſupported by ſeven Battalions from the Trenches, under the Command of the Duke of Bourbon, Lieutenant-General for the Day, attack'd the Cover'd-way on both Sides of the Fort, with ſo much Reſolution, that, after a bloody Conteſt, which laſted an Hour, and in which Mr. Coeborn himſelf was dangerouſly wounded, they not only made themſelves Maſters of it, but drove the Defendants into the Fort, in ſo much Diſmay and Conſternation, that A. D. 1692. they beat the Chamade, according to ſome Accounts, in two Places at once, and the ſame Day capitulated. Fort Coeborn ſurrender'd.

All that now remain'd to be done, was to reduce the Citadel; which was immediately undertaken with as much Spirit, as if it had been the firſt, or was to be the laſt of their Labours: Till the 27th at Midnight, their Cannons and Bombs roar'd without Intermiſſion; and then it was thought adviſeable to attack the Cover'd-ways and Counterſcarp of the great Hornwork: Thirteen Companies of Grenadiers, ſupported by four Battalions of Foot, were appointed for this Service; and began their March under the Diſcharge of twenty-ſeven Bombs into the firſt Cover'd-way, which made ſuch Havock, that they found it, upon their Approach, in a manner abandon'd: And all the Interruption they met with, was from two Fougades or Well-mines, which were fir'd under them, and blew up ſeveral. They proceeded, however, to the next Cover'd-way, and after receiving one Diſcharge from the Defendants, drove them to the Counterſcarp; where they not only made a deſperate Stand, but were vigorouſly ſupported by a large Body of the Garriſon poſted in the Breach, who, for ſome time, held the French at Bay with the Impetuoſity of their Fire; but that, by Degrees, abating, and the Aſſailants being perpetually re-inforc'd, they at laſt carry'd their Point, and made a Lodgment. All the 28th and 29th were ſpent on the Side of the Beſieged, in vain Efforts to diſlodge the Enemy: And at Night ſo profound was their Negligence, that they ſuffer'd the French Engineers not only to take a new Poſt about half the Heighth of the great Breach, but to ſurprize the whole Baſtion before they were diſcover'd; which had ſuch an Effect either on the Garriſon or the Governor, or Both, that before five o'Clock they beat a Parley; and before Night the Capitulation was ſettled; in virtue of which, the Governor and Garriſon evacuated the Place the next Day; and Mr. de Guiſcard took Poſſeſſion of it for his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty; who, as if his Glory was now at the full, immediately after return'd in Triumph to Verſailles; having firſt prepar'd his way by the exulting Letter that follows, to the Archbiſhop of Paris, appointing him to celebrate a ſolemn Te Deum on this great Occaſion, for the Entertainment of the good People of his Capital, in the Cathedral Church of that City: and alſo the Citadel. King Lewis returns in triumph to Verſailles:

" My Couſin,

" My Enemies had perſuaded themſelves, that having aſſembled all their Forces in the Low-Countries, they ſhould ſtop the Current of my Conqueſts; neverthleſs I fail'd not to undertake, in Perſon, the Siege of the City and Caſtle of Namur; the taking of which they thought impoſſible. They repair'd thither to the Number of an hundred thouſand Men, to force me to raiſe the Siege, but reſted contented with being the Spectators of it for three Weeks, and with aſſiſting at the Reduction of the Place, which I wholly ſubdued on the thirtieth of the laſt Month, after His Letter to the Archbiſhop of Paris.

A. D. 1692. ter the Trenches being open'd thirty Days. If any thing flatters me in so important a Conqueſt, it is much leſs the Glory that attends it, or the Encreaſe of my Territories, than the Hopes it gives me, that my Enemies, growing weary of their Loſſes, will at length ſubſcribe to the Offers I have for a long time made them of ending the War. It is alſo theſe Hopes that particularly oblige me to redouble to Heaven my Thankſgivings, and to proteſt at the ſame time before him that knows the Sentiments of my Heart, that I have no Deſire more ardent than the putting all my Subjects into a State of glorifying him in Peace. I write to you to this Purpoſe, to let you know that my Intention is, that you cauſe Te Deum to be ſung in the Cathedral-Church of my good City of Paris, &c."

How far the Gall of this Letter embitter'd King William's Repoſe, or whether he was as inſenſible of Deriſion as Dr. Burnet repreſents him of Applauſe, we are not authoriz'd by ſufficient Information to ſpecify; and whether he at all deſerv'd theſe Inſults, the World neither is, nor, perhaps, ever will be, agreed. His Enemies, on one hand, are pleas'd to ſay, in Arraignment of his Conduct, That tho' the Enemy were undoubtedly ſuperior to him in point of Numbers, they had abundantly more Employment for thoſe Numbers; and, conſequently, no Argument could be drawn from that Diſparity in his Favour: That the Army which carried on the Siege were oblig'd to occupy a mighty Compaſs of Ground, their inmoſt Lines, as uſual, being without Cannon-ſhot: That it was broke into many Parts, the Maes and the Sambre running through, and dividing their Camp: That they had no Circumvallation, and had only thrown up ſome ſlight Works, where their Quarters were moſt expos'd: That the Allies, being in Poſſeſſion of Huy upon the Maeſe, and Charleroy upon the Sambre, it was in their Power to have made an Attempt, at leaſt, to interrupt the Progreſs of the Siege: That they loſt as many, or more, by Sickneſs in their Camp, as ſuch an Attempt would have coſt; and that it had been more for their Honour and even their Intereſt, to have made a diſadvantageous Puſh, than to have made none at all. His Friends, on the other hand, aſſert as confidently, That nothing but the immoderate Rains which fell at his firſt Approach to the Mehaigne, and which continu'd to fall for many Days together, hinder'd his attacking Mr. de Luxemburgh in his Lines: That thoſe Rains had made a Bog of the Land on both Sides of the River, and even carry'd away the Bridges which he had caus'd to be laid over it: That he made ſeveral Motions in order to bring on a Battle, which were as often counter-check'd by thoſe of the Enemy: That a Detachment of Horſe, with the Generals Athlone and d'Auverquerque at their Head, did actually paſs the River, at a narrow Ford on the Right of the Army, and came in Sight of ſeveral Squadrons of the Enemy, whom they did not think proper to engage, for fear of being drawn into an Ambuſcade; and that, upon the whole, which is ſingular enough, he gain'd more Honour by his ſeveral Efforts to relieve the Town, tho' they were unſucceſsful, than King Lewis by taking it; though we are told by Burnet, it was reckon'd the greateſt Action of that Prince's Life. A. D. 1692.

Various Reflections on the Conduct of King William during the Siege.

Laſtly, it is urged by others, not altogether ſo prejudic'd on either Side, That the French, having the Start of the Allies in their Preparations, were in a Condition to ſecure all the advantageous Poſts on the Side of Gembloux, where only any rational Project could have been form'd for its Relief: That the Camps which the Duke of Luxemburgh had choſen, and the Diſpoſitions he made, were ſuch, as could ſcarce have been forc'd by an Army far ſuperior to his own: That when the King made a forc'd March, in order to gain the Camp of Melle and Flerus, where he arriv'd on the 24th, Mr. de Luxemburgh not only coaſted him all the way, but ſet down over againſt him, in a Place more inacceſſible than that which he had occupy'd before: And, laſtly, that the Caſtle of Namur was ſurrender'd many Days ſooner than was expected, or than was neceſſary, even by the Confeſſion of the French themſelves. It is certain, the Prince de Barbaſon did not eſcape Cenſure on this Occaſion; and that it was recollected to his Diſadvantage, that King William ſuſpected him from the Beginning, and would have prevail'd with the Elector of Bavaria, to commit the Defence of the Place to ſome Commander, of whom he had a better Opinion. But whether his Majeſty's Suſpicions were of ſuch a nature as could not be explain'd, or his Electoral Highneſs could not prevail on himſelf to enter on his Government with ſo ungracious a Proceedure towards a Perſon of his Rank, all that could be obtain'd, was, to place the Count de Thian about him, to obſerve his Conduct.

Namur being reduc'd, Mr. de Luxemburgh was left to command in chief for the Reſidue of the Campaign, with Orders to lye on the Defenſive, and to take ſuch Meaſures only, as he ſhould find neceſſary for the Preſervation of his Troops, and the Country committed to his Charge. Accordingly, his firſt Care was to detach eight thouſand Men, chiefly Horſe, into Germany, under the Command of Mr. de Coigny, to enable Mr. de Lorges to make a Figure on that Side. Mr. de Boufflers, with his ſeparate Corps, remov'd alſo to la Buſſiere, either for the Convenience of Forage, or to lye in wait for ſome Opportunity to ſnatch an Advantage. Twenty-five Battalions and two Squadrons were poſted in Namur, and the Marſhal himſelf, with the reſt of the Troops, took poſt at Seigniese. Motions of both Armies afterwards.

His Majeſty alſo, in conſequence of theſe Motions of the French, detach'd the Counts Fleming and de Tilly, with the Troops of Brandenburgh and Liege to their old Poſt in the Neighbourhood of Liege; as alſo, Count Harn, with ten Battalions of Foot and five Regiments of Horſe, towards Ghent; and remov'd himſelf with the reſt of the Army to Genap, where he took Poſt July the ſixth.

A. D. 1692. On the nineteenth his Majesty and the Elector of Bavaria gave his Electoral Highness of Brandenburgh, who had continu'd at Cleves during the whole time of the Siege of Namur, a Meeting at Louvaine: But no Account is given of what pass'd on that Occasion: On the 21st they return'd to their Camp; and on the 22d the Army pass'd the River Senne, and encamp'd at Lambeque; where they were the next Day re-inforc'd by the Hanoverian Troops, and Galway's and Langston's Horse, which had been just before landed at Williamstadt, from England.

When the King remov'd from Genap, it was with a Design of getting the Start of Mr. de Luxemburgh, who, he had been inform'd, design'd to encamp between Steenkirk and Enghien; but the Latter took his Measures so well, that he secur'd his Ground, and thereby oblig'd his Majesty to set down at Lambeque. However, the two Armies not being above six English Miles asunder, his Majesty thought he had still an Opportunity to strike such a home Blow, as should retrieve the Glory of the Campaign. On the 23d the Matter was debated in a Council of War; and all the Parties being agreed, the necessary Orders were given for making the Experiment on the Morrow: Accordingly, the heavy Baggage was order'd to repass the Senne; and the Army was put in Motion from the Left in two Columns; for so encumber'd was the Ground with Thickets, so travers'd with Hedges, and intersected with narrow and intricate Defiles, that they had not Room for any Extent of Front, or such other Dispositions as are usual in general Engagements. The Prince of Wirtemburgh, with four Battalions of English, and six of Danes and Dutch (according to the London-Gazette) was appointed to attack the Enemy on the Right, supported by Lieutenant-General Mackay, at the Head of another Body of Infantry, all British, which were also intermingled with several Regiments of British Horse. Count Solmes had the Command of the Center; and we must suppose that his Majesty and the Elector of Bavaria remain'd with the Rear, to regulate the Motions and provide for the sustaining of the whole, since we find no Mention of the first till the Business of the Day was pretty far advanc'd, nor of the Latter at all.

The Allies attack the French at Steenkirk.

But, tho' the Prince of Wirtemburgh, with the Van, began to march very early in the Morning, and the Distance between the two Armies was so small, such were the Difficulties which he had to surmount, that it was ten o'Clock before he came within Reach of the Enemy's Camp; and, having then taken Possession of a Hill, cover'd with Wood, and divided from those occupy'd by the French, by a hollow Way, it was an Hour longer before he could bring his Cannon to play upon them; and even then he was oblig'd to halt, by Order from the King, till two in the Afternoon, to give the rest of the Army time to come up: At length, however, the Word was given, and the Onset made, with so much Vigour, that though it was up Hill all the way, and the French were every where cover'd with Hedges and Ditches, the Prince and his Party drove them from all their Posts, took Possession of one of their Batteries of seven Guns, and, for Half an Hour, were Masters of their Lines. This is acknowledg'd, without any Reserve, by the French themselves; and they also add, that the Disorder and Confusion of their Camp, on this Occasion, was very great: But then our own Writers are also oblig'd to acknowledge in their Turns, that for want of making a proper Use of this Advantage, the Affair took a fatal Turn. Mr. de Luxemburgh had time to rally his broken Troops, to re-inforce them with fresh Battalions, and to make such a Disposition, as the Allies were not able to withstand. In short, the French recover'd their lost Ground, brought up a second Line to sustain their first; and, when our Forces began to reel under such repeated Shocks, let loose their Brigades of Guards, both French and Swiss, headed by almost all the Princes and Nobles in their Army, to improve the lucky Moment to the utmost. These, in a Bravade, charg'd Sword in Hand; and if Mr. de Luxemburgh's Account to the King, his Master, is to be credited, did prodigious Execution. It is indeed agreed on all hands, that scarce any Encounter was ever more obstinate or more bloody: Thousands fell on both Sides: And never was the Sword more impartial; for both Officer and Soldier fell without Distinction: Such was the Contest, such the Carnage for four Hours together; when the Marshal de Bouffiers, who had receiv'd an early Summons to rejoin the Army on the Spur, falling in with his whole Corps; and the Allies being convinc'd, that all that remain'd was to provide for a good Retreat, the King himself undertook that Province, and fill'd it in so able a manner, that Mr. de Luxemburgh did not think proper to risque the Glory he had won in repulsing the Enemy, by exposing himself to be repuls'd by them. The French, satisfy'd with their Escape, remain'd in their Camp, and the Allies return'd unmolested to theirs. A. D. 1692. and are repuls'd.

With regard to the various Reflections made upon this Action, we find the Attempt accounted for in the London-Gazette, in these Words: "His Majesty, who had long fought an Opportunity to attack the Enemy, resolv'd to do it now, upon the Information of some Persons, who were thought to understand the Nature of the Ground." And the Miscarriage in these: "But the Enemy coming down upon our Men in great Numbers, and the Foot that was to have supported them (the ten Battalions) not being able to advance so fast, by reason of the Difficulties of the Ways through which they were to pass, we could not maintain that Post." Meaning the Post carry'd at first by these ten Battalions. And again, "But there appearing so many Difficulties, or rather an Impossibility, as their Camp was situated, to get to the Flank of the Enemy, as was design'd, and so to come to a general Engagement; and they being re-inforc'd by Mr. Bouffiers's Troops, &c. it was thought adviseable Various Reflections on the Action.

A. D. 1692. advisable to desist." It is urged on the other hand, That all these Difficulties, how great soever, were actually surmounted by the ten Battalions: That two Hours were taken for the other Battalions to do the same: That Mackey, with those under his Command, did also surmount them: That by a (b) Mistake of Orders, the Latter posted themselves on the Right of the Former, instead of taking the same Rout, and pushing right on to support them: That the ten thus unsupported, withstood no less than thirty of the Enemy: That one of them, under the Command of Sir Robert Douglas, drove no less than four of the French from their Cannon: That tho' the Prince of Wirtemburgh sent one of his Aids de Camp twice, to require Succour from Count Solmes, and at last procur'd a positive Command from the King himself, so jealous was the said Count of the Prince's Glory, and so thoroughly did he hate the English, that he order'd his Horse, which he knew could not act for want of Room, to march, and his Foot to halt, purposely that the English might be massacred, and the Prince might be foil'd; saying to those about him, Let us see what Sport these English Bull-Dogs will make us: And that as to the Circumstance of the French Camp's being inaccessible in Flank, we find Mr. de Luxemburgh, in his Letter to the most Christian King, speaking of the Allies in a Strain of Acknowledgment, for not once thinking to make use of a rising Ground to annoy his Infantry in Flank with their Cannon; which, according to him, lay much expos'd, and for not throwing a Bridge across the River; which he suggests, would have render'd their Work much easier.

[Boyer.]

Others again who make it their Business to soften the Misfortune of this Day to the utmost of their Power, ascribe it to the Intelligence of the King's Motions, given to Mr. de Luxemburgh by one Millevoix, a Musician in the Service of the Elector of Bavaria, and a Spy in that of France; which put him on his Guard, and gave him time to make all the Preparations necessary for his Defence. But though the French Writers acknowledge, that their General did receive Intelligence occasionally from a Spy, by them call'd a Secretary, in the Confederate-Camp, they will not allow that he receiv'd any Benefit from it on this Occasion: On the contrary, they alledge, That their Spy was detected; that he was compell'd by Menaces, to send such Intelligence to the Marshal as should serve to mislead him; namely, that the Motions of the Allies was only in order to a general Forage; and that their Battalions of Foot in the Wood, were posted there only to cover the Foragers: That the Marshal, depending on the Informations of a Man who had never yet deceiv'd him, became so secure, that when he was, again and again, appriz'd by one of his own Scouts, that the Defiles between the two Armies were fill'd with Foot, Horse, and Cannon, he took no Precautions, as believing they had no farther Purpose than what had he receiv'd Notice of before: That he was not undeceiv'd till the Prince of Wirtemburgh actually attack'd his advanc'd Post on the Right, and defeated the Brigade of Bourbonnois, who had the Defence of it: That the whole French Army was hereupon thrown into the utmost Consternation; and that if the Allies had made a proper Use of their first Success, they had in all Probability obtain'd a complete Victory. A. D. 1692.

Even Mr. de Feuquieres, attach'd as he was, to Mr. de Luxemburgh, acknowledges all this; and that, notwithstanding all the Mastery in the Art of War, which that General manifested in forming his Troops, and recovering them out of the Panic and Confusion which had seiz'd on them at first, it was reasonable to believe, that if the Right Wing of the Allies, whose Province it was to attack Enghien, and the French Left posted there, had not mistook their way during their March in the Night; or if they had made their Attack at the same time that the Engagement began at the Right, Mr. de Luxemburgh would scarce have been able to sustain a Shock that he was so little prepar'd for.

To close on this Head, it is certain, that a Domestic of the Elector of Bavaria's (whether Musician or Secretary, whether his Name was Millevoix, or Rochemont, as he is call'd by some, is not material) was detected about this time, and hang'd in the Sight of the whole Army on the sixth of August, N. S. And that both the King and Mr. de Luxemburgh were equally censur'd for the Conduct of that Day: Mr. de Luxemburgh for suffering himself to be surpriz'd, and for not considering that his Camp was no where to be attack'd, but where the Attack was made; and the King, for losing the Benefit of the Surprize, by causing his Troops to halt so long in Sight of the Enemy; and for making a wrong Disposition. The Prince (says Mr. de Feuquieres, according to his usual Phrase, when speaking of King William, and after acknowledging, that his Majesty's Design was truly

(b) This is founded on the Authority of a Letter from an Officer, inserted both in the State of Europe for August, and and the Memoirs of Europe for September. The whole Passage runs thus: "This Mistake is imputed to the Death of Lieutenant-General Mackay, who led them, and who was kill'd at that very Instant; and at the same time Lieutenant-General Tettau was wounded. The King of England perceiving that Party of Foot had taken a quite different way from what he had order'd, immediately hasted to them; but the Quarter of an Hour which this false Step had cost, spoil'd all the Measures that had been taken; for by that time the Infantry came up to the Wood, they found those who had made the Attack retreating, having been forc'd to give way to the overpowering Numbers of the Enemy." Bishop Burnet, on the other hand, alledges, That Mackay was order'd to a Post that he saw could not be maintain'd: That he sent his Opinion about it: That the former Orders were confirm'd; and that hereupon he went on, saying, The Will of the Lord be done! And if his Majesty did in Person interpose to rectify the Disorder occasion'd by the Death of Mackay, it is somewhat strange that he did not, in his way, exact Obedience from Count Solmes (on whom the Prelate, last quoted, admits, that the Blame fell of all the Errors of the Day.) And yet, more so, that he should content himself with exclaiming, according to some Authors, who think they do him Honour: O my poor English! How are they abandon'd!

A. D. 1692. truly great) ought not to have disposed his Forces in order of Battle, when they had pass'd thro' the Defiles; but as he march'd them in different Columns thro' those Defiles, he should have attack'd the Front of the French Camp in the same order, and on the same Direction, to take the whole Benefit of the Enemies first Surprize to penetrate their Lines, to hinder their forming at all, and to improve the Confusion so created, into a total Rout; which could scarce have been avoided, if he had proceeded in this manner; and if, while his first Line had been thus employ'd, he had drawn up his second in as regular a Front as the Ground would have admitted; for, in such a Case, Mr. de Luxemburgh, on being forc'd to abandon his Camp, would have had no Opportunity, and consequently could have entertain'd no Thought, of forming behind it; and for his last Resource must have been oblig'd to have made the best Retreat he could, at the Expence of all his Baggage, Tents, Cannon, &c.

As to the Loss, Mr. de Feuquieres estimates that of the Allies at twelve thousand; Mr. de Luxemburgh at ten thousand; King Lewis, in his Letter to the Archbishop of Paris, to order another Te Deum, at six thousand; and the Allies themselves at but three thousand two hundred and seventy-one, kill'd, and two thousand nine hundred and thirty-six, wounded; while, on the other hand, the Allies estimated that of the French at two thousand four hundred and fifty-nine, kill'd, and four thousand five hundred and nine, wounded: And if the French garnish'd their Narrative with the Names of two Lieutenant-Generals, Mackay and Lanier, seven Colonels, Roberts, Douglas, Hodges, Angus, Andreé, Moor, and Goos, seven Lieutenant-Colonels, Preston, Fullerton, Fox, Vander-Abeé, de Dier, Hamerien, and Ohinga, and five Majors; we also glory'd in the Fall of the Prince de Turenne, the Marquis de Bellefonde, the Marquis de Tilladet, Lieutenant-General, Brigadier Stoupa, the Chevalier d'Estrades, Colonel Paulier, and the Marquis de Firmacon, who were left dead on the Field; and had our List of Wounded, at the Head of which appear'd the Name of the Duke de Chartres, to counter-balance theirs. Both Sides, indeed, for a while, employ'd the Press in amusing the World; the one magnifying their Success, the other extenuating their Defeat. "All our Advices, (says the London-Gazette) assure us, that the Enemies Loss in the late Action is, at least, equal, if not greater than ours.——— There never was greater Bravery than our Troops shew'd on this Occasion: Of ours there were engag'd but twenty-two Battalions, with a Detachment of Dragoons: And against these the French brought down forty-five Battalions, and four Regiments of Dragoons: Divers of their old Regiments are quite ruin'd.——— The Musqueteers of the Houshold have suffer'd extremely: Several Officers, who were thought to have been kill'd on our Side, are, we hear since, Prisoners. We have likewise taken three Captains, a Comet, and several other Prisoners of the Enemy, with the blue Standard of the Regiment of Dauphine: And we do not hear that we have lost one Colour or Standard." This was follow'd at some Distance, with a Letter dated from Paris, which the Public was to believe, was writ by a Frenchman, tho' nothing could be less suitable to the Character of that Nation: For therein it is suggested, That the Joy occasion'd by the first News of the Action, was of short Continuance: That the second Account, which was more particular, as well as more true, discover'd how little Reason the French had to pretend to any Advantage: That their whole Army narrowly escap'd an entire Defeat: That their Loss, which, it was acknowledg'd, amounted to five hundred Officers and five thousand Soldiers, much exceeded that of the Enemy, &c. Again, in the same Gazette it is said, "The Enemies Loss appears by the Advices from all Hands, to be even greater than was at first reported; for we are assur'd, that they had eight thousand Men kill'd and wounded; that in their own Army they own this; and that among them are fourteen hundred Officers kill'd, or wounded so as to be unfit for Service." And, on the other hand, the Letter of King Lewis to his Cousin the Archbishop of Paris, which was translated into almost all the Languages of Europe, was calculated, at once, to feed the Vanity of the French and mortify the Allies, as follows: "After the taking of Namur, &c. the Enemy, enrag'd for the Loss of that Place, the Importance of which is so well known, and finding themselves under a Necessity to do something to repair their Honour, in some measure, and impose upon the People, and, moreover, trusting to the Goodness of their Infantry, which they always thought superior to mine, the third of this Month attack'd the Right Wing of my Army, which lay encamp'd among Enclosures, divided with Hedges and Ditches and Rivers, where Cavalry could act; but they were receiv-ed with so much Resolution and Vigour, and repuls'd with that Valour and Courage, that after my Men had utterly defeated a good Part of their best Infantry, kill'd upon the Place above six thousand, put the rest to Flight, taken ten Pieces of Cannon, eight Colours, and thirteen hundred Prisoners, they remain'd Masters of the Field. A Victory so signal, won by only one Part of my Army, and so apparently demonstrating, that God defends the Cause which I maintain, that I have resolv'd to make him those public Returns of Thanksgiving which belong to him, &c."

But whatsoever the Pretensions on either Side were, both were manifest Losers; and neither was in a Condition to draw the least Advantage. Till the first of August, O. S. they lay still in their several Camps; and then, before Break of Day, the French decamp'd first, and were follow'd by the Allies as soon as they had Notice of their Motions: But either that Notice came too late, or too much time was taken up in deliberating

Grandval's Conspiracy.

During this Interval, and for some time before, not only the Confederate-Camp, but all Europe, by Advices from thence, had been amus'd with a Discovery of a very extraordinary kind; and of which the Historian of his own Times hath made as extraordinary a Use: For, after speaking of the intended Descent from Normandy, under the Conduct of King James, and the Purposes the French Court propos'd to answer by it, he proceeds in these Words: "And in Case other Designs had fail'd, there was one in reserve, manag'd by the French Ministry and by Luxemburgh, of assassinating the King, which would have brought about all their Designs: The French King seem'd to think the Project was so well laid, that it could not miscarry: For, he said publicly, before he set out, He was going to make an end of the War. Now, the Registers of those Times only say, "That when the King receiv'd the Compliments of the Sovereign Courts at Versailles, after he had assur'd them, that he would leave nothing omitted to put an end to the War, he told them, That King James, on his Part, was labouring to bring about his Designs." Which Terms are far from being so absolute as those made use of by Dr. Burnet, and without great Violence cannot be tortur'd into the Meaning which he has thought fit to assign them: If therefore we are to conclude, that his most Christian Majesty was at the Bottom of so black a Design, we must derive better Proofs from the Story itself; which, in Substance, is told thus, in one of the Court Pamphlets of those Times.

[State of Europe for May, &c.]

Colonel Parker, one du Mont, and the late Mr. de Louvois, were the first Contrivers of it; but whether jointly or separately, has never been thoroughly explain'd: All, it seems, was at a Stand on the Death of that Minister: But his Son, Mr. Barbasieux, succeeding him in the Secretary's Office, and finding a Draught of the Project seal'd up in his Cabinet, brought it again in play, by the Means of one Grandval, a Knight of Picardy and a Captain of Dragoons, who was employ'd to find out du Mont, and form a new Concert with him and Parker; in Consideration of which, and his undertaking the Conduct of the whole Enterprize, he was to have a Dukedom and an Estate proportionable to that high Rank, for his Reward. Madame de Maintenon, and Mr. Paparel, Paymaster to the French Army, were also Parties in it: Du Mont was to be the Assassin, and to enter himself in the Confederate Army, that he might have the better Opportunity of shooting his Majesty when he went to visit the grand Guard or the Lines. Grandval and Parker had their Posts in the French Camp, and were to be furnish'd with a Party of Horse by Mr. de Luxemburgh, to rescue du Mont when he had struck the Blow; at least du Mont was told so for his Encouragement. All repair'd to their several Posts accordingly: But whether du Mont's Heart fail'd him, or no Opportunity offer'd, after several Weeks Attendance, he stole away from the Camp; but instead of repairing to his Confederates, took Refuge at Hanover. This Disappointment did not, however, alter the Sentiments of the French Court; Barbasieux not only proceeded still in the same Track, but admitted Mr. de Chanlais into the Secret, and also enlarged his Band, by entering one Leefdale, a Dutch Baron, into it. Du Mont, who corresponded by Letter with Grandval, and by the Means of his Wife, whom he had left at Paris, with Mr. Barbasieux himself, was still in such Credit with all of them, that the Execution was left to him, as before: And Mr. Chanlais, in Person, was to assist Grandval in bringing him off. At Uden in the Country of Ravesteyn, du Mont, Grandval, and Leefdale, were to meet; and, at the same time, Parker was to pass over to England: But, before they could reach the Place of Rendezvous, all but Parker were seiz'd, by the several and separate Discoveries of du Mont and Leefdale, and deliver'd over to the Provost-Martial of the Army. A. D. 1692.

This Abstract is taken from a Piece, call'd, Reflections on the Conspiracy against the Life of King William, which, for many Reasons, ought to be laid at the Door of the Historian-Bishop of Salisbury: And we learn farther from the Preamble of the Evidence given in at Grandval's Trial, and the Sentence of the Judges, publish'd by Authority, That Leefdale made his Discoveries first by Letter to his Relations in Holland, and du Mont his, to the Duke of Zell. As to the said Evidence in Detail, it was open'd by Leefdale, who, among Variety of other Circumstances, depos'd, That Grandval had, in the Winter, remitted two hundred Pistoles to du Mont, to keep him firm to the Business: That he had sent him ten Ducats more from Brussels, by Bill of Exchange: And that while they were at Mons, a Rumour prevailing, that some Disorders in Scotland would oblige the King to repass the Seas, Grandval shew'd an extreme Impatience to be gone, for fear of losing their Opportunity. One d'Amours then added, That Grandval had confess'd to him at Brussels, That he had a great Business to do, which had miscarry'd the last Year: That being asked by him, Whether he had any thing to say to the King? he answer'd, Yes, To break his Neck: That he, d'Amours, objecting the Difficulties he had to surmount, the Other reply'd, I have given my Word to Mr. Barbasieux, and I'll do it. Du Mont came last, and he took upon him to prove Madame de Maintenon's Concern in the Affair, by a Passage out of one of Grandval's Letters; in which he says, He would accommodate the Matter by her Means. He also said, he had imparted the Design to Mr. Bedal, alias Hasfelt, the French Minister at Hanover, who

A. D. 1692. not only expreſs'd his Approbation of it, but lent him fifty Crowns: And that he had been inform'd by one Miller, an Agent of the ſaid Bedal's, that the Latter maintain'd a ſecret Correſpondence with Mr. Moreau, the King of Poland's Envoy to the States. Grandval's Letters to du Mont were alſo produc'd: So that the Proof being as plain as poſſible againſt him, he made an ingenuous Confeſſion of all he knew, and that, without ſo much as naming the Rack to him, as we are told in the Narrative, either before or after Sentence. It ſeems, however, that Grandval thought that there was ſome Merit in this Ingenuity; for on the Strength of it he ventur'd to preſer two Petitions to his Majeſty, both writ with his own Hand; in which he pleads, That he had acted but in Obedience to the Orders he had receiv'd from Mr. Barbaſieux and Mr. de Chanlais; and that, how great ſoever his Fault was, or worthy of Death, du Mont and Leefdale were as guilty as he. His Trial was before a Court-Martial, of which the Earl of Athlone was Preſident: And, by way of Preamble to the Sentence they pronounc'd, the whole Affair is given in Detail, and ſome Circumſtances are remember'd, which had been omitted before; namely, That the Priſoner, Grandval, contracted Acquaintance with du Mont, at the Houſe of Mr. Rebenac, in Paris; that being one Day in Company with du Mont and Paparel, the Latter ſaid, That if they had a mind to SEIZE the King of England, du Mont would be a fit Perſon for that Service: That du Mont reply'd, with Execrations, That he would carry him off alive or dead, as he had promis'd to Mr. de Louvois: That Mr. Barbaſieux would never ſee du Mont, for fear he, du Mont, ſhould be taken Priſoner, and, upon Examination, name him, which, he apprehended, would be detrimental to his Fortune: That the Priſoner, Grandval, having told du Mont, by Order of the ſaid Miniſter, That the King wore a Coat of Mail, du Mont reply'd, No matter! I'll KILL him for all that: That he, Grandval, was alſo engag'd with Parker as well as with du Mont, and that the ſaid Parker had told him, "That he had form'd the Deſign with Mr. de Louvois:" That he was brought acquainted with Leefdale by the Means of one Sterck: That growing very intimate, he communicated the Secret to him, and engag'd him in it, as a ſure way to obtain Preferment: That he afterwards introduc'd him to Mr. Barbaſieux and Mr. Chanlais: That the Day before they left Paris, all three, that is to ſay, Grandval, Parker, and Leefdale, went to St. Germains to ſpeak with King James about the ſaid Deſign, which he had Knowledge of, and to take their Leave: That he, the PRISONER, had Audience of the ſaid King James, the late Queen being preſent, and was told by him, "That Parker had given him an Account of the Buſineſs; and that if he and the other Officers did him that Service, they ſhould never want:" That the Manner, laſt agreed upon, of putting it into Execution, was this, viz. That, when the King ſhould ride along the Lines, or go out to take any View, or when the Army ſhould decamp, du Mont ſhould lye in Ambuſcade, and take his Opportunity of firing at his Majeſty, when he ſhould be within an hundred Paces of him: That the Priſoner and Leefdale were to accompany du Mont to the Camp of the Allies, for fear he ſhould not be punctual in obſerving his Orders: That when du Mont was at his Poſt, and the King approaching, the two Latter ſhould mix with his Majeſty's Followers: That when he had fir'd, and every body was in Purſuit of du Mont, they ſhould make the beſt of their way towards Mr. Chanlais, who was to be ready with three thouſand Horſe, at the Duke of Luxemburgh's grand Guard, to bring them off: And that the Priſoner, in his way from Paris, told Leefdale, That if their Deſign took place, the Confederacy would be broke, and the ſeveral Princes concern'd would recall their Troops: In Conſequence of which, France would maſter the Reſidue of Flanders, and King James recover England.

Upon the whole Matter, Grandval was condemn'd to be drawn, hang'd and quarter'd: And on the 13th of Auguſt, N. S. he was executed accordingly. It is added, That he left a Letter to a Lady of his Acquaintance at Paris, containing a Requeſt, That ſhe would inform the Archbiſhop of Rheims, that his obeying the Orders of Mr. de Barbaſieux had coſt him his Life; and that, ſome Days before he ſuffer'd, being told, That, probably, Barbaſieux would deny, that he had ever any Concern in a Buſineſs of that nature, he reply'd, "Let him deny what he pleaſes, yet, if I were put upon it, I would make it appear very plainly; for I have an original Paper under Mr. Barbaſieux's own Hand, which I have lodg'd with a Friend of mine, who will not part with it to any body but myſelf; and no body elſe knows with whom I have entruſted it."

To make a proper uſe of all, when the Court-Narrative had been ſome time before the Public, the Paper of Reflections was alſo ſet forth; in which, by the Dint of Inference and Refinement, all poſſible Pains is taken to involve the French King himſelf in the Odium of ſo wicked a Deſign; and the whole Horror of it is fix'd, without the leaſt Qualification, on King James; while, on the other hand, the Generoſity of King William, in refuſing, both when he was Prince of Orange, and after he was King of England, to give the leaſt Countenance to the (c) Offers that were made him, to take off the French King; and alſo, while he was upon his March from Exeter to London, in giving thoſe to underſtand, who talk'd of proceeding

(c) The Reflector tells us, That one was contain'd in a Poſt-Letter from Paris to the Prince, at the Hague; and the other was made by the Undertaker, in Perſon, to the Biſhop of Saliſbury, a few Days before his Highneſs was put in Poſſeſſion of the Crown of England.

A. D. 1692. proceeding againſt King James's Perſon, That he would ſuffer none who perſiſted in ſuch Talk to ſtay about him, was emblazon'd in the brighteſt Colours.

But then, for the ſake of Truth and Impartiality, it ought to be obſerv'd, that thoſe Reflections have as little Candour and Ingenuity, as other Party-Writings: For the Author takes Occaſion, from a Paſſage in the Narrative before alluded to, where it is ſaid, that but a very few of the Circumſtances, which Leefdale had with great Exactneſs depos'd, ſhould be mention'd there, to compliment King William, for the Greatneſs of his Mind, in not expoſing an Enemy as much as he could; whereas we have already ſhewn, that thoſe very Circumſtances are afterwards recited in the Sentence of the Judges. Again, in bringing the Sentence home to King James and his Queen, he ſuggeſts, "That the ſaid King had the Indiſcretion to entertain Parker, Leefdale, and Grandval, all together, on the ſame Subject; whereas we have alſo ſhewn, that the Words in the Narrative are ſimply theſe, That the PRISONER had Audience, &c. He alſo makes no Difficulty to conclude, that the Deſign then ſpoke of, was to murder the King: But King James only ſays, the Buſineſs; and there is ſome Room for Charity to conclude, That the carrying off his Majeſty, was rather the Point underſtood; ſince, according to du Mont's Evidence, the Affair diſcours'd of at Mr. Rebenac's Houſe, and propos'd by Paparel, was no more than the ſeizing him; and it is du Mont himſelf who undertakes to carry him off, alive or dead: Beſides, tho' Grandval does indeed confeſs, that the Project of an Aſſaſſination was entertain'd and agreed upon, he is expreſs, that it was the firſt time concerted by Mr. Barbaſieux, Paparel, Parker, du Mont, and himſelf; and the laſt by himſelf, Mr. Chanlais, and Leefdale; as alſo, that they had their laſt Orders from Mr. Chanlais. And, finally, the ſaid Author moreover inſiſts, that there is a remarkable Miſtake in the Engliſh Narrative of the Proceedings of the Court-Martial; namely, in that Paſſage which immediately follows King James's Aſſurances to Grandval, and which runs in theſe Words, "And Parker, the Priſoner, and Leefdale, enter'd into a Diſcourſe about this Deſign." Now, according to him, the Words in French, are Qu' alors IL a auſſi parlé avec le dit Parker & Leefdale de cette Affaire: And the Turn he gives it, is, "That HE (meaning King James) not Grandval, ſpoke likewiſe to Parker and Leefdale about that Affair."

To finiſh on this Head, whether King Lewis could think this Project well laid, as Biſhop Burnet inſinuates, let the Reader judge; as alſo, whether it was poſſible, that ſo wiſe a Court ſhould place any great Dependence on it, though the ſame Author aſſures us, it was what they truſted to moſt. Du Mont and Leefdale were both Adventurers, and had it in their Power to get as much by diſcovering the Deſign, without any Hazard to themſelves, as by venturing their Lives to accompliſh it: The French Miniſters had not been over liberal to them: The Entrance-Fee given to du Mont, A. D. 1692. was but thirty Piſtoles: The Sum afterwards advanc'd to Grandval, for the Expences of the whole Junto, was no more than eighty Louis d'Or's, according to Grandval's Confeſſion, tho' Leefdale rais'd it to two hundred Piſtoles: And if they were thus thrifty in their Inducements, what Dependence could be plac'd on their Rewards? And at how ſmall a Value did they rate a Project that was to produce ſuch mighty Conſequences? Then as to Grandval, if he was not a Madman, he was ſo intoxicated by his own Dreams of Succeſs, and the ſplendid Vanities he had built upon it, that he was little better; as appears by the whole Courſe of his Conduct, and more particularly, by his frantic Anſwer to the ſurprizing Queſtion put to him by d'Amours, at Bruſſels: Yet farther, when the three Delinquents were brought into the Camp of the Allies, we find it obſerv'd by Mr. Vernon, in his Letter to Sir William [Tindal.] Dutton Colt at Hanover, that their Treatment was remarkably different; Grandval was kept in Irons, du Mont under the Care of three or four Soldiers, and Leefdale was left in a manner at Liberty: And tho' the ſame Gentleman afterwards uſes theſe Words, "I ſuppoſe it will be thought fit, he (du Mont) ſhould undergo a Trial for the Juſtification of his Majeſty's Proceedings throughout this whole Buſineſs." In another Letter, dated Auguſt 31, he writes as follows: "As to the Buſineſs of du Mont, I think that it is now over, upon his ſending a Petition to his Majeſty, in which he owns his Guilt, and implores his Majeſty's Mercy as to Life, upon the Account of his being one of the firſt Diſcoverers, ſubmitting himſelf to be diſpos'd as his Majeſty ſhall think fit, in any Place of Safety, and begging that Care may be taken of his ſubſiſting there; which Petition being refer'd to the Council of War that ſat upon Grandval for their Opinion, they have recommended him as an Object of Mercy, on account of his Diſcovery, and coming hither to teſtify what he knew of the Buſineſs; adviſing withal his being kept ſafely in ſome ſecure Place, with a Maintenance, that others may be encourag'd by this Example, rather to rely on his Majeſty's Clemency than perſiſt in their damnable Deſigns. So you ſee by this Proceeding, Regard has been had to the Promiſes that might have been made him in Germany upon his firſt diſcloſing the Buſineſs, which yet, I think, he might then, and ſince, have made more fully than he did."

And to conclude, Biſhop Burnet acknowledges, that upon du Mont's Diſcourſes at Zell, Leefdale was ſent to Paris, as a Perſon that would come into the Deſign, but in Reality to betray it.

A brave Action perform'd by a Detachment of the Liegois.

The Talk of this Affair, which for ſome time ſerv'd to amuſe the Public as well as the taking of a Town, or the winning of a Battle, was ſcarce over, before the Gazettes were fill'd with a pompous Account of a brave Action perform'd by a Detachment of the Troops of Liege, which was in Subſtance as follows: Count Sarcales de Tilly having receiv'd

A. D. 1692. ceiv'd Intelligence from the Governor of Huy, that Mr. de Guiscard frequently ſent Detachments in Boats from Namur, to fetch Paliſadoes from the Neighbourhood of Salzyn, about two Leagues from that Place, and that he deſign'd to ſend out a Party of three hundred Men the Night following, took a Reſolution to ſurprize them with one of his own: Accordingly, three hundred Foot, and two hundred Dragoons were detach'd for this Service, with Orders to poſt themſelves ſo near the Place where the French were to land, as they might attack them while they were coming out of their Boats. The French came, according to Expectation; but, inſtead of three hundred, prov'd to be upwards of a thouſand, under the Command of the Prince d'Henrichment. The Liegois, however, were not diſcourag'd, it ſeems, but, on the contrary, ruſh'd upon the Enemy with that Vigour and Succeſs, that they entirely routed them, kill'd a conſiderable Number on the Spot, and brought to Huy four hundred Priſoners, thirty Officers, among whom was the Prince d'Henrichment himſelf, and one of their Boats; having loſt but ſix of their own Men.

Sequel of the Duke of Leinſter's Expedition.

It was about this time that the Duke of Leinſter, with the Troops under his Command, landed at Oſtend; and, late as it was in the Seaſon, all Europe began to be perſuaded, that the Confederates would end the Year with as much Honour to themſelves, as France had begun it. Several Veſſels laden with Cannon and Ammunition, had been ſent down the Meuſe from Maeſtricht to join him: He was alſo reinforc'd with a large Detachment of Foot, and five Regiments of Horſe from his Majeſty's Camp at Grammen, under the Command of Lieutenant-General Talmaſh: His Mortars were taken out of the Tranſport-ſhips, and fixed upon Flat-bottom-Boats: And that the French might have the leſs Leiſure to interrupt the Progreſs of his Arms, the Troops of Brandenburgh and Liege, paſs'd the Meuſe at Huy, and mov'd towards Charleroy, in order, as it was given out, to enter the French Territories between the Sambre and the Meuſe, while the Troops of Newburgh, Cologn, and Munſter advanc'd into their Poſts, and undertook for the Protection of Liege.

All this had a Face of Enterprize; and as if they were for once reſolv'd to ſatisfy the Expectations they had rais'd, Talmaſh took Poſſeſſion of Furnes on the fourth of September, N. S. On the ſeventh the Duke, with the reſt of the Forces, proceeded on to the ſame Place. About the ſame time, that the whole Enterprize might be animated with a Portion of the King's own Spirit, the Earl of Portland and Mr. d'Auverquerque were ſent to be his Grace's Supporters, with ſuch additional Inſtructions and Powers, as were ſuitable to the high Rank of Favour which they held: On the 10th, a farther Reinforcement of four Regiments of Horſe were order'd to take the ſame Rout; and nothing elſe was talk'd of but the reducing of Dunkirk, and the making ſuch a Diſpoſition on that Side, as ſhould put France on the Defenſive for the time to come.

But, pleaſing as the Proſpect was, it was A. D. 1692. ſoon loſt in Clouds and Darkneſs: The Time that ſhould have been employ'd in Action, was waſted in Deliberation: Dunkirk was found, or thought to be, inacceſſible: Colonel Cambon was diſpatch'd to remonſtrate the State of Things to his Majeſty: And Dixmuyde having been reduc'd by Brigadier Ramſay on the 17th, Orders were given for covering both that Place and Furnes with new Works, and providing them with ſufficient Gariſons; which being done accordingly, a Paragraph was inſerted in the London-Gazette, ſignifying, That, by this Means, that Part of Flanders would be very much eaſed, that our Quarters would be enlarg'd, and that the French would be oblig'd to pay Contributions. The Command of theſe new Acquiſitions was given to Count Horn, a Dutchman: The Cannon and Baggage under a Guard of ſix Regiments of Foot and eight Squadrons of Horſe, were ſent back on the ſecond of October; the reſt of the Forces ſoon after embark'd at Oſtend for England: And thus ended this Expedition.

Reflections on his Majeſty's Conduct during the Campaign.

As to the Reſidue of the Campaign under his Majeſty's immediate Inſpection, it produced nothing material, unleſs the invidious Reflections of his Enemies on his Inactivity, ſhould be deem'd ſo: According to them, his Army, while he continu'd at Grammen, was near a hundred thouſand ſtrong; and that of Mr. Luxemburgh, poſted at Courtray, not above fifty thouſand. They ſay, that if the French Lines at that Place were too ſtrong to be forc'd, thoſe between the Lys and Dunkirk could not have been defended, unleſs the Marſhal had brought down his whole Army for that Purpoſe; in which caſe he had left Courtray expos'd, together with all the unfiniſh'd Works at that time erecting there. They farther ſay, that if his Majeſty had been repuls'd in this Attempt, he might, nevertheleſs, have march'd up the Scheld, and, by throwing Bridges over it, which they repreſent as the eaſieſt thing imaginable, not only laid the French Conqueſts under Contribution, but march'd into France it ſelf. And, laſtly, they ſay, that as Furnes was but five Miles directly on from Newport, and Dixmuyde but ſeven on one Side of it, which was in our Poſſeſſion, thoſe Places were not worth the Gariſons that held them, more eſpecially as the Diſtrict they commanded, would not furniſh Subſiſtence for a thouſand Men.

What was yet more provoking than all, the Troops of Brandenburgh and Liege, which had alſo been re-inforc'd with four thouſand Walloons and Spaniards, inſtead of entering into the French Territories between the Sambre and the Meuſe, as had been given out, made no Attempt at all, but lay quietly upon their Arms at Waren, between Liege and Brabant, while, on the other hand, Mr. de Boufflers, with about ſix thouſand Horſe, ſuch Bodies of Foot as he could draw out of the ſeveral Gariſons of Dunkirk, Namur, and Maubeuge, march'd on the 23d of September to St. Tron; and the next Day ſent out his Parties on every Side, which burnt ſeveral Villages,

A. D. 1692. Villages, and laid the whole Diſtrict under Contribution: After which, when it was expected that he would have paſs'd into Germany, to re-inforce Mr. de Linges, he found Ways and Means to increaſe his Army to almoſt twenty thouſand Men, and, all at once, inveſted Charleroy; Mr. de Luxemburgh, at the ſame time, removing from Leuſe, and taking up his Quarters in the Neighbourhood of Condé.

Charleroy bombarded by Mr. de Bouffiers.

The Confederates were thunder-ſtruck at theſe new Motions; which they ſo little expected, that the King had left the Army on the 26th, under the Command of the Elector of Bavaria, and had repair'd in great Compoſure to his darling Retreat at Loo. On the 28th, the Camp at Grammen broke up, the Foot marching to Mariekerke, and the Horſe to Gaure; and nothing ſeem'd to be thought of at the Hague, but Preparations to give their Stadtholder ſuch a Reception, as would have been more ſuitable to a Conqueror. The News did not reach his Majeſty till the 16th of October, when he was on the Road to the Hague; and what an Effect it had upon him, may be gathered from his returning full ſpeed to Bruſſels, where a Council of War was immediately held; and, upon the Iſſue, it was reſolv'd to put the Army into Motion, which had been already re-aſſembled, and lay encamp'd between the Village of Ixells and Hall, in order to raiſe the Siege. His Majeſty could not, however, ſtay to take upon him the Command, becauſe a Proclamation had been ſet forth on the 22d of September for the Parliament to meet on the fourth of November, for the Diſpatch of Buſineſs; and he choſe to open it in Perſon; but having adjuſted the Scheme of Operations with the Elector of Bavaria, departed the next Day at Noon; and by travelling all Night reach'd the Hague on the 21ſt, about ten in the Morning.

Mr. de Bouffiers, in the mean time, had on the 19th began to bombard Charleroy, and continu'd to do ſo all that Day, and till Noon of the next; but then, receiving Advice, that the Confederates were marching towards him, he diſmounted his Batteries, and remov'd towards Philipville: And his Electoral Highneſs having on the 21ſt, according to our Accounts, or the 23d, according to the French, put a Reinforcement of two thouſand Men into the Place, together with a ſufficient Quantity of Ammunition and Proviſion, having alſo ſupply'd Aeth in the like manner, immediately broke up his Army, and diſtributed them in their Winter-Quarters, without ſeeming to entertain a Thought of making Reprizals on the French.

Mr. de Luxemburgh had all this while lain quietly in his Cantonments between Condé, Leuze, and Tournay; but being now convinc'd that nothing more was to be apprehended from the Efforts of the Allies, return'd to Paris; and in his Abſence, the chief Command in Flanders was transferr'd to Mr. de Bouffiers, who took up his Reſidence at Mons.

Having thus cloſ'd the Scene on the Side of Flanders, we muſt now proceed to the Stage of Germany. Of the chief Actors there, we have already ſpoke, viz. of the Landtgrave of Heſſe, and the Prince of Bareith, on one Side, and the Marſhal de Lorges on the other. But before we can open the Campaign, it is neceſſary to touch upon a remarkable Incident which preceded it. Velt-Marſhal de Schoening, who, in conjunction with Mr. Knock, had negociated and ſign'd the Alliance between the two Electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh, having repair'd to Doblitz in Bohemia, for the Benefit of the Baths of that Place, was there ſeiz'd in the Night, between the 24th and 25th of June, N. S. by a Party of Imperial Dragoons, together with his Papers, Money, and ſome of his principal Domeſtics; and having been poſted firſt to Prague, was from thence remov'd to the Caſtle of Speilbergh in Moravia. To juſtify this violent Procedure, it was given out, That he had held a ſecret Correſpondence with the French Court, by the Means of Mr. Bedal, his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's Reſident at Dreſden: That it was owing to his Intrigues that the Caſtle of Namur was ſo ſoon ſurrender'd: That his real Buſineſs in Bohemia was to create Troubles there, &c. But his real Crimes were the Concern he had in the Treaty above-mention'd, and the fatal Meaſure of withdrawing of the Saxon Troops out of the common Service in the Spring. The Elector his Maſter did not fail to interpoſe in his Favour, and even to expoſtulate with the Imperial Court in very high Terms upon it: But all the Satisfaction he could procure, was, firſt, a Reſcript from his Imperial Majeſty, allowing him to ſend Commiſſaries to be preſent at his Examination, and, laſtly, after the Marſhal had been kept in cloſe Cuſtody for upwards of two Years, a Warrant for his Diſcharge, on the hard Condition of his never being employ'd in the Empire any more.

A. D. 1692. General Schoening ſeiz'd in Bohemia by the Emperor's Order.

This was a new and notorious Proof, that the Differences between the Imperial Court and that of Dreſden, were farther than ever from a Deciſion; and while every Link of the German Concert was enfeebled by ſo ill an Example, the two Generals on the Upper Rhine could form no perfect Scheme of joint Operations, becauſe neither would give up his Pretenſions to the chief Command. The Landtgrave hearing that Mr. de Lorges had burnt this Camp near Creutznac, and was marching towards Flonheim, had indeed paſs'd the Rhine at Mentz in the Beginning of July, and advanc'd towards Worms, while the Margrave kept his Poſt on the Neckar, and undertook to open a Paſſage of his own, by throwing a Bridge over the firſt of thoſe Rivers: But, according to Mr. de Feuquieres's Account, theſe ſeparate Meaſures might have been very eaſily improv'd to the Ruin of both: For the Body of Forces under the Landtgrave, were not only inferior to the French, but actually fell within their Power; and by the Precautions which Mr. de Lorges had taken to ſecure the Iſland of Sandthoven, which had been found by laſt Year's Expe-

Quarrel of the Princes of Heſſe and Bareith for the chief Command.

A. D. 1692. rience so commodious for a Bridge, the Margrave had Batteries to erect, and many Difficulties to surmount, before he could raise the Bridge which he propos'd to make use of.

There was a small Party of French in Worms, which the Landtgrave requir'd to surrender at Discretion. This Message was sent on the fourth, by a thousand Dragoons: But the Commandant not knowing how great a Force had pass'd the Rhine, and were at hand, resolutely answer'd, That he was provided for a Defence. This drew on an Attack, which hasted several Hours; in which Interval Mr. de Lorges, having receiv'd Advice of their Danger, posted five Squadrons of Horse to their Assistance: But they arriv'd too late: The Germans carry'd the Post Sword in Hand, and put all to the Sword, except a few Officers. The next Day both Armies encamp'd within Cannon-shot of each other; and that of the Germans in a Place so expos'd, and so utterly indefensible, that nothing could have sav'd them from utter Destruction, but the Scruples of Mr. de Lorges, who could not be prevail'd upon to depart from the Letter of his Orders. By these he was directed to act upon the Defensive only; and there being a small Stream between the two Armies, he would not run the least Risque in passing it, but rather chose to march round by the Head of it, in Order of Battle, which took up so much Time, that the Landtgrave had not only Leisure to become sensible of the Danger he had brought himself into, but to extricate himself out of it. On the other hand, it is certain, that the Re-inforcements which Mr. de Lorges expected, of Horse from Flanders, under Mr. de Coigny, and of Foot from Mr. de Joyeuse, who, about this time, receiv'd Orders to break up his Camp in Enfelt, were not arriv'd; and that if the Germans had made Use of this Opportunity to press him with their whole Force, they might, perhaps, have given the Law in Alsace, and thereby created such a Diversion, as had greatly facilitated the Efforts of the Allies in Flanders.

The Margrave, in the mean time, found the Difficulty of his Undertaking so much increas'd by the Measures which Mr. de Lorges had taken for defending the Passage of the Rhine at Sandthoven, that all August was wasted before he could carry his Point; nor had he succeeded then, if a sudden Swell of that River had not overflow'd both the Island and the Shores on each Side, which not only disabled the French from making use of their Batteries, but oblig'd them to dillodge, and leave ten Pieces of their Cannon behind them.

It was now indispensibly necessary for the two Generals to have an Interview, not only to find some Expedient, either to settle or suspend the Contest about the Precedency, but also to deliberate on the Plan of Operations, which Mr. Gortz had brought from the Confederates in Flanders. An Interview they had accordingly, at a Place call'd Rebthach, within a League of Heydelburgh: All the General-Officers assisted; and so far did they come to an Agreement, that, upon the Issue, it was resolv'd, That the Landtgrave, with his Division of Troops, should repass the Rhine at Mentz: That a strong Body of Horse, under the Command of Count Stirum should be detach'd to cover his Retreat: That two Regiments of Dragoons, and two Battalions of Suabians, should take Post at Sinshiem to observe the Motions of the Enemy on that Side: And that, after the Junction of the two Armies, they should act in Concert against the Enemy. A. D. 1692.

This Interview took place on the 23d of August, and on the last of the Month, the Landtgrave pass'd the Rhine at Mentz, and the Neckar at Heydelburgh, with all his Cavalry and Hussars: On the first of September his Foot and Artillery follow'd; and the two Armies having join'd each other the same Day, they immediately pass'd the Rhine, over the Margrave's Bridge near Manheim. This took up the Residue of the first, and all the second; and upon the third, they continu'd their March, with a Purpose to attack that Party of the Enemy which had been posted at Sandthoven, and which had retreated to Spires, under the Command of the Marquis de Feuquieres. The Marquis himself has taken care to give us a circumstantial Account of what follow'd, tho' not without some Inconsistency; for, in the first Part of his Memoirs, he tells us, He had sent constant Intelligence to the General (de Lorges) both of the building and completing the Bridge: And in the last, he says, That when he succeeded to the Command, he found the Enemy had taken the Opportunity of a Swell of the Rhine to finish their Bridge, unknown to Mr. de Mela, who had the Command before him, and had already pass'd over four thousand Men. He afterwards proceeds to say, That this Body alone was too strong for his, which had been reduc'd by Sickness to less than three thousand: That, therefore, the only Expedient left was to cover himself with a Branch of the Spirebach (a small River which passes through Neustadt, and falls into the Rhine at Spires) to give Notice to his General (who, according to him, was nine Leagues off) of the Enemy's Motions, and to make the best Disposition he could to receive them at the Outlet of the Dyke of Opau, towards which, the Projection of their Bridge was made: That, accordingly, in the Space of twenty-four Hours, he made a shift to throw up Entrenchments, to raise a Battery of five Pieces of Cannon, and to present such a Front to the Enemy as he could best sustain, and they could least annoy: That the Orders he receiv'd from Mr. de Lorges, were to retire through Little Holland to Philipsburgh, and to mark out a Camp for his Army there; by which Motion he thought to oblige the Enemy once more to repass the Rhine: That when these Orders came to hand, they (the Enemy) were within Cannon Shot, which render'd it impossible for him to obey them; for having a Plain of three Leagues to cross, and they having no

A.D. 1692. less than a hundred Squadrons of Horſe, his whole Corps muſt have been infallibly cut to Pieces in the Experiment: That about four in the Afternoon the Attack was begun, and ſupported by the whole Force of the Confederate Army, but withal under ſo pitiful a Direction, that, inſtead of ſurrounding him, as with ſo vaſt a Superiority of Number, it was in their Power to do, and by which he muſt have been inevitably ruin'd, they contented themſelves with charging him in Front only, which drew the Conteſt into Length, and gave Mr. de Lorges an Opportunity to come up to his Relief: That by this time the Confederates were not only in Deſpair of Succeſs, but, in a manner, at the Mercy of the Marſhal; for, in the Progreſs of this Affair, all of them had enter'd what is called the Landſwart, and had no way out but thro' two Gates: That this great Advantage was not only pointed out to the Marſhal, but enforc'd with all the Remonſtrances that could poſſibly be made, but without Effect; and that he ſuffer'd them to retreat about Midnight, without giving them the leaſt Diſturbance, for the ſame Reaſon as had determin'd him at Worms, becauſe he would not break thro' his defenſive Orders.

[Memoirs of Europe.] It is thus the Story is told in Subſtance by the Marquis; but, according to other Accounts, Mr. de Lorges was himſelf advanc'd to Little Holland on the Day of the Engagement, and detach'd nine Battalions to re-inforce Mr. de Feuquieres, which came up at the very Beginning of the Attack. From theſe Accounts, we alſo learn, that a Part of the Iriſh Troops, by the Articles of Limerick ſo liberally made over to the Service of France, behav'd extremely well on this Occaſion: That as to the Retreat of the Confederates out of the Landſwart, they had, from the Beginning, provided for it, by ſecuring a Tower that commanded one of the Paſſes: And that whereas the Marquis computes the Loſs of the Confederates at a thouſand or twelve hundred, they acknowledge but three hundred kill'd and wounded.

All Europe now expected, that the Confederates would have laid Siege to Landau, or, at leaſt, that they would have undertaken ſome other Enterprize of equal Importance: But, inſtead of anſwering this Expectation, they amus'd themſelves for ten Days together in throwing up Entrenchments to cover their Bridge, and, in re-fortifying Old Manheim, as a proper Poſt for a ſtrong Gariſon, to ſecure the Paſſage of the Rhine; for ſo they gave out; but the Truth was, That the Quarrel between the two Commanders broke out a-freſh; That all Conſiderations were ſacrificed on both Sides to the Luſt of Power: And the only thing they agreed in, during this whole Interval, was in furniſhing out this Pretence, to cover the ill Effects of their Diſſention. At laſt, however the Landtgrave refus'd to countenance even this Pretence any longer; but decamping with his Troops on the 13th from Mannheim, march'd on to Mutterſtadt, and left the Margrave to follow him, or not, as he thought proper. Moſt fortunately, at this very Criſis, the Count de Halsanlse arriv'd in his Camp, with Inſtructions from the Imperial Court, to make up the Difference, if poſſible: And ſo much Regard was paid to his Remonſtrances, that on the 16th the two Armies once more join'd in the way to Neuſtadt; and, at a general Council of War held the ſame Day in the Prince of Bareith's Quarters, an Accommodation was made, and the Landtgrave was induc'd to wave his Pretenſions, on Condition that the Troops under his Command ſhould have the Van-guard. A.D. 1692.

The ſame Evening both Armies encamp'd in the Neighbourhood of Neuſtadt, which the French had abandon'd: And towards the Cloſe of the next Day, certain Peaſants brought Advice, That Part of the French Army was in full March toward Fort-Louis; that they plunder'd and burnt all the Villages as they paſs'd along; and that their Purpoſe was to paſs the Rhine, and lay the Country of Wirtemburgh under Contribution. Nothing could have been more material than this Intelligence; and yet nothing could have been leſs regarded: Inſtead of taking inſtant Meaſures to follow them, the 18th, 19th, and 20th were employ'd in reducing certain little Forts within reach of the Camp: And on the laſt of thoſe Days, the Landtgrave, with eight thouſand Men decamp'd to inveſt the ſtrong Caſtle of Ebernburgh. What was yet more extraordinary, when ſeveral Deſerters from the Enemy, on the 21ſt, not only confirm'd the Report of the Peaſants, but with this Addition, That they had actually paſs'd the Rhine, and were committing all manner of Devaſtations, hardly any Credit was given to their Story; and the Duke, Adminiſtrator of that Country, was detach'd with five Regiments of Horſe to join the Body poſted at Sinſheim, rather by way of Precaution, than in a Belief, that he would find any Employment. On the 23d, however, the Margrave remov'd from Eberſtein to Frankendal; and having receiv'd freſh Intelligence the next Day, that the Detachment of French which had paſs'd the Rhine, was much ſtronger than had been at firſt reported, decamp'd immediately; and, having repaſs'd the Rhine, order'd all his Horſe to advance as faſt as poſſible to re-inforce the Duke of Wirtemburgh. It was the 28th when the Latter paſs'd by Heydelburgh. On the ſame Day, the Marſhal de Lorges, who, in this Interval, had paſs'd the Rhine at Philipſburgh, with his whole Army, and had reduc'd the Town of Portzheim on the River Entz, fell upon his Highneſs, and his little Party near Entz-Wahingben, having taken Advantage of a thick Fog to ſurprize him in his Quarters, and to deſtroy and diſperſe the whole Party, before they could take Horſe. Above nine hundred Men were kill'd upon the Spot, four hundred were taken Priſoners; and among the Latter, the Duke himſelf, and the Count de Soyer, Major-General of the Bavarians: Seven Standards, two Pair of Kettle-Drums, two Field-Pieces, together with the Baggage and Horſes of the whole Corps, fell alſo into the Hands of the Enemy: And what was worſe than all, the whole Duchy lay

A. D. 1691. lay open to all the Ravages and Impositions that could be levy'd or committed by a victorious Army, who had no Enemy to ſtand in awe of, and whoſe only Buſineſs was Rapine and Deſtruction. They penetrated as far as Stutgart, the Capital of the Country; they firſt plunder'd and then burnt the Towns and Villages; and when they were in a manner glutted with particular Miſchiefs, they demanded a general Contribution of two hundred thouſand Crowns, and took as many Priſoners as they thought proper, by way of Hoſtage for the Payment of it.

As to the Prince of Bareith, he was ſo far from being any longer in a Condition to face the Enemy, that he was oblig'd to take Sanctuary with the reſt of his Army under the Cannon of Heydelburgh, and to demand a Re-inforcement from the Landtgrave of Heſſe. The Loſs of the Duke of Wirtemburgh's Party had render'd the Enemy ſuperior in Horſe; and the very Moment he prepar'd to repaſs the Rhine, the Troops which had been furniſh'd by the King of Sweden, as Duke of Bremen, quitted the Service, with a Declaration, that they had fulfill'd the Duties of the Campaign; and tho' ſolicited in the moſt preſſing manner to continue in the Field, till the neceſſary Meaſures had been taken to oblige the French to repaſs the Rhine, peremptorily refus'd, and pleaded the poſitive Orders of his Swediſh Majeſty for their Juſtification.

Thus Mr. de Lorges was in a Condition to give the Law in Germany; and Mr. de Feuquieres has made it the third capital Objection to his Conduct, during this Campaign, That he did not improve this great Opportunity, to re-transfer all the German War to the other Side of the Rhine, and conſequently to maintain it at the Expence of the Empire; whereas, when he had exhauſted the Duchy of Wirtemburgh, and laid the principal Towns in Ruins, he repaſs'd that River at Philipſburgh, in hope to ſurprize the Landtgrave of Heſſe under the Walls of Ebernburgh, which he had not been able to reduce: But the Landtgrave had Intelligence of his March time enough to be on his Guard; and having rais'd the Siege on the eighth of October, once more repaſs'd the Rhine. Soon after which, the Troops on both Sides being ſufficiently harraſs'd with the hard Duty they had undergone, were diſtributed into Quarters of Refreſhment.

and obliges the Landtgrave to raiſe the Siege of Ebernburgh.

As to the Confederate Forces of Cologne, Neuburgh, Munſter, &c. they did indeed take the Field, and ſo far contributed to the Common Cauſe, as to oblige the Enemy to keep a Body of Troops to obſerve their Motions, and cover their Frontier againſt their Incurſions: But as to any Feats perform'd by them, it is in vain to make any Enquiry. About the Middle of September they made a Shift to advance from Limburg into the Diſtrict of Stavelo, towards the Ardenne and the Meuſe; and we are told they rais'd Contributions as far as St. With and Verviers. They alſo detach'd two thouſand Horſe, and eighteen hundred Foot, making twelve Battalions, and three Squadrons, with ſix Pieces of Cannon, to attack the Marquis d'Harcourt, without knowing his true Strength, or how advantageouſly he was poſted; and the Succeſs was agreeable to the Raſhneſs of the Enterprize: The Marquis had five Battalions, and twenty-four Squadrons under his Command; his Camp was well choſen; and he had ſix Pieces of Cannon to encounter theirs: And yet, notwithſtanding all theſe manifeſt Diſadvantages, the Confederate-Horſe began the Charge as ſoon as they were within reach of the Enemy, without waiting for their Foot and their Field-pieces to come up, and having been once repuls'd, as precipitately made off; leaving, according to their own Accounts, one hundred and fifty of their Party dead behind them, and the Count de Velan, their Commanding-Officer, and two Captains Priſoners in the Hands of the Enemy. And, after this Miſadventure, we hear no more of them, except that they continu'd encamp'd in the Valley of Sleyden, near Gemmond, till the End of September: That the Troops of Cologne and Neuburgh then ſeparated from thoſe of Munſter, and march'd towards Luxemburgh: That they return'd ſome Days after, and took Poſt near Zulpich; and, that after ſeveral Conferences among the General-Officers, and ſeveral other Motions, all of equal Importance, they cloſ'd the Campaign with making the beſt Proviſion they could for the Security of the Counties lying between the Rhine, the Meuſe, and the Moſelle, during the Winter Seaſon.

A Detachment of the Confederates repulſed by the A. D. 1691. Marquis d'Harcourt.

Having found the Imperialiſts thus inefficient againſt their great Enemy on this Side, it is but natural to ſuppoſe, that their great Effort was made on the other; and that, in Conſequence thereof, the Turks were at laſt reduc'd to the Neceſſity of accepting ſuch a Peace, as his Imperial Majeſty ſhould think fit to impoſe.

The Seaſon for Action open'd as favourably for them as could have been wiſh'd; for when the Councils of the Divan ſhould have turn'd ſolely on the Means of relieving Great-Waradin (which had continu'd under all the Preſſures of a cloſe Blockade all Winter long, and was now more than ever ſtraiten'd by General Heuſſar who had the Command before it) and of making all the neceſſary Preparations for acting offenſively both in Hungary and againſt the Venetians, the Seraglio itſelf was rent into Parties, and diſtracted with Cabals and Intrigues, which were in a great Degree the Reſult of private Ambition, tho' varniſh'd over as uſual with public Pretences: The Viſier made it his chief Buſineſs to have no Competitor; and to be rid, if poſſible, even of his very Fears, put to death the Janizar Aga, and three other principal Baſhaws, and ſeiz'd on their Eſtates: He alſo diſplac'd the Muſſi, who had put himſelf at the Head of his Opponents, and would have ſtrangled him, if he had not apprehended the Reſentments of the People. But all theſe Precautions only ſerv'd to haſten his own Ruin: The diſcarded Muſti had not loſt his Credit with his Poſt; and the new one either thought it became him to tread in the Steps of his Predeceſſor, that he might

A. D. 1691. share in his Popularity, or that he ought to lift at his Maker, to ſecure his own Eſtabliſhment: Thus, he was ſcarce warm in his Office, before he enter'd into Confederacy with the Caimacan, whom the Viſier intended to deſtroy next, and made ſo ſtrong a Remonſtrance againſt him to the Sultan, accompany'd it with ſuch a Variety of Proofs in ſupport of every Article, and deduc'd ſuch a Series of frightful Conſequences, that his Sublime Highneſs, who was himſelf, perhaps, of the Cabal, and glad of an Opportunity to ſhake off an imperious Miniſter, gave Credit to all; and in the firſt Tranſports of his Indignation, call'd him Infidel, reproach'd him with the removing of his beſt Servants; and order'd the Executioner to cut off his Head: But, at the Deſire of thoſe preſent, only remov'd him to the Dardanells, together with his Son, his Kaia, and the principal of his Accomplices. The Perſon nam'd to ſucceed him was Ali, Baſhaw of Derbeker in Meſopotamia, for whoſe Head he had actually ſent; and had not an Arabian overtook the Meſſenger of Death on the Road, he had never had a Glimpſe of the Honour that was deſign'd for him. It was ſome time, however, before he could reach the Capital; and, according to the Maxims of his Predeceſſors it was his firſt and great Buſineſs, after his Arrival, to new-model the Court and the Empire, by dividing the Truſts and Profits of both among his own Creatures. In this tedious Interval, their Preparations for opening the Campaign went but ſlowly on, and the Gariſon of Great-Waradin being unable to ſupport their Diſtreſſes any longer, and, in utter Deſpair of all Relief, ſurrender'd by Capitulation on the third of June, N. S. The Imperialiſts, however, took no Advantage either of this Succeſs, or the Diſtractions which had made way for it. Poſſibly, they were now as weary of the War as the Turks themſelves, and had plac'd their principal Dependence on their Negotiations for a Peace: Mr. Harbord, the Engliſh Embaſſador to the Port, arriv'd at Belgrade about the End of July, in the Character of Mediator. The Viſier himſelf was but a Day or two behind him: The Conferences were open'd without Loſs of Time; and it was given out, that ſuch a Diſpoſition appear'd on both Sides, as made it reaſonable to conclude, That there was an Accommodation at hand. But whether this Repreſentation was true, or whether it was only given out to amuſe the World, the ſudden Death of Mr. Harbord, which happen'd on the 11th of Auguſt, N. S. gave a ſudden Damp to all Expectations of that nature: And' tho' Mr. Van Heinſkirke, the Dutch Envoy Extraordinary at Vienna, ſet out towards the End of September with full Power to ſupply Mr. Harbord's Place till the Arrival of Lord Paget, who was appointed to ſucceed him, it does not appear that they reviv'd any more during the Reſidue of this Seaſon.

A new Viſier.

Great Waradin capitulates.

Death of Mr. Harbord.

Prince Lewis of Baden, who had again the Command in Hungary, did not put himſelf at the Head of the Army till the 22d of Auguſt; and, late as it was, inſtead of entering immediately into Action, was forc'd to ſend a Remonſtrance to the Court of Vienna, ſetting forth the State of it, and the utter Impoſſibility of attempting any thing conſiderable this Campaign. A. D. 1691.

The Turks, on the other hand, were no more in a Condition to act offenſively than he: They had taken Poſt beyond the Save, near Belgrade, and fortify'd their Camp, as the Imperialiſts had done theirs in the Neighbourhood of Peter Waradin. And in this State of Inactivity, Things continu'd till the Approach of the Winter made it neceſſary for both to quit the Field, and take Shelter in their Quarters.

The Poles were ſtill Parties in the War; but as if all they had to do was to keep their German Allies in Countenance, they only drew out their Forces, and made a Shew of attacking Caminiec; and having ſpent ſome time in marching, encamping, and removing, as if in order thereto, gave over their Deſign when they were within reach of the Place; and, having poſted four thouſand Men to hold the Gariſon in check during the Winter, diſpers'd their Army: So that all the Merit which his Poliſh Majeſty could clame from his whole Summer's Service, was the rejecting the Offer of a ſeparate Peace, which had been made him by an Envoy from the Cham of Tartary. The Poles as inactive as the Imperialiſts.

As little was done by the Venetians; for tho' they acted offenſively in the Iſle of Candia, and laid a formal Siege to the ſtrong Town of Canea, which laſted from the 17th of July to the third of September, they were not able to reduce it; but having loſt great Numbers in the Attempt by Sickneſs, Deſertion, and the Sword, were oblig'd to give it over, and re-embark the Remains of their Army for Neopoli de Malvaſia in the Morea. The Venetians forc'd to raiſe the Siege of Canea.

The Allies in Italy, in the mean time, prepar'd to exert themſelves in a very extraordinary manner, and, in all Appearance, had the faireſt Opportunity to do ſo which had ever occurr'd in the Memory of Man. By a Liſt of their Forces ſtill extant, their Army was upwards of fifty thouſand ſtrong; and, on the other hand, France was ſo many ways beſet, and had ſo many Projects in hand, that ſhe could only act on the Defenſive on that Side: Others, indeed, ſuggeſt, that ſhe took ſufficient Precautions in the Cabinet, though ſhe ſeem'd to give up the Field; and that by maintaining a cloſe Correſpondence with the Generaliſſimo, ſhe had ſo much the leſs Reaſon to be apprehenſive of his Army.

How well theſe Suggeſtions are founded, will appear in its Place: But, according to the Outſide of Things, Mr. Catinat was in no Condition to withſtand the great Efforts that were likely to be made againſt him, or to anſwer what was expected from him.

The Allies did not, however, apply their Superiority to recover Savoy out of his Hands, but to make ſufficient Reprizals, by entering into France, and thereby create ſuch a Diverſion, as ſhould not only render the Work of the Confederate Princes in Germany eaſy, but The Duke of Savoy invades Dauphiné.

A. D. 1692. but extend to Flanders, and generally to every Province of the War.

Agreeable to this Plan, a Body of four thouſand Men were poſted to obſerve the Gariſon of Caſal; and another of upwards of fifteen thouſand, under the Command of Count Palſi, to ſtraiten that of Pignerol, as alſo to attend the Motions of Mr. Catinat; while the main Body of the Confederates pour'd into Dauphiné; which they did towards the Beginning of Auguſt, in three Diviſions; the Van-guard conſiſting of upwards of ſeven thouſand, being led by the Prince de Commerci and the Marquis de Parella; the Center, of almoſt twenty thouſand, by the Duke of Savoy and the Marquis de Leganez; and the Rear, of four thouſand Vaudois and French Refugees, by the Duke of Schomberg.

Mr. Catinat, we are told, had early Intelligence of this Deſign; but ſo little apprehended the Succeſs of it, that, in Raillery, he ſent a Meſſage to the Prince of Commerci to wiſh him a good Journey: He, nevertheleſs, thought it adviſeable to give Count Palſi and his Detachment the ſlip in order to coaſt the Invaders as well as the Country would give him leave; and by that Means had the Mortification to ſee them inveſt Guilleſtre, from the other Side of the River Durance, without having it in his Power to relieve it, or even to ſtay in Preſence of the Enemy. The Place, however, which was gariſon'd by two hundred of our Iriſh, and ſix hundred Militia, held out two Days, and then ſurrender'd at Diſcretion. His Royal Highneſs proceeded in the next Place to Ambrun, which he inveſted in form on the fifth of Auguſt, and employ'd ten Days, not ſome Weeks, as Biſhop Burnet aſſerts, in reducing it; which were thought abundantly too much for ſo inconſiderable a Place. But if he was blameable for being ſo dilatory in his Operations before it, he was much more ſo for continuing on the ſame Spot twelve Days more, after he had won it, under the Pretence of raiſing Contributions. Indeed many Councils of War were held in the Interval, but they produc'd no Reſolution; except that the Marquis de Leganez, with Part of his own Spaniards, and three thouſand of the other Confederates, ſhould march back to Guilleſtre, to ſecure the Communication between that Place and Ambrun, and to obſerve Mr. Catinat, who had taken Poſt at Briançon.

Now Briançon was the Place where the French had their chief Magazines; and thoſe who are moſt diſguſted with the Conduct of his Royal Highneſs, affirm, that, inſtead of loſing his time at Guilleſtre and Ambrun, he ſhould have repair'd thither firſt; in which caſe not only all thoſe Magazines had fallen into his Hands, but he had cut off Mr. Catinat's Retreat, and ſecur'd his own with one and the ſame Motion. [Memoirs of Savoy.]

The ſame Perſons farther affirm, that the Project of entering into Dauphiné conſiſted of two Parts, and was to operate two ways; for while the Duke of Savoy and the Confederates were employ'd in making Acquiſitions by the Sword, it was provided that the Duke of Schomberg, with the ſeparate Corps in the Pay of England, under his Command, ſhould endeavour to excite a Revolt among the new Converts, by undertaking to play the Part of a Deliverer in the Right of his Royal Maſter. Thus, upon his Entrance into the Territories of France, we find him ſpreading a Declaration in his Majeſty's Name; which, in the Preamble, we are told, was calculated to remove any Apprehenſions which might be entertain'd, That his Majeſty deſign'd to viſit the Iniquities of King Lewis on his innocent Subjects: And in which it is ſet forth, "That as his Majeſty had been obliged to take up Arms for the Defence of his own invaded Rights, ſo he ſhould never employ them but for the Preſervation of the Rights of all Men: That his Intention in cauſing the Duke to enter France, was to re-eſtabliſh the Gentry and the Parliaments in their ancient Luſtre, and the People in their ancient Rights: That he knew the Gentry were trod under foot: That the Parliaments were without Authority, and the People overwhelm'd with Taxes: That an Opportunity was now offer'd, which might never, perhaps, be offer'd again, to redreſs the Grievances of all, if they thought proper to embrace it: That his Majeſty had their Intereſt at Heart, as well as his own: That nothing could be more falſe than what had been given out by the Clergy to animate the People, that this was a religious War: That as a Proof of the Contrary, the Duke was authoriz'd by his Majeſty to take the ſaid Clergy of all Ranks under his Protection, to ſecure to them all their Poſſeſſions, Privileges, and Immunities; to chaſtiſe in the moſt exemplary manner, all thoſe who ſhould offer them the leaſt Outrage, and to engage, that no Alteration ſhould be made with reſpect to the Roman Catholic Religion: That, nevertheleſs, as the Kings of England were Guarantees of the Edict of Nantz, his Majeſty thought himſelf oblig'd to maintain that Guarantee, and to re-eſtabliſh that Edict: That all good Frenchmen ought to aſſiſt him in it, becauſe the ſaid Edict was the great Effect of the Wiſdom of Henry the IVth, whoſe Memory was ſo dear to them: That all ſuch of the Roman Catholics as had had the Generoſity to compaſſionate the Sufferings of the Reformed, would, undoubtedly, take Pleaſure in their Re-eſtabliſhment: That it was hop'd even the Clergy themſelves would be glad to teſtify, by their prudent and Chriſtian Behaviour, on this Occaſion, That they had no Concern in the Violation of that Edict, or the Cruelties which follow'd it: That thoſe who ſhould think fit to take Part with his Grace, ſhould receive ſuch Diſtinctions and Rewards as their Services merited, or he ſhould be in a Condition to beſtow: That, on the contrary, all thoſe, who inſtead of aiding and aſſiſting him, ſhould join with the Oppreſſors of his Country, were to expect all the Rigour of Military Execution; and that thoſe who continu'd quiet at home, without interfering either way, ſhould be no ways moleſted either in their Perſons or Eſtates." A Declaration ſet forth there in the Name of King William by the Duke of Schomberg. [Appendix to the Life of K. William, vol. ii.]

A. D. 1692. It is added, That all these fine Words had so good an Effect on the new Converts at least, that they came thronging in to the Duke of Schomberg on all Sides; and that if he had been enabled to give them Subsistence, and suffer'd to follow his own Measures, he would have made a better use of them than the Generalissimo did of his whole Army.

Now these Measures of his, according to the Report of these Gentlemen, were to march towards the Rhone, with a Purpose to excite an Insurrection in the Cevennes, to fortify himself there during the Winter, and early in the Spring to open a War in the very Bowels of France. He had already establish'd a Communication with the Malcontents there, by the Means of certain of his Officers, whom he had sent among them in the Guise of Peasants, and who had obtain'd a Promise from the Chiefs of them, of co-operating with his Grace, as soon as he was near enough to give them Protection. All this Mr. de Schomberg had communicated to the Duke of Savoy, and demanded his Concurrence in: But his Royal Highness, instead of granting it, is accus'd of making it his Business to defeat it; for, continuing true to his fundamental Maxim of seeming to serve his Allies, and doing real Service to himself, he form'd Pretences to retain Mr. de Schomberg and his Corps under his own Eye, and to discover his whole Project to the Court of France, together with a List of the Conspirators, who were all immediately seiz'd, and thrown into Prison. His Royal Highness is moreover accus'd of refusing to furnish Mr. Schomberg either with Ammunition or Provisions: The Consequence of which was, That the Majority of his new Associates not having had Bread to eat for eight Days together, and labouring besides under all manner of Difficulties and Discouragements, found themselves under a Necessity to desert their new Protector, and to make their Peace, by joining their own Militia against him; which they were yet farther induc'd to do, by seeing their Houses and Settlements plunder'd and burnt by the (d) Command of his Royal Highness, and the whole Country more cruelly and wantonly laid waste, than if it had been expos'd to the Incursions of the Turks and Tartars for many Campaigns together.

His Project frustrated, if not betray'd, by his Royal Highness.

It was in this manner one half of the Project of the Allies was dropt, almost as soon as it was enter'd upon: And for the other Half, over and above what has been said of his Royal Highness's dilatory Proceedings before Amburn, and his lingering so long there, after he had reduc'd it, he is charg'd with keeping up a regular Correspondence with the Enemy, and with having enter'd into an actual Concert with them, to retard the Progress of the Confederate Forces, as much as possible, or rather to proceed no farther with his Conquests than they gave him leave. But as all these several Articles are rather asserted than prov'd, our Conclusions only ought to be, That his Royal Highness lay in wait for a Treaty; not that he had concluded one: That he manag'd his present Superiority so as to convince the French Court, that they might have him if they would: That in order to work upon their Fears, he kept the Storm hovering over them: And that he would not suffer it to fall, because he would not make them desperate, and because he resolv'd to have no Sharers with him in the Profits of an Accommodation. A. D. 1692.

who falls ill of the Small Pox, and retires into his own Dominions.

It is farther alledg'd in his Justification, that he was taken ill at a Place call'd Saxines, in his March towards Gap; and having been twice let Blood, was forc'd to return to Amburn, where his Disorder prov'd to be the Small Pox, and, consequently, was of so critical a kind, that he was oblig'd to give himself up into the Hands of his Physicians, and to obey their Direction in all things: But his Army proceeded on to Gap notwithstanding: The French Forces deserted all the Passes, and retir'd as soon as they came in Sight: They found that Place abandon'd both by the Garison and the Inhabitants: They had the Benefit of all the Provisions and the Plunder, which they had left behind: The Country was every where alarm'd, and every where defenceless: And it was universally agreed, that not only Grenoble, but Lions itself, would have fallen into their Hands. His Royal Highness could not, however, be prevail'd on to transfer the chief Command, or to suffer the Allies to reap the Advantages that offer'd by any other Hand but his own. It is added, that the Pock was of so favourable a kind, that he was out of all Danger in eight Days time, and that he might have officiated in Person at the Head of the Army if he had thought fit: Instead of which, we are told, that he suddenly feign'd a Relapse, and, under that Pretence, came to a Resolution of evacuating all his new Acquisitions, and of retiring with his whole Force; which began to be put in Execution on the 15th of September; and, by the 19th, they were all in full March out of the French Territories, having left behind them many Monuments of their Cruelty, but none of their Valour.

Thus, an Expedition which had kindled such a Blaze of Expectation, ended in Smoke: And all we have farther to observe on the Summer's Transactions on that Side, is, That about the Middle of May, the French, with a Fleet of thirty-five Gallies, not only bombarded Oneglia, but actually took Possession of it. That while they were busy in setting fire to it, they were vigorously charg'd by a Body of the Militia, join'd with two hundred Veterans, who redeem'd the Prey out of their Hands, and oblig'd them to retire to their Ships: That in the Beginning of August, the Court of Spain set out a Fleet of sixteen Men of War, eighteen Gallies, and three Fire-ships to protect the Coasts of Italy, and contribute all that lay in their Power to the Efforts

(d) Some Authors disculpate the Duke, and ascribe these savage Orders to the Imperial and Spanish Commanders.

Laſtly, the bare Mention of the two Armies in Catalonia, is rather more than they deſerve; for, having waſted the whole Campaign in waiting the Motion of each other, they ſeverally broke up their Camps, and, without making any one Attempt of either Side, quitted the Field.

Proceedings with regard to the ninth Electorate.

There remains now but one Foreign Affair to be treated of, before it will be incumbent on us to reſume the Conſideration of our own; namely, the Suit that was making to the Emperor and Empire for erecting a ninth Electorate, in favour of the Houſe of Brunſwic-Lunenburgh. In this King William, as we have already ſeen, had the Honour to be prime Solicitor; and we are told by Biſhop Burnet, that the Conſent which he had obtain'd of his Imperial Majeſty, being conditional, that he alſo obtain'd that of the other Electors, the Imperial Miniſters made it their Buſineſs, under-hand, to traverſe the Affair, which they had ſeemingly agreed to.

Diſingenuity is the Maſter-tool of every Court; and, unfortunately, that Court is eſteem'd the ableſt that makes the moſt uſe of it, and draws the greateſt Advantages from it: But the Diſingenuity of the Court of Vienna had always ſomething peculiar in it; for when their Selfiſhneſs was detected, or their Ingratitude complain'd of, they cover'd themſelves with Haughtineſs, and diſcours'd as if they had a right to the Services of the World; and as if their Acceptance of thoſe Services, was an Over-recompence for them.

This the Princes of Lunenburgh were thoroughly ſenſible of, and, therefore, thought it their wiſeſt way to proſecute their Suit without ſeeming to feel the Injury: They had been oblig'd to perform their Part of the Covenant firſt; and it was the known Practice of the Imperial Miniſters in every ſuch Inſtance, to make a new Merit of every Advance on their Side, and over and above, to derive ſome new Advantage both to their Maſter and themſelves: Their Highneſſes had alſo many other Obſtacles to overcome, beſides thoſe which aroſe from the Selfiſhneſs of the Imperial Court. His Holineſs the Pope took the Alarm, and rais'd a Cry, That the Church was in Danger: The Houſe of Hanover, in whoſe favour the new Electorate was to be inſtituted, were Proteſters againſt his Supremacy, and therefore he proteſted againſt their Elevation. Several of the Electors alſo made uſe of the ſame Pretence to cover Ends and Purpoſes of their own: And what was worſe than all, the whole Eſtate of Princes, either out of Fear or Envy, or both, openly remonſtrated againſt the whole Procedure, as a Breach of the Capitulation which the Emperor had ſign'd on his Admiſſion to the Imperial Dignity, and deſtructive to the Germanic Conſtitution.

All this Variety of Diſcouragements, gave riſe to as great a Variety of Negotiations; ſome of which ſucceeded, and ſome not: The Pope was inacceſſible to a Proteſtant Prince; but then as his Holineſs had already began to temporize with France, his Imperial Majeſty was induc'd to overlook his Reſentment: And if the major Part of the Electors were prevail'd upon to give their Conſents, the reſt continu'd immoveable: And as to the Princes, they would not give it the leaſt Countenance. A. D. 1692.

All, therefore, depended on the Authority of the Imperial Court, and the Uſe that ſhould be made of it at the Diet; and as we find they were induc'd, not only to ſacrifice the great Article of Religion, but to adopt ſuch Expedients as ſerv'd to bring the Affair to an Iſſue, we cannot help ſuppoſing, That they only meant to hold the Houſe of Lunenburgh as long in Dependance as poſſible, and to make them pay as dear as poſſible for their Promotion, and never to diſappoint them of it.

Nov. the Remonſtrance of the College of Princes, above alluded to, was made to the Emperor before the Affair was mov'd in the Electoral College; and it is obvious, that his Miniſters might have taken Advantage of their Oppoſition, and the Diſſent of ſome of the Electors, to have inſiſted on ſuſpending it, till the Latter were unanimous, and till the Former were better diſpos'd to give it their Sanction; inſtead of which, they ſuffer'd the Electors to determine upon it by Plurality of Voices, and without imparting it to the College of Princes at all, though the Princes had caus'd a Declaration to be made to the Imperial Commiſſioners, That they would take no Cognizance of the Electoral Votes, if the Point in queſtion was not firſt communicated to them.

In virtue of theſe Conceſſions, therefore, and by the help of theſe Expedients, on the 17th of October it was reſolv'd in the College of Electors, That, in Conſideration of the humble Prayer of Prince Erneſt Auguſtus, Duke of Hanover, to the Emperor and the Lords Electors, as alſo of the great Merits of his Highneſs, the Power and Rank of his Houſe, and the Succours which he had already granted, and was ſtill to grant, againſt the Common Enemy, it was upon the Queſtion reſolv'd, That the Dignity of Elector ſhould be confer'd on him and his Heirs Male, and that he ſhould receive the Inveſtiture from his Imperial Majeſty, together with all the Honours, Rights, &c. thereunto belonging.

It is true, this very Vote was clogg'd with a Proviſo, That till the Diſpute which had aroſe between the Catholic and Proteſtant Electors (namely, that in caſe the Electorates of Bavaria and Palatine ſhould deſcend to the Proteſtant Heirs of thoſe Families, and thereby the Suffrages of the Proteſtants ſhould out-number thoſe of the Catholics, the Ballance ſhould be reſtor'd to the Latter by a new Creation, which Theſe contended for, and Thoſe oppos'd) ſhould be accommodated, the new Elector ſhould not be admitted into the College: And alſo a Requiſition to the Emperor, That he would not grant the Inveſtiture either by Letters-Patents or otherwiſe,

A. D. 1692. otherwise, till the Electoral College had determin'd after what manner he ſhould be receiv'd: But tho' the Duke's Admiſſion into the College was delay'd as long as poſſible, the Inveſtiture was, notwithſtanding, granted in Form by his Imperial Majeſty on the 19th of December following: On which ſolemn Occaſion, his Highneſs's two Plenipotentiaries, the Baron de Groot, and the Baron de Limbach, became his Repreſentatives; and, after performing the uſual Homages, and taking the uſual (e) Oaths of Vaſſalage and Fidelity on their Knees, at the Foot of the Imperial Throne, in the Name of his Electoral Highneſs, their Maſter, receiv'd the Electoral Bonnet; which was all that was wanting in point of Ceremony, to make the Dignity complete.

Having thus finiſhed the political Tour of Europe, for this Year, we ought now to attend the Seſſion of Parliament, which was open'd in Ireland on the ſixth of October, by the new Lord Lieutenant, Sydney: But, as we ſhall have Occaſion to touch on the Parliamentary Proceedings there, when we come to treat of thoſe of England, it will be moſt adviſeable to make but one Section of both; and by way of Introduction thereto, to give ſuch a Sketch of the Experiments made by the ſeveral Parties among us on the Minds of the People, thro' that common Vehicle, the Preſs, as may beſt ſerve to explane their ſeveral Purpoſes, and make us beſt acquainted with the real Temper of the Nation.

Account of the principal State-Tracts at this time made public, viz. [Reflections on King James's Letter of Invitation.]

While the Terrors of the Invaſion were yet impending, a Paper of Reflections had been ſet forth, under the Countenance, if not by the Authority of the Court, upon K. James's Letter of Invitation to his Privy Counſellors, to be preſent at the Delivery of his Queen, tending in general to ſhew, That when he ceas'd to be a King, he ceas'd to have a Privy Council: That the ſame Act of State which depriv'd him of the Crown, had extinguiſh'd the Pretenſions of his whole Line: That, conſequently, the People had no Concern in the Delivery: That the Right of the King and Queen could be no ways affected by it: That the Silence of Parliaments, in relation to the former Birth, inſtead of amounting to a tacit Admiſſion that it was real, according to the Allegations of the Jacobites, only ſerv'd to ſhew, That in the Opinions of thoſe Parliaments, the Government was ſettled on ſuch a Bottom, as render'd it quite immaterial, whether it was real or not: That a Prince, whoſe Religion was different from that of his People, was incapable to govern them: And, laſtly, that the Continuance of our Freedom and Happineſs depended on the Continuance of our Fidelity to King William and Queen Mary, who had done ſuch mighty things for us.

This Paper was follow'd by thoſe two of Dr. Lloyd's, call'd, A firſt and ſecond Letter to a Friend, concerning a French Invaſion to reſtore King James to his Throne, and what may be expected from him ſhould he be ſucceſsful in it. The laſt of theſe, which contains a formal Anſwer to King James's Declaration, we have already quoted: The Scope of Both is to work upon the Fears of the Nation: And, in order to do this in the moſt effectual manner, the Author endeavours to ſhew, That nothing was to be expected from King James, but a Repetition of the ſame Meaſures as had render'd him ſo juſtly odious before: That while he continu'd a Papiſt, and in ſo cloſe an Union with his moſt Chriſtian Brother of France, he could not be kind or juſt to his Proteſtant Subjects, if he would: That, if inſtead of being directed by Papiſts, as before, he ſhould now think it his Intereſt to be directed by Nonjurors, the Caſe of the Bulk of the People would be the ſame, and they would find the Yoke of the one as heavy, and the Reſentment as ſevere, as thoſe of the other: That his very Penitence was not to be truſted: That the Weight of the Taxes was the only Reproach that could be levell'd againſt the new Government: That thoſe Taxes aroſe from the Neceſſities of the Times: That we had a hopeful Proſpect of ſeeing an end of them: That our Men had now got a Habit of beating the French: That Revolutions were in their own nature chargeable Things: That one was enough for one Age: That how much ſoever the laſt had coſt, our Money had been well laid out; and that another would coſt ten times as much, and entail French Popery and Slavery upon us into the Bargain. A. D. 1692. Dr. Lloyd's two Letters.

Theſe again were re-inforc'd by two other Pieces of the ſame Nature and Tendency; namely, one entituled, The Pretences of the French Invaſion examin'd, for the Information of the People of England; and the other, Reflections on the late King James's Declaration. In the Former, theſe Pretences are thus enumerated: Viz. 1. The repairing the Injury done to the late King: 2. The delivering the People from the Oppreſſions they ſuffer'd under the preſent: 3. The ſettling the Government on its old Baſis: And, 4. The ſecuring the Proteſtant Religion for future Ages: And the Method taken to explode them, is, To ſhew, 1. That King James was the Author of his own Ruin; and that if he had never vacated his Throne, he had never been depriv'd of it. 2. That the Nation was never ſo free or ſo happy as at preſent; for even as to the Taxes which occaſion'd ſo much Clamour, they had given as much before, for aſſiſting France to ruin Europe, as now aſſiſted Europe to humble France. Pretences of the French Invaſion examin'd; and Reflections on K. James's Declaration.

(e) To this Effect: "That his Electoral Highneſs, for himſelf and his Heirs Male, will be always devoted, faithful and obedient to the Empire and Emperor: That he will always be ready to ſerve them: That he will not be preſent at any Counſels that ſhould be held, or engage in any Enterprizes that ſhould be reſolv'd againſt the Perſon of his Imperial Majeſty, his Honour, his Dignity, or his Intereſt: That, on the contrary, he will always maintain, defend and ſupport them to the utmoſt of his Power: That if he ſhould be informed of any Deſign to the Detriment of the Emperor or Empire, he ſhould immediately apprize his Imperial Majeſty thereof: And that he ſhould, on all Occaſions, do all that lay in his Power, and all that became the Duty of an obedient Elector and Vaſſal of his Imperial Majeſty and the Holy Roman Empire, according to the Laws and Conſtitution thereof, without any Fraud or mental Reſervation whatſoever."

A. D. 1692. France. 3. That, in effect, the Government ſtill reſted on its old Baſis; for tho' the Perſon of the King was chang'd, the Monarchy remain'd the ſame, and was likely to remain ſo; for tho' King William was a Republican in Holland, he was not ſuch a deſperate Foe to his own Intereſt as to uncrown himſelf and become the People's Vaſſal here: And, 4. That as to the Proteſtant Religion, it could never be ſecure under a Popiſh Prince, and that it could never be in Danger under the Head and Protector of all the Proteſtant Churches in Europe.

The Reflections, and indeed every other Paper from the ſame Quarter, made uſe of the ſame Topics, and brought all to the ſame Concluſion; only the Author of this laſt Piece does admit, that the Taxes levy'd on account of the War, were ſomewhat greater than ordinary: But then he qualifies this Conceſſion, by adding, That as they were legally impos'd, they could not be oppreſſive; and both the Reflecter and the Examiner make no Difficulty to pronounce, That in caſe King James was to be reſtor'd, the whole Kingdom would be immediately mortgag'd, to indemnify France for the Charge of the War in general, as well as that particular Service.

This was the Language of the Court-Advocates; and with what Confidence ſoever it was deliver'd, or Partiality it was receiv'd by thoſe under the ſame Influence, the Jacobites were ſo far from being ſilenc'd by it, that they took up the Pen as ſoon as their Adverſaries had laid it down, and uſed their Endeavours to prove, That there was not a ſingle Article which had been urg'd againſt King James, that might not be urged with more Juſtice againſt King William. Their Champion upon this Occaſion, was Sir James Montgomery, ſo often before mention'd: The Piece he ſet forth was that call'd Great Britain's juſt Complaint, ſo often before quoted; and the Taſk he undertook, was, to eſtabliſh the four ſeveral Pretences which the Examiner, by him ſuppos'd to be the Earl of Nottingham, had undertaken to ſubvert. According to him, the Prince of Orange inſpir'd King James with the very Councils which he afterwards improv'd to his Ruin: The Lords Sunderland and Churchill, though Favourites of the King, were Tools of his Highneſs, and made uſe of their Aſcendancy over their Maſter, to put him on the very worſt Meaſures that he is reproach'd with in the Prince's Declarations: If his Highneſs had not approv'd the Cruelties exercis'd in the Weſt, after Monmouth's Inſurrection, he would not have prefer'd Kirk in the Army, and Pollexfen on the Bench, who, after Jeffreys, were the principal Promoters of them: The Earl of Bath could bear witneſs, if he pleas'd, That nothing but the Importunity of thoſe about him had induc'd him to regulate Corporations, which he never could be brought to approve. His Majeſty's Evil Counſellors had ſince made a Merit of theſe Treacheries, and had not only met with Indemnity, but Rewards: His Highneſs had ſufficiently avow'd the real Purpoſes of his Expedition, by aſſuming and exerciſing the ſovereign Authority, before the King was withdrawn, or he had receiv'd any Deputation either from the Peers or People: The King's Deſertion was not voluntary, but the Reſult of the Treatment which he receiv'd, and the Practices that were try'd upon him: The Prince manifeſted his Luſt of Power, by cauſing the Convention to be inform'd, That he would not ſubmit to their intended Limitations: And how little Dependence was to be put on his Promiſes, not only by leaving the Diſpenſing Power, as he found it, but by exerting it in favour of Catholics more publicly and notoriouſly than ever King James had done, in the Capitulation of Limerick: In no Reign whatſoever, the Liberty of the Subject, which was their Birth-right, had been ſo abus'd, ſpoil'd, and broken in upon, as in this; in which Miniſters had firſt affronted the Laws in the groſſeſt manner, and then procur'd a Parliamentary Licence or Pardon for ſo doing; which was making the Nation Felo de ſe: More unqualify'd Perſons had Commiſſions in the Army than ever: A Governor (Sir William Phipps) had been impos'd on New England on the Quo-Warranto-Footing, even contrary to the Opinion of the Privy-Council: Criminal as it had been repreſented in his Highneſs's Declaration to reject the Petitions of the Subjects, a Petition from the Majority of the Scotiſh Parliament, founded on their National Claime of Right, had been ſcornfully and diſdainfully refus'd and rejected: And tho' in the ſame Declaration it had been objected to King James, that a Peer of England had been proſecuted for aſſerting, that the Subject was not bound to obey a Popiſh Juſtice of Peace, another Peer of England, the Earl Feverſham, had lately been order'd to leave the Kingdom, tho' accus'd of no Crime, and conſequently obnoxious to no Law: The Prince of Orange had compland'd of the cloſeting of Members to preengage their Votes, and yet not only contima'd that Practice himſelf, but diſcarded the Intractable without Mercy: The ſame Abuſes of appointing Judges irregularly, and keeping them in ſervile Dependence on the Court, of (f) extravagant Bail, of free Quarterings, the Exerciſe of Martial Law and Military Executions, which were held ſo intolerable under King James, were yet more flagrant under King William: His Highneſs had promis'd to concur in every thing that might procure the Happineſs of theſe Kingdoms, and yet had ſtifled ſeveral uſeful and neceſſary Bills, before they had paſs'd the Forms; and had in Scotland rejected ſeveral afterwards,

[Great Britain's juſt Complaint.]

(f) To illuſtrate this Topic, he adds, That when certain injur'd Perſons, who were intirely in the Intereſt of the Government, laid their Complaints before the Secretary of State, by the Hands of the Knight of the Shire, they were ſcornfully rejected, with this Anſwer, That Men and Horſes muſt eat.

A. D. 1692. afterwards, as well as the Judges Bill in England: The Right and Power of levying Money had been acknowledg'd to be the Peculiar of the People in Parliament; and yet the Scotiſh Privy-Council had oblig'd the Subjects of that Kingdom, at their own Charge, to furniſh Carriages and Horſes for the Uſe of the Army, under the ſevereſt Penalties, by the Authority of a Proclamation only: As to the Freedom of Elections, the Frequency of Parliaments, and the employing them for Redreſs of national Grievances, it was notorious, that Elections were no longer free, becauſe the Court interpos'd in them openly, and made uſe of all the Influence both of Menaces and Rewards: That as to the Frequency of Parliament, it was metamorphos'd into Frequency of Seſſions; and as to the Redreſs of Grievances, it was no longer thought of: But the one Thing needful, was the giving Money; which being done, all was done; inſomuch, that the Court was in a fair way of having it in their Power to plead Preſcription againſt Parliaments, as to any other Buſineſs but Money-Bills: Laſtly, even Freedom of Speech, was, in effect, at an end; for as on the one hand, that Member was ſure to be turn'd out, who gave the leaſt Countenance to any popular Point, ſo on the other, the Money of the Nation, as well as the Places of Truſt and Profit in the Gift of the Court, were ſo openly and viſibly employ'd, to the debauching of Members from their Honour and Integrity, that all Public Spirit was at an end, and the great Purpoſes of Parliaments were more effectually fruſtrated than they could poſſibly be by violent Courſes.

It is in this manner Sir James endeavours to eſtabliſh a Belief, that both Prince and People had been equally injur'd under the Notions of an Abdication and a Deliverance: And to ſhew, that the Government had undergone an eſſential Alteration, he cites, firſt, The ſetting aſide the Clames of the ſuppos'd Prince of Wales, without a parliamentary Enquiry into the juſt and viſible Grounds of Suſpicion, mention'd in the Prince's Declaration; which Enquiry had been promis'd in the ſaid Declaration, had been aſſented to by King James himſelf, and had been petition'd for by ſeveral Perſons of Honour and Quality, in October, 1690: Secondly, That Clauſe in the Vote of Succeſſion, by which King William is continu'd in Poſſeſſion of the Crown, in caſe he ſurviv'd the Queen, to the Prejudice of the Princeſs of Denmark and her Children: Thirdly, he alledges, That by entailing the Crown on the Heirs of the Prince of Orange, the Clames and Rights of all the collateral Heirs were cut off; and upon the whole, pronounces, That it was not poſſible for the Wit of Men to contrive a Vote, which, in ſo few Words, could more viſibly alter the Nature of an Hereditary Monarchy. He then touches on our foreign Syſtem: Aſks on what Footing the then boaſted Confederacy was founded? Whether any Proviſion was made for re-aſſerting our ancient Title to the Crown of France, or even for the Recovery of the Maritime Provinces of that Realm, which was the Inheritance of our Kings, to compenſate our Labours in Flanders for the Benefit of Spain and Holland? Whether our preſent Clame to the Sovereignty of the Seas was likely to be eſtabliſh'd and confirm'd by the total Deſtruction of the French Fleet, which had more than once defeated that of England and Holland in Conjunction? Whether our domeſtic Miſeries were like to be countervail'd by new Acquiſitions of military Glory? And anſwers all in the Negative, by ſuggeſting, That the Glory and Intereſt of England were alike out of the Queſtion: That as the Revolution had been the Reſult of foreign Intrigues, ſo Foreigners were to reap the only Fruits of it: And inferring from the Loſs of Mons and Namur, and the Battles of Steenkirk and Fleruſ, That even in point of Succeſs, as little was to be expected from the future Conduct of the War, as had flow'd from the Former. Laſtly, to ſolve the Problem, That the Proteſtant Religion would be for ever ſecur'd by the Reſtoration of a Catholic King, he firſt inſinuates, which can never be believ'd, That King James, while on the Throne, if left to himſelf, would never have aimed at any more than the eſtabliſhing a bare Liberty of Conſcience: That the Extravagances he had been guilty of were owing to the blind Zeal of ſome, and the artful Treacheries of others: That the ill Succeſs of thoſe Attempts, had convinc'd him of the Folly and Danger of them: That the Catholics in England bore ſo ſmall a Proportion to the Bulk of the People, that it was utterly impoſſible for them to get the Maſtery: That France would never lend her Intereſt to bring about a National Converſion here, becauſe the Difference of Religion between the two Nations, was the principal Reaſon why we were not able to make as ſucceſsful Inroads into their Country now, as formerly: That King James was willing to return to his People on their own Terms, and to give them all the Securities that they themſelves ſhould require, both for their Civil and Religious Liberties: That, whatſoever was urg'd to the contrary, this was ſufficiently prov'd, by the Grant which he had made under his Great Seal to ſome Gentlemen of the Scotiſh Nation, who had been active againſt him, of the ſeveral Immunities which the Prince of Orange had refus'd them: That as to his Engagements to France and the Pope, which had been made ſuch a Bugbear, it was impoſſible he ſhould have any to the Latter, becauſe the Prince of Orange had all along been favour'd with the whole Intereſt of the Holy See againſt him: That as to the Former, the whole Expence of France in the Iriſh Expedition, did not exceed three hundred thouſand Louis-d'Ors: And it was not likely, that great Princes who had piqu'd themſelves in doing great and magnanimous Actions, would imitate the mercenary Temper of the Dutch, in making Merchandize of their Favours.——— A. D. 1692.

But we have follow'd him far enough: The whole Pamphlet takes up no leſs than ſixty-

A. D. 1692. sixty-one Quarto Pages, and was thought of such Importance, that though printed at a private Press, and circulated in a clandestine manner from Hand to Hand, it was thought expedient to send forth an Antidote to the Poison: And for fear that Antidote should not have Force and Virtue enough to disarm the Contagion, a Proclamation was issu'd on the 13th of September, against such evil-dispos'd Persons, as, in Contempt of the Royal Mercy and Clemency, which their Majesties had extended to their Subjects, as well by their general, as particular Pardons, did make it their Business to write and print sundry false, infamous, and scandalous Libels, as had a Tendency not only to traduce the Government and the Ministers, but to dispose the Minds of the People to Sedition and Rebellion, offering a Reward of twenty Pounds to such as would discover any Person or Persons who had receiv'd any such Libel to print or transcribe, and fifty Pounds for the Discovery of the Author, or the Person who had handed any such Libel to the Press: And, as if to render Libellers so much the more infamous, another Proclamation of the same nature was not only issued against Highwaymen in the opposite Column of the same Gazette; but the Reward for apprehending one of the Latter was made ten Pounds less than that which was offer'd for the Former.

A Proclamation against Libellers.

Neither of these Expedients had, however, the Effect propos'd; the Press had to the full as much libelling Business as before; and as fast as one Discovery was made at one Printing-House, and one Impression of a Book was seiz'd, it was undertook at another.

But all these unlicens'd Pieces were not of the Jacobite kind; some, without meddling with the Titles of Kings, treated only of the Grievances of the Subject; and others were the Work of Mal-Content-Whigs, who had nothing in view, but to out the Tory-Part of the Administration, and engross the King to themselves.

Reasons for a new Bill of Rights.

Among the first of these is a Treatise call'd, Reasons for a new Bill of Rights, humbly submitted to the Consideration of the ensuing Session of Parliament, and which was apparently occasion'd by the numerous and unwarrantable Committments and other State-Persecutions of the preceding Summer: For herein the Author contends, in the first Place, for a new Effort in favour of the Bill for regulating Trials in case of Treason, as a necessary Security for the Life of the Subject, in Opposition to certain bold Whisperers, as he calls them, who, as if there had been no Revolution, pretended, That the Times either were, or might be, dangerous: That the Crown ought to have a Power to support itself: That the Bill would help to make Convictions difficult: That the Government must, sometimes, have a List: That there should be Methods at hand to lop off an Enemy, or the Head of a Party now and then: That no Method was more convenient than a doubtful Law: That, therefore, no Explanation or Amendment would be politic. In the second, for the Security of the Subjects Estate, by some new Provision to restrain the Exorbitances of that Prerogative-Court, call'd Chancery, and to reform the Abuses and Corruptions of the Law, which had put it into the Power of Judges and Keepers, to punish Men in their Property, for their political Opinions, and for the Sins of the Party they had the Misfortune to belong to. And, thirdly, for the Liberty of his Person against the insidious Pretences and arbitrary Encroachments of Power, which had extended so far, and affected so many of late Years, that the greater Part of the Nation, either by themselves, or their Friends, under one Administration or other, were thoroughly acquainted with them; and which had been practis'd with so much Boldness, that both Commons and Peers, sitting the Parliament, had found their Privilege no Protection against them. It is on the last of these Particulars that he dwells longest; and, having premis'd, That, how fondly soever our Judges affect to talk of Liberty, as the Birthright of the Subject, the Darling of the Law, &c. the Practice had almost in all Ages given the Lie to these Pretences, he proceeds to point out the Defects of the Habeas-Corpus-Act; namely, That it doth not enjoin an Oath to be mention'd in the Warrant of Commitment: That it does not require that the Cause of Commitment should be specially signify'd: That it has not provided a Remedy for the Subject in case of wrong Imprisonments, nor sufficiently against the Oppressions of Messengers, who frequently detain'd their Prisoners many Days, Weeks, or, perhaps, Months, before they carry'd them to Examination: That it left the Affair of Bail so much at the Discretion of Ministers and Judges, that they had it in their Power to insist on what Terms they pleas'd; and even in Cases of bare Suspicion, to connive at keeping the Bonds in force, and the Suit in Suspence from Term to Term, for seven Years together: That it has not expressly provided against Commitments under the hard and illegal Conditions of being debar'd the Use of Pen, Ink, and Paper, or the Access of Friends: That in case a Man is committed at Hull or Canterbury, or to any Country-Goal, it has left him remediless till an Assize; for though the Law allows the Prisoner his Choice of the Assize, or the King's-Bench, the Judges had been pleas'd to restrain him by their Opinions to the Assize only: That for want of some farther Explanation, the Clause in the Act most favourable to the Subject, had been explan'd away: For whereas it is said, "That if no Indictment the first Term, the Party to be bail'd, unless Oath be made, that the King's Witnesses could not be produc'd that Term;" meaning plainly, that he should be bail'd in case there was not sufficient Evidence to be found on Indictment, the Interpretation was left to the Affidavit-Maker, or Solicitor of the Treasury, who gave it what Sense, and made what use of it, he pleas'd: That if a Man was committed in Wales, as a dangerous Man, who had not Money to defray his Charges to London, he could have no Relief at their Session of Goal-Delivery, because the

Treason

A. D. 1692. Treason not being specially signify'd in the Warrant, it could not be decided there, whether it was bailable or not: So that to such a Wretch as this, there was, in Effect, no Habeas-Corpus at all: And, lastly, tho' the Act has laid a Penalty on the Judge or Judges, if they deny'd a Habeas-Corpus, it has laid none upon them for refusing to bail or discharge; which left the Operation of the Law imperfect, and the Subject liable to Torture, tho' obnoxious to no Law, and, consequently undeserving of Punishment.

The Whig-Pamphlets, at least the Principal of them, came from the Earl of Warrington and Mr. John Hampden. It was now that the Former publish'd his Dialogue between a Lord-Lieutenant and one of his Deputies, so often already quoted; and the Latter, his Considerations on the most proper way of raising Money; in which, after making a Court-Sacrifice, by admitting, that the Government and Confederacy ought to be maintain'd, and that the necessary Sums ought to be readily and chearfully granted for those Ends, he puts in his Protest against a general Excise, which began to be talk'd of by those in Power, as the Method of furnishing the Supply for the following Year; which he calls a troublesome and a slavish sort of Tax. "The present Government, says he, came in upon a Foot of Liberty: What was the Reason that the Chimney-Money was taken off, but only this, That every Man might have his House free? Shall the Nation be mock'd by taking off a Feather, and in the Room of it, laying on a Millstone? This is a way to bring a Lord-Dane into every one of our Families." He also endeavours to expose the oppressive Nature and pernicious Tendency of Excises, by giving a short History of their Rise and Progress in England; by shewing, that they never fail to become perpetual, when once establish'd; and that if they should not actually destroy the Being of Parliament, they would infallibly their Independency, and thereby unhinge the Constitution. And, lastly, he proposes, that, instead of giving the least Countenance to so ruinous a Project, the forfeited Estates in Ireland might be set to sale, agreeable to the Declarations which had been made in Parliament: That the Commissioners of public Accounts might be call'd upon for their Report, that those who had fatten'd on the Spoils of their Country, by receiving immoderate Pensions, and who had cheated the Public of such incredible Sums, might be made to refund; and that what might be still wanting to complete the Aid, should be supply'd by a Land Tax; which being never impos'd but in time of War, would cease of course when the War was over.

Considerations on the most proper way of raising Money.

He also set forth another Pamphlet, after the Meeting of the Parliament, call'd, Some short Considerations concerning the State of the Nation; which, in five several Instances, he supposes to be in a State of Decay; namely, 1. By the Loss of our Ships, by him computed at two thousand. 2. The Consumption of our Seamen arising from that Loss, and our own Neglect of our own Fisheries, and those of Newfoundland, which were the great Nurseries of Seamen, and were, in a manner, abandon'd to the French. 3. The daily Diminution of our Commerce, invaded by our Enemies, supplanted by our Friends, and unprotected by ourselves. 4. The miserable Condition of our Coinage, wasted in the Hire of foreign Bottoms; the Pay of foreign Forces, and the Service of foreign Lands; whence it never return'd but in such an impair'd and wasted Condition, as to be full 20 and 25 per Cent under its current Value: And, 5. The Slaughter and Havock of our best and bravest Men, whose Blood had been spilt like Water upon the Ground, needlessly, in the Wars of Ireland, and lavishly at the Battle of Steenkirk. His next Endeavour is to shew, That we are in an unsettled State; which he also exemplifies in several Particulars: As, first, the Prevalence of Jacobitism, and the Impunity it met with. Secondly, the false Titles set up for the new Government by the Parasites of the Court: The want of an Abjuring Bill, and a solemn Declaration of the Lawfulness and Rightfulness of their Majesties Tenure, which had been so long struggled for in Parliament, without Success: The want of Solidity in the very Structure of Parliaments themselves; the Benefits and Advantages of which the Nation was no longer secure of, than Parliaments were necessary to the Crown, to supply the Necessities of the Year: The Insecurity of the Subjects Liberty: The Necessity of some new Provision for its Preservation, and for ascertaining Prosecutions and Trials in case of Treason: The great Grievance of quartering Soldiers in private Houses, contrary to the ancient Law, the Petition of Right, and the express Letter of the Act of Car. II. with this additional Aggravation, that a Bill having been prepar'd last Session, to regulate that Matter legally, it was rejected because of some free Passages in the Preamble, and because of some Clauses in it, which made bold with the Prerogative: The Violation of Property, by forcibly taking up of Transport-ships, without settling any Fund for the Payment of them; by which many Persons had been ruin'd: The useless and burdensome Condition of the Militia; which, by the help of proper Regulations, might be render'd a sufficient Security for the Kingdom against all Invaders, without the Help of Mercenaries: The suffering our Allies to carry on an open Commerce with France, and to supply them with all Necessaries, while our own People labour'd under the severest Prohibitions, and thereby became the Cullies of the very Powers whom they supported: And, lastly, the want of Ability in our own Cabinet, the want of Intelligence of the Designs of the Enemy, and such an apparent Improvidence, Remissness, Tardiness and Indigestion in all our Designs and Undertakings, whether offensive or defensive, as could be owing to nothing but Treachery, and a settled Purpose to precipitate the Nation once more into its former Bondage.

A. D. 1692.

Thus, we find both Whig and Jacobite joining joining in many of the same Clamours, at the same time that the Former call'd for Vengeance on the Latter; and the Courtiers of all Sorts seem'd to be equally incens'd against both; for as they had rais'd the Cry against Jacobitism on account of the Invasion, so now the Malcontent-Whig was to be render'd equally obnoxious for presuming to exercise that Liberty which the King had undertaken to restore. Of this we are furnish'd with an Instance in a ministerial Piece, call'd, Short Considerations on the present State of Affairs, written plainly in Opposition, tho not by way of formal Answer, to the two Tracts of Mr. Hampden's, just quoted; in which, by way of Introduction, a Parallel is drawn between the English and the Jews; between the late Deliverance of this Nation out of the Hands of King James, and that of the Israelites out of Egypt; and our Murmurings and Repinings are compar'd to theirs. After which, passing over the profess'd Enemies to the Establishment, he comes to the Murmurer, the Discontented, the Envier, and the Busy-body; Persons whom he is pleased to esteem Friends still: But such as are grown melancholy on reflecting, that their Deserts and Services were not enough acknowledged; that their Notions were not follow'd; that their Enemies are not punish'd; that those should be trusted again, who had once misbehav'd; and that any Man should be promoted to a Place which they had conceiv'd was fit only for themselves. "Thus Guilt, says he, sticks to Places of Profit and Credit, as the Jewish Leprosy did formerly to the Walls of Houses; and you must go out of them to get clear of the Infection." He then cautions them not to sink the Vessel because they are not at the Helm; insists, That where opposite Parties in a State are equally powerful, the Favours of the Government ought to be shar'd equally between them: That Matters should be manag'd by balanc'd Councils: That a ceremonious Stiffness belongs only to Plato's imaginary Republic: That Insinuations, Condescensions, and Compliances, were the Qualities in Esteem at Court: That a King of ripe Years and mature Judgment, would not be put back into his Pupilage; nor could be persuaded, that to clip the Monarchy, was the way to make himself great: Complains of a timorous Party, who thought every Disaster decisive; and that a Cause was lost whenever the Enemy got an Advantage: Declames on the dreadful Consequences of King James's Restoration: Expectiates on the Valour of our Troops; the Superiority of our Fleets; the Necessity of continuing the War, and maintaining the Confederacy at all Events: Argues, that if Flanders was lost, Holland must follow; in which case, England would become the Seat of War, and the landed Interest must submit to maintain an Army at home, which they were unwilling to maintain abroad: That therefore the darling Project of a Descent could not be prosecuted, unless the Service there was first and effectually provided for: That, consequently, our Supplies must bear a Proportion to our Necessities; That we ought not to be over-nice in the Ways and Means of raising them: That it was more advisable to pay a Tenth, an Eighth, or some such ratable Part of one's Expences by a general Excise, than to run a probable Risque of losing all: And for a Conclusion he intimates, That though he does not contend for a general Excise, yet, if it was capable of performing such Wonders, as those who declar'd against it had suggested, he should rejoice, that the Nation had so rich a Vein yet unopen'd: That he could not conceive how a general Excise, like the Trojan Horse, could carry a House of Commons in its Belly; and that however dreadful they had render'd the Phantom in their Descriptions, he did not think it necessary for People to break their Necks out of a Window to avoid it.

A. D. 1691. Other Considerations on the present State of Affairs.

Lastly, there was yet another Pamphlet publish'd about this time, which was of a singular kind, because national, and level'd at all Parties alike: It is call'd, The State of Parties, and of the Public, as influenc'd by those Parties: And the general Plan of it is to shew, That as no Country is more secure from Invasions than this, while Sovereign of the Sea, so none is more expos'd to them, or liable to worse Consequences, when depriv'd of that Advantage: That all Parties, Williamite or Jacobite, or however subdivided, are ultimately concern'd in the Maintenance of this Sovereignty, because all would be independant of Foreigners, and in a Condition to maintain that Independancy: That, nevertheless, so infatuated were all with their narrow, selfish Pursuits, that neither bestow'd a Thought on this grand Concern; and yet such were their Pursuits, that, except to Individuals, they were, in their own Nature, unattainable: That if, as the Jacobites seem'd to wish, for the sake of another Restoration, the French should become Masters at Sea, they would become Masters for themselves; and King James would be no more than King Lewis's Substitute: That, on the other hand, as the Williamites conducted the War, our Trade was already at the Mercy of the Enemy; and as that was the Fountain of our naval Strength, our naval Strength must follow it: That the Assistance given to the King for the Maintenance of a Land-War was absolutely thrown away: That instead of recovering, we had lost Ground every Campaign: That either to force a Way into France, by reducing the triple Rows of Garisons, which cover'd it on the Flemish Side, one by one, or by leaving them all behind, was what the most sanguine could scarce dream of: That the Efforts of the Spaniards in Catalonia, and of the Germans on the Rhine, did not amount to so much as a Diversion: That all Hopes from Savoy were at an end: That the Project of a Descent was yet less to be depended upon, than the feeble Efforts of our Allies, or those other Chimeras of our own: That our Manner of conducting the War at Sea, was as fatal to our true Interest, as our fruitless Attempts at Land: That thus, a Court-Complaisance for King William, or a blind Attachment to King

State of Parties.

A. D. 1692. James, was equally ruinous to the Nation: That the only way to preserve ourselves, and reduce France, was to turn all our Power and Riches against the French Commerce, both in the West-Indies and the Mediteranean, the French Ports, and the French Navy; which, in such case, would not be doubly lost, by being dissipated among Foreigners, and by being dissipated in vain, but would really disable them, and make us really useful or formidable, as true Policy should require, to the rest of Europe: And that while these great Points were either neglected or sacrifice'd, and it was the great Endeavours of those in Power to gratify the King in his own way, not only by giving into all the Extravagances of a Land-War, but by advancing the Prerogative, instead of reducing it, according to the just Expectations of the People, it was a vain thing to look for Relief, from a Change of Ministers or the Promotions of Men, merely for their Party-Merits; or the gratifying the Court with such prodigious Sums as might, if possible, suffice their Greediness or surmount their Lavishment.

If there are any who read History for Amusement only, they will be disgusted with the whole preceding Section; but those who read for the sake of Information, which ought to be the great End both of Reader and Writer, will see Cause to acknowledge, that the Narrative Part would have been imperfect without it. (g) We have now the whole Circle of things, both foreign and domestic, open around us, and may accompany the King from Holland, to meet his People in Parliament, with the Clue in our Hands to all the Business likely to be transacted there.

It was on the 11th of October, O. S. as we have already seen, that his Majesty return'd post to the Hague from Brussels; where having settled the Plan of Operations for the ensuing Year, with their High and Mighty Lordships, as well as the shortness of the Time would permit, he sail'd out of the Maes on the 15th; and on the 20th arriv'd at Kensington, having been met by the Queen at Newhall, and receiv'd by the Inhabitants of London and Westminster, as if he had dragged the Common Enemy at his Chariot Wheels. The Compliments of his Courtiers of all sorts, and the formal Congratulations of the Magistracy of London, were Matters of course: But his Majesty thought a little Popularity now so seasonable, that he accepted their Invitation to honour the City with his Presence at Dinner upon the Lord Mayor's Day; and farther, set forth a Proclamation, signifying, That for as much as it had pleas'd Almighty God, of his infinite Goodness, in answer to the Prayers humbly and devoutly offer'd up to him (during the Monthly Fasts before appointed, that is to say) to preserve their Majesties and their Government against the Designs and Attempts of their open and secret Enemies; to give their Majesties a great and signal Victory at Sea against the French Fleet; to protect his Majesty's Person from the many and great Dangers of the War, in his late Expedition beyond the Seas; to disappoint and defeat the barbarous and horrid Conspiracy for taking away his Majesty's sacred Life by Assassination; and to bring him back in Safety to this Kingdom, their Majesties, adoring the Divine Goodness, and duly considering, that such great and public Blessings did call for public Acknowledgments, had thought fit, with the Advice of their Privy-Council, to appoint and command a general Thanksgiving, &c. and did farther charge and command, That the said public Day of general Thanksgiving should be religiously observ'd by all their loving Subjects, as they tender'd the Favour of Almighty God, and upon pain of suffering such Punishments as their Majesties could justly inflict for the Contempt or Neglect thereof.

King William returns to England.

Proclamation for a national Thanksgiving.

Now, if what Bishop Burnet suggests be true, namely, That Jacobitism was more openly profess'd and more universally prevalent than ever, this last minatory Clause had no other Tendency than to expose Men to the Indignation of the Government for being disaffected, or to make them Hypocrites in their own Defence: And yet the same Bishop complanes, in Effect, That Hypocrisy was the reigning Vice of the Times; for, at the same time that he compliments the King and Queen on the great Example they had set the Nation, and on the Alteration it had made in public Practices, he calls that Alteration but an outward Form; and he acknowledges, that the Nation was corrupt at Heart, both as to Morals and Principles: And instead of ascribing any Efficacy to their Prayers, as the Proclamation had done, he intimates, that the Righteous were under great Apprehensions, that their Sins would have drawn down heavy Judgments from Heaven upon them.

Productive of Hypocrisy or Persecution.

To proceed; November the fourth, being the Anniversary of his Majesty's Birth, and, for that Reason, selected for the meeting of the Parliament, his Majesty open'd the Session with the following Speech:

" My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I am very glad to meet you again in Parliament, where I have an Opportunity of thanking you for the great Supplies you have given me for the Prosecution of this War; and I hope, by your Advice and Assistance, which has never fail'd me, to take such Measures as may be most proper for supporting our Common Interest against the excessive Power of France.

King's Speech to both Houses.

We

(g) It ought not to be forgot, that on the seventh of June, this Summer, the greatest Part of the Town of Port-Royal in Jamaica, was, in a Minute's time, devour'd by an Earthquake, accompany'd with an Inundation: And that on the eighth of September following, great Part of Europe was alarm'd with a Shock of the same kind; but without incurring any of those terrible Effects which it produc'd at Jamaica.

A. D. 1692. We have great Reason to rejoice in the happy Victory, which, by the Blessing of God, we obtained at Sea: And I wish I could tell you that the Success at Land had been answerable to it; I am sure my own Subjects had so remarkable a Part in both, that their Bravery and Courage must ever be remembred to their Honour.

The French are repairing their Losses at Sea with great Diligence, and do design to augment their Land-Forces considerably against the next Campaign; which makes it absolutely necessary for our Safety, that at least as great a Force be maintain'd at Sea and Land, as we had the last Year: And therefore I must ask of you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, a Supply suitable to so great an Occasion.

I am very sensible how heavy this Charge is upon my People; and it extremely afflicts me, that 'tis not possible to be avoided, without exposing ourselves to inevitable Ruin and Destruction: The Inconvenience of sending out of the Kingdom great Sums of Money for the Payment of the Troops abroad, is indeed very considerable; and I so much wish it could be remedy'd, that if you can suggest to me any Methods for the Support of them, which may lessen this Inconvenience, I shall be ready to receive them with all the Satisfaction imaginable.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

None can desire more than I do that a Descent should be made into France, and therefore, notwithstanding the Disappointment of that Design this last Summer, I intend to attempt it the next Year with a much more considerable Force; and so soon as I shall be enabled, all possible Care and Application shall be used towards it.

And upon this Occasion I cannot omit taking notice of that signal Deliverance, which, by the good Providence of God, we receiv'd the last Spring, to the Disappointment and Confusion of our Enemies Designs and Expectations: This has sufficiently shewn us how much we are exposed to the Attempts of France, while that King is in a Condition to make them; let us therefore improve the Advantage we have at this time, of being joined with most of the Princes and States of Europe against so dangerous an Enemy: In this, surely, all Men will agree, who have any Love for their Country, or any Zeal for our Religion: I cannot therefore doubt but you will continue to support me in this War against the declar'd Enemy of this Nation, and that you will give as speedy Dispatch to the Affairs before you, as the Nature and Importance of them will admit, that our Preparations may be timely and effectual for the Preservation of all that is dear and valuable to us.

I am sure I can have no Interest but what is yours; we have the same Religion to defend, and you cannot be more concern'd for the Preservation of your Liberties and Properties, than I am that you should always remain in the full Possession and Enjoyment of them; for I have no Aim but to make you a happy People.

Hitherto I have never spared to expose my own Person for the Good and Welfare of this Nation; and I am so sensible of your good Affections to me, that I shall continue to do so with great Chearfulness upon all Occasions, wherein I may contribute to the Honour and Advantage of England." A. D. 1692.

Some Authors tell us, this Speech was receiv'd with the universal Applause which it deserv'd: But if it was deservedly applauded, it was not immediately applauded: The Commons adjourn'd for six Days, without proceeding to Business, by reason of the Thinness of the House: And the Proceedings of the Lords seem'd to shew, that they did not think what his Majesty had so plausibly said concerning Liberty and Property, was sufficiently warranted by the Measures of his Government: The Malecontents, not only affected to wonder, that the maintaining the Confederacy, and furnishing a suitable Supply, should be the only connecting Circumstances between the Crown and the People, but, from the Alteration of his Majesty's Stile, concerning the Power of France, which he calls Great in the Beginning of the War, and now excessive, to insinuate, that our Supplies were thrown away, and that the Confederacy was not worth the Cost. They had also the Boldness to accuse his Majesty of Impolicy, in discoursing thus publicly of a Descent, if he had really any such Purpose; and of Collusion, if he had none: And they made no Difficulty to point out the Unlikelihood of his succeeding any better the next Year without a greater Force, than he had done this.

Bishop Burnet acknowledges, That the Session of Parliament was open'd under great Disadvantages: "The Earl of Marlborough, says he, and some other Peers, had been put into the Tower, under a false Accusation of High Treason; which was evidently prov'd to be a Conspiracy, design'd by some profligate Creatures, who fancy'd [how reasonable or not, will appear in the Sequel] that Forgeries and false Swearing would be as acceptable in this Reign, as they had been formerly: But till this was detected, the Persons accus'd were kept in Prison, and were now only out upon Bail."

The whole Case, which his Lordship has passs'd thus tenderly over, in few Words, was thus: One Young, infamous for his Forgeries and Villanies of all sorts, for which he had several times undergone the Discipline of the Law, having been lodg'd in Newgate till he had paid the Fine which had been last impos'd on him, was there encourag'd by one Pearson, a Prisoner for Debt, to fly at higher Game, and make use of his Knack of counterfeiting Hands to forge a Plot, and father it on the Earls of Marlborough and Salisbury, Archbishop Sancroft, Sprat, Bishop of Rochester, and others, which would infallibly procure him Money enough to pay his Fines, procure his Discharge, &c. Young greedily embrac'd this Proposal, and for his first Trial of Skill endeavour'd to procure the Countenance of Archbishop Tillotson, to whom he sent several Letters towards the Close of the preceding

Young's Conspiracy. [Sprat's Relation, 4to. 2 Parts.]

A. D. 1692. preceding Year, ſignifying, that a moſt infernal Plot was on foot; as alſo deſiring his Grace to make the King acquainted with it: And his Grace not being over-fond of the Office, he ply'd him with Letters full of treaſonable Matter, which, as he pretended, had been written to him by ſome of the greateſt Men in England. Theſe the Archbiſhop thought it his Duty to communicate to his Majeſty; who, having read them over, generouſly ſaid, Really, my Lord, theſe Papers may reſemble ſome of theſe Perſons Hands; but I do not in the leaſt diſtruſt them: I am confident they are innocent, and this is a Villany; and therefore I will not have them diſturb'd on this Account: And here the Miſchief ſlept till the Terror of an impending Invaſion encourag'd Young to ſpread his Snares anew; and the Apprehenſions or the Devices of the Court made his wicked Offers acceptable: But to whom they were made, or who ſtoop'd ſo low as to make uſe of ſo vile a Tool, is out of the Power of Hiſtory to aſcertain: For tho' the Ducheſs Dowager of Marlborough is pleas'd to make uſe of theſe Words in her Account, viz. "My Lord Romney (then Sydney) Secretary of State, had ſent to one Young, who was then in Jail for Perjury and Forgery, and paid his Fine, in order to make him a legal Evidence: For, as the Court-Lawyers ſaid, Young not having loſt his Ears, was an irreproachable Witneſs," her Grace's Authority in this Caſe, is, at leaſt, apocryphal: For Lord Sydney ceas'd to be Secretary of State when he was made Lieutenant of Ireland; and it is expreſly declar'd in the Gazette, N°. 2746, that he reſign'd the Seals to the King upon the third of March, being the Evening before his Majeſty departed for Holland: And it is ſcarce to be ſuppos'd, that he continu'd to officiate after he had given up his Authority for ſo doing. This, however, is certain, that the Earl of Marlborough was the firſt Perſon who was impriſon'd upon Young's Accuſation: That the Earls of Scarſdale and Huntington met with the ſame Treatment at the ſame time; but whether upon his Evidence or not, is not ſo certain; and that the Biſhop of Rocheſter and the reſt had been clapt up next, if by the great Ingenuity of his Lordſhip's Behaviour before the Council, his extraordinary Preſence of Mind, and the concurring Evidence of many of his Servants, he had not, on the very Spot, clear'd himſelf from every Circumſtance laid to his Charge, and prov'd his Accuſer to be one of the greateſt Villains upon Earth.

The Biſhop was arreſted at Bromley on the ſeventh of May, and had his Papers ſeiz'd: On the eighth he was examin'd before a Committee of Council, and was kept under a Guard at his own Houſe till the 18th, when he was diſcharg'd: On the 25th, Young's Fines were paid, and he was diſcharg'd out of Newgate with new Cloaths on his Back, and Money in his Pocket: On the eighth of June the Biſhop was ſummon'd by a Letter from Lord Nottingham to attend the Council again: On the 10th he was confronted by one Blackhead, who was to ſwear, that he had been the Meſſenger, and had carry'd on the Correſpondence between his Lordſhip and Young; and then it was that he not only ſo effectually exculpated himſelf [by proving, that Blackhead came to him, as from one Dr. Hookes, a Country Clergyman, that the Buſineſs pretended was to detect a Perſon accus'd by the ſaid ſham Doctor of counterfeiting the Biſhop's Orders; and by aſſerting, that all he could recollect concerning Young, was, That he once receiv'd a Letter from one of that Name, out of Newgate, deſiring him to recollect, that he, Young, had officiated ſome Weeks for the Chaplain of Bromley-College, and to ſend him a Certificate thereof, together with ſome Relief by way of Charity; both which, on hearing a very bad Character of him, his Lordſhip refus'd] but overwhelm'd Blackhead in ſuch a manner, with the irreſiſtible Force of Truth, that he confeſs'd his whole Concern in the Forgery: And when the Biſhop, after having been clear'd with the utmoſt Honour by the whole Board, put in a ſeaſonable Caveat, that the Fountain of Wickedneſs which had been near deſtroying him, might not be ſuffer'd to break forth elſewhere, to the Ruin of any other innocent Man, the Earl of Devonſhire reply'd, "My Lord, you need never fear this Fountain can break forth any more, to do you or any other good Man, any Prejudice, he (Blackhead) having been ſo palpably convicted of Knavery and Lying." As yet Young himſelf had not appear'd; but the Biſhop, on his Return to Bromley, having collected all the Proofs that could be given by his whole Houſhold, in order to trace the Villany to the Bottom, and returning to London on the 13th, in order to lay them before the Council, found himſelf on that Occaſion confronted by him alſo; and declaring, that he had no Knowledge of him, Young reply'd, with an inſolent Confidence, You will know me better when Captain Lawe appears: I warrant, you don't know Captain Lawe neither. Thus a third Perſon was brought upon the Stage; and, ſoon after, a fourth; for Young's Wife being call'd in, and aſked by Lord Nottingham, from whom ſhe receiv'd that Paper (which his Lordſhip then took up from off the Table) anſwer'd, That ſhe had receiv'd it from Captain Lawe, who left it with her for her Huſband; and that when he came for it again, her Huſband refus'd to part with it, ſaying, "No; theſe Lords whoſe Names are ſubſcrib'd, have not been ſo liberal in their Relief of my Wants as formerly; and therefore I will make another Uſe of this Paper." Blackhead was then again produc'd; and, being aſked by Lord Nottingham, Why, on his ſecond coming to Bromley, he was ſo earneſt to ſee the Biſhop's Study, and whether it was in order to lodge any Paper there? after ſome Heſitation anſwer'd in the Affirmative; as alſo, that he did lodge it in a Flower-pot in one of the Parlour-Chimneys: And being again queſtion'd by the ſame Lord, why he went to Bromley a third time, while the Biſhop was under Confinement, he confeſs'd, That he was deſir'd by Young, ſeeing the Paper had

A. D. 1692. had not been found by those who search'd the House, to try to recover it, that being the Original; That he did recover it accordingly; and that it was the same which lay upon the Table; which was the Draught of an Association, to assist King James at his Landing with thirty thousand well armed Men; to take care that some strong Garison should be put into his Hands; to furnish him with a considerable Sum of Money for the Support of his Army, and to seize on the Person of the Princess of Orange, alive or dead; and it was subscrib'd with the Names of William Canterbury, Thomas Reffen, Marlborough, Salisbury, Cornbury, Basil Firebrace, and John Wilcox; with Intervals or Blanks for five Names more. Young was then confronted with Blackhead, who averr'd to his Face all that he had confess'd before; and the Lords themselves, in Proof that he had said nothing but Truth, testify'd, That Young gave express Directions for those that were sent to Bromley, to search the Flower-pots: But with an Impudence beyond Example, he deny'd all, and insisted, that the Bishop and Blackhead had combin'd in this Matter to baffle his Discoveries. Lastly, the Bishop having brought along with him the Letter which he had receiv'd from Young in the Name of Hooke, the Lord-President discover'd, that the pretended Association was writ in the very same Hand; and all the Lords present, not only spoke with Detestation of Young's Villany, but seem'd to agree with the Bishop, That for the sake of Truth, Justice, and the Safety of every other honest Man, the whole of this Black Contrivance ought to be sifted to the Bottom; and that nothing could be of more Service to the Government, than to cause such perjur'd Informers to be punished according to their Demerits.

But notwithstanding all that had pass'd, Young proceeded in his Plot, and his Captain Lowe not chusing to appear, endeavoured to suborn one Holland to make a second Evidence, who communicated all that pass'd to Lord Nottingham, and also made Oath of it before the Grand-Jury of Middlesex, who found a Bill of Forgery and Subornation of Perjury against Young. What, however, is most strange, the whole Year was suffer'd to elapse, before his Trial came on: Blackhead twice made his Escape out of the Hands of the Messenger who had him in Custody: A Letter was put about in his Hand, declaring, in Effect, That in his Examination he had injur'd no-body but Young: And Advantage was still taken of a Combination so notoriously wicked, to make Lord Marlborough undergo the very worst Usage that Power could inflict upon him: For, in the first Place, when he was brought up, with many Others, to the King's-Bench, to demand the Benefit of the Habeas-Corpus-Act, accompany'd by the Marquis of Halifax, the Earls of Shrewsbury, and Carbury, and Mr. Boyle, afterwards Earl of Burlington, who were to be his Bail, Mr. Aaron Smith, the Court-Solicitor, took care to have such an Affidavit prepar'd, as should both furnish the Judges with a Pretence for remanding him and them to their several Prisons, and screen himself from the Guilt and Punishment of Perjury: For, instead of the Word Witnesses, according to the Statute, he only swore, first, That there was Evidence against each Prisoner; and then, that there were Witnesses against the Prisoners: And though the Equivocation was obvious enough to the Bench, they chose to overlook it, and remand the Prisoners, as if on a Supposition that the Law was satisfy'd. Again, after they had been admitted to Bail, and they came again into Court in the Beginning of Michaelmas Term to require the Discharge of their Bondsmen, their Demand was refus'd, and the Court even persisted in their Refusal, after the Lords had declar'd, They would make their Appeal to the House of Peers. A. D. 1692.

Thus it is scarce to be wonder'd, that the Session should be open'd under great Disadvantages: And it is scarce to be imagin'd, that the King's Speech should be universally applauded. Under any Reign, such Proceedings as these would have excited very melancholy Reflections; but under that of a profess'd Deliverer, they could not fail to excite the Indignation of the Public.

Debates there on in the House of Lords.

The Lords, for what Reason is not specify'd, adjourn'd for three Days, as the Commons had done for six; and then, instead of making their Compliments to the Crown, enter'd with great Warmth on the Vindication of their Privileges. The suffering Lords open'd the Matter, by making their several Complaints, and laid their great Stress on the Circumstance of their being refus'd Bail on Smith's Affidavit, and the want of Information against them by Oath of two Witnesses: Their Friends took care to support them with all their Eloquence, and all the Use that could be made of it: And the Result of the first Day's Day's Debate, was, an Order for Lord Lucas, Constable of the Tower, to produce the Warrants of Commitment; as also for the Clerk of the King's-Bench to produce Smith's Affidavit, upon which the Lords had been remanded to Prison; and a Resolution to refer the whole Matter to a Committee, who were empowered to send for Papers, Persons, and Records.

On the ninth, the same Affair was resum'd, and the Debate turn'd principally on the Refusal of the King's-Bench to discharge the Recognizance; but no Resolution was taken upon it: It was indeed propos'd, That the said Recognizances might be remov'd to the House of Peers, as the supreme Court: But the Lord Chief-Justice Holt undertaking to shew, that it could not be done, the House acquiesc'd in his Opinion, and the Motion was dropt. The next Day, the Judges and Aaron Smith attended the House; and the Former having been heard in their own (b) Defence, the Latter was

(b) Which they manag'd in such a manner as gave Mr. John Hampden Occasion to say, "That the very same Opinions were now deliver'd for Law, which King Charles and King James's Judges were infamous for." "It is but a few

A. D. 1691. was requir'd to anſwer upon Oath, Whether he had two Witneſſes againſt each of the Lords? but refus'd, till threaten'd to be himſelf committed by Order of the Houſe. The Queſtion then put to him, was, Whether he had two againſt the Earl of Huntington? and his Anſwer was, That he knew but of one. This brought the Matter to the Point contended for, viz. Whether one Witneſs was ſufficient to authoriſe the Commitment of a Peer, or the holding him under Bail after he had enter'd his Prayer at the King's-Bench to be try'd, as the Habeas Corpus Act directs? The latter Part of the Queſtion was argu'd firſt: And among ſuch a Variety of Opinions, Arguments and Authorities as were made uſe of on both Sides, the whole Affair grew ſo intricate, that a Committee was appointed to draw up a Reſolution on the general Senſe of the Houſe, to be reported the next Day; under an expreſs Proviſion, That no other Buſineſs ſhould intervene: And the Reſolution they came to, was, That no Peer ſhould be continu'd upon Bail, unleſs there were two Witneſſes againſt him: But this the Court-Lords could not be brought to agree to; and a new Debate aroſe, which was maintain'd with ſo much Obſtinacy on both Sides, that it was adjourn'd till the Morrow, when all the Judges were order'd to attend: And now, the Anti-Court Lords becoming ſenſible of their Strength, the Lord Scarſdale made a new Complaint, That his Houſe had been ſearch'd by one of the King's Meſſengers; which was receiv'd and incorporated with the Buſineſs before them. The Committee then reported their general Reſolution on both Parts of the general Queſtion; namely, That no Peer ought to be remanded to Priſon, by the Court of King's-Bench, on his appearing before them, by virtue of the Habeas Corpus Act, after having enter'd his Prayer to be try'd as the ſaid Act directs; or kept under Bail, unleſs there be againſt him two Witneſſes upon Oath: And the Senſe of the Houſe inclin'd ſo manifeſtly to that of their Committee, that all the Court-Lords had for it, was, to call for the Opinion of the Judges; who, upon this Occaſion, thought it their wiſeſt way, to trim between the two Parties: And while, on the one hand, they argu'd in Abatement, That the requiring two poſitive Witneſſes to authoriſe a Commitment, was requiring too much, for one might be abſent, or ill, they admitted, on the other, That two Witneſſes were neceſſary to warrant a Proſecution. But this mix'd Opinion of theirs did not ſerve to bring the Houſe into the ſame Temper; the Courtiers thought they had granted too much; the Malcontents too little; every Man had ſomething of his own to urge in a Caſe that might become his own: And that all might be at full Liberty to utter and maintain their Sentiments, the Debate was once more adjourn'd, in order to be diſcuſs'd in a Committee of the whole Houſe, on the 14th, being Monday. Accordingly, both Sides having recapitulated all their former Arguments, A. D. 1692. and re-inforc'd them with all the new Matter that occur'd to them, it was, at laſt, reſolv'd, and declar'd to be the Senſe of the Committee, "That it was the Duty of all the Judges of Oyer and Terminer, and General-Goal-Delivery, in purſuance of the Statute 31 Car. II. commonly call'd, The Habeas Corpus Act, to ſet at Liberty the Priſoner on Bail, if committed for High Treaſon, unleſs it be made appear upon Oath, That there are two Witneſſes againſt the ſaid Priſoner, who cannot be produc'd in that Term, Seſſions, or General-Goal-Delivery. And it was alſo farther reſolv'd, That in caſe there ſhould be more than one Priſoner to be bail'd or remanded, 'tis the Intention of the ſaid Statute, that there muſt be Oath made, that there are two Witneſſes againſt each of ſuch Priſoners, in order to remand them to Priſon reſpectively. as alſo their Lordſhips Votes and Reſolutions.

The Houſe being then reſum'd, and theſe Reſolutions reported, both were ſeverally receiv'd and adopted: But a Motion being made to enter them in the Books, as a ſtanding Direction to all future Judges, and to cut off all Excuſe for any ſuch Illegalities in times to come, it gave riſe to another fierce Debate, which laſted ſeveral Hours; and ended, at laſt, in a Diviſion of the Houſe; when it appear'd, that the Contents had a Majority of thirty-five Voices againſt twenty-eight.

The next great Point to be diſcuſs'd, was the manner of ſetting free the ſuffering Lords: This was argued the very next Day, and contended for with ſo much Vehemence, that the Courtiers began to be in pain for the Fate of the Seſſion, and thought it high time to ſubmit to a Compromiſe. Accordingly, after the Debate had laſted ſeveral Hours, it was hinted, by way of Expedient to the Houſe, that his Majeſty would cauſe them to be diſcharg'd the next Day. This was accepted, but with ſo much Caution, that they would hear of no other Buſineſs till they were aſſur'd the thing was done; and to avoid any Surprize, adjourn'd to the 17th. Nor, when inform'd, at their next Meeting, that their Lordſhips had been actually diſcharg'd by the King's particular Command, was the fiery Spirit of the Houſe allay'd; for thoſe who had obtain'd the Victory, inſiſted alſo on ſetting up a Trophy. This the Courtiers could not bear, and oppos'd with all their Might. Another Debate enſued, which took up the reſt of the Day: And, on the Morrow, when it appear'd, that Peace was to be had on no other Terms, a formal Entry was made in the Journals, That the Houſe having been inform'd, that his Majeſty had given Directions for the Diſcharge of the Lords under Bail in the King's-Bench, the Debate about that Matter ceas'd. The Diſpute compromiſ'd.

Biſhop Burnet's Summary of theſe Proceedings, is contain'd in theſe remarkable Words: "The Lords paſs'd ſome Votes, aſſerting Remarks on the whole.

Days ago, continues he, that ſome of the Judges declar'd in the Lords Houſe, That one Witneſs to a principal Treaſon, and another to a Circumſtance, was ſufficient to convict a Man that is indicted for Treaſon; which was the worſt of all the Opinions deliver'd upon the Bench by the late Chief Juſtice Jeffreys." [Short Conſiderations, p. 18.

A. D. 1692. ferting their Privileges, and were offended with the Judges for detaining some in Prison, tho' there was no Reason or COLOUR for their Displeasure: But when the Privilege or the Dignity of Peerage is in question, it is not easy to keep the House within Bounds." And, on the other hand, the Jacobites made no Scruple to set forth in Print, "That it had very much detracted from the Reputation, Justice and Honour of the House of Lords, that they had tamely conniv'd at such an Injury done unto, and Affront put upon, their honourable Fellow-Members [by Aaron Smith;] and that they did not both imprison the presumptuous and daring Deposer, and order him to be prosecuted according to the utmost Rigour of the Law; or, at least, that they voted him not to be for ever incapable of serving the Government in any Place or Capacity whatsoever."

[A Letter to Mr. Secretary Trenchard.]

The Bishop also adds, "The Debate went off in a Bill that indemnify'd the Ministry for those Committments, but limited them for the future by several Rules: All which were rejected by the Commons. They thought those Limitations gave a legal Power to commit in Cases where they were observed; whereas they thought the safest way was, to indemnify the Ministry, when it was visible they did not commit any but upon a real Danger, and not to set them any Rules; since, as to the committing suspected Persons, when the Danger is real and visible, the public Safety must be first look'd to, and supersede all particular Laws."

To conclude on this Topic, though in this particular Instance, which so nearly concern'd themselves, it is not, perhaps, to be wonder'd, that the Majority of the Lords, who are generally Courtiers, should make so firm a Stand against the Encroachments of the Crown, it certainly is, that they should shew so little Complaisance in the Manner of it: And, perhaps, this can be no otherwise accounted for, than by the present Divisions of the Court; which were more in Number, and had spread wider than ever. The Princess of Denmark not only continu'd under Disgrace, but all imaginable Means had been used to mortify her as much as possible: Her Guards had been taken away: The Mayor of Bath (whither her Highness had been oblig'd to repair for the Recovery of her Health) had receiv'd an express Command from the Earl of Nottingham, in her Majesty's Name, to discontinue the Honours to her, which had been usually paid to the Royal Family: And even the Minister of St. James's Church, where she used to attend Divine Service during her Banishment from Court, was forbid to lay the Text on her Cushion, or to take any more Notice of her than of other People. As all these Persecutions arose from her persisting in her Friendship to Lord and Lady Marlborough, it was but natural that, in Return, she should employ her whole Interest, both to countenance his Lordship while under Confinement, and to procure him Satisfaction afterwards. The Marquis of Hallifax adher'd to him for the sake of Opposition; the Earl of Shrewsbury, because he was his particular Friend, according to Dr. Burnet, and because he thought him ungratefully and unjustly persecuted: The Earl of Nottingham himself, in the whole Course of the Examination, had acted like a Man who was not in Young's Secret, and who made it his Business to expose the Villany of it, in order to detect a Rival, and, of Course, an Enemy: And not only the Lord Montagu and Bradford, but even Lords Devonshire, had refus'd to sign Lord Marlborough's Warrant of Committment at the Council-Board, as thinking it infamous to send him or any Man to Prison on such Evidence. The Earl of Mulgrave was of the Party, that he might have an Opportunity to display his Abilities, and exact that Consideration from those in Power which they deserv'd. The Earls of Stamford, Monmouth, Warrington, and other Whigs, pleaded Principle for embracing the same Side; but, according to the Historian of his own Times, were more actuated by their own Discontents and Jealousies of those who had supplanted them: And as to the Jacobites, whatever had a Tendency to embroil, was sure to have both their Approbation and Assistance.

So great a Conjunction of Passions and Interests was necessary to make up one effectual Opposition: And that it was not thoroughly so, argued, that either it was very ill cemented, or that the Court had a secret Dissolvent whose Operation was irresistible.

And now, on the 18th and not before, their Lordships condescended to take the King's Speech into Consideration; but did it in such a manner as serv'd to shew, that the Tempest was still raging, though such a Sacrifice had been made to appease it: For, as we shall find the Commons had done, they took the Hint from the first Paragraph, in which his Majesty makes use of the Word Advice, as well as Assistance, to suggest, that, according to the Order in which these Words had been used by him, Advice ought to precede Assistance: And so good a Use was made of it by those who drew up the Address, that the House were led unawares into an Engagement, to gratify his Majesty both ways; tho' they very well knew, that he had mention'd the one only for the sake of the other: It was, however, the 23d, even before this Address was presented, and during that whole Interval, and for many Days afterwards, all the busy Spirits of the House were hard at work, in collecting Matter to make their Address as unpalatable to the Court, and as grateful to the People, as possible.

The Lords take the King's Speech into Consideration.

It is now time to speak of the Commons, who set out with a Face of Opposition as well as the Lords: For they had no sooner voted their Address of Thanks for the Speech, than they call'd upon the Commissioners of Accounts for their Report; and, at the Instance of Sir Thomas Clarges, voted an Address, for his Majesty's foreign Alliances to be laid before them. They also the next Day, brought in a Bill for regulating Trials in Cases of High High Treason: And, after having pass'd a Vote of Thanks to Admiral Russel, and the Commanders, Officers, and Seamen under him, for the late Victory obtain'd by them over the French, set on foot an Enquiry, Why the said Victory had not been pursu'd? Why the Descent had not been made? And why Care had not been taken to cover the Trade, by having a sufficient Number of Convoys and Cruisers in Stations proper for that Purpose? By the Vote of Thanks given to the Admiral, and which had been echo'd in Form from the Chair, with a suitable Introduction, it was manifest, that this Enquiry was rather calculated to skreen than expose him. But how the House of Commons, constituted as it was, came to espouse his Cause against Lord Nottingham, who was principally drove at, cannot at this Distance of time, be satisfactorily accounted for, without better Lights than have as yet, been communicated to the Public. The Admiral, however, undertook to shew, That no Misconduct could be justly imputed to him; for that he had written Orders to Sir John Ashby to follow the French Ships which fled thro' the Race of Alderney: And that as to the Descent, it was so late before the Land-Forces join'd the Fleet, that, according to the joint Opinion of all the Seamen, it was not adviseable to expose the great Ships to the Hazards they were liable to, in standing over to St. Malors and the other Places propos'd. In order therefore to trace the Matter as far as they could, the House severally order'd the Lords of the Admiralty to lay before them the Copies of all the Orders which they had sent to the Admiral; as also, the Admiral to bring Copies of his Answers; and the Commissioners of the Transports, Victuallers, Office of Ordnance, &c. to deliver in an Account of their Proceedings, &c.

The Commons Addresses and their Majesties Answers.

Having thus discover'd what Disposition they were in, they agreed to the Report of the two Addresses to the King and Queen; which, on the 14th, were presented by the whole House, to the following Effect, viz. To the King, "That they acknowledg'd the great Affection his Majesty shew'd to his Subjects, by taking Notice of their Bravery and Courage; by that sensible Concern he express'd for the Charges on his People; and that tender Regard for the Preservation of their Religion, Liberties and Properties, which must ever be remember'd with Gratitude by all his faithful Subjects. They likewise acknowledg'd the Favour of God in restoring his Majesty to his People, after so many Hazards and Dangers to which he had expos'd his Sacred Person, that there might be nothing wanting on his Part to oppose the ambitious Designs of his Enemies, and to maintain the Honour of England, and the Liberties of Europe. They then congratulated his Deliverance from the secret and open Designs, which the Malice of his Enemies had form'd against him: And assur'd him, that they would always advise and assist his Majesty in the supporting of his Government against all his Enemies." To the Queen they also set forth their thankful Acknowledgments, "For her gracious and prudent Administration of the Government, whilst his Majesty was hazarding his Royal Person abroad; and for the Blessings of Peace which they enjoy'd at home, under her auspicious Reign, at a time when the greatest Part of Europe was suffering the miserable Effects of War. They also congratulated her Majesty, not only on the signal Deliverance which they had receiv'd from a bold and cruel Design, form'd and prosecuted for their Destruction, when it was just ready to be executed, but likewise on the Return of her Majesty's Fleet with so complete and glorious a Victory, as was not to be equall'd in any former Age. And they assur'd her Majesty, that the grateful Sense they had of their Happiness under her Government, should be always manifested in constant Returns of Duty and Obedience, and a firm Resolution to do all that was in their Power to render her Reign secure and prosperous." A. D. 1692.

In answer to these Compliments, his Majesty was pleas'd to say, "I thank you heartily for your kind Address: And I assure you my Design is to do all I can for the Honour, Safety and Interest of the Nation." And the Queen simply, "My Thanks to the House for this kind Address."

These Answers being severally reported to the House, the next Day the Courtiers propos'd to take the King's Speech into Consideration, as the first Step towards a Supply: But those who had Credit enough with the House, to make the public Business subservient to their own, oppos'd it, urging, That his Majesty expected their Advice as well as their Assistance; and they could neither furnish him with the one, nor the other, till they had the Alliances, the public Accounts, the Estimates, &c. before them, and till the whole State of Things was thoroughly understood. And these Reasons and Pretensions had such Weight with the House, that the Consideration was postpon'd till the 22d following; in which Interval, they prosecuted their Enquiry into the Miscarriages of the Year, by sending for Sir John Ashby, whom Mr. Russel had made accountable for that Part of the French Fleet, which had escap'd thro' the Race; but who gave so fair, clear and candid an Account of his own Behaviour, that the House, by their Speaker, declar'd themselves equally satisfy'd with his Conduct then, and his Recital now; and dismiss'd him from any farther Attendance. And thus one Branch of the Enquiry, namely, Why the Victory had not been prosecuted? fell to the Ground.

They undertake to give the King Advice.

The Accounts, Alliances, &c. being now on the Table, they proceeded next to the great Article of giving Advice: And that it might not be thought that they meant to give Advice only, they pass'd a previous Vote, Nemine Contradicente, That a Supply should be given to his Majesty. This was done the 22d: And the next Day, after a long and warm Debate, on the Partialities shewn to the Foreign Generals, meaning the Dutch, and their ill Behaviour to the national Forces, especially Count Solmes, who was particularly

A. D. 1692. larly named, and whose Conduct at Steenkirk was severely reflected on, it was at first urged, That no foreign General should be allow'd on the English Establishment: And this being over-rul'd, it was finally resolv'd, That one Article of Advice to his Majesty should be, That he would be pleas'd to fill up such Vacancies as should happen among the General-Officers, with such only as were Natives of their Majesties Dominions; and that the Commander in Chief of the English, should be an Englishman: In Consequence of which, Count Solmes must have been remov'd, without the Formality of an Address for that Purpose: And here a Member, who either was not in the Secret of the Opposition, or had a Purpose to disjoint it, mov'd, That the House would recommend Lieutenant-General Talmash to his Majesty, who, he said, was a better and more experienc'd Officer than Solmes: But as the Success of this Motion would have totally disconcerted the Views of the Marlborough-Faction, it was suffer'd to drop, without being so much as seconded.

Three Days after, the Affair of the Transports, which had been referr'd to a Committee, and whose Report was that Day receiv'd, was taken into Consideration; and, after several warm Speeches thereon, it was unanimously resolv'd, That, in regard many of the great Affairs of the Government had been, for some time past, unsuccessfully manag'd, the House should humbly advise his Majesty to prevent the like Mischiefs for the future, by employing Men of Knowledge, Ability and Integrity. The Success of this Vote encourag'd some of those who had carry'd it, to lay the Axe to the Root of all our Mismanagements, by complaining of Cabinet-Councils; which, tho' a Novelty in our System of Government, was now become the first Mover in it, and gave what Direction it pleas'd to the whole; insomuch, that the Privy-Council was jostled out of its Place, and serv'd only to countenance the Measures which they had no Share in advising. But these Complaints, however justly founded, or manifestly tending to restore the Constitution, did not meet with the Notice which they deserv'd; but were suffer'd to drop, as a Matter either too great to be manag'd, or too tender to be touch'd: Tho' the Truth really was, That those who were loudest in their Clamours, thought least of a Reformation.

On the 30th, the Debates were conducted on a still narrower Bottom, and were calculated more openly and visibly to answer the Purposes of a Party; for the great Drift of the angry Speeches of that Day, was to shew, That all the bad things which had so grievously affected the Nation, and which then employ'd the Attention of the House, arose from the bad Principles of those in the Administration; whereas, the great Misfortune of the Commonwealth was, that those in Power, Place, and Authority, seem'd to have no Principle at all, but were govern'd solely by Ambition and Avarice. It was said, That those who had oppos'd the Settlement of the Government, could not be expected A. D. 1692. to serve it with the Zeal which the present Circumstances requir'd: The Earl of Nottingham was nam'd by one Member, but no body seconded him; and, upon the Issue of all, it was resolv'd, That his Majesty be humbly advis'd, for the necessary Support of the Government, to employ in his Councils and the Management of his Affairs, such Persons only whose Principles oblig'd them to stand by him and his Rights, against the late King James, and all other Pretenders whatsoever.

On the fifth of December, the Current of Opposition ran still in the same Channel; and it became more and more apparent, that the Earl of Nottingham was the principal Obstacle which was to be remov'd by it: Mr. Russel had not only clear'd himself from all Blame, but had tacitly laid it upon his Lordship: For being call'd upon to shew Cause, why it was so late before the Transports join'd him, he excus'd himself, by saying, That twenty Days had pass'd between his first Letter to the Earl of Nottingham after the Fight, and his Lordship's Answer to it. This seem'd to be a Proof, that the Secretary was in Fault: And as no Endeavours were wanting to enflame the House against him, so neither did he want for Advocates to argue as fiercely in his Behalf, and to recriminate upon the Admiral. Thus when the first Question came to be put upon the Debates of the Committee, both Parties agreed, That there had been an apparent Miscarriage in the Management of the Affairs relating to the Descent last Summer: But when the second, which was directed against the Secretary in these Words, "That one Cause of the said Miscarriage was the want of giving timely and necessary Orders, by such Persons to whom the Management of this Matter was committed," came also to be put, the two Parties divided, and appear'd so equally match'd, that it was carried in the Affirmative but by one Voice, viz. 165 against 164.

This seem'd to be a stunning Blow to both; for those who had carry'd their Point, durst not venture to make any immediate Use of it; and those who had lost it, were forc'd to be quiet for that Reason. On the eighth, therefore, when the Committee sat again, Advantage was taken by Sir Richard Temple, to give the Debates of that Day an indifferent Turn, by moving, That, in Pursuance of the King's Speech, they would take it into Consideration, how to pay the Forces abroad, by sending over English Manufactures, and thereby preventing the Exportation of so much Money yearly. This Expedient being seconded, it was resolv'd to move the House to appoint a Committee to consider thereof: But as if nothing which had a national Aspect, was to answer any other End, than to blind and mislead the Nations, this Resolution was no sooner taken, than Sir Francis Winnington, the Chairman, was call'd upon to leave the Chair: And that appearing to be the Sense of the Committee, the Speaker resum'd his Place: In Consequence of which abrupt Proceeding,

A. D. 1692. all that had been done was void; and even the Committee itſelf was at an end: For as the Chairman had receiv'd no Directions to make a Report, nor to apply for Leave to ſit again, he could do neither the one nor the other: The Committee was however reviv'd by the Houſe, and directed to ſit on the 12th following; at which time it was again adjourn'd, at the Inſtance of Admiral Ruſſel, to the 16th, and then ſcandalouſly dropt for good and all: For, a Motion being made, to adviſe his Majeſty, to remove Colonel Gower and Mr. Meeſters, two Dutch Officers, out of the Ordnance, and a Debate ariſing upon it, ſome Military Men, who had Seats in the Houſe, took Occaſion to ſay, That if they had nothing of more weight to lay before the King, they might as well go to their Dinner, the Hint was taken by the Majority to break up the Committee as before.

but give over at all.

Now if any one, more concern'd for the Credit of this Reign, than the Cauſe of Truth, and the Intereſt of Poſterity, ſhould take Offence at paſſing ſo harſh a Sentence on this Event, let them recollect, that even Biſhop Burnet himſelf, who is exceedingly careful not to throw too much Light on theſe Tranſactions, ſpeaks of them as follows: "The Commons began with great Complaints of the Admiralty; and then they had the Conduct in Flanders, particularly, in the Action of Steenkirk, before them; and they voted ſome Heads of an Addreſs relating to thoſe Matters; but by a SECRET MANAGEMENT they let the whole thing fall, after they had paſs'd thoſe angry Votes." What this SECRET MANAGEMENT was, there is no need, at this time of day, to explane; and it is to be fear'd, that the fatal Experience of this Age, will ſufficiently enlighten thoſe to come.

They vote the Supply for the Navy, Army and the Deficience of the Quarterly Poll.

To return; while the previous Point of Advice was viſibly languiſhing from Adjournment to Adjournment, that of Aſſiſtance gather'd Strength in Proportion: According to the Eſtimates ſent in by the Commiſſioners of the Admiralty, a Proviſion was to be made for thirty-three thouſand Seamen, and two Regiments of Marines: And tho' the Houſe could not be brought to admit the Latter, they made very little Difficulty to provide for the Former: And the Sum granted for this Service, as alſo that of the Ordnance, and for finiſhing the Dock-Yard at Plymouth, and building four Bomb-Veſſels, and eight new Fourth-Rates, was One Million, nine hundred and twenty-ſix thouſand, eight hundred and ſixteen Pounds, which was more by upwards of three hundred and thirty-five thouſand Pounds, than was given the former Year. This was done December the ſecond; and the next Day they made a farther Grant of Seven hundred and fifty thouſand Pounds to ſupply the Deficiency of the Quarterly Poll. Nothing now remain'd, but to provide for the Land-Forces: And as this was the Article in which the King was moſt concern'd, they choſe to keep it longeſt in Suſpence, for Reaſons of their own. The Eſtimates were indeed taken into Conſideration on the third, but the Grant was not completed till the 10th; and, in that Interval, the Craftſmen of all Sides ſhew'd the utmoſt of their Skill, in endeavouring to over-reach and circumvent one-another. The Number of Men demanded, was fifty-four thouſand, of whom twenty thouſand, as Lord Ranelagh the Pay-Maſter gave the Houſe to underſtand, were to be kept at home for the Defence of the Nation, while the reſt were employ'd abroad, in concert with the other Troops of the Confederacy. Under the ſame Head of Land-Service, were alſo comprehended the Subſidies paid to the Electors of Saxony and Hanover; together with the Artillery, Tranſports, Pay of General-Officers, Hoſpitals, and Contingencies of all Sorts; every one of which Items afforded ſufficient Matter for Diſpute and Altercation, and conſequently for the adverſe Party-Leaders to manifeſt their Importance, by expoſing and diſtreſſing the Court on one hand, and by their Endeavours to gratify it on the other. The Item firſt conſider'd, was the fifty-four thouſand Men; and as theſe were for two different Services, thoſe in the Oppoſition choſe to have them propos'd to the Houſe, under two ſeveral Queſtions; which the Courtiers, for a while, ſtrenuouſly withſtood, but at laſt gave way to, as not caring to endanger the thing by being over-rigid in preſcribing the manner: And now the Home-Queſtion being ſtated firſt, the whole Houſe appear'd of one Mind; for it was carry'd without one diſſenting Voice: But when the Foreign Branch came to be propos'd, the Debates were renew'd with more Vehemence than ever: Several declar'd themſelves averſe to the ſending any Forces into Flanders, where we had no immediate Intereſt of our own to ſerve, and where Experience had ſhewn us, there was ſo little Probability of Succeſs: Others again, were for continuing to aſſiſt our Allies on the Continent with a Proportion of Land-Forces; but then it was to be ſuch a one as became an Auxiliary, not a Principal, and at ſuch an Expence as the Nation could eaſily and chearfully bear. The whole Debate laſted till nine o'Clock, and then it appear'd, that the Courtiers had obtain'd ſo great a Majority, that their Opponents did not think it proper to expoſe their own Weakneſs, by dividing the Houſe.

A. D. 1692.

The greater Points being thus carry'd, the leſs follow'd almoſt of courſe: Upon the following Days, the Charge of the Staff-Officers, the Train, and the Tranſports, were ſeverally allow'd; and nothing remain'd but the Hoſpitals and the Mercenaries, which, as if to make Amends for the Diviſion of the great Queſtion on the third, was on the ninth compriz'd in one Article, under the Head of Hoſpitals and other extraordinary Charges; in which they ſtretch'd their Complaiſance to the Crown to a very remarkable Degree: For, whereas it appear'd on the Face of thoſe Treaties, which the King had caus'd to be laid before the Houſe, that, tho' the Dutch and we were joint Contracters with the German Princes, they bore but one Third of the Expence, and we the other Two, the Houſe, inſtead of openly and avowedly condemning

A. D. 1692. demning this open and avowed Inſtance of Partiality, choſe this lumping Method to enable his Majeſty to fulfil a Bargain, which they could not but diſapprove; and by way of Palliative granted but Two hundred thouſand Pounds for the Jobb, in lieu of Two hundred and thirty-five thouſand Pounds, as it was rated in the Eſtimate. Nor was this all; for, ſo much was the Temper of the Majority alter'd by this time, that a Motion being made, that the Prince of Wirtembergh and the Major-Generals Tetteau and la Foreſt, who commanded the Daniſh Troops now in the Dutch Pay, might have the Difference between the Dutch and Engliſh Pay made up to them by us, thoſe, who in the Beginning of the Seſſion could ſcarce bear the Mention of a foreign General, now made no Scruple to ſet up ſo ſtrange a Precedent in favour of theſe, under the Notion of a Conſideration for their good Services.

Here, however, they ſtopt, and on ſumming up all the ſeveral Items which they had by this time engag'd for, they voted and reſolv'd the next Day, That Two Million, ninety thouſand, five hundred and ſixty-three Pounds, ſhould be given to his Majeſty for the Land-Forces, and the other Extraordinaries of the War, which was One hundred and fifty-four thouſand, ſeven hundred and ſeventy-ſix Pounds more than they had given the Year before. And now nothing remained but to furniſh the Ways and Means: But before we follow them through that Walk, it will be expedient to reſume the Proceedings of the Lords.

Proceedings of the Lords on the Head of Advice.

Their Lordſhips, as we have ſeen, had reſolv'd to adviſe as well as the Commons; and indeed Advice was the proper Province of their Houſe, as Aſſiſtance was the Peculiar of the other: They ſet out with a Suppoſition, that the King had aſked their Advice; whereas, he had only dropt the Word by the Way, in Hopes that no body would think it worth picking up; and they were diſpos'd to give him, if not more than he wanted, more than he would uſe. It was, however, the 28th of November before they could agree on the firſt Head; and then, as well in Compliment to Lord Marlborough, as to attack the Court in its weakeſt Place, they open'd their Batteries againſt the foreign Intereſt, by reſolving to adviſe his Majeſty, to employ one of his Engliſh Subjects to be the Commander in Chief of his Engliſh Forces. It was yet many Days longer before they could agree on their next Stept: And in that Interval it occur'd to ſome of thoſe who were moſt in earneſt, and who beſt knew how infinitely difficult it was, to carry ſo vaſt and perplex'd a Buſineſs thro' all the Forms of a numerous Aſſembly, not only againſt the Inclination, but the fundamental Intereſts of the Court, that, as each Houſe were on the ſame Queſt, if they could ſo contrive it, as to procure the Management to be veſted in a joint Committee of both, arm'd with proper Powers and Authorities, they ſhould proceed with more Eaſe, on ſuter Grounds, and with more Certainty of Succeſs. Accordingly, this Notion of theirs was communicated to the reſt, who warmly eſpous'd it; and on the ſeventh of December it was mov'd for in the Houſe, and ſupported with all the Arguments, adorn'd with all the Eloquence, and animated with all the Spirit of the Party; againſt which the Court oppos'd their whole Phalanx, that is to ſay, all the Lords of the Cabinet, except the Lord Steward Devonſhire, all thoſe other Lords, whoſe Conſciences were under the Dominion of their Places and Penſions, and all the Biſhops preſent, except Watſon, Biſhop of St. Davids. Theſe altogether made up forty-eight, whereas, the others were but thirty-ſix. And thus, after a long Debate, the Courtiers became Maſters of the Field of Battle; while the Vanquiſh'd cover'd their Retreat with a thundering Proteſt; which was ſign'd in the firſt Place by Lord Shrewſbury, and after him, by the Lords Stamford, Monmouth, Crew, Torrington Granville, Marlborough, Ayleſbury, Colchmondeley, Mulgrave, Cornwallis, Vaughan, de Longueville, Montagu, Bath, Macclesfield, Warrington, and Fitzwalter; of whom above three Fourths were eminent Revolutioners; which deſerves ſo much the more Notice, becauſe Biſhop Burnet, ſpeaking of this Propoſition of theirs, is pleas'd to ſay, That it was what had never been offer'd, but when the Nation was ready to break out into Civil Wars; and, that if it had once been admitted, it would have grown in a ſhort time into a Council of State, which would ſoon have brought all Affairs under their Inſpection. The Proteſt itſelf was as follows:

A. D. 1692.

"1. Becauſe his Majeſty, having particularly and expreſly deſir'd the Advice of his Parliament at this time, when he ſo much ſeems to need it, no other Method was, nor, in our Opinions, could be propos'd, by which the two Houſes might ſo well and ſo ſpeedily be brought to that Concurrence which is neceſſary to render their Advice effectual.

2. Becauſe it appears by ſome Papers already imparted to this Houſe, that ſeveral Members of the Houſe of Commons are concern'd in the Matters before us, as having been ſo lately employ'd in his Majeſty's Service; and we conceive it the eaſieſt, propereſt, and faireſt way of Communication between the two Houſes, to have ſo great and important Buſineſs tranſacted, and prepar'd in a Committee ſo choſen.

3. Becauſe it cannot be expected that ſo many Members of the Houſe of Commons, from whom we ſhall need Information, can in any other manner be here preſent ſo often (tho' with the Leave of their Houſe) as will be neceſſary for a ſufficient Enquiry into the ſeveral Affairs now under Conſideration.

4. Becauſe, if the Houſe of Commons intend alſo to give Advice to his Majeſty, 'tis very probable that both Houſes of Parliament may receive ſuch Information ſeverally, as will be thought fit to be communicated as ſoon as poſſible; and we conceive no way of doing that can be ſo proper or ſpeedy, as in a Committee of both Houſes.

5. Becauſe in a time of ſuch imminent Danger to the Nation, by reaſon of the many Miſcarriages

A. D. 1692. Miſcarriages as are ſuppos'd generally to have been committed, the cloſeſt and ſtricteſt Union of both Houſes is abſolutely neceſſary to redeem us from all that Ruin which we have too much Cauſe to fear is coming upon us."

This Project having been thus fruſtrated, their Lordſhips the next Day reſum'd the Affair of giving Advice, notwithſtanding; and having taken into Conſideration the Eſtabliſhment of the Ordnance, objected to the two Dutchmen, Gower and Meeſters, whoſe Names they found therein, and made it (i) another Head of their Addreſs, That his Majeſty would be pleas'd to remove them; which renders it ſo much the more remarkable, that the Commons ſhould break up their Committee eight Days afterwards, as we have ſeen they did, on this very Circumſtance, and withal that they ſhould throw ſo ſtrong a mark of Contempt upon it.

The next Point ſtarted, was that of the Precedency, when the Engliſh and Dutch were employ'd conjunctly in the ſame Service. The Earl of Marlborough aſſerted, it was not only due to the Former, but had been ſolemnly yielded by the Latter; and for Proof, he referr'd to the very Capitulation which had been ſign'd by the two States: The Lords apply'd to the Paper-Office for a Copy of this Piece: The Anſwer given was, That it could not be found. The Earl then produc'd a Copy himſelf, and upon the Authority of it, the Houſe came to a Reſolution, That another Head of their Advice ſhould be to this Effect, That his Majeſty would be pleas'd to give the Precedency to the Engliſh; and, that an Engliſh Officer might command all Dutch Officers of the ſame Rank, tho' his Commiſſion was of a later Date. This, in ſhort, was the plain Engliſh of the Vote; but in the Addreſs we ſhall find, that a leſs invidious Turn was given it.

There were ſtill four Dutch and three French Regiments in the Kingdom: Theſe were juſtly obnoxious to the Nation, as the continuing them here, while we were oblig'd to furniſh ſo large a Body of our own Troops to the Support of the Common-Cauſe on the Continent, ſeem'd to argue a Diſtruſt of the Engliſh, and an Opinion, that thoſe who had been the firſt Inſtruments to bring about the Revolution, were ſtill neceſſary to maintain it. Theſe, therefore, as a national Nuſance, their Lordſhips made it their next Effort to remove; and the principal Diſpute ſeem'd to be, after what manner the Effort ſhould be made: Some were for adviſing his Majeſty humbly, to ſend them all away; others, who were for trimming between the Intentions of the Malcontent Lords, and the King's known Inclinations, recommended, That his Majeſty might be adviſ'd to bring no more into the Kingdom than thoſe that were already complain'd of: And, at laſt, the Matter took this Turn, to make it part of their Addreſs, That the twenty thouſand Men to be left in England, might be all Engliſhmen. A. D. 1692.

Having made their way thus far, the Lords who led the Chace, believing, that they might carry yet another Point of ſtill greater Conſequence, or if not, that the Honour of making the Experiment, would more than compenſate the Diſappointment, endeavour'd to perſuade the Houſe, That ſeeing the Blood and Treaſure of England were employ'd in a Quarrel not entirely our own, it was but reaſonable, that the Powers we aſſiſted at ſuch an Expence, namely, Spain and Holland, ſhould put certain cautionary Towns, ſuch as Oſtend, Newport, Sluys, &c. into our Hands, as had been done by the Latter, when they firſt implor'd the Aſſiſtance of Queen Elizabeth. But tho' the Proportion was warrantable both by Reaſon and Example, and endur'd a very long and fierce Debate, the Majority, which were 36 to 24, were pleas'd to reject it; under what Pretences has never been explain'd.

Another Motion, which there is reaſon to think, was either made by, or at the Inſtance of, Lord Warrington, ſome Days after, was, That it might be Part of their Addreſs, to adviſe his Majeſty to remove out of the Lieutenancy of London ſuch Perſons as were reputed not to be well affected to the Government: But this was not only rejected, as unfit to be made a Part of the preſent Concern, but when it came afterwards to be conſider'd ſeparately, was found liable to ſo many juſt Objections, that it dropt of courſe.

And, laſtly, that their Addreſs might not ſeem to concern the Engliſh Soldiery only, they took into Conſideration the Grievances of the Seamen, ariſing from their being forc'd into the Service, and from the Outrages committed upon them by the Preſs-Officers; and with a Cauſe in their Favour, thus clos'd their Proceedings.

Thus, after ſo long a Purſuit, which had amus'd the Public from the 18th of November to the 23d of February, they waited upon his Majeſty with an Addreſs or Remonſtrance, conſiſting of theſe five Articles only; namely, 1. That the Commanding-Officer of the Engliſh Forces under the King, ſhould be an Engliſhman. 2. That the Engliſh Officers might have Precedency of all Officers of equal Rank in the Confederate Forces, tho' their Commiſſions were of later Date, thoſe of Crown'd Heads excepted, the contrary Practice during the preſent War, being, as they conceiv'd, a great Diminution to the Crown of England, and a great Diſſatisfaction for their Majeſties Subjects. 3. That the twenty thouſand Men to be left in England, might be all Engliſh, under the Command of an Engliſh General. 4. That effectual Orders might be given for remedying the great Abuſes committed by preſſing Men for the Fleet; and that ſuch Officers as were guilty of that Practice, might be caſhier'd, and farther Their Lordſhips Addreſs.

(i) The Houſe divided upon Gower's Caſe; and it then appear'd, that the Malcontents had a Majority of Three: the Number againſt him being 41, and for him but 38.

A. D. 1692. farther puniſh'd according to Law: And, 5. That there might be no Foreigners at the Board of Ordnance, becauſe they eſteem'd it a Prejudice to their Majeſties Service, and a Diſcouragement to their Subjects. His Majeſty's Anſwer was, That he would take their Addreſs into Conſideration; which, in the Language of the Throne, was as much as to ſay, That he ſhould pay no Regard to it at all: Their Lordſhips did not, however, as the Commons have ſometimes done, on the like Occaſion, preſs his Majeſty for an Explanation; nor did they ſo much as talk of addreſſing again, to know by whoſe Advice they had been expos'd to ſuch Treatment.

The King's Anſwer.

But tho' their Lordſhips were in this Inſtance true to the fundamental Maxim of their Houſe, never to be on deſperate Terms with the Crown, they ſeldom or never ſuffered their ill Humour to riſe to ſuch a height, or to break out ſo many various ways as during this Seſſion; as will be farther exemplify'd in its proper Place.

Nothing, indeed, could be more myſterious to the Public, than to be amus'd from Day to Day with Accounts of their Lordſhips notable Efforts to rectify the Errors of Government; and yet to find the Majority as ſedulous to ſkreen Lord Nottingham, as they ſhew'd themſelves to cenſure Admiral Ruſſel: For ſuch was the Caſe: And tho', when they call'd for all the Papers, Orders, and Replies relating to the Deſcent, they ſeem'd to have no particular Biaſs, the contrary ſoon became apparent; as alſo, that the two Houſes would ſooner come to a Breach, than either would lay aſide Favour and Affection, for the ſake of doing Juſtice to their Country.

Proceedings of both Houſes with relation to Lord Nottingham and Mr. Ruſſel.

On the fifth of December, Lord Nottingham brought into the Houſe his own Book of Entries, together with the whole Correſpondence that had paſs'd between him and the Admiral; which were referr'd to the Conſideration of a Committee: And his Lordſhip having moreover added ſome Particulars tending to prove, That by Word of Mouth, the Latter had been guilty of many things which had contributed greatly to the Miſcarriage, another Committee was appointed on the ninth, to enquire, What way might be found for their Lordſhips to ſpeak with a Member of the Houſe of Commons, or to have him before a Committee; and on the tenth, the ſaid Committee made their Report of an Expedient, which they conceiv'd would be effectual, and which, after ſome Debate, was adopted by the Houſe. The ſame Day alſo, Sir John Aſhby was examin'd at the Bar; and a Queſtion ariſing from the firſt Committee, whether the Account they were preparing, to be communicated to the Commons, ſhould be drawn up, as coming from the Houſe, or Lord Nottingham, the Former was reſolv'd on; and his Lordſhip was directed to draw up the Subſtance of his own verbal Charge himſelf. It was in Expectation of theſe Papers that Mr. Ruſſel had procur'd the Adjournment of the Committee of Advice, in the Houſe of Commons, before ſpoken of: And on the 19th following, the Lord Preſident and the other Lords of the Committee, deliver'd the ſaid Papers at a Conference to a Committee of the Commons, with Theſe or the like Words: "Gentlemen, we deliver theſe Papers to you by Command of the Houſe of Lords; and ſome Members of the Houſe of Commons are often mention'd in the ſaid Papers, from whom, poſſibly, you may be more particularly inform'd of the Matter contain'd in them." Now Biſhop Burnet aſſerts, in the moſt peremptory manner, that the Commons would not ſo much as read theſe Papers: And yet nothing is more certain, than that there is an Entry in the Journals, to this Effect, That at another Conference, which the Commons had demanded, and which was held on the 21ſt, their Committee declar'd, in the Name of the Houſe, "That they had read and well conſider'd thoſe Papers which their Lordſhips had ſent them, and which they now return'd by Order of the Houſe; and that finding Mr. Ruſſel a Member of their Houſe often mention'd in them, they had unanimouſly reſolv'd, "That Admiral "Ruſſel, in his Command of the Fleet, dur- "ing the laſt Summer's Expedition, had be- "hav'd with Fidelity, Courage, and Con- "duct."

A. D. 1692-3.

Thus it appear'd, that their Lordſhips Expedient had not anſwer'd their Purpoſe; and all that that remain'd, was to give ſome Vent to the Diſpleaſure which aroſe from the Diſappointment. This could be only done at a free Conference; and it was a doubtful Point, whether a free Conference could be demanded, unleſs in caſe of a Diſagreement between the two Houſes: Hereupon Precedents were ſearch'd, ſome were found, and, after a long Debate, another Committee was appointed to inſpect Precedents, whether the Reſolution of the Houſe of Commons, deliver'd at the laſt Conferences, was agreeable to the uſual Proceedings of Parliament, and alſo to conſider of Heads to be deliver'd at a free Conference on that Subject. A free Conference was accordingly demanded by their Lordſhips, and (k) granted by the Commons, but under this Reſtriction to their Managers, That how free ſoever the Lords Committee might be on their Side, they were to make no Reply. This Demand was made January the firſt, 1692-93. the two Committees met on the fourth, Lord Rocheſter was Spokſman for the Lords; and what he ſaid was to this Effect, "That he was commanded by the Houſe of Lords to repreſent to them, That their Lordſhips look'd upon the late Vote and Proceeding of the Houſe of Commons, in returning their Papers

(k) Mr. Tindal not only ſays it was refus'd, but gives the Numbers on each Side when the Houſe divided on the Queſtion; and yet afterwards gives an Account of what paſs'd at it. The Diviſion of the Houſe, therefore, could not be on refuſing the Lords a free Conference, which would have given them the greateſt Advantage, but whether the Conference ſhould be free on their Side, as the Fact is ſtated above.

A. D. 1692-3. Papers about the laſt Summer's Expedition, to be irregular and unparliamentary; for that their Lordſhips having tranſmitted thoſe Papers to them for their Information in a Matter wherein ſeveral Perſons ſeem'd to be concern'd, they expected that the Commons would not only have duly conſider'd them, but likewiſe have communicated to their Lordſhips what Lights they had before them relative to that Matter, and at leaſt the Facts and Reaſons which they had grounded their ſaid Vote upon." His Lordſhip alſo gave in a written Paper, to the ſame Purpoſe; which Colonel Granville receiv'd on behalf of the Commons; ſaying, That they would report what their Lordſhips had ſaid to the Houſe, which was all they had in Charge. And ſo ended this half-free Conference; and with it all Expectations of ſeeing the Nation better ſerv'd: For while it was admitted on all hands, that Affairs had been ill manag'd, and the ill Managers could not be detected, a Door had been open'd by the Legiſlature itſelf, for Abuſes on one hand, and Impunity on the other.

We are not, however, to forget, that while the Lords were at all this Trouble to ſet a Mark on Admiral Raſſel, the Commons made it Part of their Buſineſs to return the Compliment to Lord Nottingham: For about the ſame time that a Motion to adviſe his Majeſty to fill the Admiralty-Board with Perſons of known Experience in maritime Affairs, which imply'd ſo ſtrong a Cenſure of the (l) preſent Commiſſioners, was over-rul'd, an Addreſs, That, for the future, all Orders for the Management of the Fleet might paſs through the Hands of the ſaid Commiſſioners, was carry'd; which could anſwer no other End, than to enter a ſort of Proteſt againſt the Conduct of the Secretary's Office in the Journals of the Houſe: For ſtill the Orders of the Cabinet were to paſs through the ſame Channel, and only went farther about, before they could be carry'd into Execution.

Ways and Means. In this Interval alſo, the Commons enter'd on the Conſideration of Ways and Means; and for their firſt Step, reſolv'd, "That a Pound Rate of four Shillings in the Pound, for one Year, ſhould be charg'd upon all Lands according to their yearly Value; as alſo upon all perſonal Eſtates, and upon all Offices and Employments of Profit, other than military Offices in the Army and Navy." This capital Vote was completed December the 15th; and in the Act that was form'd upon it, the King was enabled to take up Money on the Credit of it, at 7 per Cent. Secondly: They farther enabled his Majeſty to raiſe a Million on the general Credit of the Exchequer, by granting Annuities after the rate of 14 per Cent. for one Life, or of ſeven to ſuch as ſubſcrib'd under the Reſerve of Survivorſhip. Thirdly: They made an Addition to the Cuſtoms, by impoſing ſeveral new Duties on a Variety of Imports in the Act ſpecify'd. Fourthly: They brought in a Bill for a Review of the laſt quarterly Poll; and made a Proviſion therein, that, in caſe upon the Return of the Duplicates of Aſſeſſment, it did not produce three hundred thouſand Pounds, the Deficiences might be borrow'd on the general Credit of the Exchequer, at eight per Cent. And, fifthly, they prepar'd another Bill for continuing the Impoſitions on Wine and Vinegar, together with thoſe on Tobacco and Sugar, which were to have expir'd in 1696, till 1698; and thoſe on Eaſt-India Goods, which were to have expir'd in 1695, till 97; as alſo, for laying a new Impoſition of eight per Cent. on the capital Stock of the Eaſt-India Company, then eſtimated at ſeven hundred and forty-four thouſand Pounds; one per ann. on the African, and five Pounds on ever Share of the Hudſon's-Bay Stock, and enabling his Majeſty to borrow five hundred thouſand Pounds upon it, at eight per Cent. All theſe Sums were given expreſly for the carrying on a vigorous War with France. And we are told, that when King Lewis was inform'd how liberally his Majeſty was ſupply'd out of the Coffers of his People, he was heard to ſay, with ſome Emotion, My little Couſin the Prince of Orange is fix'd in the Saddle: And again, after a little Pauſe, No matter, the laſt Louis d'Or muſt carry it. [Cruſoe's Teſt. againſt Hutchinſon, fol. p. 10.]

A. D. 1692-3.

On the Supply, the Malcontents of both Houſes very well knew depended the Fate of the Seſſion; when, therefore, by virtue of the ſecret Management, before ſpoken of, all Obſtacles were overcome in that of the Commons, the Lords began to caſt about for ſome ſuch Expedients as ſhould put them within reach of the Sweets of this ſecret Management too: And this could no otherwiſe be done, than by retarding the Money-Bills, when they ſhould come before them. Accordingly, when that for the Land-Tax, which was firſt diſpatch'd, came up, the Lords Halifax, Mulgrave, &c. apply'd their whole Strength to graft a Clauſe upon it, That the Lords ſhould tax themſelves: And tho' Biſhop Burnet pronounces, That in the way in which the ſaid Clauſe was drawn up, it could not be defended, it met with ſo much Countenance, that it was actually adopted by the Majority; and the Bill ſo amended, was moreover return'd to the Commons on the 17th of January, who immediately took it into Conſideration, and not only rejected it with one Voice, but with ſuch peculiar Tokens of Indignation, as they thought ſo flagrant a Treſpaſs on their peculiar Right deſerv'd: That the Lords alſo might not have room to fancy, that they heſitated a Moment, they ſent to demand an inſtant Conference; but their Lordſhips had the Addreſs to fruſtrate them in that Particular: For they had no ſooner ſent down the Bill, than they went on the (m) hearing of (l) It is aſſerted of one of them, That, being apply'd to by certain Barbadoes Merchants for a Convoy for the Trade of that Iſland, he told them, The Virginia Convoy would be order'd to take care of them.

(m) They had alſo made uſe of the ſame Cauſe before this to retard the Progreſs of the Million Annuity Bill: For Sir John Somers being Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and being alſo obliged, as Attorney General, to attend

A. D. 1692-3 of Lord Banbury's Clame of Peerage; and while that was depending, the Meſſengers could not be admitted. This produc'd an Adjournment; for the Commons would proceed in no Buſineſs whatſoever, till they had aſſerted their Privilege; and it was not till the next Day that they had an Opportunity to let their Lordſhips know, at a Conference, "That they diſagreed to the Clauſe in queſtion, as being a notorious Encroachment upon the Rights of the Houſe of Commons, to order and ſettle all Matters relating to the giving of Money; which Right their Anceſtors had been ſo jealous of, that they thought it underwent a Diminution when they gave their Lordſhips any Reaſon in ſupport of it."

Thus the Controverſy was fairly ſet on foot, and it remain'd with the oppoſing Lords to make all the Uſe of it they could: Accordingly, when the Report came to be debated, they contended with unuſual Vehemence, ſays Burnet, for a Delay, till a Committee ſhould be appointed to examine Precedents: Who the Speakers were, he does not ſtay to ſpecify; but then he gives us to underſtand, that the Earl of Mulgrave was at the Head of them: For he ſays, that he preſs'd his Point many Hours, with a great Force of Argument and Eloquence, beyond any thing that he had ever heard in that Houſe: And yet all that he remembers of either, is contain'd in the following Words: "He inſiſted much on the Dignity of the Peerage, and made THIS which was now propos'd to be ſo main a Part of that Dignity, that he exhauſted all the Topics of Rhetorick to convince the Lords, That if they yielded to THIS, they diveſted themſelves of their true Greatneſs, and nothing could remain but the Name and Shadow of a Peer, which was but a Pageant." What ſort of an Inſtance this is of Argument and Eloquence, there is no need to point out; and how highly ſoever the Biſhop himſelf might value it, we find him undertaking with three Lines more, to ſubvert all that the Earl had taken ſo much Pains to eſtabliſh. "But after all the Pomp and Heat of his Oratory, continues he, the Lords conſider'd the Safety of the Nation, more than the Shadow of a Privilege: And ſo they paſs'd the Bill." Meaning, that they parted with their Clauſe; which was, in truth, the Buſineſs immediately before them, and the great Point which the Earl of Mulgrave had ſo vigorouſly withſtood.

Upon the whole, it ſeems, their Lordſhips had only adopted it by way of Experiment: And the very Moment that the Houſe of Commons appear'd ſteddily reſolv'd, to riſque all rather than give way to it, their Reſolution was to relinquiſh it: And A. D. 1692-3. this appear'd ſo clearly to be the Senſe of ſo great a Majority of the Houſe, that on putting the Queſtion, it paſs'd without a Diviſion; and the only Salvo they could have recourſe to, was to appoint a Commitee to draw up Reaſons for their Conduct; which having been approv'd by the Houſe, were communicated to the Commons at a Conference, and were in Subſtance as follows, viz. That their Lordſhips had agreed to paſs the Bill without Alteration; and that they had done ſo, merely in regard to the preſent urgent State of Affairs, as being otherwiſe of opinion, That they had a Right to inſiſt upon their Clauſe.

And thus it appearing, that in the eſſential Buſineſs of the Supply, the Court had taken their Meaſures ſo, as to be ſure of overcoming all Obſtacles in both Houſes, the Heads of the Party had nothing left to do, but to keep up the Spirit of the Seſſion, by feeding the Flame with all the Combuſtibles that lay within their Reach.

A bold, but impolitic, Pamphlet, call'd, King William and Queen Mary Conquerors, had been ſet forth by one Mr. Blount (tho' he did not prefix his Name to it) under the Sanction of Bohun the LICENSER OF THE PRESS; and, tho' it contain'd no other Doctrine than what had been propagated, not only thorough the whole Dioceſe of Sarum, but through every Dioceſe in the Kingdom, in a paſtoral Letter of Bp. Burnet's, and what had been preach'd before their Majeſties by Dr. Lloyd, Biſhop of Worceſter, November the fifth, 1690, whole (n) Sermon, with large Additions and Corrections, was afterwards printed by AUTHORITY; that Doctrine was now eſteem'd and repreſented to be an Inſult to the whole Nation, and what the whole Nation was concerned to have puniſh'd. Accordingly, January 20, a formal Complaint was made in the Houſe of Commons againſt the ſaid Pamphlet, as containing Aſſertions of dangerous Conſequence to their Majeſties, to the Liberty of the Subject, and the Peace of the Kingdom. The Licenſer was ſent for in Cuſtody of the Serjeant at Arms, as were alſo the Bookſeller and Printer: And all having been examin'd, it was reſolv'd, nemine contradicente, That the ſaid Pamphlet ſhould be burnt by the Hands of the common Hangman; and that his Majeſty ſhould be humbly mov'd to diſmiſs the ſaid Licenſer from his Employment. Nor did they ſtop here; for the like Complaint having been alſo exhibited againſt Biſhop Burnet's Paſtoral Letter, in which it was ſaid, the Notion of Conqueſt had been firſt promulgated (though he himſelf, in his Hiſtory, aſcribes the Honour of it to Dr. Lloyd) a Debate aroſe, whether the ſaid Paſtoral attend the Lords on that Occaſion, they caus'd him to be ſent for out of the Chair; and as he had offended one Houſe, by ſuffering them to wait for him; ſo he offended the other as much, by obeying that Summons rather too abruptly, and breaking up the Committee without a due regard to the uſual Forms.

Under this Title:

A Diſcourſe of God's Way of diſpoſing of Kingdoms:

And with this Motto:

"With God I would have you begin and end, who is King of Kings, the Sovereign Diſpoſer of the Kingdoms of the World, who putteth down one and ſetteth up another." [King Charles the Firſt's Works, p. 713, in his Letter to his Son.

A.D. 1692-3. toral Letter ſhould not undergo the like Cenſure: And tho' it was adjourn'd for that Day, it was not only reſum'd the next, but the Houſe dividing on the Queſtion, Whether the paſtoral Letter ſhould be burnt at the ſame time with the other, it was carry'd in the (o) Affirmative, by 162 Voices againſt 155. Biſhop Lloyd's Book was alſo mentioned as equally worthy of the ſame Fate; but either in reſpect to their Majeſties, who had given it their peculiar Sanction, or out of Partiality to the Man, or thinking they had already ſet a ſufficient Brand on the Doctrine it contain'd, they let the Motion drop.

The next Day the Houſe was inform'd by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, That, in anſwer to their Addreſs for removing Bohun, the Licenſer, his Majeſty had ſaid, It ſhould be done. And, in this Interval, the Lords having join'd in the ſame Cry, and being deſirous not only to overtake, but even to ſurpaſs the Commons in the Purſuit, firſt deſir'd a Conference; and thereat ſignify'd, That, upon Occaſion of a late Libel, entituled, King William and Queen Mary, CONQUERORS, which their Lordſhips had order'd to be burnt by the common Hangman, their Lordſhips had agreed to a Vote; which they thought to be ſo important, that they thought fit to communicate the ſame to the Houſe of Commons, viz. "Reſolv'd by the Lords, Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament aſſembled, That the Aſſertion of King William's and Queen Mary's being King and Queen by CONQUEST, was highly injurious to their Majeſties, and inconſiſtent with the Principles on which this Government is founded, and tending to the Subverſion of the Rights of the People." This being reported to the Commons the ſame Day, by their Committee, they not only adopted it, nemine contradicente, but after the Words, injurious to their Majeſties, made the following Addition, RIGHTFUL TITLE to the Crown of this Realm: And under this double Sentence of both Houſes, the Pamphlet was burnt accordingly. After which, Bohun, who had been all this while, that is to ſay, from the 20th to the 28th of January, in Cuſtody of the Serjeant, upon his Petition, was brought to the Bar of the Houſe; and, having been reprimanded upon his Knees, by the Speaker, was diſcharg'd.

Againſt preſſing for the Land-ſervice.

This Fire-work had ſcarce ſpent itſelf, before another was let off from the ſame Quarter, on the following Occaſion: The Servant of one Mr. Manſel, a Member, going in his Livery for his Maſter's Letters, was preſs'd, clapt on board a Tender, and with others in the ſame Circumſtance, hurry'd down to Harwich, in order to his being ſent to Flanders. On the ſecond of February, this was complain'd of in the Houſe, and ſo highly reſented, that an Order was immediately made, for the Mayor of Harwich to ſearch all Tranſport-Ships, Packet-Boats, and all other Veſſels in the ſaid Harbour, for the ſaid Servant; and, in caſe he found him, not only to cauſe him to be releas'd, but to ſend to the Houſe a particular Account, where, and in whoſe Cuſtody he found him; and alſo, to take his Examination, and to tranſmit it to the Houſe. On the ſeventh, Mr. Lutterel, another Member, made the like Complaint; upon which, a Committee was appointed to examine the Particulars, as alſo, to enquire into the great Abuſes daily committed by Preſs-Maſters: And the Mayor of Harwich, having comply'd with the Order of the Houſe, and ſent up the Informations requir'd, his Letter was order'd to be laid before the King, accompany'd with a ſuitable Recommendation of it to his Majeſty's Attention. On the ninth, Sir Edward Seymour reported his Majeſty's Anſwer; which was to this Effect, "That his Majeſty had been graciouſly pleas'd to take notice of the great Violation of Juſtice, which had been committed, by kidnapping his Subjects (under the Pretence of preſſing them) into foreign Service: That his Majeſty had a very great Reſentment, that his Subjects ſhould meet with ſuch Uſage: That he would take all poſſible care, for the future, to puniſh the Authors of it: That he had already been pleas'd to call before him the Officers of the Army, and to give them a ſtrict Charge, that as they had no Power to preſs, they ſhould not receive any into the Service who were preſs'd: That his Majeſty would cauſe this Order to be made public, by having it printed: That he had alſo given Orders to the Admiralty to examine the Preſs-maſters, who had committed the Abuſes complain'd of; and that there ſhould be ſuch exemplary Puniſhment inflicted upon them, as ſhould deter others from doing the like." This mollifying Anſwer, for a while, had all the Effect that could be deſir'd; and that, more eſpecially, as it was accompany'd with a Royal Mandate in the Gazette, to all Commiſſion-Officers, not to receive impreſs'd Men, on pain of being immediately caſhier'd; and to all Non-commiſſion-Officers, of the ſevereſt Puniſhments that might be inflicted on them; and a Declaration, That his Majeſty had alſo given his Orders for the puniſhing Preſs-Maſters offending therein, with the utmoſt Rigour, according to their Demerits. But, when it appear'd, that this Mandate was not obſerv'd, and that there was as much Reaſon given to complain of the Abuſe as ever, Advantage was taken to renew the Enquiry concerning them. In particular, the Houſe being inform'd, that one Captain Winter had preſs'd ſeveral Perſons for the Land-ſervice, whom he detain'd in Cuſtody; and that ſeveral other Perſons who had in like manner been preſs'd for the ſame Service, were detain'd in Cuſtody of one Bright, in Drury-Lane, and one Davis (Deputy-Provoſt-Marſhal)

A.D. 1693.

(o) This is one of the Circumſtances which the Hiſtorian of his own Times had reaſon to paſs over in Silence; and of which, perhaps, he complains, when he ſays, "It was a hard thing in ſuch a divided Time, to reſolve to be of no Party, ſince Men of that Temper are puſh'd at by many, and protected by no Side. Of this we had many Inſtances at that time; and I myſelf had ſome very ſenſible ones, but they are too inconſiderable to be mention'd." [Vol. II. p. 118.

A.D. 1692-3. ſhal) in Parker's-Lane, under very hard Uſage; and that there were two Perſons attending at the Door, who could farther inform the Houſe concerning thoſe Matters; the ſaid Perſons were call'd in, and having been examin'd at the Bar, the Serjeant at Arms was order'd to bring the ſaid Winter, Bright, and Davis, together with all the Perſons held in Confinement by them, to the Bar of the Houſe; which being done accordingly, all thoſe who had been preſs'd, were immediately diſcharg'd by ſpecial Order of the Houſe: Finding alſo ſome Reaſon to ſuſpect, that all the Priſoners had not been as yet produc'd, the Serjeant at Arms was again ſent back to make a new Search, to take an Account of ſuch others as he ſhould find, and to bring the reſpective Books of Impriſonments and Diſcharges kept by the ſaid Davis and Bright: And upon the whole Matter, obſerving Captain Winter to be the Undertaker-general for this Method of recruiting the Army, they order'd him to be carry'd in Cuſtody of the Serjeant, before the Lord Chief-Juſtice, to be examin'd by his Lordſhip, who was alſo to take the Informations againſt him, in order to his being proſecuted according to Law.

While the Clamours, occaſion'd by this Affair, were yet ringing in the Ears of the People, the Mal-Adminiſtration of the Government of Ireland, ſo lately deliver'd from the Oppreſſions of King James, furniſh'd freſh Matter for Remonſtrances within Doors, and Invectives without.

and on the Mal-Adminiſtration of Ireland.

Several Gentlemen of that Kingdom; namely, Sir Francis Brewſter, Sir William Gore, Sir John Macgill, Lieutenant Stafford, Mr. Slone, and Mr. Kerne, either by Invitation from hence, or, in Proſecution of their own particular Quarrels, were come over from Ireland, purpoſely to lay the Complaints of that Kingdom before the Parliament of this. All made their Appearance at the Bar of the Houſe of Commons, and at firſt ſpecify'd their Complaints by Word of Mouth: But theſe not giving full Satisfaction, both the Hearing and the Debate which it occaſion'd, were adjourn'd; and they were ſeverally requir'd to give in their Narratives in Writing. This they did accordingly on the 24th of February; and the Subject Matter of them may be gather'd from the two Papers of Slone and Brewſter; both Members of the Iriſh Parliament.

[Slone's Narrative.]

Slone's was the moſt full, but ſo deficient in point of Method, that his Facts and Arguments loſt much of their Force for want of a due Connection with, and a Dependence on, each other. His firſt Head was National Grievances; and of thoſe he began with the Non-payment of the Army; which had furniſh'd thoſe Gentlemen with an Excuſe for raiſing what Sums they pleas'd for their own Subſiſtence, by their own Authority: And when theſe Contributions were either refus'd, or could not be anſwer'd, they made no Scruple to levy them by Diſtreſs, as if they were arm'd with the Laws as well as with the Sword. And in this manner he ſuppoſes they had levy'd above two hundred thouſand Pounds. His next Topic, was the Miſapplication and Embezzlement of the forfeited Eſtates, both real and perſonal; the Value of which laſt, as return'd by the Commiſſioners, amounted alone to about a hundred and thirty thouſand Pounds; of which but a very ſmall Part had been accounted for to their Majeſties. He then mentions it as another national Complaint, that ſo many of the Papiſts were not only ſuffer'd to keep Arms, but even to ſerve in the ſtanding Army; as alſo, that they ſhould be cover'd from the due Courſe of Law, by unlawful Protections: That the Outlawries of many of them, who were comprehended in no Articles, but ſuch as they had made themſelves, ſince the War ended, ſhould be revers'd: And that when it was aſked, Why ſuch Favour was ſhewn them? it was anſwer'd by an Agent of the Court, That, perhaps, this was one of the Arcana Imperii, which was not fit to be divulg'd. And, laſtly, he ſpoke of the Prorogation of the Iriſh Parliament, as the greateſt Grievance of all: But in order to illuſtrate that, he gave ſuch a Detail of the Behaviour of the Lord-Lieutenant and his Courtiers, during the time of their Sitting, as ſeem'd to argue, that the whole was grievous alike.

A.D. 1692-3.

There never was, he ſaid, a Houſe of Commons of that Kingdom, of greater Property, or better Principles, than thoſe which met under Lord Sydney's Adminiſtration; nor could any Men be more gratefully ſenſible of the Kindneſs, which, in their Diſtreſs, they had receiv'd from the Engliſh Nation, or more cordially diſpos'd to make ſuch Returns to the Crown, as became them. After Parliaments had been diſcontinu'd for about twenty-ſeven Years, with an Exception to that held by King James, nothing could be more welcome than ſuch a Meeting. The Lieutenant's Speech was alſo receiv'd with great Joy; tho', in effect, a Supply was demanded in it, as the Price of that Meeting, which was ſaid to be the greateſt Demonſtration of their Majeſties Affection to that Kingdom in their Power to give. Then, as to the Proceedings of the Houſe, he ſuggeſted, That tho' the Supply was the laſt Article in the Speech, ſuch was the Complaiſance of the Members, that they gave in to the Inſtances of the Courtiers, and made it the firſt of the Buſineſs. The civil and military Liſts having been laid before them, by Order of the Lord Lieutenant, together with his own Computation of the Revenue, Mr. Pulteney, his Secretary and firſt Miniſter, demanded a Fund, or Funds, for the raiſing ſeventy thouſand Pounds per ann. more, to make the Income of the Government anſwerable to the Expences of it. The Houſe, on the other hand, took his Excellency's Word for both; for, tho' it was obſerv'd, that the one was leſſen'd, and the other magnify'd, and that the Country was ſo exhauſted with the late War, that it was rather in a Condition of demanding Abatements from the Government, than to contribute farther to it; ſuch was their Zeal, that they adopted the Secretary's Motion, and reſolv'd to make Proviſion

A.D. 1692-3. sion accordingly. Ways and Means came next under Conſideration; and, whether they were not over dextrous in that Purſuit, or they found it reaſonable to prolong it, till the national Bills they were preparing, ſhould overtake them, the Court grew impatient and ſent down two Bills ready drawn, from the Council Board, and requir'd the Houſe to paſs them without any farther Ceremony. The Purport of one, was to impoſe an additional Exciſe upon Beer, Ale, and other Liquors; and the other to lay a Tax of fifteen Pence an Acre on all Corn throughout the Kingdom. The firſt of theſe was tolerably well reliſh'd, as to the Matter of it; but the ſecond was almoſt univerſally diſlik'd, as being unequal in its Nature and Effects: For neither was all Corn of the ſame Value; nor was the Market-Price of any one kind of Corn the ſame throughout the Kingdom: Beſides which, the Graſier would be wholly exempt from it, and the Farmers, having ſuffer'd the moſt in the late Calamities, were leaſt able to bear it. Then as to the manner of Introducing theſe Bills, both were in the higheſt Degree diſſatisfactory: For tho' by Poyning's Law, no Bill was to be paſs'd in Ireland, till it had firſt receiv'd the Sanction of the Engliſh Privy-Council, it was never pretended, that the Commons of Ireland were by that Act foreclos'd from taxing themſelves their own way. Tho' willing therefore to oblige the Court, and diſpos'd to adopt the additional Exciſe-Bill, they were reſolv'd to maintain their own Rights: And, accordingly, after an Inſpection of their Journals, and a ſolemn Debate, it appear'd upon the Iſſue to be the general Senſe of the Houſe, that they had a Right to reject the ſaid Bills; and that all Money-Bills, whatſoever, ought firſt to take their Riſe from themſelves. That, however, the Court might have ſo much the leſs Reaſon to complain of them, and the Courtiers to miſrepreſent their Proceedings, they ſuffer'd the Exciſe-Bill to lye before them, and prepar'd a Poll-Bill to make up the Deficiency thereof. But the ſaid Courtiers appear'd at firſt too angry, and too determin'd, to give ear to any ſuch Temperament: They ſaid publicly, That if their Money-Bills were not paſs'd in their own way, the Army ſhould continue at free Quarter, or to that Effect. And when it appear'd that theſe high Words did not intimidate the Members ſo much as was expected, the next Expedient, was to preſs the Houſe to paſs the two Bills, with a Salvo to their Right: But this was oppos'd by Slone himſelf and others, who thought, that the Exertion of Right was worth more than any Salvo to preſerve the Claim; and that it was adviſeable to poſtpone the Court-Bills, till thoſe of the Nation, before ſpoken of, were ready to accompany them (which were, a Habeas-Corpus-Bill; a Bill for reſtraining the Juriſdiction of the Council-Board; a Bill to prevent the buying and ſelling of Offices; a Bill againſt Frauds and Perjuries, &c.) leaſt, A.D. 1692-3. when the Former were paſs'd, the Latter might be left behind. At laſt, however, an Expedient, and the Neceſſity of an immediate Supply was ſo earneſtly preſs'd, that the Houſe was mollify'd, and they conſented to paſs the Exciſe-Bill, with a Declaration, That it was only for this time; and that it ſhould never be drawn into Precedent: But then, at the ſame time, they rejected the Corn-Bill, for that expreſs Reaſon, becauſe it did not take its riſe among the Commons. And now it was underſtood, that the Diſpute was at an end; the poor Commons thought they had topt their Parts, by reconciling thus notably the Service of King and Country, and expected equal Acknowledgments from both: More eſpecially, they thought, that they had won the Heart of his Excellency the Lord-Lieutenant, for all his Creatures had join'd unanimouſly in this Compromiſe: When they recommended their Chaplain to him for Preferment, as uſual, he anſwer'd, That tho' he had heard a good Character of him before, he ſhould pay the greater Regard to it in Compliment, to the Recomendation of the Houſe: And the ſame Day, being November the ſecond, he appointed the fourth for the Committee to wait on him in Council, with the Heads of their new Laws: And yet in the midſt of all this ſeeming Calm, no ſooner was he in Poſſeſſion of the additional Exciſe, then he ſent for them up (on the third, that is to ſay) and having reprimanded them ſeverely, (p) for entrenching on his Majeſty's Prerogative, and the Rights of the Crown of England, by their Votes for maintaining their Right of raiſing Money by Ways and Means of their own, and rejecting the Corn-Bill, and enter'd his Proteſt in the Lords Books againſt thoſe Votes, he prorogu'd them to the 16th of April.

The laſt Topic of Slone's Diſcourſe, was chiefly upon an Occurrence which had happen'd ſince the Prorogation. It ſeems this Behaviour of the Lord Lieutenant had opened the Eyes of the Members; and, ſuſpecting, that he who was capable of tricking, would make no ſcruple to miſrepreſent, them, they came to a Reſolution, to ſend over Agents of their own to guard againſt his Devices, by laying a plain and true State of their whole Conduct before their Majeſties. This was no unuſual thing; but then it had been uſual, at leaſt it was ſo alledg'd, to aſk the Conſent of the Government; and it was reſolv'd to do ſo now, that their Conduct might be, in all reſpects, unexceptionable. Accordingly, a Petition, requeſting his Conſent, was preſented to his Excellency, by Sir Robert King, Sir Arthur Rawden, Sir Arthur Longford, and Mr. Anneſly; and the Anſwer they receiv'd was, That they could not have a better Agent than the King himſelf, who had been Agent for the Proteſtants theſe twenty Years: But if they would have leave for any to go over and beg the King's (p) This is according to his Excellency's printed Speech; but Slone himſelf ſuggeſts, That his real Words were, for behaving themſelves undutifully and ungratefully, by invading their Majeſties Prerogative, &c.

A. D. 1692-3. King's Pardon for their riotous and seditious Meetings, they might have it; or to that Effect. This sounded very harsh in the Ears of the Gentlemen to whom it was said, and, in general, to all others, who believ'd them to be Men of Worth and Integrity. Nor was this all; an Order was issu'd to prosecute them upon an Information in the King's-Bench; but stopp'd on better Advice; the Gentlemen being resolv'd to defend what they had done. To set a Mark upon them, however, Sir Arthur Rawden was remov'd from the Goverment of Down, and Mr. Osborne and Mr. Broderick, Serjeants at Law to their Majesties, who were suppos'd to be at the Bottom of all this Opposition, were not only depriv'd of that Honour, but even struck off the List of Justices of the Peace.

Lastly, to shew how reasonably the Petition to send Agents to Court, was founded, it is farther alledg'd by Slone, That, according to Common Fame, the Papists were allow'd that Liberty, and made annual Collections to support the Expence of it; and if the same Liberty had been extended to the Protestants, the House would, in all Probability, have had no Occasion to render themselves obnoxious, by rejecting so many bad Bills with very fair Titles, as had been transmitted to them; namely, a Bill to confirm the Act of Settlement, so worded, as to make the Remedy worse than the Disease; another to reverse the Proceedings under King James's Act of Attainder; which had such a Clause in the Body of it, as made those very Persons afraid to accept of it, who had been fearful enough to desire it; a third to punish Mutiny and Desertion (but without any Clause for the regulating Quarters) for a stated Term of three Years, and from thence to the next Session of Parliament, which it was in the Power of the Crown to postpone for twenty-seven Years longer; and a fourth for a new Establishment of the Militia, which requir'd some Counties to raise more Men than the Protestant-Inhabitants in them amounted to; and impos'd such arbitary Methods of raising the Money for their Support upon all, under such severe Penalties, that the House, tho' desirous to render the Militia useful, rejected it, as a Burden too grievous to be borne.

This is a Brief of Slone's Narrative, which tho' sufficiently declaratory of an evil Spirit in the Government, did not furnish sufficient Matter to proceed directly against those who had the Management of it: But Sir Francis Brewster, though he did not take so large a Scope, kept rather closer to the Point which he knew would be most regarded, and met with Attention accordingly. He had been one of the Committee of Grievances and Accounts, and, by that means, had been furnish'd with all the Lights that could as yet be procur'd, to examine those fraudulent Transactions to the Bottom.

Sir Francis Brewster's Narrative.

He began with saying, That so many Complaints came before them, concerning the unequal Disposition of forfeited Lands, and accompany'd with such a Variety of Proofs, that the whole Affair appear'd a Series of Jobbs; that for fear they shou'd not have time allow'd them to take in the whole Circle of Grievances, they came to a general Resolution, That it was a great Breach of Trust, as well as a Grievance, for the Commissioners of the Revenue to set forfeited Lands to themselves, or to any in Trust for them: And then to shew how reasonable it was for them to do so, he adds, That by all he could find in the Books and Rent-Rolls, the greatest Part of those Lands were set for the private Advantage of Favourites, the Favourites of Favourites, and the Creatures of the Court. The Persons he first nam'd were, first, Mr. Culliford, as the grand Delinquent; and after him, the Lord Chief Baron , Judge Linden; and, in general, those concern'd in the Revenue, or in Trust for them; for that many of the most valuable Lands were so held, appear'd by the Instance of a Hackney-Coachman, who was nominal Tenant to several of the best Farms in the Neighbourhood of Dublin. He acknowledg'd the Method pretended to be used for setting them, was very fair, but the Practice widely different: For such Artifices were used, that very few had even the Liberty to bid for the Lands they liv'd on: And the Consequence to them was truly deplorable; for they were turn'd out without Money or Compassion, to seek a Settlement where they could find one; and many of them, after they had crop the Ground they were dispossest of. What made this so much the more remarkable, the Dispossess'd were English Protestants, the new-admitted generally Irish Catholics; and the Rents they paid but a Fifth or Fourth of what had been paid by the Former: So that whereas the forfeited Lands were set for thirty-two thousand Pounds the first Year, when only two of the Provinces were entirely reduc'd to their Majesties Obedience; the second Year, when the whole Kingdom was reduc'd, and Peace every where restor'd, the Amount of the whole did not exceed ten thousand Pounds. Upon Enquiry into the Cause of this Difference to Loss, when it was so reasonable to expect as wide a Difference to Profit, the Answer given was, That it was occasion'd by the Articles of Limerick and Galway, which had vacated many Outlawries, and, consequently, restor'd many Estates to the original Proprietors: But to this it was reply'd, That, how many soever had the Benefit of those Articles, and what Advantage soever had been taken to render them beneficial to those who had no real Clame to make upon them, still the Increase of Forfeitures, by the Reduction of the whole Kingdom, was greater than the Diminution, by the vacating those Outlawries. And, upon the whole, he declar'd it to be his Opinion, That the Frauds upon this Occasion, amounted to some hundred thousand Pounds. His next Transition, was to the forfeited Goods and Chattles, which Slone had touch'd on before, and of which, as he testify'd, the Accounts deliver'd in, were so perplex'd, that it would have taken up some Months to have render'd them intelligible. He was even expres, That the whole seem'd nothing but a Trick, without either

A. D. 1692-3.

A. D. 1691-3. either Check or Voucher, Method, or Form; insomuch, that there was a Necessity to examine every particular Officer concern'd in the Jobb, before a regular Charge could be brought against any one of them: And yet upon the whole, it was apparent, That out of a hundred and thirty-five thousand Pounds worth of Goods deliver'd into the Commissioner's Charge, not above ten thousand had been brought to their Majesties Account: And it was said, that near as much more had been probably dispos'd of in the Country, by private Orders from Mr. Culliford. But tho' the Crown was so little the better for these Forfeitures, he further alledg'd, that the Commissioners had not been wanting on their Side to extend them as far as possible; as appear'd in the Case of Mr. Joy, Knight of the Shire for Waterford, who, taking Refuge in England from the Oppressions of the Irish Government, had his Estate and Effects seiz'd; and on his Return, after the Settlement, hearing, that a Quantity of his Wooll was still in the King's Warehouse at Waterford, apply'd to the Government for Restitution, but instead of obtaining it was referr'd from one Set of Commissioners to another; and, at last, was told at the Exchequer, That he could have no Remedy but by common Law: He sought that Remedy also, and a Quirk was found out, by which he had Judgment given against him, and lost his Wooll: All this Joy set forth in a Petition to the Irish Parliament; which he put into Brewster's Hands to present and speak to. "But, said he, there was in our Sessions no Room for private Grievances, our public were so many; and, therefore, the Gentleman was only pity'd among the Number of afflicted Protestants."

Sir Francis then signify'd, that another Branch of their Enquiry was into the Value and Application of the Stores, left by King James. These, it seems, had been entrusted to the Care and Management of one Mr. Robinson: And unless there had been such Stores, none could have been taken care of; nor was there any Pretence to appoint a Manager of them. According to Common Fame, they were of great Value, and might have been of great Use: But nothing of this could be made appear by the Committee on their Enquiry. It was indeed publicly said, that Mr. Robinson had found the Value to be eighty thousand Pounds, and some body else the Use of that Sum: But if so, his Management had been so ingenious, and, being one of Lord Conningsby's Deputies in the Treasury (which was an Office that had an Influence over all the other Offices in the Kingdom) he was so every way defended from every Quest of every kind, that no Proof nor Evidence could be brought against him, as long as the whole Administration was of a-piece. It had indeed been pretended, that the Corn had rotted in keeping; which, if true, had argu'd inexcusable Negligence; because at that time both Soldiers and Inhabitants were reduc'd almost to Extremity for want of it: But others suggested, That they were too good Managers to suffer any thing to rot in their Custody; that, on the contrary, they supply'd the French out of these very Stores; and that Quantities of Beef, Butter, and other Provisions had been shipp'd for that Kingdom: In particular, it was said, That a Ship-Load of Wooll had been taken out of the Stores of Waterford, and so dispos'd of by Robinson, under Pretence of sending it to be employ'd in the Siege of Cork; and that Captain Pedar, Commander of one of his Majesty's Ships, having taken a Vessel laden with French Goods, and brought her into Waterford, Orders were sent to him, to deliver her up to the Officers of the Customs; for that she belong'd to Dublin; which the Captain refusing, and being menac'd for so doing, he put an end to the Controversy, by saying, They had best be quiet; for he had such Proofs in his Hands of the Correspondence which they had settled in France, as would do their Business.

A. D. 1691-3.

The last of these Particulars, Sir Francis advanc'd on the Credit of a Colonel of the Army, who was then attending at the Door, in order to give a more full Account, as he he had receiv'd it from the Captain's own Mouth.

Proceeding then to the Administration of the Treasury, which, as he observ'd, had never before been in the Hands of the chief Governor, he took notice, That, according to the former Oeconomy of that Office, all Receipts and Payments were transacted by Exchequer Orders and Acquittances, which were enter'd from Day to Day in the several Offices, and all finally lodg'd in the Pells; from whence an Abstract was sent to the Chief Governor every Monday Morning; who thereby became acquainted with the whole State of the Treasury; and had it in his Power to detect and punish every indirect Practice: But that now this wholsome Method was entirely laid aside, and all Payments were made by Paper-Assignments from the Treasury; by which means, the Use and Virtue of the Exchequer was lost; and not only the Officers of the Treasury, but even the Collectors and Receivers had it in their Power, almost, to do what was right in their own Eyes. Nor was this the worst; for the Mismanagement in the Treasury had contributed to the Ill-payment of the Army; and the Ill-payment of the Army had furnish'd Pretences for the Ruin of the Country; which is the Reason, said he, for laying this Matter before the Parliament.

He then touch'd on the Disorders which had been committed by the Army, as also the Proposals which had been made by the Country to rectify them, and which had been rejected by the Government. And he added, That the Resentment of this Usage, and the Persuasion which had generally prevail'd, that the Produce of the Forfeitures, and the right Application of the Stores, might have prevented the Army from being any Burden to the Nation, drew down some very hard Reflections on Lord Conningsby. "Not, said he, that I speak this to reflect on his Lordship; for I never had any Concern with him, but as my Estate

A. D. 1692-3. lay under the common Calamity of his Government."

Laſtly, he complain'd, on the Behalf of the City of Dublin, which he repreſented in the Iriſh Parliament, That they were not allow'd to chuſe their own Magiſtrates; a Privilege, that, till now, they had never been refus'd: And, for a Cloſe of all, he ſaid, That he had aſſerted nothing but what many thouſands in Ireland were ready to confirm.

The Lords take up the Affair and examine other Perſons.

Both theſe Papers, and thoſe of the other Perſons before nam'd, were ſeverally given in to the Lords, as well as the Commons; and their Lordſhips, that they might be Maſters of both Sides of the Queſtion, went ſo far, as to ſummon and examine ſeveral other Perſons, as the Lady Anglas, the Biſhop of Meath, Sir Robert Southwell, and Mr. John Pulteney himſelf, who appear'd as an expreſs Advocate for the Government, and omitted nothing that could extenuate his Excellency's Conduct with regard to the Iriſh Parliament; or thoſe Tranſactions without Doors, which had, in ſo remarkable a manner, excited the Diſpleaſure of the Country.

Their Interrogatories to Brewſter, and his Anſwers.

The whole hearing took up ſeveral Days, and it ought not to be forgot, that, in this Interval, Sir Francis Brewſter, having been call'd upon by their Lordſhips, to inform them, Why he did not communicate the Reaſons to them, that were aſſign'd to him by the Perſons aggriev'd in Ireland, for not making their Complaints to the Lords Juſtices; his Anſwer was, That it was becauſe they believ'd nothing was done by the Commiſſioners of the Revenue there, but what was agreeable to their Majeſties Pleaſure.

That being alſo requir'd to name the Perſons who told him, It was to no Purpoſe to complain to the Government of any Grievances, and that ſuch as did would be treated as Enemies, he ſpecify'd Mr. Joy, in the Caſe of his Wool; Mr. Henry Downes, in the Caſe of certain Salt-Pans ſet to Judge Linden; Mr. Cocker, in the Caſe of the Embezzlement of the Stores, who having a ſmall Employment, was afraid to ſpeak out, for fear of loſing it; and Mr. Edward Haines of Dublin, in the Caſe of that City's Right to elect their Lord Mayor, who ſaid farther, That he had been indited, by the preſent Lord Mayor's Order (who was a Creature of the Court) at their own Seſſions, for having appear'd in behalf of the City, though the Pretence was, for Words ſpoken; and that the Grand Jury having refus'd to find the Bill, he had been proceeded againſt in the King's-Bench, and had heard, they meant to ruin him.

And, laſtly, being aſked, what Somebody he meant, that had profited ſo greatly by Mr. Robinſon's Help, in the Management of the Stores? his Anſwer was, I mean my Lord Coningſby and himſelf.

Having thus the whole Matter before them, each Houſe prepar'd an Addreſs, or rather Remonſtrance, upon it, and ſeverally preſented them to his Majeſty on the ſame Day, namely, March the ninth: In that of the Lords it was urged, 1. That there had been great Abuſes in the diſpoſing of the forfeited Eſtates, inſomuch, that of the perſonal Eſtates, which amounted to a hundred and thirty-five thouſand Pounds, but ten thouſand had been accounted for to the King. 2. That Protections had been granted to the Iriſh, not included in the Articles of Limerick, whereby the Proteſtants had been depriv'd of the Benefit of the Law againſt them. 3. That the Quarters of the Army had not been paid, though the ſame was deducted out of the Pay of the Troops; and that the Parliament had made ſufficient Proviſion for both. 4. That a Mayor had been impos'd for two Years together upon the City of Dublin, contrary to their ancient Privileges and Charter. 5. That one Gaffney and ſeveral others, who were accus'd of the Murder of ſome of Colonel Foulkes's Men, were executed without any Proofs, and one Sweetman, who was the moſt guilty, diſcharg'd without any Proſecution. And to all his Majeſty was pleas'd to anſwer, "Your Lordſhips may be aſſur'd, I will, as ſoon as poſſible, take care to remedy all theſe Matters."

A. D. 1692-3. Their Lords Ships Addreſs on the whole Matter.

The Addreſs of the Commons was more full, free, and concluſive: Under whatever ſecret Management they were, they had nevertheleſs ſo much Firmneſs remaining, as to urge, That their Duty to his Majeſty oblig'd them to lay before him the great Abuſes and Miſmanagement in the Kingdom; by expoſing the Proteſtant Subjects to the Miſeries of free Quarters, and the Licentiouſneſs of an Army, to the great Oppreſſion of the People there; which they conceiv'd had been chiefly occaſion'd by the want of that Pay, which they did hope they had fully provided for. 2. By recruiting his Majeſty's Troops with Iriſh Papiſts, and ſuch Perſons as had been in open Rebellion againſt his Majeſty, to the great endangering and diſcouraging of his Majeſty's Proteſtant Subjects in that Kingdom. 3. By granting Protections to Iriſh Papiſts, whereby Proteſtants were hindred from the legal Remedies, and the Courſe of Law was ſtopp'd. 4. By reverſing Outlawries for High Treaſon againſt ſeveral Rebels in that Kingdom (not within the Articles of Limerick) to the great Diſcontent of his Proteſtant Subjects there. 5. By letting the forfeited Eſtates at under Rates, to the leſſening of his Majeſties Revenue. 6. By the great Embezzlements of his Majeſty's Stores in the Towns and Gariſons of that Kingdom, left by the late King James, and in the great Embezzlements which had been made in the forfeited Eſtates and Goods, which might have been employ'd for the Safety and better Preſervation of Ireland. 7. By the Addition made to the Articles of Limerick, after the ſame were finally agreed to, and ſign'd, and thereupon the Town ſurrendered; which had been a great Encouragement to the Iriſh Papiſts, and a weakning to the Engliſh Intereſt there. All which Abuſes they moſt humbly beſought his Majeſty to redreſs; particularly, that the Soldiers might be paid their Arrears, and the Country their Quarters: That no Papiſt might be admitted to ſerve in the

and that of the Commons.

A. D. 1692-3. Army: That forasmuch as the reducing of Ireland had been of great Expence to this Kingdom, agreeably to his Majesty's gracious Assurances, no Grant might be made of the forfeited Lands in Ireland, till there might be an Opportunity of settling that Matter in Parliament: That a true Account of all Forfeitures real and personal, and of the Stores left by the late King James, might be laid before the Commons assembled in Parliament: That no Out-lawries might be reversed, or Pardons granted to the Rebels, but by Advice of Parliament: That no Protections might be granted to the Irish: And that the additional Articles in the Capitulation of Limerick, by which so wide a Passage had been open'd to the Irish Papists to come in and re-possess themselves of the Estates, which they had forfeited by their Rebellion, might be laid before the Commons, that so the manner of obtaining the same, and the Prejudices that had been thereby occasion'd to the Protestant Interest, might be inquir'd into: And, for a Conclusion, they said, "That as his Majesty had been pleas'd to give such gracious Assurances of his Readiness to comply with them in any thing that might tend to the Peace and Security of this Kingdom, so they doubted not his Majesty's like Grace and Favour to that of Ireland; in the Safety and Preservation whereof this his Majesty's Kingdom was so much concern'd." His Majesty was all Grace and Condescension, as before to the Lords, and answer'd, "I will always have a great Regard to what comes to me from the House of Commons; and what may have been amiss in Ireland, I will take care to remedy."

But Remonstrances, however pointed, are but lame Expedients, unless enforc'd by Examples. Sir Francis Brewster had mention'd several Persons, whose Rapaciousness seem'd to deserve the Chastisement of Parliament; and Stone, in his Narrative, had expressly said, That what by Grants, and Promises of Grants to Lord Sydney, Lord Athlone, Lord Coningsby, and others, scarce any of the Forfeitures remain'd for the Use of the Public: And yet the House of Commons not only chose to overlook, in Effect, their own Votes and Addresses on that Head, and his Majesty's Engagements, but to wave all Proceedings against the Persons so mention'd. Indeed Stone had distinguish'd Mr. Culliford, as the chief Delinquent of the second Class, and had been most particular in his Charge against him: Against him even the Irish Committee of Grievances, had ventur'd to proceed, till he pleaded his Privilege as a Member of the Parliament of England: And when that Plea had given a check to those Proceedings, they took care to perfect the Evidence against him; by which it appear'd, That while he was a Commissioner of the Irish Revenue, he was guilty of several very great Breaches of Trust, by seizing and converting to his own Use, forfeited Goods of considerable Value, and by letting or procuring Leases in Trust for himself of the Mills and Wears of Kilmainham, the Estate of one Mr. Krief, and one Mr. Warren of Carduff, the Cranage and Wharfage of Cork, on which he had grafted certain new Exactions never demanded before; all at very inconsiderable Rents, in comparison to their real Value: And to all he had added Sweetman's Estate, as a Composition for the Murder of the Soldiers near Dublin, formerly spoken of: Against this Culliford, therefore, the Indignation of the House seem'd, for a while, to be particularly levell'd: They made an Order for him to attend in his Place; and, upon his absconding, they proceeded to deprive him of the Benefit of his Privilege, as a Member, till he obey'd it: But when he did appear, which was the Day before the Prorogation, instead of bringing the whole Stress of their own Power and Authority to bear against him, they gave him leave to wave his Privilege; and so left him in the Hands of the Irish Committee: From which whole Proceeding, it is pretty plain, that instead of intending to give the Irish the Consolation of any one Example, they only hung up the Rod in Sight of the Offenders; and that, perhaps, with a View to terrify those concern'd into a Composition, rather than to warn others from committing the like Enormities.

No Disposition in either House to make Examples.

The Historian of his own Times touches on these Matters, but then it is in a very cursory manner; which certainly argues either want of Candour, or want of Judgment; for as in the two late Reigns, the Genius of the Court was constantly represented to the People, according to the Figure it assum'd in the Provinces, where it was most at Liberty to assume what Figure it pleas'd, Impartiality requires that the same Use should be made of the same Standard in this: What was fair and just in one Instance, being equally just and fair in the other. The Bishop, after premising, that the Irish Parliament met full of Discontent, and in a Disposition to find fault with every thing, does indeed acknowledge, that they had too much Matter to work upon: But then he does not stay to specify what that Matter was; nor does he give a Brief of those Addresses (of the two Houses) which, he says, were very invidiously penn'd; and in which, according to him, every Particular was severely aggravated.

A Place-Bill propos'd in the House of Commons.

The same unwarrantable Inclination to extenuate and disculpate those in Power, appears yet farther, when he comes to speak of the Place-Bill (to make use of a more modern Phrase) which the Malcontents, this Session, brought into the House of Commons: For, after having allow'd, that the Majority of that House were under a corrupt Influence, after having expressly declar'd, that the Speaker himself was the Factor between the Court and the Members in that Corruption, and after acknowledging, that he (the Bishop) had made his Complaint of it to the King in Person, who justify'd it from the Necessity of his Affairs and the Depravity of the Times, and, notwithstanding the Concessions he makes, as he goes along, he speaks of that Measure in these Words: "When the Party, that was set against the Court, saw they could carry

A. D. 1692-3 nothing in either House of Parliament, then they turn'd their whole Strength against the present Parliament, to force a Dissolution: And in order to that, they first loaded it with a Name of an ill Sound: And, whereas King Charles's Long Parliament was call'd the Pensioner Parliament, they call'd this the Officer's Parliament; because many that had Commands in the Army were of it: And the Word that they gave out among the People, was, that we were to be govern'd by a Standing Army and a Standing Parliament. They try'd to carry a Bill, that render'd all Members of the House of Commons incapable of Places of Trust or Profit; so that every Member that accepted a Place, should be expell'd the House, and be incapable of being chosen again to sit in the current Parliament. The Truth was, it came to be observ'd, that some got Credit by exposing the Government; and that to silence them, they were preferr'd: And then they chang'd their Note, and were as ready to flatter, as before to find Fault. This gave a specious Colour to those who charg'd the Court with Designs of corrupting Members, or at least of stopping their Mouths by Places and Pensions. When this Bill (continues his Lordship) was set on, it went through the House of Commons with little or no Difficulty: Those who were in Places, had not Strength and Credit to make great Opposition to it, they being the Persons concern'd, and look'd on as Parties: And those who had no Places, had not the Courage to oppose it; for in them it would have look'd as an Art to recommend themselves to one. So the Bill passed in the House of Commons; but it was rejected by the Lords, since it seem'd to establish an Opposition between the Crown and the People, as if those who were employ'd by the one, could not be trusted by the other."

This is his Lordship's whole Account of that Matter, but not all that ought to be said concerning it. It was call'd, A Bill touching free and impartial Proceedings in Parliaments; it was brought into the House of Commons by Sir Edward Hussey, one of the Members for Lincoln; and it was founded on the Votes of the old Whigs in that House, during the Reign of King Charles II. when a corrupt Influence in Parliament began first to be felt, and when the fatal Effects of it seem'd to be really apprehended: So much Tenderness was, however, shewn to the present Members, that it was not to be in force till his Majesty thought fit to call a new Parliament: It was order'd up to the Lords on the 22d of December, while the Supply was yet depending, and consequently, long before the Fate of the Session was decided; and it was not rejected by them with so much Facility, as might be conceiv'd from the Bishop's manner of recording that Event. The first Reading produc'd nothing extraordinary; but, on the second, when a Motion was made by the Malcontents for committing it, notwithstanding all the Efforts of the Courtiers to over-rule it, the Former carry'd their Point by a Majority of nine Voices: Nor was this all; for in the Committee they were still triumphant: And even on the Report, when the Court exerted their whole Strength, of the Lords present, forty-two were for the Bill, and only forty against it; so that the Scale was turn'd by the Proxies; of whom the Court had seven, and the opposite Lords but three: Difference upon the whole, TWO.

and sent up to the Lords.

A. D. 1692-3

Every body that knows any thing of parliamentary Affairs, knows, That Ministers esteem such a Division as this, an Escape, rather than a Victory; and surely this was one of the narrowest that ever befell any Ministry whatever: Besides, the vanquish'd Party rally'd the most considerable Persons of their Corps, among whom, it is most remarkable, was Prince George of Denmark, Duke of Cumberland, and enter'd their Protest in the Journals of the House, for these Reasons, viz.

who reject it. & Protest thereon.

1. Because the principal Objection made to this Bill, was the great Danger that might happen thereby, of the too long continuing this present Parliament, which is an ill Consequence that we can no ways apprehend, since we hope and humbly conceive, his Majesty will never be capable of taking any Advice of that kind, so plainly destructive to the Subjects just Rights of Election to frequent Parliaments, and so many ways inconsistent with the Good of this Nation.

2. Because we are not only very sensible of the just Occasion given for such an Act (tho' we are loath to enlarge upon so tender a Subject) but have good Reason to believe the House of Commons would not have begun and passed a Bill of this Nature, wherein the Members of that House are so particularly concern'd, without having been fully satisfy'd in the Reasons for it, and plainly convinc'd of that great Need the People of England are in, at this time, of so JUST AND WISE A PROVISION.

The Lords who signed this, together with his Royal Highness, were Warrington, Thanet, de Longueville, Weymouth, Montagu, Denbigh, Fitzwalter, Rivers, Vaughan, Sandwich, Clifford, Stamford, Arundel, Mulgrave, Marlborough, Cholmondeley, Caernarvon, Aylesbury and Ashburnham; and, as a parting Blow, the Earl of Mulgrave, who had more distinguish'd himself by his Eloquence in this Debate than ever, was induc'd to print his Speech, which was every where receiv'd as if it had been a new Revelation: And how well it deserv'd to be so receiv'd, may best be gather'd from the (g) Speech itself.

It

(g) Which follows:

" My Lords,

" This Debate is of so great Consequence, that I resolv'd to be silent, and rather to be advis'd by the Ability of others, than to shew my own want of it; besides, it is of so nice a Nature, that I, who speak always unpremeditately, apprehend extremely, saying any thing which may be thought the least reflecting; tho' even that ought not to restrain a Man

A.D. 1692-3. It appear'd, moreover, that the Courtiers, in admitting, as a Fence againſt the Bill, that the long Continuance of the preſent Parliament was an Evil, had moſt foully bewray'd themſelves; and that their Antagoniſts had Sagacity enough both to diſcern and make the moſt of the Advantage: For before the Former had recover'd themſelves from the Pannic which the Place-Bill had thrown them into, the Earl of Shrewſbury, whom Biſhop Burnet is pleas'd to ſuppoſe was drawn into the Oppoſition, that he appear'd at the Head of, brought in another Bill, which provided, That there ſhould be a new Parliament every three A.D. 1692-3.

Man here from doing one's Duty to the Public, in a Buſineſs where it ſeems to be ſo highly concern'd.

I have always heard, I have always read, that foreign Nations, and all this Part of the World have admir'd and envied the Conſtitution of this Government. For, not to ſpeak of the King's Power, here is a Houſe of Lords to adviſe him on all important Occaſions, about Peace or War; about all things that may concern the Nation, the Care of which is very much entruſted to your Lordſhips: But yet, becauſe your Lordſhips cannot be ſo converſant with the generality of the People, nor ſo conſtantly in the Country as is neceſſary for that Purpoſe, here is a Houſe of Commons alſo choſen by the very People themſelves, newly come from among them, or who ſhould be ſo, to repreſent all their Grievances, to expreſs the true Mind of the Nation, and to diſpoſe of their Money, at leaſt ſo far as to begin all Bills of that Nature; and if I am not miſtaken, the very Writ for Elections ſent down to the Sheriffs does impower them to chuſe; What? their Repreſentatives.

Now, my Lords, I beſeech you to conſider the Meaning of that Word, Repreſentatives: Is it to do any thing contrary to their Mind? It would be abſurd to propoſe it: And yet how can it be otherwiſe, if they, after being choſen, change their Dependency, engage themſelves in Employments plainly inconſiſtent with the great Truſt repos'd in them? And that I will take the Liberty to demonſtrate to your Lordſhips they now do, at leaſt according to my humble Opinion.

I will inſtance firſt in the leaſt and loweſt Incapacity, they muſt be under, who ſo take Employments.

Your Lordſhips know but too well what a general Careleſſneſs there appears, every Day more and more, in the public Buſineſs: If ſo, how is it likely that Men ſhould be as diligent in their Duty in Parliament as that Buſineſs requires, where Employments, and a great deal of other Buſineſs ſhall take up both their Minds and their Time.

But then in ſome Caſes 'tis worſe, as in Commands of the Army, and other Employments of that kind, when they muſt have a divided Duty: For it does admirably become an Officer to ſit voting away Money in the Houſe of Commons, while his Soldiers are perhaps taking it away at their Quarters, for want of his Preſence to reſtrain them, and of better Diſcipline among them; nay, perhaps his Troop or Regiment may be in ſome Action abroad, and he muſt either have the Shame of being abſent from them at ſuch a Time, or from that Houſe where he is entruſted with our Liberties.

To this I have heard but one Objection by a noble Lord, that if this Act ſhould paſs, the King is not allow'd to make a Captain a Colonel, without diſabling him to ſit in Parliament.

Truly, if a Captain has only deſerv'd to be advanc'd for expoſing himſelf in Parliament, I think the Nation would have no great Loſs in the King's letting alone ſuch a Preferment.

But, my Lords, there is another ſort of Incapacity yet worſe than this; I mean that of Parliament Men having ſuch Places in the Exchequer, as the very Proſit of them depends on the Money given to the King in Parliament.

Would any of your Lordſhips ſend and entruſt a Man to make a Bargain for you, whoſe very Intereſt ſhall be to make you give as much as he can poſſibly?

It puts me in mind of a Farce, where an Actor holds a Dialogue with himſelf, ſpeaking firſt in one Tone, and then anſwering himſelf in another.

Really, my Lords, this is no Farce; for 'tis no laughing Matter to undo a Nation: But 'tis altogether as unnatural for a Member of Parliament to aſk firſt in the King's Name for ſuch a ſort of Supply, give an Account from him how much is needful towards the paying ſuch an Army, or ſuch a Fleet, and then immediately give by his ready Vote, what he had before aſked by his Maſter's Order.

Beſides, my Lords, there is ſuch a Neceſſity now for long Seſſions of Parliaments; and the very Privileges belonging to Members are of ſo great extent, that it would be a little hard and unequal to other Gentlemen, that they ſhould have all the Places alſo.

All the Objections that have been made may be reduced to theſe.

Firſt, 'Tis told us, that 'tis a Diſreſpect to the King, that his Servants or Officers ſhould be excluded.

To this, I deſire it may be conſider'd, that 'tis in this Caſe, as when a Tenant ſends up any Body to treat for him: Would any of your Lordſhips think it a Diſreſpect; nay, would the King himſelf think it any, if the Tenant would not wholly refer himſelf to one of your own Servants, or the King's Commiſſioners in the Caſe of the Crown? And if he chuſes rather ſome plain honeſt Friend of his own to ſupply his Abſence here, will any Man blame ſuch a Proceeding, or think it unmannerly?

Beſides, your Lordſhips know even this Act admits them to be choſen, notwithſtanding their Employments, provided the Electors know it firſt, and are not deceived in their Choice.

All we would prevent is, that a good rich Corporation ſhould not chuſe to entruſt with all their Liberties a plain honeſt Country Neighbour, and find him within ſix Months chang'd into a preferred cunning Courtier, who ſhall tye them to their Choice, though he is no more the ſame Man, than if he were turn'd Papiſt; which, by the Law, as it ſtands already, puts an Incapacity upon him.

Another Objection is, that this Act may, by its Conſequence, prolong this Parliament, which they allow would be a very great Grievance, and yet ſuppoſe the King capable of putting it upon us, which I have too much Reſpect for him to admit of; tho' I am glad, however, that it is objected by Privy-Councellors in Favour, who conſequently, I hope, will never adviſe a thing which they now exclaim as ſo great a Grievance.

But pray, my Lords, what ſhould tempt the King to ſo ill a Policy? Can he fear a Freedom of Choice in the People, to whoſe Good-will he owes all his Power, which theſe Lords ſuppoſe he may uſe to their Prejudice?

And therefore give me leave to ſay, as I muſt not ſuſpect him of ſo ill a Deſign as the perpetuating this Parliament, ſo he cannot, he ought not to ſuſpect a Nation ſo entirely, I was going to ſay, ſo fondly devoted to him.

My Lords, no Man is readier than myſelf to allow that we owe the Crown all Submiſſion as to the time of calling Parliaments according to Law, and appointing alſo where they ſhall ſit. But with Reverence be it ſpoken, the King owes the Nation entire Freedom in chuſing their Repreſentatives; and it is no leſs his Duty, than it is his true Intereſt, that ſuch a fair and juſt Proceeding ſhould be uſed towards us.

Conſider, my Lords, of what mighty Conſequence it may be, that ſo many Votes ſhould be free, when upon one ſingle one may depend the whole Security or Loſs of this Nation. By one ſingle Vote ſuch things may happen, that I almoſt tremble to think: By one ſingle Vote a General Exciſe may be granted, and then we are all loſt: By one ſingle Vote the Crown may be empowered to name all the Commiſſioners for raiſing the Taxes, and then ſurely we ſhould be in a fair way towards it.

Nay, whatever has happen'd may again be apprehended; and I hope thoſe Reverend Prelates will reflect, that if they grow once obnoxious to a prevalent Party, one ſingle Voice may be as dangerous to that Bench, as a general Diſſatisfaction among the People proved to be once in a late Experience: Which I am far from ſaying by way of threatning, but only by way of Caution.

My Lords, we may think, becauſe this concerns not the Houſe of Lords, that we need not be ſo over-careful of the Matter: But there are Noblemen in France, at leaſt ſuch as were ſo before they were enſlaved, who, that they might domineer over others, and ſerve a preſent Turn, perhaps, let all things alone ſo long till the People were quite maſter'd, and the Nobility themſelves too, to bear them Company.

So that I never met a Frenchman, even of the greateſt Rank (and ſome had ten thouſand Piſtoles a Year in Employments) that did not envy us here, for our Freedom from that Slavery which they groan under; and this I have obſerv'd univerſally, except juſt Monſieur de Louvois, Monſieur Colbert, or ſuch People, becauſe they were the Miniſters themſelves who occaſion'd theſe Complaints, and thrived by the Oppreſſion of others.

My Lords, this Country of ours is very apt to be provoked; we have had a late Experience of it; and though no wiſe Man but would bear a great deal rather than make a Buſtle, yet really the People are otherwiſe, and at any time change a preſent Uneaſineſs for any other Condition, tho' a worſe; we have known it ſo too often, and ſometimes repented it too late.

Let them not have this new Provocation, in being debarr'd from a Security in their Repreſentatives; for malicious People will not fail to infuſe into their Minds, that all thoſe vaſt Sums, which have been, and ſtill muſt be raiſed towards this War, are not diſpoſed away in ſo fair a manner as ought to be: And I am afraid they will ſay, their Money is not given, but taken.

However, whatever Succeſs this Bill may have, there muſt needs come ſome good Effect of it: For, if it paſſes, it will give us Security; if it be obſtructed, it will give us warning."

A. D. 1692-3. three Years, that there ſhould be a Seſſion annually; and, as in the old Triennial-Bill, that, in caſe the Crown did not order the Writs to be iſſu'd at the time prefix'd, the Lord-Chancellor, or Keeper, or Commiſſioner of the great Seal, ſhould iſſue them, in virtue of their Office, and by Authority of this Act, under ſevere Penalties. This Bill our Hiſtorian takes occaſion to brand, as another Attempt of the Oppoſition; and, making a Tranſition to the famous Act of King Edward III. which provides, That Parliaments ſhould be held once a Year, or oftener, if need be, not only adopts the old Quibble of the Court-Lawyers, whether the Words, if need be, related to the whole Act, or to thoſe other Words, or oftener, only, but adds, That the Non-obſervance of this Act had never been complain'd of as a Grievance; which is an Aſſertion that nothing can excuſe: For whenever Government became a Grievance, for want of thoſe neceſſary Checks which can only be ſupply'd by Parliaments, or when the Parliament itſelf was thought ſo, as was the Caſe of the long Parliament in the Reign of Charles II. the Benefit of this Statute had been ever demanded, on Behalf of the People; and every political Pen was employ'd in ſhewing how clear a Right they had to it.

A Bill for frequent Parliaments brought in by Lord Shrewſbury.

It muſt, however, be own'd, that what he principally aims at in this Paſſage, is to ſhew, that this Bill took in a larger Scope, than any other of the like Nature had done; which is true; but from thence no Inference can be drawn, that it extended farther than was neceſſary. Indeed, the Biſhop himſelf ſeems to have form'd no ſettled Opinion concerning it: For though he is pleas'd to pronounce, that annual Parliaments would, according to the preſent Direction of Things, be an unſupportable Grievance to the People, his Sentence cannot affect this Bill; which provided only for a Triennial-Parliament, and Annual-Seſſions: And when he comes to ſpeak of the Bill itſelf, he gives the Arguments on both Sides of the Queſtion, without declaring for either: For the Bill, he ſuggeſts, "That a Parliament of long Continuance ſeem'd to be very dangerous either to the Crown or to the Nation. If the Conjuncture of their Proceedings gave them much Credit, they might grow very uneaſy to the Crown, as happen'd in King Charles the Firſt's Time: Or, in another Situation of Affairs, they might be ſo practis'd upon by the Court, that they might give all the Money and all the Liberties of England up, when they were to have a large Share of that Money, and were to be made the Inſtruments of Tyranny, as it was in King Charles the Second's Time (which, by the way, is not ſtrictly true; for tho' this long Parliament gave much, they could not be prevail'd upon to give all.) It was likewiſe hop'd, that frequent Parliaments would put an end to the great Expence Candidates put themſelves to in Elections; and that it would oblige the Members to behave themſelves ſo well, both with relation to the Public, and in their private Deportment, as to recommend them to their Electors at Three Years End; whereas, when a Parliament was to ſit many Years, Members, cover'd with Privileges, were apt to take great Liberties, forgot that they repreſented others, and took care only of themſelves: So it was thought that England would have a truer Repreſentative, when it was choſen every Third Year, than when it run on to the End of the Reign." And again; "All that was objected againſt this, ſays he, was, That frequent Elections would make the Freeholders proud and inſolent, when they knew that Application muſt be made to them at the End of Three Years: That this would eſtabliſh a Faction in every body which had a Right to an Election: And that whereas an Election, as the Caſe then ſtood, put Men to a great Charge all at once, the Charge, upon ſuch an Alteration, would be continu'd thorough the whole Term; and thoſe who were already choſe, muſt behave as Candidates till they were choſe again."

A. D. 1692-3.

He then paſſes on to the immediate Object of the Bill, which was the Diſſolution of the preſent Parliament; concerning which, he gives us to underſtand, That ſome (meaning the Courtiers) were for leaving it to the general Triennial Clauſe, in order to continue it for three Seſſions longer. "They thought, ſays his Lordſhip, That, during ſo critical a War, as that in which we were now engag'd, it was not adviſeable to venture on a new Election, ſince we had ſo many among us, who were ſo ill-affected to the preſent Eſtabliſhment; to which it was reply'd, That this Parliament had already ſat Three Years; and that, therefore, it was not conſiſtent with the general Reaſon of the Bill, to let it continue any longer: So the Bill paſs'd in the Houſe of Lords." That is to ſay, the Anti-Courtiers carry'd their Point; ſo far, at leaſt, as to provide, that the preſent Parliament ſhould not be ſuffer'd to continue, longer than the firſt of January then next enſuing.

The Bill paſs'd by the Lords.

This was by no means pleaſing to thoſe in Power, who had, in general, ſo much Reaſon to be ſatisfy'd with the preſent Repreſentative, that they did not care for the Expence, Trouble, and Hazard of a new Election. When therefore the Bill was ſent down to the Commons, they labour'd hard to beſpeak an Oppoſition to it, by repreſenting, That a Bill of ſuch a nature, did not come properly from the Lords, who were not to be affected by it; for tho' the Body of the Commons might be alter'd by it, the Lords would remane the ſame, &c. And ſuch Effect had theſe and the like Suggeſtions, together with the Concern which many had for their Seats, or rather the Profits and Emoluments connected with them, that on the very firſt Reading, a ſtrong Party appear'd for rejecting it: But thoſe who acted in Concert with the oppoſing Lords, contending as violently for it, and being alſo ſupported by others, who had not, as yet, loſt all Senſe of Decency, the Queſtion was not only carry'd for a ſecond Reading, but, on the ſaid ſecond Reading, the Bill was committed to a Committee of the whole Houſe.

A.D. 1692-3. And now came on the great Struggle, which was maintain'd with great Obſtinacy on both Sides, and various Succeſs; for tho' the Courtiers had not ſufficient Strength or Courage to throw out the Bill, they carry'd ſeveral Points which were clearly in their own Favour: Thus, when the Queſtion was put on that Clauſe, which provided, that there ſhould be a Seſſion every Year, it was carry'd in the Affirmative by a hundred and ſeventy-one Voices, againſt a hundred and ſixty: And when they came to the Term of [Tindal.] Diſſolution, they extended it from the firſt of January to the 24th of March, or ſooner, if his Majeſty thought fit, which ſecur'd another Seſſion: But when a Clauſe was offer'd by way of Salvo for the King's Right of diſſolving and proroguing Parliaments, they rejected it by a Majority of ſeven Voices, becauſe it was thought to caſt a Reflection upon the Bill; as if it were derogatory to the Prerogative, which they would not allow it to be, but only an Explanation of an old Law.

The Report occaſion'd yet another long and warm Debate, and yet another Mortification to the Court; for, on the Iſſue, the Queſtion being put for the third Reading, it was carry'd in the Affirmative by two hundred againſt one hundred and ſixty-one: After which it was ſent up to the Lords, who having ſignify'd their Concurrence to the Amendments the next Day, Feb. 10, nothing was wanting but the Royal Aſſent to paſs it into a Law.

A King of England never makes a more ungracious Uſe of his Prerogative, than when he refuſes his Aſſent to any Bill preſented to him in Parliament. His Majeſty had, once before, furniſh'd his Enemies with Matter of Complaint againſt him, by rejecting the Judges Bill; and now he was induc'd to fall into the ſame Error, on a more national Point, though ſure of redoubling thereby the Reſentment of the Nation. Biſhop Burnet ſays, "The King let the Bill lye for ſome time upon the Table, ſo that Mens Eyes and Expectations were much fix'd on the Iſſue of it." And it appears, that the Lords were ingenuous enough to put him in mind of it, in ſuch a manner, as, at once ſerv'd to diſtreſs, if not expoſe, his Majeſty, and exempt themſelves from any Cenſure on that Account: For the Act to puniſh Mutiny and Deſertion, which had alſo paſs'd both Houſes, being to come in force on the 10th of March, that Day being at hand, and no Notice having been receiv'd of the King's Intention to come to the Houſe in order to paſs it, the Malcontent-Leaders affected to be in Pain for what might happen, either if the Army ſhould be left, for ever ſo little time, without the Bridle of the Law, or, in caſe of any Diſorder, ſhould be unlawfully puniſh'd for it. On the ſeventh, therefore, they made uſe of theſe artful Pretences to obtain an Order, for the Lords with white Staves, to acquaint his Majeſty with that Circumſtance, That, in caſe he thought proper, he might come to the Houſe and give the Royal Aſſent to that and ſuch other Bills as lay ready for it. The Courtiers were aware of the Difficulty this would bring upon his Majeſty, and, therefore made ſome A.D. 1692-3. Oppoſition to it, though rather, it may be preſum'd, for the ſake of acquitting themſelves to the King, than any thing elſe; for the Queſtion was carry'd in the Affirmative, without a Diviſion; but produc'd no other Effect than a ſudden Reſolution to cloſe the Seſſion as faſt as poſſible, to prevent any other Attack of the like nature: Which was done accordingly on the 14th: On which Day, and not before, his Majeſty was pleas'd to paſs the Mutiny-Bill, ſo particularly recommended to him and all the reſt that were preſented, except a Bill to veſt the entire Property of all Mines in the Lord of the Soil, and That for frequent Parliaments, It is rejected by the King. which, as before hinted, he thought fit to reject. Biſhop Burnet indeed ſays, he had an unqueſtionable Right to do ſo: And yet nothing is more certain than that many of the Whiggiſh Writers have both queſtion'd this Right, and back'd their Arguments, with the very Letter of the Coronation-Oath; as alſo with that ancient Cuſtom of making Proclamation in Weſtminſter-Hall, before the End of every Seſſion, of the Day of Diſſolution, that all Matters depending might have a regular Deciſion; and yet again, by the Statute 2 R. II. No. 28, which provides, That all Petitions and Bills preſented in any future Parliament, ſhould have a good and gracious Anſwer and Remedy ordain'd thereupon, before the departing of every ſuch Parliament.

It ought not, however, to be forgot, That The Act to retrain the Preſs continu'd. among the Bills ſo preſented and paſs'd, there was one for continuing and explaining certain Temporary Laws then expiring or expir'd; among which was the Law, for preventing Abuſes, in printing ſeditious, treaſonable, and unlicens'd Books, and for regulating Printing, or Printing Preſſes. This Law had its Riſe in the Beginning of the Reign of King Charles II. had been reviv'd in the firſt Year of King James II. for a Term of ſeven Years, and was now continu'd for one Year, and from thence to the End of the next Seſſion of Parliament. What Oppoſition it met with in the Houſe of Commons, does not appear; but when it came before the Lords, it was not only oppos'd, but proteſted againſt by the Lords Halifax, Shrewſbury, Mulgrave, Marlborough, Stamford, Macclesfield, Oſſulſton, Hunſdon, Granville, Lincoln and Vaughan, for theſe Reaſons: Becauſe two Proviſoes, viz. 1. That no Search ſhould be made in the Houſe of any Peer for a Printing Preſs, without Oath being firſt made. 2. That in caſe the Names of the Printer and Author of any Book was prefix'd to it, it ſhould not be neceſſary to take out a Licenſe, were not admitted: Becauſe, in their Opinions, the Benefit occurring to the Public by the Continuance of the ſeveral Acts mention'd in the Bill, would not countervail the Prejudice which might ariſe in many reſpects from rejecting the ſaid Clauſes; and becauſe it ſubjected all Learning and true Information to the arbitrary Will and Pleaſure of a mercenary, and, perhaps, ignorant Licenſer, deſtroy'd the Properties of Authors in their Copies, and ſet up many Monopolies.

A.D. 1692-3. Some Notice ought alſo to be taken of the Bills; which either by the ſecret Management, more than once already ſpoken of, or the Tricks and Refinements of the Managers, miſcarry'd. Of theſe, the Bill for regulating Trials, was one: It was brought in, as before obſerv'd, in the very Beginning of the Seſſion, and had the Favour not only to be read twice, but alſo to be committed, though not without a very violent Oppoſition from the Courtiers, who divided the Houſe upon the Queſtion, and loſt it by a Majority of twenty Voices. But this ſhew of Succeſs was mere Matter of Amuſement and no more; for while the Caſe of the impriſon'd Lords was yet freſh in Memory, it was not held adviſeable to cruſh it with an arbitrary Negative: The Managers had, however, an Expedient at hand, that anſwer'd the ſame End; and at the ſame time obviated all the Clamours to be apprehended from a contrary Proceeding; which was to load it with ſuch Clauſes on the Behalf of the Crown, as ſhould render it rather a Snare, than a Relief to the Subject. Accordingly, when it came to be deliberated in a Committee of the whole Houſe, a Proviſo was offer'd and admitted by way of Amendment, That the Act ſhould not take place till after the Expiration of the War: And this being agreed to, on the Report by a Majority of 165 againſt 140, another Clauſe was offer'd, importing, That it ſhould be High Treaſon for any Perſon to declare, by Word or Writing, that their Majeſties were not lawful and rightful King and Queen of this Realm: But this was oppos'd with great Heat and Sharpneſs by the Fautors of the Bill, who inſiſted, That it was irregular to ſuperinduce ſuch a Clauſe as was tantamount to a new Law; as alſo, that it was a thing utterly unknown to our Conſtitution to make Words Treaſon: And now it appearing that the Senſe of the Majority was on their Side, the Courtiers thought it their wiſeſt way to withdraw their Clauſe; which was done accordingly; and Leave was given, in lieu of it, to bring in a Bill for the Preſervation of their Majeſties Sacred Perſons and Government. Such a Bill was, moreover, actually brought in, and read twice; but when a Motion was made for committing it, the Queſtion paſs'd in the Negative; and another Motion being made to reject the ſaid Bill, it was rejected accordingly. This happen'd on the 14th of December; and, as no farther Mention was made of the Trial-Bill during this Seſſion, it is reaſonable to think, that the Diſpute was compromis'd, on Condition that neither ſhould be proſecuted any farther.

Proceedings on the Bill to regulate Trials.

and on the Eaſt-India Trade.

Another Matter of Importance, which was left in Suſpence, was the great Controverſy in relation to the Eaſt-India Trade: On the 14th of November, Sir Edward Seymour, by his Majeſty's Command, had laid before the Houſe a Copy of the new Regulations, formerly inſerted, together with the Company's Objections thereto; as alſo the Opinion of the Judges thereon, viz. That the Company muſt have three Years Notice before they were diſſolv'd, and that no new Company ought to be ſet up in that time; for which Reaſon his Majeſty had done nothing in the Affair, and left it to the Commons, to proceed in it as they ſhould think proper. On the ſame Day alſo the aſſociated Merchants, &c. preſented a Petition for the diſſolving the old Company, and erecting a new one, to preſerve that Trade which they alledg'd was already in a great Meaſure loſt to this Kingdom, and would wholly fall into the Hands of our Neighbours, unleſs timely prevented. On the 17th, the Pretenſions on both Sides were taken into Conſideration; and, upon the Iſſue of that Day's Debate, it was reſolv'd, nemine contradicente, That a Bill ſhould be brought in for regulating, preſerving and eſtabliſhing the Eaſt-India Trade to this Kingdom. On the 24th, it was farther reſolv'd, in a Committee of the whole Houſe, That there ſhould be a new Subſcription of a Joint-Stock, not exceeding two Millions, and not leſs than one Million five hundred thouſand Pounds, to continue for twenty-one Years. On the ſeventh of December it was yet farther reſolv'd, That no Individual ſhould have above ten thouſand Pounds Stock; That the Deputy-Governor ſhould have ten thouſand Pounds: That the Company ſhould every Year export Engliſh Manufactures to the Value of a hundred thouſand Pounds; and that they ſhould be oblig'd to furniſh the Government with five hundred Tons of Salt-petre, yearly, at a certain Rate. All theſe ſeveral Heads having been thus agreed to, it was reſolv'd to move the Houſe that a Bill might be brought in thereon to ſettle the ſaid Trade. On the 10th the Report was made and receiv'd; and it was now expected, without Doors at leaſt, that the whole Affair would be brought to a ſpeedy Iſſue: But, it ſeems, the Company underſtood ſecret Management as well as the Court: From this time the Affair cool'd again: The Chairman grew weary of his Seat: And though Advantage was taken of a thin Houſe, on the fourth of January, to procure a Vote, That the Subſcription for a new Stock ſhould be open'd ten Days after the paſſing of the Act, it does not appear that any farther Progreſs was made in the Bill: But, as if the main Purpoſe of the Houſe was to huſband the Jobb as thriftily as poſſible, it was finally reſolv'd on the twenty-fifth of February, That an humble Addreſs ſhould be preſented to his Majeſty by the whole Houſe, that he would be pleas'd to diſſolve the ſaid Company upon three Years warning, according to the Condition of their Charter. On the ſecond of March the ſaid Addreſs was preſented accordingly: His Majeſty's Anſwer was conceiv'd in theſe Words: "Gentlemen, I will always do all the Good in my Power for this Kingdom, and I will conſider your Addreſs." And thus the Company had the Grace to be once more repriev'd.

But if there is any thing unaccountable in this Proceeding, what ſhall we ſay of their rejecting their own Bill, to aſcertain the Commiſſions and Salaries of the Judges, which, as in the Caſe of the Bill for frequent Parliaments

Judges Bill rejected by the Commons.

A. D. 1692-3. liaments now, the King had the Odium of rejecting the Seſſion before? And yet ſuch was actually the Caſe; the ſaid Bill being rejected on the ſecond Reading, on the 17th of December.

Another to prevent the Exportation of our Coin there of Neglect.

Another Anti-Coort-Bill, to prevent the Exportation or melting of our Specie (which, perhaps, was rather calculated to increaſe the Difficulties of the Court, than with any Hope to remedy the Miſchief complain'd of) was ſuffer'd to die of Neglect.

But whatever Complaiſance the Majority of this Houſe of Commons occaſionally ſhew'd to the Views of the Court, they were not ſo thoroughly form'd and diſciplin'd, as to obey the Word of Command implicitly, as often as it was given, and without any regard to the Service they were put upon; on the contrary, they ſometimes heſitated, ſometimes mutiny'd, ſometimes turn'd ſhort upon their Leaders, and now and then ſeem'd to caſt a relenting Thought on their ſuffering Country. There was ſome Policy, if not Virtue, in their perſiſting to continue the Commiſſion to take and ſtate the public Accounts: And, whatever Reaſon their Deſcendants have, to complane of their providing ſo ineffectually for the Current Service, as to entail the Miſeries of the War on their Poſterity, by entailing on them ſuch Debts as they are never like to be in a Condition to diſcharge, it muſt be allow'd, that they conſider'd their own Intereſt in ſo doing, at leaſt; for, thereby, the Burden was render'd ſo much the more eaſy to thoſe on whom it was immediately impos'd; and by encumbering the Crown with Debts, they made the Aſſiſtance of Parliaments neceſſary, at leaſt for a Generation or two to come. This, however, is ſaid, rather to account for their Conduct in that reſpect, than to excuſe it. The Steward who makes it his Buſineſs to feed his Maſter's Extravagancies in ſuch a manner as ſhall render the Approaches of his Ruin imperceptible, though ſure and unavoidable, deſerves double Condemnation: But then it is really Matter of Credit to them, at leaſt if Comparatives may be uſed, That they did not eſpouſe every Job that was offer'd; and, that, during this very Seſſion, in particular, they rejected the Application in pursuit of the London Orphans rejected,

Application of the City of London, to ſaddle the Debt on the Nation; which they had incurr'd by a moſt notorious Breach of Truſt, in expending the Fortunes of about fourteen hundred Orphans, which they had oblig'd their Executors and Guardians to lodge in the Chamberlain's Office: As alſo, that when the Bill for taking the public Accounts was under Conſideration, and a Motion was made to empower the Commiſſioners to examine and ſtate the old Debt of the Bankers, occaſion'd by King Charles's ſhutting up the Exchequer, they refus'd to give it the leaſt Countenance; as being juſtly apprehenſive, that the ſaid Motion was either calculated to tranſfer the ſaid Debt to the Public, or to check the Progreſs of the Bill.

as alſo a Motion relating to the Bankers Debt.

Lord Mohun's Trial is the only remarkable Occurrence of this Seſſion that remanes to be ſpoke of; and tho' the whole Caſe is

A. D. 1692-3. ſo well known to the preſent Times, it is fit that a Brief of it ſhould find a Place in our Annals, to gratify the Curioſity of thoſe to come. His Lordſhip was indicted, together with one Captain Hill, for the wilful Murder of Mr. Mountford, a celebrated Comedian: The Bill had been found by the Grand Jury of Middleſex: His Trial was held in Weſtminſter-Hall, before the whole Peerage, ſitting as a Court. The Lord Steward for the time being, was the Lord Danby, Marquis of Carmarthen, who for ſo many Years together had laid under the Terrors of a capital Impeachment himſelf. The Matter of Fact ſworn againſt the Priſoner in Subſtance, was, That three Nights before the Murder was committed, he was in Company with Hill at a Tavern, when the ſaid Hill threaten'd to be the death of Mountford, becauſe he obſtructed ſome Deſigns of his on Mrs. Bracegirdle, another celebrated Commedian, but not that he heard that Declaration of the ſaid Hill: That on the Day the Murder was committed, his Lordſhip din'd with Hill at another Tavern: That the Diſcourſe turn'd on a Deſign of Hill's to carry off Mrs. Bracegirdle in a Coach and Six: That Hill, on that Occaſion, ſaid, If the Villain, meaning Mountford, offer'd to reſiſt, he would ſtab him; and Lord Mohun ſaid, He would ſtand by his Friend: That the ſame Evening they chang'd Coats: That they did attend with a Coach and ſix Horſes to carry her off, and made their Attempt accordingly near Craven Houſe, in Drury Lane; Hill undertaking to force her into the Coach, and Lord Mohun ſitting within to receive her: That tho' they had Soldiers to aſſiſt them, ſo many came up to her Reſcue, that the ſaid Attempt miſcarry'd: That Mrs. Bracegirdle being conducted to her Lodgings, they reman'd before the Door, with their Swords drawn; and being aſked, Why they did ſo? Hill anſwer'd, To be reveng'd on Mountford, who, by the way, does not appear to have had any Concern in the Reſcue: That Mountford himſelf, though warn'd of their Intentions, came up while they were thus poſted: That while he was expoſtulating with Lord Mohun on his countenancing ſo bad an Action, Hill interpos'd, and with one Hand gave Mountford a Box on the Ear, and with the other, having his Sword ready drawn, ran him through the Body; which Mountford alſo affirm'd with his laſt Breath: That Lord Mohun afterwards declar'd, He was glad Hill had made his Eſcape; and farther, That he did not care a Farthing if he was hang'd for him. His Lordſhip, the Priſoner, on the other hand, call'd Witneſſes (among whom were Hill's Footboy, and Mrs. Bracegirdle's Maid, who had avoided the Coroner's Summons, and had been conceal'd ever ſince) to prove, That he had no Malice to Mountford: That Hill gave Mountford fair Warning to draw and ſtand upon his Guard: That three or four Paſſes, one ſaid one, two, ſaid another, were exchang'd before Mountford fell, in the laſt of which, his Sword was broke: That Lord Mohun had no Concern in the Fray, directly, or indirectly:

That

A.D. 1692-3. That the reaſon of their ſtaying under Mrs. Brazegirdle's Window, was to beg her Pardon for the Inſult they had offer'd to her: That if Mountford, inſtead of going directly home, had not gone out of his Way to meet them, this Rencounter had not happen'd: And that whereas both Hill and Mountford made off, the firſt full ſpeed, and the laſt as faſt as he was able, his Lordſhip did not ſtir, but ſurrender'd himſelf as ſoon as the Watch came up. We have here the Merits of the Caſe on both Sides: And their Lordſhips, having amus'd themſelves and their Auditory, with putting a Variety of Caſes, by way of Parallel, to the Judges, and receiv'd their Opinions thereon, at laſt proceeded to give their Judgments ſeriatim; on the Iſſue of which, it appear'd, that his Lordſhip, the Priſoner, was acquitted by a great Majority; the Not-Guilties being ſixty-nine, and the Guilties but fourteen.

Account of Bills paſs'd.

And now all that remains to bring the Seſſion to a Period, is to ſpecify the moſt remarkable Acts which receiv'd the Royal Aſſent, together with the Mutiny-Bill; that of the Additional-Impoſitions; that for the Review of the Quarterly-Poll; that for prolonging certain Duties, and charging Joint-Stocks; that for examining and ſtating the Public Accounts; and that for reviving, continuing, and explaining certain temporary Laws, before-mention'd; and which were, 1. The Act for preventing (r) Suits againſt ſuch as had acted for their Majeſties Service in Defence of this Kingdom. 2. An Act for raiſing the Militia for the Year 1693. 3. An Act to authoriſe the Judges to empower ſuch Perſons, other than common Attorneys and Solicitors, as they ſhould think fit, to take ſpecial Bail, except in London, Weſtminſter, and ten Miles round. 4. An Act to encourage the apprehending of Highwaymen. 5. An Act to prevent clandeſtine Marriages. 6. An Act for the regaining, encouraging, and ſettling the Greenland Trade. 7. An Act to prevent malicious Informations in the Court of King's-Bench, and for the more eaſy Reverſal of Outlawries in that Court. 8. An Act for the better Diſcovery of Judgments in the Courts of Law. 9. An Act for delivering Declarations to Priſoners for Debt. 10. An Act for regulating Proceedings in the Crown-Office. 11. An Act for the more eaſy Diſcovery and Conviction of ſuch as ſhould deſtroy the Game of this Kingdom: And, 12. An Act for continuing the Acts for prohibiting all Trade and Commerce with France, and for the Encouragement of Privateers.

As to the parting Speech from the Throne, it reſembled that of a parting Lover, who, having gain'd his Point, inſenſibly converts Paſſion and Energy into Gratitude and Complaiſance.------But it is fit his Majeſty ſhould ſpeak for himſelf. A.D. 1692-3.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The large Supplies which you have given me this Seſſion, are ſo great Teſtimonies of your good Affections, that I take this Occaſion, with great Willingneſs, to return my hearty Thanks to you. And I aſſure you, it ſhall be my Care to ſee, that that Money you have given may be effectually apply'd to ſuch Services as may be moſt for the Honour and Intereſt of England. The King's Speech.

I muſt recommend to your Care the Peace and Quiet of the ſeveral Counties to which you are now returning, and doubt not but by your Care, the Supply, which you have ſo freely given, will not only be effectually levied, but with the greateſt Equality too, and the leaſt Uneaſineſs to the People that is poſſible.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Poſture of Affairs does neceſſarily require my Preſence abroad; but I ſhall take care to leave ſuch a Number of Troops here, as may be ſufficient for the Security of the kingdom againſt any Attempts of our Enemies.

I ſhall add no more, but that, as I ſhall continue to expoſe my own Perſon, upon all Occaſions, for the Good and Advantage of theſe Kingdoms, ſo I do likewiſe aſſure you, that my hearty and ſincere Endeavours ſhall never be wanting, in any other kind, to make this a great and flouriſhing Nation."

Alterations in the Miniſtry.

We muſt now follow the Hiſtorian of his own Times, but not blind-fold, to the Door of the Cabinet (which having been ſhut againſt him, we are not to expect that he ſhould open to us) as alſo thorough that Maze of Faction and Cabal, which gave riſe to the intricate Tranſactions of theſe Times.

According to his Lordſhip, it was to ſoften the Diſtaſte which the King's rejecting the Bill for frequent Parliaments might otherwiſe give, that his Majeſty was induc'd, at the Cloſe of the Seſſion, to make conſiderable Alterations in his Miniſtry. Now the conſiderable Alterations ſpecify'd by him, are, the taking the great Seal out of Commiſſion, and giving it to Sir John Sommers; and the beſtowing the Secretary's Seals, which had lain ſo long dormant, on Sir John Trenchard; both which Steps, he further tells us, were aſcrib'd to the great Credit which the Earl of Sunderland had gain'd with the King (and which he openly made uſe of in favour of the Whigs) and had a great Effect on the WHOLE PARTY, who were thereby brought to a better Opinion of his Majeſty: So that we are to conclude, that an Alteration of Men was, even in thoſe Days, to be eſteem'd an Equivalent for an Alteration of Meaſures; and that as the People

Charles* II. in that Behalf, and to march and be quarter'd in divers Places upon that Occaſion: That thoſe Proceedings in that extraordinary Juncture, and the Parties concern'd therein may be indemnify'd therefore, and for the preventing the Trouble and Charges which the ſaid Lord Sollicit. might be put to by the Proſecution of their Majeſties, their Heirs and Succeſſors, or by the means of Suits of any Perſon whatſoever, for, and by Reaſon of, their Actings and Doings aforeſaid, Be it enacted, &c."

A.D. 1692. People had no other Communication with the Crown than by the Means of their Repreſentatives, ſo the Devotion and Munificence of the People were to be rewarded in the Perſons of their Repreſentatives only.

But we ſhall find, that the Biſhop is not conſiſtent with himſelf in ſuggeſting, that the Effects of this Alteration extended to the whole Party; and that we are, by no means, to ſuppoſe, that becauſe Lord Sunderland was re-converted to Whigiſm, and had re-obtain'd ſuch an Aſcendency at Court, none but Whigs were now the Favourites there: For, as to humour one Party, his Majeſty had promoted Sir John Sommers and Sir John Trenchard, ſo, to humour the other, he remov'd Mr. Ruſſel from his Command at Sea, and Lord Cornwallis and Sir Richard Onſlow from the Admiralty-Board, to make Room for Mr. Killigrew and Sir Ralph Delaval. The Biſhop's own Account of this Matter is contain'd in theſe Words, "The King was now poſſeſs'd againſt him (Ruſſel) for he diſmiſs'd him from his Service, and put the Command of the Fleet into the Hands of three Perſons, Killigrew, Delaval, and Shovel: The two firſt were thought ſo inclinable to King James's Intereſts, that it made ſome inſinuate, that the King was in the Hands of thoſe who intended to betray him to his Enemies: For though no Exception lay againſt Shovel, yet it was ſaid, he was only put with the other two, to give ſome Reputation to the Commiſſion, and that he was one againſt two; ſo that he could neither hinder, nor do any thing. The chief Blame of this Nomination was thrown on the Earl of Nottingham; and of thoſe who belong'd to his Office, many Stories were rais'd and ſpread about, as if there had been among them, beſides a very great Remiſſneſs in ſome of the Concerns of the Government, an actual betraying of all our Secrets and Councils. The Opinion of this was ſpread both within and without the Kingdom; and moſt of our Confederates were poſſeſs'd with it: He juſtify'd not only himſelf, but all his under Secretaries: Both King and Queen continu'd ſtill to have a good Opinion of his Fidelity; but they ſaw ſome Defects in his Judgments, with a moſt violent Party Heat, that appear'd on all Occaſions, and even the ſmalleſt Matters." What Party Heat appears in this whole Paſſage, there is no need to point out: The ill Opinion that was ſpread of the Earl of Nottingham's Fidelity, was ſpread by his Enemies; and neither that Opinion, nor the Inſinuations againſt Killigrew and Delaval were ſupported by any Fact. The Writer of King William's Life, on the other hand, takes occaſion to ſay on the Removal of Ruſſel, That his Majeſty expreſs'd himſelf with reſpect to his Officers, as Cæſar had done with reſpect to his Wife, That they ſhould not only be free from Guilt, but Suſpicion. But if his Majeſty had really laid that down for a Rule, he ſhould have remov'd Lord Nottingham as well as Mr. Ruſſel; and, as the Fact ſtands, it is reaſonable to lay as little Streſs on the Scandal of one Party, as of the other.—But to return.—Though our Hiſtorian has thought fit to ſeparate theſe Veins of Promotion, as if they had broke out at different times, nothing is more certain, than that they were the Production of the ſame Criſis, and that they are both recorded in the ſame Gazette; which Gazette alſo bears witneſs, that Mr. Ruſſel was not diſmiſs'd from his Majeſty's Service, but that on the contrary, he was only tranſlated from the Fleet to the Houſhold, of which he was made Treaſurer. And thus it appears, that the Alterations on one Side, were ballanced by thoſe on the other: As alſo, that the whole Proceeding was no more than a new Experiment on the old trimming Principle, which his Majeſty had made the Rule of his Government, ever ſince the Scales of Power had been firſt put into his Hands.

[Numb. 2836.]

We are now to ſhew, that this Expedient did not, however, anſwer his Ends; and for this Purpoſe it is again neceſſary to make uſe of our Hiſtorian of his own Times. "But as the employing thoſe Men [Sommers and Trenchard] ſays his Lordſhip, had a very good Effect on the King's Affairs; ſo a Party came to be now form'd, that ſtudy'd to croſs and defeat every thing. This was lead by (1) Seymour and Muſgrave. The laſt was a Gentleman of a noble Family in Cumberland, whoſe Life had been regular, and his Deportment Grave; he had loſt a Place in King James's Time; for though he was always a high Tory, yet he would not comply with his Deſigns. He had, indeed, contributed much to increaſe his Revenue, and to offer him more than he aſked; yet he would not go into the taking off the Teſts. Upon the Revolution, the Place out of which he had been turn'd, was given to a Man that had a good Share of Merit in it. This alienated him from the King; and he being a Man of good Judgment, and of great Experience, came to be conſider'd as the Head of the Party; in which he found his Account ſo well, that no Offers that were made him, could ever bring him over to the King's Intereſts. Upon many critical Occaſions, he gave up ſome important Points; for which the King found it neceſſary to pay him very liberally."

Burnet's Account of them unadvertised upon.

Thus we are furniſh'd with another flagrant Inſtance of the ſhameleſs Intercourſe, which had been open'd between the Court and the Repreſentatives of the People; and the Hiſtorian who could paſs over it, without a Note of Abhorrence, would not deſerve the Attention of his Country.

The Biſhop adds, "But the Party of the Tories was too inconſiderable to have rais'd a great Oppoſition, if a great Body of Whigs had not join'd them." And here we have the Inconſiſtence before alluded to; for if a great Body join'd with the Tories, it could not

(1) As Sir Edward Seymour continu'd to be one of the Commiſſioners of the Treaſury till May, 1694, it is reaſonable to think, that the Biſhop is a little too early in the Date of his Oppoſition.

A.D. 1692-3. not be truly said, that the Promotion of Sommers and Trenchard had a great Effect on the whole Party: But the former Part of this Fact is mis-stated, as well as the Latter; for the Majority of the House of Commons were Tories; and as the Court-Majority, agreeable to the Mixture which compos'd the Cabinet, was compos'd of both Whigs and Tories, so the Opposition was the same. Moreover, in proceeding, as he does, to, say, "That some of those (Whigs) had such Republican Notions, that they were much set against the Prerogative; and they thought the King was become too stiff in maintaining it," he does not reason over candidly; for surely it is the Corner-Stone of Whigism to be jealous of the Prerogative: Consequently the Whig of Principle could not be otherwise: Besides, any Man might be so without having the least Biass towards a Republic; and as Abuse of the Prerogative was the great Fault of the preceding Reigns, the least Tendency of that kind, must, in their Eyes, have very much misbecame a Prince, who professedly undertook to remedy that Abuse. How truly and justly he has given the following Account of Mr. Foley and Mr. Harley, who, together with Mr. Hampden, the Younger, had the Direction of the Malcontent-Whigs, cannot be decided till we come to sum up the Evidence to their Characters." Others, says his Lordship, were offended, because they were not consider'd nor prefer'd, as they thought they deserv'd. The chief of these were Mr. Paul Foley and Mr. Harley: The first of these was a younger Son of one, who, from mean Beginnings, had, only by Iron Works, rais'd one of the greatest Estates, that had been in England in our Time; he was a learn'd, tho' not a practicing Lawyer, and was a Man of Virtue and good Principles, but morose and and wilfull; and he had the Affectation of passing for a great Patriot, by his constant finding Fault with the Government, and keeping up an ill Humour and bad Opinion of the Court. Harley was a Man of a noble Family, and very eminently learn'd, much turn'd to Politics, and of a restless Ambition: He was a Man of great Industry and Application, and knew Forms and the Records of Parliament so well, that he was capable both of lengthning out and perplexing Debates; nothing could answer his aspiring Temper: So he and Foley join'd with the Tories to create Jealousies and raise an Opposition: They soon grew to be able to delay Matters long, and set on foot some very uneasy things that were popular, such as the Bill against Parliament Mens being in Places, and that for dissolving the Parliament, and having a new one every third Year." His Lordship then makes a Transition to the King's personal Deportment, and acknowledges, it was such as gave the Malcontents great Advantages over him: He reminds his Readers, That his Majesty was not over-gracious in his manner of receiving those who paid their Court to him, A.D. 1692-3. nor over-easy of Access: That his living at Kensington the little time he was in England, contributed to render him more and more unpopular: That his chief Confidents were Dutch: That he took no Notice of the Clergy: That he seem'd to have little Concern in the Matters of the Church, or of Religion; and that not only Socinians, but Atheists and Deists were suffer'd to publish Books against Religion in general, and more particularly against the mysteries of our own Faith, who expressing great Zeal for the Government, gave a Handle to those who were waiting for all Advantages to spirit up the Bulk of the Clergy against him, under the Pretence of providing for the Security of the Church. Discontents of the Clergy.

It is certain, that no Part of his Majesty's Conduct was more pernicious to his Repose, than his Disregard of the Clergy; and yet, as a Politician, he had very good Reasons to assign for those very Instances which the Bishop has urged as Matters of Complaint. It was apparent, that though the Bulk of the Clergy had submitted to his Goverment, they were not thoroughly reconcil'd to the Measures of it; and that they were no otherwise to be reclam'd, than by giving them the Necks of their Enemies, who were his Majesty's best and surest Friends.

As, therefore, he could not prevail with himself to purchase their Good-will on such injurious Terms, and it was to be fear'd, that they would improve every Access of Power and Credit to their own Profit and Emolument, rather than his, he gave way to such a Method of treating them, as had a gradual Tendency to humble their Pride, by exposing the Abuses it was founded upon, and to redeem the Laity out of their Hands, by enabling them to think and judge for themselves. And thus for political Regards, Reason was allow'd fair Play in spiritual Matters; and Men thought they had Leave given them to make use of their own Eyes for their own sakes, when it was only to enable them to detect the Blindness and Perverseness of their Guides.

But though the Grievances of the Church were echo'd loudest by the discontented Tories, the discontented Whigs directed all their Attention to those of the State: And it might have been worth the Bishop's while to recollect, that, immediately after the Close of the Session, the Leaders of that Party set forth a Pamphlet, call'd (t) An Enquiry; or, a Discourse between a Yeoman of Kent, and a Knight of a Shire, upon the Prorogation of the Parliament to the second of May; as also to appropriate Posterity, That the Knight, after premising in that Discourse, That, according to the ancient Constitution of this Kingdom, Parliaments were to meet of course, at least twice every Year, and that we had positive Laws for annual Parliaments, is made to use these very Words: "I must confess to you, Of the Whigs. [State Tracts Tem. III. Vol. ii. p. 330.]

(t) This Piece is ascrib'd to Major Wildman, Mr. Hampden, &c. But if they were in the Secret of the Composition, it seems most reasonable to me to conclude, that Lord Warrington was the Penman.

A.D. 1692-3. [4to Edit. p. 2.] you, nothing prevail'd with me more, to concur with our King in his Pretenſions to reſtore our Parliaments and the Laws to their due Authority, than my own Knowledge, that the late Civil Wars in this Kingdom, and the Subverſion of our Religion, Laws, and Liberties, were principally occaſion'd by the Powers uſurp'd in ſeveral late Reigns, to refuſe the calling of ſucceſſive Parliaments, and to continue the ſame Parliament for many Years, and to form them into a Compliance with their Deſigns of Deſpotic Power. When I read the ſolemn and repeated Aſſurances his Majeſty gave us, That his Deſigns of coming into England, was to remove from the Adminiſtration of the Government, thoſe evil Miniſters that had promoted the Murders and Treaſons committed, in attempting to ſet up an Arbitrary Power over the People and their Parliaments; and alſo heard him deſire the Parliament, to make ſuch an effectual Proviſion for their fundamental Laws and Liberties, that they might never hereafter be in Danger to be again invaded, I thought the ancient, legal Courſe of annually cheſen Parliaments would have been immediately reſtor'd, and the ſtrongeſt Fence made for that Conſtitution, that the Wiſdom of the Kingdom could have enacted. But I muſt tell you, to my Sorrow, that we are left as much to the King's Will for a Seſſion of Parliament, as evil Miniſters in the late Reign deſir'd we ſhould be." Again, [Ibid. p. 3.] "We concluded upon ſolemn Debates, that he was highly concern'd to have this Bill enacted, to juſtify his coming with Force and Arms to deliver us from Arbitrary Power, and to ſettle our Laws and Liberties. We thought that the Reputation of his Concurrence with the Advice of the great Council of his Kingdom, oblig'd him to a free Conſent to that Bill; the Expectations of all Europe being ſo exceeding great from the Reſult of this Parliament's Councils and his Union with them. We believ'd his Deſire to ſecure to his Subjects their Government by Law, would have made him glad of the Opportunity of this Bill, leſt any Accident ſhould befal him in this War, and he ſhould loſe the Glory of his Deſign, by leaving them unſettled. We thought it for his Intereſt to paſs this Bill, to induce the People to pay their great Taxes freely, and to advance them to as great Sums as the Acts of Parliament would allow; it being the ancient Courſe in Parliaments, that the King always paſs'd ſome Bills for the Peoples Advantage when they had great Sums from them; and we thought his Majeſty had the leſs Reaſon to deny his Aſſent to the Bill, in regard it depriv'd the Crown of no legal Prerogative, but only reviv'd and confirm'd the ancient Laws of the Realm, than which nothing is more frequent, when wholſome and neceſſary Laws grow into Diſuſe. We alſo conceiv'd that his Majeſty was bound in Honour to make good the Matter of his Declarations, and his ſolemn Promiſes to the [Ibid. p. 7.] People in them."----- And again, "I want Advice as much as you, how to ſatisfy thoſe who ſent me to Parliament, about the King's Refuſal of this Bill: Yet one thing vexes me worſe, that, having been zealous for the Revolution, I know not how to reſtrain, nor yet well to bear, the Scoffs of ſome of our Enemies, at my Folly. They call to mind, that I, ſimple Man, as I was, confidently ſaid, That the Government ſhould be reform'd, and our Laws and Liberties fully ſecur'd. They now aſk me, Whether I find by Experience, a King of our own making more ready to do the People Right, than the old ones that claim'd by lineal Deſcent? Some of them laugh'd, and told me, That I gap'd for a New Jeruſalem to drop from Heaven, wherein there would be nothing but Righteouſneſs.----- They have upbraided me with what I ſaid, That God had ſent us a Prince that would deny his People nothing."---

A.D. 1694.

This was the Language of the Whigs; and in this we have a new Proof, That thoſe who aſſiſted in ſetting their Deliverer on the Throne, made no Scruple to put him in mind of his Obligations to make their Deliverance complete, nor to prompt the People to be as tenacious of their Privileges, and as jealous of the Abuſe of Power, under the new Eſtabliſhment, as under the old.

and of the Jacobites.

Laſtly, the Jacobites, during this whole Interval, were as attentive as ever to the Conduct of the King, the Diſguſts of the two Houſes, and the Animoſities of every kind that rag'd among the People, and as ſedulous out of all to derive ſome Advantage, if poſſible, to themſelves. Neither the Proclamation againſt Libellers, nor the reviving the Licenſing Act, deterr'd them from the Uſe of the Preſs; and, either thro' an Exceſs of Zeal, or the cruel Artifice of thoſe who believ'd, that the Sufferings of Individuals would communicate new Strength and Vigour to their whole Party, a Pamphlet, ſo outrageouſly virulent, was ſet forth from that Quarter againſt the Government, as no Government would over-look. It was call'd, Remarks upon the preſent Confederacy and late Revolution: And the chief Points endeavour'd to be prov'd in it, are, 1. That if the Prince of Orange had not ſucceeded in his Expedition againſt his Father, there would have been no ſuch Confederacy. 2. That the ſeveral Powers which favour'd the Former, did ſo with a View of making the Wealth and Strength of England ſubſervient to the Latter. 3. That tho' England was held thus neceſſary to the great Deſign of reducing France, ſhe was to have no Share of the Spoil: And, laſtly, That, inſtead of finding their Account balanc'd by the Virtues of their new Maſter, and the Happineſs reſulting from them, the Nation was on the Point of being undone by his Ambition, Perfidy, Oppreſſion, and Corruptions, he had introduc'd among us, both in Church and State.

About the ſame time another far more dangerous, becauſe more rational and temporate Pamphlet, was alſo ſet forth, under the Title of, A French Conqueſt neither deſirable nor practicable; which was a ſort of ſecond Part to a Piece call'd, The Jacobite Principles vindicated, publiſh'd ſome time before;

A. D. 1692-3. one being dedicated to the Queen and the other to the King of England, meaning the late King James and his Queen. Of both ſomething ought to be ſaid, as well becauſe of the relation they had to the general State of Things at this Criſis, as to the more particular Views, Deſigns, and Pretenſions of the Jacobite Party. In the former Part, which treats of their Principles, the Writer takes upon him to aſſert, "That there were among the Jacobites, Perſons, who would join with any other Engliſhmen to aſk, in a reſpectful manner, for every honeſt Thing that was neceſſary to ſecure us from arbitrary Power and the Violence of all ſorts of Prieſts; and who were themſelves ſatisfy'd, and could authentically ſatisfy others, that the King (James) had been a long Time willing to make all thoſe neceſſary Conceſſions that would ſecure the Church of England as the eſtabliſh'd Church, make an impartial Toleration ſafe, and, for the future, put our Liberty and Property (as much as good and wholſome Laws could do it) out of the Power of Mal-Adminiſtration; who were of Gourville's Opinion, That a King of England, who would be the Man of his People, was the greateſt King in the World; but that if he inſiſted on being more, he became nothing at all; and who were for Reformations, tho' they believ'd them more laſting under inconteſted Titles, than where Title was too great a Part of the Diſpute: That it was plain by the Condeſcentions of King James to the Scottiſh Gentlemen, that he was convinc'd, That a Compliance with his People was his true and only Intereſt: That the People ought not to take a Standard either of the King's Inclinations, or thoſe of his Friends from the indiſcrete Tattle of thoſe who talk'd too loftily and dogmatically concerning Prerogative and the Nature of Monarchy? That the ſtrained Uſe of ſome Powers and Prerogatives in the Reign of Charles I. for which the flattering Lawyers had ſome dark Semblance of Authority, gave riſe to the civil War: That the firſt Parliament call'd by King Charles II. after the Reſtoration, paſs'd many Acts that plainly own'd the great Inexpediency, if not Illegality, of ſeveral things done in his Father's Days: That he himſelf, had he liv'd a little longer, would have ſeen Cauſe to own he had carry'd the Quo Warrantos too far: That he, the Author, deſir'd no body to ſerve King James, but on the Principles of making him the Father of his Country: That it was the Intereſt of the King himſelf, as well as of all Orders and Degrees of Men, that he ſhould be reſtor'd upon civil Securities: That there were thoſe about the King who would lay before him the Neceſſity and Wiſdom of complying with all reaſonable Demands; And that if thoſe Demands were not unfit either in Matter or Manner for an Engliſh King to grant, thoſe Men, Jacobites as they were, would not only deliver, but ſecond the PETITIONS that ſhould be prefer'd to him." This is an Abſtract of the firſt Piece: And in the ſecond, the Author declares, in the Name of his Party, "That they were ſo far from wiſhing King Lewis ſhould conquer the Nation, that A. D. 1692-3. they did not deſire King James ſhould: That Father, not Conqueror, was the Language of their Loyalty: That there was not one Burnet or Lloyd among the nonjuring Clergy: That they were very glad, that thoſe who ſat in the two Houſes had fix'd ſuch a Brand on the Doctrine of Conqueſt: That if the King (James) ſhould be forc'd to reduce theſe Nations with a high Hand, all the wiſe and influencing Jacobites would interpoſe, if it ſhould be found neceſſary to keep him from Revenge: That, however, he had never talk'd of his Subjects but with Compaſſion inſtead of Indignation: That of the Princeſs of Orange, herſelf, he had found Occaſion to ſay, 'That ſhe had ſuch natural 'Foundations of Goodneſs, as Dr. Burnet 'and the Biſhop of London could never de'ſtroy:' And that all thoſe who had been at St. Germains knew with what Indignation the King treated all thoughts of reſtoring him, otherwiſe than by a great Concurrence of his own People." Drawing then to his immediate Point, he proceeds to inculcate, "That it was the common Intereſt of all the Princes and Powers of Europe to withſtand the Deſigns of France, if they ſhould entertain any to reduce this Iſland: That the Jealouſy which they had already ſhewn of the French Greatneſs, was ſufficient to ſhew alſo, that they would never ſuffer her to make an Acquiſition which would render her formidable to the whole World: That the French Court were too ſenſible of the Unweildineſs of ſuch an Attempt to venture upon making it: That it was not even the Intereſt of France to run the Riſque of the Experiment: That if it was poſſibly for her to ſucceed in it, that very Succeſs might be fatal to her: That it would be as hard to hold theſe Nations in Obedience, as to conquer them: That the Vicegerency was too great a Truſt for any Subject; and yet the Government here could no otherwiſe be adminiſter'd: That it would ſo far exhauſt the Wealth and Strength of France, that ſhe would fall an eaſy Prey to thoſe Neighbours who waited only for ſuch an Opportunity to ruin her: That the French rarely, if ever, ſucceeded in ſuch Enterprizes as were far remov'd from their own Frontiers, and the reach of thoſe Reſourſes which were at all times neceſſary for their ſupport: That this was of all things the moſt difficult; for without ſubduing the Winds and Waves, as well as our Fleets and Armies, and indeed the very Spirit of the Nation, it would be impoſſible for the French to eſtabliſh their Dominion here: That, again, inſtead of its being their Intereſt to aſſiſt in enſlaving us under Kings of our own, or in reconverting us to the Religion of Rome, it was, on the contrary, their Intereſt to have the Power of the Monarchy held in Balance by Clames of the People; and that the very Religion which was call'd Hereſy on that Side of the Water, ſhould be the Eſtabliſhment on this: That paradoxical as this might ſeem, nothing was more true: That it would be the greateſt Soleciſm imaginable in the Po-

A. D. 1697-8 litics of the French Cabinet, to make the King of England, who had alſo Pretenſions to the Crown of France, Maſters of their People; becauſe in ſo doing, he would enable them to proſecute thoſe Pretenſions as often as they thought fit, without ſoliciting Aids, by the tedious Forms, and under the numerous Checks of Parliament; and that, for the ſame Reaſon, it would be equally abſurd and impolitic for them to excite any Alteration in the preſent Mode of Religion, or remove the Shibboleth of the different Creeds of the two Nations, which ſerv'd more effectually than any other Bar to keep them in their preſent State of Separation. He alſo takes ſome Pains to ſhew, that this Nation never was effectually conquer'd, either by Romans, Saxons, Danes, or Normans; and that we were never like to be ſo, till we fell into civil Wars amongſt ourſelves; in which caſe, we muſt expect to be made the Cockpit of the World, by means of the foreign Auxiliaries; which both Parties alike would not fail to call over to their reſpective Aſſiſtance: But then, how likely we were to fall into that Predicament, or, at leaſt, how deſirous he, the Author, was, that we ſhould do ſo, rather than King James and his Family ſhould continue in Exile, appears from what follows; which it is proper to inſert in his own Words: "And tho' all the Jacobites abhor a French Conqueſt, and ſo does the King too, yet if the Nation will not come to ſuch a Temper as to reſtore him without their Help, the King's Friends cannot be blam'd for being willing to admit of ſuch a moderate Number of French, or any other Forces as may be neceſſary to cover them, when they come to him, till they get together, and as may give them Opportunity to riſe. We had rather; He had much rather; nay, the King of France declares, he had rather his Reſtoration ſhould be wholly owing to his own Subjects: We will never agree that he ſhould bring ſuch a Force as may give any the leaſt Jealouſy, that either He or France deſigns to conquer; and he is perfectly reſolv'd to come in that manner that ſhall be agreed to by ſuch Friends of his, as the World muſt allow to be Men of Honour, regardful of the Britiſh Rights, and of the Proteſtant Religion."

Laſtly, by way of Uſe and Application of all, he farther ſays, "Can any Men of Senſe believe, that the Earl of Middleton, who could never, during his whole Miniſtry, be drawn into any irregular Step, would go over upon any other Errand? That great Man is known to underſtand his Duty to his Country as well as his Prince, and thinks he ought at the ſame time to be the Miniſter of both; and his Affection and Firmneſs to Proteſtancy was never once ſuſpected: He will neither betray our Laws nor his own Religion; nor will he, to do the King but Juſtice, be tempted to either; for all that we have miſliked in the King's Meaſures abroad, has proceeded from Miſrepreſentation from hence: And my Lord Middleton is ſo fraughted with the genuine Intereſt, as well as Senſe, of theſe Nations, that the moſt inveterate of our Enemies, will have, hereafter, no Opportunity to clamour and exaſperate. This is a Truth, which, in a ſhort time, will need no Voucher. The future Acts of State that came from that Court, will prove he has diſcours'd many of the leading Men, and compromis'd the Grievances of all Parties." A. D. 1697-8

Now, in order to underſtand what is here ſaid of Lord Middleton and his Errand, we muſt again have recourſe to the Hiſtorian of his own Times, who ſays, That the ſaid Lord went over to France in the Beginning of this Year: That it was believ'd he was ſent by a great Body among us, with a Propoſition, which, if his Lordſhip had had the Aſſurance to make, and the King the Wiſdom to embrace, would have greatly increas'd our Factions and Jealouſies; namely, for King James to reſign his Title in favour of his Son, and likewiſe to ſend him to be bred in England, under the Direction of a Parliament, till he ſhould be of age: That he, the Biſhop, could never hear that the Earl endeavour'd to communicate this Propoſal; and that all the apparent Effect of his Miſſion was, to obtain a new Declaration in a quite different Strain from the Former; for whereas that was in the Stile of a Conqueror; this promis'd every thing, pardon'd every body, and, as far as Words could go, gave Content to all." The Biſhop adds, "His Party got this into their Hands: I ſaw a Copy of it, and they waited for a fit Occaſion to publiſh it to the Nation."

Lord Middleton goes over to France with a new Propoſition from the Diſaffected.

A new Declaration founded thereon.

His Lordſhip might alſo have ſaid, That by the Care of the ſaid Party it was printed, and that it was ſtill extant in the State Tracts of this Reign. As to the Contents of it, King James, in the Preamble, ſets forth, That being ſenſible that nothing had ſo much contributed to his Misfortunes and the Miſeries of his People, as the Calumnies of his Enemies, he had thought fit to make ſuch Condeſcentions as ſhould be moſt proper for removing the ſaid Calumnies, and moſt likely to give the fulleſt Satisfaction to all Men: And farther, That becauſe he rather deſir'd to be beholden to the Love of his Subjects, than any other Expedient whatſoever for his Reſtoration, he had alſo thought fit to let them know before-hand his Royal and Sincere Intentions; and that when his own Circumſtances and his Peoples united Deſires ſhould give him an Opportunity to come and aſſert his Right, he ſhould come with the Declaration that follow'd; which was to this Effect, That when he reflected upon the Calamities of his Kingdoms, he was willing to leave nothing unattempted that might reconcile his Subjects to their Duty: That tho' he would not enter into all the Particulars of Grace and Goodneſs, which he was willing to grant, yet he did aſſure them they might depend upon every thing that their own Repreſentatives ſhould offer to make them happy; it being his nobleſt Aim to do more for the Conſtitution, than the moſt renown'd of his Anceſtors; and, in his Opinion, his chiefeſt Intereſt, to leave no Umbrage for Jealouſy, in relation

A. D. 1692-3. relation to Religion, Liberty, and Property: That for his part, he was ready and willing to lay aside all Thoughts of Animosity and Resentment for what was past, and desir'd nothing more than that it should be bury'd in perpetual Oblivion: That he did by this his Declaration under his Great Seal, solemnly promise his free Pardon and Indemnity to all who should not oppose him and his Adherents, in a certain Number of Days after his Landing: That he farther promis'd to reward, according to their respective Merits, such as should come to his Assistance: That he would, with all Speed, call together the representative Body of the Kingdom: That from them he would inform himself what were the united Interests and Inclinations of his People; and that with their Concurrence, he would be ready to redress all their Grievances, and give all those Securities of which they should stand in need: That he would protect and defend the Church of England, as it was then establish'd by Law, and secure to the Members of it all their Possessions, Immunities, Rights, and Privileges: That he would, with all Earnestness, recommend to that Parliament such an impartial Liberty of Conscience as they should think necessary for the Happiness of these Nations: That he would not dispense with, nor violate the Test: That for the Dispensing Power in other Matters, he would leave it to be explan'd and limited by Parliament: That he would also give the Royal Assent to all such Bills as were necessary for the frequent calling and holding of Parliaments; the free Election and fair Returns of Members, and to provide for impartial Trials; and that he would ratify and confirm all such Laws made under the present Usurpation, as should be tender'd to him by that Parliament: That in the same Parliament he would also consent to every thing that they should think necessary, to re-establish the late Act of Settlement of Ireland, made in the Reign of his dearest Brother; and that he would advise with the said Parliament how to recompense such of that Nation as had follow'd him to the last, who would be Sufferers by the said Re-establishment: That if Chimney-Money, or any Part of the Crown-Revenue had been burdensome to his Subjects, he was ready to exchange it for any other Assessment which should be thought more easy: That in all these several Concessions, he had follow'd the Advice, and conform'd to the Intimations which he had receiv'd from great Numbers of his loving Subjects of all Ranks and Degrees, who had adjusted the manner of his coming to regain his own Right, and relieve his People from Oppression and Slavery: That after this it would be unnecessary to enumerate the tyrannical Violations and Burdens, with which his Kingdoms had been oppress'd and were now like to be destroy'd: That whereas his Enemies had endeavour'd to affright his Subjects with the Apprehensions of great Sums to be repaid to France, he did positively assure them, That his dearest Brother, the most Christian King, expected no other Compensation for what he had done for him, than merely the Glory of having succour'd an injur'd Prince; and that he besought God to give him Success in the Prosecution of his Right, as he sincerely intended to confirm the Liberties of his People."

A. D. 1692-3.

This Piece was dated April the 17th, N. S. 1693, and was dispers'd by the Jacobite Party in London about the Middle of May following: But one Canning and one Dormer, who had undertaken, with others, it must be presum'd, that dangerous Office, were, on the 21st of that Month taken up by the Watch, as they were thus employ'd, and committed to Finsbury Prison. On the 15th of July following, they were brought to their Trial at the Old-Bailey; and in their Indictment were not only charg'd with dispersing and publishing, but with making and composing a certain false and malicious Libel, call'd King James's Declaration, with an Intent to disturb the Peace of the Kingdom, to raise War and Sedition against the King and Queen, and to withdraw their Subjects from their Duty and Allegiance. And thus by the Refinements of the Lawyers, all the Merit which King James and his Minister, Middleton, propos'd to themselves from so many gracious Condescentions, were transfer'd at once to the two Prisoners at the Bar; and what was calculated to do so much Service to the Former, was made use of to the Ruin of the Latter: But tho' the Words making and composing were inserted in the Indictment, no Evidence was brought in Support of them; on the contrary, all that was prov'd, was, That the said Prisoners had given a Paper to one Brown, which he call'd a Ticket for a Play: That a Watchman, whom they met, as they left Brown, and who held up his Lanthorn to their Faces, took up two of the like Papers in the Street: That upon examining the Contents, they resolv'd to pursue them: That in Coleman-Alley, where they were taken, two several Parcels of the like Papers were found the next Day on the Top of a Shed: That Mrs. Dormer had confess'd, she had burn'd several Papers after her Husband was committed; but said, she knew not what they were: And, lastly, Stephens, the Messenger of the Press, depos'd, That he had often found Canning to be a busy Man, and disaffected to the Government: That he had taken a private Press of his, as also many seditious Papers; and that he had been in Custody several times. The Prisoners deny'd all, and insisted it was hard to prove, that they were the same Men who had been met by Brown and the Watchman, or that the Papers then produc'd in Court, were the same which had been found by them in the Street; and that no Proof was offer'd, that they had dispers'd the said Papers: Brown reply'd, That he knew Canning when he was taken; and the Watchman, That he found not any Paper in the Street before he met the Prisoners, and that he found several afterwards. And, upon the whole, Sir Salathiel Lovel, the Recorder, was pleas'd to observe, That the Le-

nity

A.D. 1692-3. nity and Patience of the Government had been highly manifeſt, in hope, by fair and gentle Means to conciliate them to the preſent Government: That inſtead of being ſo wrought upon, Theſe and other evil-diſpos'd Perſons had taken Encouragement to grow more impudent and audacious: That traiterous, ſeditious, and ſcandalous Papers, Books and Libels had, through Impunity, greatly multiply'd and increas'd; which had made it indiſpenſibly neceſſary for their Majeſty's Honour and Safety, and the Preſervation of the Public Peace, to exert the Juſtice of the Public, and to put the Laws in Execution againſt ſuch Offenders, till the Smart had made them ſenſible of their Crimes: That nevertheleſs, in the Caſe of the Priſoners at the Bar, more of Mercy than of Rigour had been ſhewn: For tho' the Offence was Treaſon, the Indictment had been laid for a Miſdemeanor only: And with this Impreſſion of the Mildneſs of the Government, and the Incorrigibleneſs of the Priſoners (but without any Hint of the Inſufficiency of the Evidence to authoriſe a capital Proceſs) the Jury were left to conſider of their Verdict; which, having done, or affected to do, they found both the Priſoners guilty of the Offences mention'd in the Indictment. All that now remain'd, was to pronounce Sentence; which was done by the Recorder, to this Effect, That the Court, conſidering their Inability to pay a Fine proportionable to their Offence, had reſolv'd to inflict a Puniſhment upon them, partly corporal, and partly pecuniary; and did, accordingly ſentence them to pay a Fine of five hundred Marks a-piece, to ſtand in the Pillory three ſeveral Times, at three ſeveral Places, to lye in Cuſtody till their Fines were paid, and to find Sureties for their good Behaviour for a Twelvemonth.

This, however, was not the firſt Effort which had been made, to provide for their Majeſty's Honour and Safety, by complying with the indiſpenſible Neceſſity which appear'd, of exerting the Juſtice of the Public againſt Libellers; for one Anderton, the ſuppos'd Printer of the Remarks on the late Revolution and preſent Confederacy, and that other Piece, call'd, A French Conqueſt neither deſirable nor practicable, was ſeiz'd by Stephens the Meſſenger of the Preſs (May the 2d) and committed to Newgate, by Lord Chief Juſtice Holt, at firſt, for a Miſdemeanor; but, on offering ſufficient Bail, was, by a freſh Warrant, continued there under a Charge of High Treaſon: His Trial came on the firſt of June; Treby, Lord-Chief-Juſtice of the Common-Pleas preſided on the Bench; by whoſe Direction the Priſoner was deny'd a Copy of his Indictment; which was in Subſtance for compoſing, printing, and publiſhing the ſaid Libels. The Witneſſes againſt him were Stephens, the Beadle of Stationers-hall, a Conſtable and a Pariſh-Beadle, two Printers and a Stationer. Stephens, who was an avow'd Enemy of Anderton, open'd his Evidence with ſwearing, That the Priſoner not only reſiſted, but did in Words diſown the Government, and

call'd King William, HOOKNOSE! And having properly prepar'd the Jury with this Inflamatory, proceeded to ſwear, That in the ſame Houſe where Anderton lodg'd, he found an old Trunk, which he knew to be Anderton's, fill'd with the ſaid Papers and Pamphlets; and that out of his Deſk he alſo took ſorty or fifty of each ſort. The Conſtable and the two Beadles, who accompany'd Stephens on this Occaſion, ſwore to the ſame Circumſtances. The two Priſoners ſwore that they had ſeen the Types at Stationer's-Hall, which had been ſeiz'd at Anderton's, and that they did believe them to be the ſame which had been uſed for printing the ſaid Libels: And the Stationer ſwore, that he had ſold the Priſoner Paper, who, upon that Occaſion, went by the Name of Williamſon, about three Quarters of a Year before. The Priſoner, on the other hand, inſiſted, That the Trunk was not his: That it was not found in any Apartment of his: That the Deſk was too ſmall to contain half the Number of Pamphlets ſworn to be taken out of it; and that for Proof, he deſir'd it might be ſent for into Court, and that the Experiment might be there made for the Satisfaction of the Jury. But this was over-rul'd, and the Witneſſes were permitted to recede from any poſitive Number, and to ground their Evidence on one of each. The Priſoner then aſked the Conſtable, How he knew the two Books then produc'd to be the ſame with thoſe in queſtion? And deſir'd him to read the Titles of them: But the latter Part of this Requeſt could not be comply'd with, becauſe the Conſtable could not read: And as to the former, it was ſaid, that he knew them by a private Mark which he had ſet upon them; which private Mark had not, however, been made on the Spot at Anderton's Lodgings, but four Hours afterwards at the Lord-Chief-Juſtice Holt's Chamber, on two Books produc'd by Stephens, out of his own Pocket. The Priſoner, moreover, objected to the Evidence of the two Printers, That their Belief ought to have no Weight where poſitive Proof was neceſſary; and that by the ſame Rule, all the Printers in London were liable to be hang'd; for all had Types of the ſame kind. And it is farther alledg'd in his Caſe, printed after his Death, That if this Evidence of the Printers had, been true, it ought to have acquitted him and if falſe, no Regard was due to it: For the Government had then in their Cuſtody the Perſons who were deepeſt in the Secret of the French Conqueſt, and one of thoſe Perſons in a ſubſequent Trial, ſwore in open Court, that he, and the two Priſoners then at the Bar, were the only Perſons concern'd in printing that Piece; whence it follow'd, that if the two Pamphlets were printed from the ſame Types, either that Perſon was perjur'd, or Anderton was innocent. From the Stationer's Evidence, no Concluſion could be drawn; for ſimply to buy Paper was no treaſonable Act, and nothing was ſworn to ſhew that he had made a treaſonable uſe of it. Upon the whole, Anderton inſiſted, That by

A.D. 1693. no Part of the Indictment was made good by the Witneſſes; that is to ſay, that he had either compos'd or printed, or publiſh'd the ſaid Pamphlet: And the Chief-Juſtice, on the contrary, undertook to perſuade the Jury, that all was made out as plain as Noon-Day. Fearful, therefore, that the Authority of the Bench would weigh more with the Pannel, than the Matter of Fact, the Priſoner ſtarted a Queſtion in Law, Whether printing was Treaſon within the Statute, 25 Edward III? And demanded the Benefit of Council, as his Right, which even in the Caſe of Colonel Sydney, had not been deny'd, nor indeed in any Caſe before. But Treby in this Caſe was reſolv'd to ſurpaſs Jeffreys himſelf, and rather make a Precedent than looſe his Point. Accordingly, he refus'd the Priſoner's Demand, with leſs Difficulty than he found to ſet a Colour on that Refuſal: And reduc'd to this Neceſſity, the poor Man was forc'd to be his own Counſellor; but acquitted himſelf ſo well, that it no longer ſeem'd a Hardſhip, that he had been oblig'd to do ſo. The Points which he principally inſiſted on, as to Matter of Law, were three, viz. 1. That Printing (though even that was not prov'd) was not Treaſon. 2. That the Crime laid to his Charge came not within the Purview of the 25 Edward III. 3. That if it did, yet by the ſaid Statute he ought to be diſcharg'd; becauſe there was not ſuch Witneſs againſt him as that Statute requires, and without which it condemns no Man. And theſe he prov'd fully and clearly, by ſeveral Caſes in Law, by ſeveral Authorities from the Lord Coke, and from the Letters of the Laws and Statutes themſelves: He argued from the Statute whereon he was indicted, that whereas that made two things Treaſon, conſpiring the Death of the King, and, levying War, the Printer who work'd for his Hire, could not be guilty of either, whatever the Author might: And farther, that the Books contained nothing of ſuch Matter, but the contrary, of which he produc'd an Inſtance full and plane: He alſo argued, That the ſaid Statute allow'd no conjectural Preſumptions, Inferences, or Strains of Wit, but requir'd direct and manifeſt Proof by, at leaſt, two Witneſſes; whereas, there was not one againſt him that ſpoke to the Purpoſe, or any thing like it: He preſs'd and explan'd the Statute 1*mo Mariæ*, even to a Demonſtration of his Caſe: For, whereas that Statute ſaith, No Act, Deed, or Offence, ſhall be adjudged Treaſon, but ſuch as are declar'd and expreſs'd to be ſuch by the 25*th of* Edward III, it was abſolutely impoſſible, that Printing ſhould be any ways declar'd or expreſs'd in that Act; the Art not being known in England till eight Kings Reigns after, and not long invented before it travell'd hither: And, laſtly, he cited the Printing Act of the 13th and 14th of Charles II. now lately reviv'd; and the penal Clauſes thereof to ſhew, That the very making that Law, argu'd, That the Government were at a Loſs to puniſh Printing, as ſuch, before, and, conſequently, that all Offences A.D. 1693. ariſing from the Abuſe of it could be meaſur'd by no other Standard.

It now reſted on the Bench to confute or confirm what the Priſoner had alledg'd, out of the Law-Books: But whether Treby did not care for the Trouble of ſo long a Diſquiſition, or whether he choſe to paſs over what he found it troubleſome to anſwer, he paſs'd a general Cenſure on all he had ſaid, as inſufficient, or nothing to the Purpoſe, cited the Caſe of Lord Cobham, which had occurr'd almoſt a Century before the Art of Printing had been diſcover'd, and ſome others equally material; inſiſted, that as the Subject-Matter of the two Libels was treaſonable, the printing them was an Overt-act of Treaſon; and, in general, labour'd as heartily to caſt the Priſoner, as if he had been a Council, who was reſolv'd to deſerve his Fee, rather than a conſcientious Judge who was ſworn to do equal Juſtice to Sovereign and Subject.

All that now remain'd, was for the Jury to bring in their Verdict: And while they were debating the Merits of the Caſe among themſelves, Stephens, the Meſſenger, being aſked by a Gentleman, as we are told, What was like to be the Fate of the Priſoner? had the Inſolence to anſwer, The Rogue pleaded bravely; and I believe, hopes he has Friends enough among the Jury to get him off: But, if ſuch as He are acquitt'd, the Government muſt give us Orders to ſtab them wherever we find them.

In Reality, many of the Jury were inclin'd to pronounce on the favourable Side, and were at no ſmall Pains to bring over the reſt: The Diſpute laſted above two Hours; and when they return'd into Court, it ſoon appear'd, that they came to have their own Scruples anſwer'd, not to decide the Fate of the Priſoner: For being aſked, Whether they were agreed? one of them anſwer'd bluntly, No: And the Foreman put the following Queſtion to the Bench, viz. Whether the Priſoner's having thoſe Papers by him, without making any farther Uſe of them, or there being any poſitive Proof that he printed them, did affect him as to Life? Treby, with a Frown, anſwer'd, No; but added, That was none of their Buſineſs: They were to find him guilty of Printing, which, in the preſent Caſe, was a ſufficient Overt-act. And when a Juryman again interpos'd with a Remonſtrance, That their Foreman was of Opinion, the Fact was not proved, his Lordſhip rejoin'd, to this Effect, "Poſitive Proof is not to be look'd for; and though the bare finding of the Books in his Cuſtody would not be Treaſon, yet it appearing, that he had a Printing Preſs which no body had Admiſſion to but himſelf, that he had the ſame Types in his Poſſeſſion as had been uſed in printing thoſe Books; that the Errata, &c. were found in his Poſſeſſion, as well as many of the Books themſelves, it muſt be inſer'd, That he printed the (u) Treaſon." Here another

(u) What the particular Paſſages were which were brought to warrant this ſevere Proſecution, are no where ſpecify'd: But that the Reader may be convinc'd, as indeed he ought to be, for Impartiality's ſake, that never any Pamphlet

A. D. 1691. another Juryman admitted, That the Presumption was very ſtrong; and Mr. Baron Powel put an end to the Parley, by adding, That a very ſtrong Preſumption was tantamount to occular Demonſtration. Under theſe Directions (which were given in the moſt rude and overbearing manner imaginable, intermix'd with frequent Revilings; the Bench ſeveral times calling them, Ill Men! Ill Subjects! and, A Pack of Knaves!) the Jury once more withdrew; and, after another Diſpute, which laſted about three Hours longer, and which was decided at laſt rather by the Menaces of the Court-Zealots among them, than their Arguments, brought in their Verdict, Guilty: Upon which Treby ſmoothed his Brow, which had been hitherto furrow'd with continual Frowns, and was pleas'd to ſay, That they had acted like good and honeſt Men.

Sir John Fleet was then Lord Mayor of London, and of Courſe had the Place of Honour in his own Court; and Anderton's Caſe being thought ſo particularly hard, he was adviſ'd, by his Friends, to lay a Petition before him, ſetting forth the many Points of Law that were to be urged in his Favour, and beſeeching that Judgment might be ſuſpended, till thoſe Points had been argu'd by his Council. But as his Lordſhip had been paſſive during the Trial, he refuſ'd to intermeddle, now it was over. When Anderton was brought up to receive Sentence, he, nevertheleſs, produc'd the ſame Petition; and, having read it in open Court, farther enforc'd it, with the four following Queries: "1. Whether, if a Jury, not being competent Judges of the Matter of Fact whereof they are to judge, bring in their Verdict againſt the Defendant contrary to Law; I ſay, whether Judgment ought, in ſuch Caſe, to paſs upon the Defendant, becauſe of that Verdict? 2. Whether if a Judge (who is Council for the Defendant, and therefore indiſpenſibly bound to take particular Cognizance of what the Defendant urgeth in his own Behalf, as well as what is alledg'd againſt him) in ſumming up the Evidence, doth omit (out of Forgetfulneſs or otherwiſe) the only material Point upon which the whole Indictment is founded, and which the Defendant ſo much urged in his own Behalf; and alſo which inevitably led the Jury into this Miſtake of their Verdict; whether, I ſay, this be not ſufficient to ſtay Judgment? 3. Whether any Judge, &c. can conſtrue Printing to be a ſufficient Overt-Act, till it be ſo declar'd by Parliament? 4. Whether the Statute of 13 Car. II. does not plainly intimate the contrary? and likewiſe the 13th and 14th Car. II. lately reviv'd." But all was ineffectual; Lovel, the Recorder, was now the Mouth of the Court; and he made no Difficulty to countenance all that Treby had done before him, by delivering him up to Execution, according to the dreadful Form made uſe of on ſuch capital Occaſions.

pillet was of a more provoking kind than the Remarks, the following Quotation is here inſerted.

"What is become of the wounded and maim'd in Ireland and Flanders, who, no doubt, were very numerous, God only knows: The moſt reaſonable Conjecture is, they are either ſuffered to periſh abroad, by being refus'd Paſſage home, or knock'd on the Head to ſave their Pay, and that they might not come home and tell Tales of their hard Uſage, to the diſcouraging their fellow Slaves from entering upon the Service. The Story of fifty wounded Engliſh being burnt in a Barn by the Dutch, at the Command of the P. of O. in Ireland, upon the abſolute Refuſal of an Engliſh Officer, who had ſome Remains of Compaſſion and natural Affection for his own Countrymen, is real Matter of Fact, and ought not to be forgotten; which was done, as is ſaid, merely to avoid the Trouble and Charge of curing them. Theſe are ſome of the Hardſhips the Soldiery groan under, and a Specimen of the brutiſh Temper as well as Unpoliticknels of our Uſurpers and ſooner or later he muſt expect to reap the juſt Fruits of his Cruelty and Folly both. What glorious Atchievements can he ever pretend to do with Soldiers, who muſt in due time (if there be ſo much Mercy reſerved in Heaven, have their Eyes opened, ſee their Error) and relent ſuch ill Uſage and Partiality! However our dull and unthinking Bigots may flatter themſelves with great Expectations of what he has, moſt ſillily, given out in his Speech to both Houſes, of his Reſolution, to make a Deſcent and do Miracles in France, the Soldiery are of the contrary Opinion, and through mere Deſpair of ever getting their Pay, or ſpending any thing upon their Enemy, have deſerted conſiderably, and really entertain low and mean Thoughts of his Conduct, ſee through the Cheat, and are only hindred by the Strictneſs of his Diſcipline from running unanimouſly to their old and beſt Maſter. They own, as many as get over, that they are hated in Flanders, abuſed at all rates by the Dutch, expoſed upon all Accounts as Forlorns: They can tell you how divers of their Officers were cudgell'd, and Soldiers hang'd immediately after the Battle at Steinkirk, for avoiding being knock'd on the head by the Dutch, when a numerous Army ſtood looking on, and not one ſingle Troop or Company was permitted (though ſome of the Engliſh deſired it, and were ready to hazard their Lives to relieve their poor Countrymen) to go in to their Aſſiſtance. By ſeveral Letters from Officers in Flanders in the Engliſh Army, we have been informd how the poor wounded Men, through the intolerable Pains they endur'd, curs'd and damn'd to the Pit of Hell, with their laſt Breaths, him who brought them to that horrid Butchery. They can tell you likewiſe what great Numbers deſerted his Service immediately after the Fight, chuſing rather to run the Hazard of being hang'd, and loſing all their Pay and Arrears, than to continue in his Service. They can tell you how the Engliſh are univerſally hated by the Country People there, that they ſcarce let them have Neceſſaries for their Money, and that the Flanderkins have more Reſpect for the Enemy, than for their pretended Friends the Allies, and much better Uſage for them. They can tell you, that their Wounded and Priſoners that fell into the Hands of the French, were more kindly treated by them, than among their Friends; and how far ſuch Uſage may work upon the Minds of a People, naturally generous, though at preſent bereav'd of their Senſes, Time may demonſtrate. They can tell you how the P. of O. is undervalu'd and no'd by the Confederates in general, diſtruſted by the Dutch, deſpiſed by the Inhabitants, in all the Cities and Towns in Flanders, and hated by all, and that for want of thoſe Qualifications we are made to admire, and ſo fooliſhly and ſuperſtitiouſly have hitherto magnify'd in him. What Wonder then is it, that our Engliſh Seamen and Soldiers mutiny, run away, &c? They can neither get their Pay nor good Words, but at a dead Lift: If they modeſtly demand their own, though incited to it by the keeneſt Neceſſity, they are immediately hang'd or ſhot to death without the leaſt Remorſe or Pity! Had we ever ſuch Acts of Parliament made in any Kings Reigns, for enſlaving and puniſhing of Seamen or Landmen, as ſince this Revolution: to many brave Men hanged or ſhot to death for Trifles; ſuch kidnapping our Landmen, under Pretence for Sea Service, and ſent to the Lord knows whither? Nay, I am credibly inform'd it has been no unuſual thing to preſs Landmen, and ſell them for three Pounds a Head to the Dutch, or into other Foreign Service. What Apology can be made for the wicked Abuſes of the Mariners, a Parcel of brave young Fellows, who were kept on board till they were almoſt all dead of the Small pox and other Diſtempers, the remainder cheated of and deny'd their Pay, and then forc'd to a ſickly and moſt piteous Condition to beg from Door to Door; as London and other Places can ſufficiently teſtify? To recount all the Miſeries of our diſtreſt Countrymen, who are actually engag'd under this Government, would be an endleſs Task. All I ſhall add under this Head, is, that this ill Uſage looks more like the Effect of Malice and a perfect Hatred, and Diſbrain, than of any Neceſſity upon our Governors: but if ſo, our Condition is deplorable and remedileſs, by all the Supplies we are able to give, though never ſo willingly, and without our moſt juſt and preſent Reſentment, a certain Forerunner of inevitable Ruin." P. 25, 30.

A. D. 1693. All that now remain'd, was for the poor Convict to make the best Efforts he could to soften the Queen and Council: But Mercy and Power were upon as ill Terms as Law and Justice: His Wife could make her Way no farther than the Doors of the Council Chamber; and the only Answer she could obtain, was, That it was expedient that one should die. "And thus, says the Writer of Anderton's Case, we have bravely secur'd our Lives, Liberties, and Estates, when Men are hang'd for Reasons of State, not for Offences against Law." To conclude; on the fifteenth of June he suffer'd Death at Tyburn; and in his last Paper, which is still extant, there is a solemn Protest against the whole Proceeding of the Court, which, according to him, was not appointed to try, but to convict him, and a charitable Prayer for his repenting Jury.

As this is the first Instance to be found in our Annals, of a Man hang'd for printing, and as it is much to be lamented, that any Instance is to be found of a Man hang'd on Presumptions only, instead of that positive Evidence which the Law requires, it was of Importance to set a suitable Mark on so dangerous an Innovation; and that more especially, as Anderton himself, in his said last Paper, insists, that the Court Account of his Trial was not only unfair, lame, and imperfect, but stuffed with downright Falshoods.

There remanes yet another remarkable Case to be discuss'd, which was the peculiar Growth of these Times, and which presented such a Phænomenon in Government as had never occur'd in our System before.

Dr. Oldys, the King's Advocate, refuses to prosecute certain Prisoners as Pirates, who had King James's Commission.

Towards the Close of the preceding Year, King James had issu'd Commissions to several Adventurers, empowering them to enter the Ports of these Kingdoms, and either there, or at Sea, to take and apprehend, and, in case of Resistance, to sink, burn or otherwise destroy all Ships and Vessels belonging thereto, as also those of the States of Holland: But, by way of farther Precaution, the said Adventurers had furnish'd themselves with the like Commissions under the Authority of France; and both were accompany'd with the usual Conditions and Limitations, That the Parties concern'd should give Security to bring all their Prizes into the French Ports, and submit the Legality of the Capture to the Decision of the Courts of Admiralty there.

As several of these Ships had been very successful in their Cruizes, so several others fell into the Hands of our Men of War, together with their Commissions: And those of King James so exasperated our Court, that they came to a Resolution to prosecute the Captains and Crews as Pirates. Accordingly, in November of the said Year, Dr. Oldys, the King's Advocate, was commanded to proceed against one John Golding and others for High Treason and Piracy: But the Doctor, having his Scruples, not only excus'd himself from obeying that Command, but gave his Opinion in Writing, That they were not Pirates, and ought not to be proceeded against as such.

This founded so harsh at Court, that Dr. Oldys himself was look'd upon as a Delinquent, and summon'd before a Committee of Council, together with Sir Thomas Pinfold, Dr. Walker, Dr. Littleton, and Dr. Tindal, to shew Cause for his Disobedience; which he did to this Effect, That Pirates were avow'd Enemies of all Mankind; and, instead of pretending to any legal Authority, set all Laws and all Governments at Defiance; whereas these Prisoners produc'd a Commission, sign'd James R. at the Court of St. Germains, counter-sign'd, Melfort; and in every other Respect agreeable to the Forms in use on these Occasions. Mr. Trenchard reply'd, That King James having parted with his Sovereignty, together with his Crown, had no longer any Right to grant such Commissions. The Doctor answer'd, That tho' a King might be depos'd, he was still a King, and had still a Right to make War, and to issue military Commissions as before. This the Secretary admitted; but, said he, What if he abdicated? The Doctor reply'd, That, after a real Abdication, like that of the Emperor Charles V. or that of Queen Christina of Sweden, a King became a private Person, and had no longer any legal Power to grant Commissions, or exercise any other Act of Kingship: But though his Commissions were illegal, it was a question whether a Privateer, who had once known him in undisputed Possession of all the Rights and Powers of Sovereignty, and who was not, perhaps, inform'd of his Abdication, might act innocently under them; for, in such a Case, a reputed Power was tantamount to a real one. It was notorious, he added, That King James had once been a lawful King: That when he was deserted by his Army, he fled to France, as to an Ally for Aid: That he had since re-asserted his Clame in Ireland: That the Soldiers fighting under his Commissions, had been treated as Prisoners of War, not as Robbers: That Numbers of the same Soldiers had since been suffer'd to follow him into France: That these believ'd he had still Authority to grant Commissions as well by Sea as by Land; and under these Commissions, came out animo hostili, as Privateers, but not animo furandi, as Pirates: That, consequently, the colourable Authority remaning in King James secur'd them from the Guilt of Piracy; more especially, since the Abdication had been never publish'd, nor so much as heard of, in France; and that in Piracy, which deserv'd ultimum supplicium, if prov'd, all Circumstances of Favour and Mitigation ought to be allow'd: That, therefore, a general Acknowledgment of a false Authority in another Country, where the Commissions were taken out, would absolve them from a felonious Intent in taking them, and, of course, from Piracy: That King James was own'd and reputed a King in France; and, therefore, in this Case, it was undoubted Law, Communis Error facit Jus. Here both the Secretary and Lord Falkland, with warmth, suggested, That his Reasons amounted to High Treason; and call'd upon him to give

A.D. 1693. his own Opinion concerning the Abdication. The Doctor reply'd, That the Queſtion was odious and enſnaring: That, perhaps, his Opinion of it was the ſame as theirs: That ſince it was voted, it bound; at leaſt in England: That, however, the Priſoners not knowing of that Vote, and being in a foreign Country, where it did not BIND, were excuſable for acting under an Authority which was there admitted, tho' it was otherwiſe here. Sir Thomas Pinfold was then aſked, What his Thoughts of the Matter were? and reply'd, That he agreed entirely with Dr. Oldys. Dr. Walker, and Dr. Newton, deſir'd Time to conſider farther of the Caſe; only the Latter ſaid, It was againſt his Conſcience to have a hand in Blood. Dr. Littleton, on the contrary, held, That King James, in Conſequence of his Abdication, was now a private Perſon: That he was not in a Condition to make War: That he had no Revenues: That he could neither ſend nor receive Embaſſadors; and, that conſequently theſe Adventurers under his pretended Authority, were not Privateers, but Pirates, and ought to be dealt with accordingly. Dr. Tindal had the Complaiſance to ſay after Dr. Littleton: And, upon the whole Matter, Dr. Oldys was remov'd from being King's Advocate; Dr. Littleton was promoted in his Room; the Priſoners, whom he had thus prejudg'd, were try'd before him; the Sentence was verify'd upon them; and ſeveral of them were executed accordingly.

and remov'd from his Place, which is given to Dr. Littleton, who hang'd the Priſoners.

Of all theſe Incidents, Advantage was taken by the Jacobites, to inveigh againſt the vindictive Spirit of the Government, and to put in Practice all the Arts which had been ſo ſucceſsfully uſed by their Adverſaries, to augment the Diſcontents and Diſaffection of the People, in order to bring about a new Revolution. But as that was the conſtant Object of all their Cares and all their Endeavours, and of courſe they were expos'd to continual Dangers, they never were more induſtrious to expoſe the Court, than when the Miniſtry lent their Countenance to Villains on record, to ſwear them out of their Lives, not for the treaſonable Practices they were actually guilty of, which the Intelligence of the Court was ſeldom good enough to diſcover, but for the Fictions imputed to them by thoſe Miſcreants, for the ſake of Pardons and Rewards. On theſe Occaſions they were ſure to excite Compaſſion on one hand, and Diſguſt on the other; and what was of ſtill more Conſequence, by proving the Charge brought againſt them in ſome Inſtances, to be mere Matter of Forgery and Subornation, they weaken'd the Credit of the Government in all, and render'd real and pretended Diſcoveries odious alike.

The Government had furniſh'd them with but too many Opportunities of this kind; Fuller had met with abundantly more Countenance than he deſerv'd; Blackhead, after his ſecond Eſcape from the Meſſenger, had not only found a Place of Refuge, but a ſufficient Proviſion in Ireland: And even Young, himſelf, though he was treated as an Impoſtor, and ſuffer'd the Penalties of the Law as ſuch, had ſome Reſources, which kept up his Spirits under his Proſecution, and made it more than ſuſpected, that the whole Secret was not diſcovered. A.D. 1693.

In the Beginning of this Year, by ſome Accident, it was diſcover'd, that blank Warrants, ready ſign'd and ſeal'd by the Secretary of State, were lodg'd in proper Hands to be fill'd up as Occaſion offer'd: And there was ſo near a Reſemblance between this Method of proceeding, and the Practices of arbitrary Courts, that it occaſion'd very ſevere Reflections, not only among the Jacobites, but all Parties whatſoever: In order therefore to ſtop the Progreſs of theſe Clamours, a Proclamation was iſſued, complaining, That Lord Nottingham's Hand and Seal had been forg'd by the Diſaffected, annulling all the ſaid Warrants, and all others, ſign'd with the old Seal, declaring, that a new one was preparing with all Speed, and offering a Reward of five hundred Pounds to any Perſon or Perſons who ſhould diſcover the Contriver of the ſaid Forgery.

And, laſtly, Whitney, the famous Highwayman, being, about the ſame time, under Sentence of Death in Newgate for his manifold Villanies, found Encouragement, as we are told, to coin a Plot, and to put in for a Pardon, on the Merits of turning Diſcoverer. The Jacobites ſay, that certain Creatures of the Court firſt prompted him to make uſe of this Expedient: But it is moſt likely, that, finding every other Avenue to Mercy ſhut againſt him, he, himſelf, had recourſe to this, as the only way left. However this may be, he was viſited in his Cell by ſome Perſons of Diſtinction; and immediately after, he charg'd the Lords Litchfield, Ayleſbury, Saliſbury, and ſome others, with having enter'd into a Treaty with him, to aſſemble his Gang and kill the King, while hunting in Epping or Windſor-Forreſt, and having offer'd him vaſt Rewards in caſe of Performance. He alſo undertook to make good this Charge, by producing another Witneſs; and, by his Means, tracing the Stream to the Fountain-Head. Whitney's Houſe was at Cheſton in Hertfordſhire; and one Dr. Thorogood, a Neighbour of his, together with one Mr. Pike, a Friend of the ſaid Doctor's, had ſometimes met Whitney in Town, and drank with him at one Burchill's, a Public Houſe in Swan Yard in the Strand: On theſe, therefore, he fix'd to be the Agents between the Lords and him; on Burchill's Houſe as the Place of Treaty, and on Burchill as a Perſon privy to what had paſs'd there. A rough Draught of all was ſent to Lord Nottingham in Writing; Whitney was immediately repriev'd; Warrants were iſſued againſt Thorogood and Pike; and a Method was taken to force Burchill into the Service, whether he would or no. One Bowes, a Dragoon, calls at his Houſe, tells him he was going to viſit Whitney, and prevails with him to do the ſame. Whitney receiv'd them as Perſons he was glad to ſee; and, in Return for the Concern which Burchill expreſs'd for ſeeing him in ſuch a Condition

A. D. 1693. dition, told him, It was in his Power, not only to save his (Whitney's) Life, but withal to be highly serviceable to himself: Burchil asking, How? Whitney reply'd, By witnessing what he knew concerning the Plot, which Thorogood, Pike, and he had fram'd at his House, to kill the King. Burchil answer'd, He could witness no such thing, because he had never heard a Syllable of any such Tendency before. Whitney then endeavour'd to bear him down, with Affertions both of the Fact, and his Knowledge of it; as also with repeated Importunities to recollect himself, accompany'd with Mountain-Promises, in case he would do so: But all proving fruitless, he, all at once, chang'd his Manner, and, with a loud and menacing Voice, loaded him with Reproaches. This was the Hint, it seems, for one Tucker, a Turnkey, to make his Appearance; who accordingly rush'd in, and not only join'd with Whitney, but justled Burchil with his Elbows, told him he would be hang'd, and his Goods confiscated, if he refus'd to be a joint Evidence with Whitney; and at last clapp'd him up a close Prisoner for three Hours; in hope that Fear would operate more effectually on him, than other Motives had hitherto done. At the End of that Term, Tucker and Bowes brought him a Paper, sign'd by Whitney, containing all the Particulars he was to swear to, and requir'd him to sign it; in which case they assur'd him, as Whitney had done before, that he should be richly rewarded. Having been thus roughly handled already, Burchil now thought it his wisest Course to submit, for fear of being handled worse, and did accordingly sign the Paper as he was requir'd. Upon this he was enlarg'd, and sweeten'd with many Compliments. The Paper so sign'd was sent away to Lord Nottingham, and by him transmitted to the Lord Chief-Justice Holt, with Directions to examine Burchil thereon. Accordingly, the same Evening, a Tipstaff was sent to bring him before his Lordship: And Bowes chose to bear him Company, not only to keep him up to his Engagements, but also to swear, that he saw him sign the Paper. This last Precaution, however, appear'd to be unnecessary; for Burchil frankly acknowledg'd his Hand: But when his Lordship proceeded to say, Then you can swear to the Contents of this Paper? He reply'd as frankly, No, my Lord; for there is not a Word of Truth in it; and then recounted the whole Story, with so much Nature and Simplicity, that his Lordship made no Difficulty to dismiss the Jobb, and to procure Whitney to be hang'd before he could meditate any farther Mischief. But though the Court-Party apply'd the whole Merit of the Lord Chief-Justice's upright Dealing to themselves, the Jacobites did not fail to observe, That if Bowes and Tucker had not been their Tools, they would have been made Examples as well as Whitney, since, in some respects, they were even more criminal than he.

Affairs of Scotland. From these nauseous Proceedings in England, we must now pass on to those of Scotland, that we may persue the Course of the War without Interruption. A. D. 1693.

We are told by the Historian of his own Times, That the Scottish Affairs had grown more and more out of joint: That such of King James's Friends as King William had put into Places of Trust and Profit, in hope to make them his own, were at the Bottom as much Jacobites as ever, and waited only for a proper Opportunity to throw off the Mask: That many Letters were intercepted between France and Scotland, in which the Easiness of engaging that Nation was often repeated, if no Time were lost: That from hence the King came to see, that he had been a little too sudden in trusting some who did not deserve his Confidence; and that in order to bring the Kingdom into a better State, an Accommodation was made with the Presbyterians, who were also prevail'd upon, in Consideration thereof, to shew some Mercy to the Episcopal Clergy. It is in this compendious manner his Lordship chuses to treat of the Politics of the Court, with regard to Scotland: But the Truth of the Matter is, That a Session of Parliament was now become as necessary in that Kingdom, as in this; and it was utterly impossible to hold one, without gratifying the Presbyterians, of whom the House was principally compos'd; the same Reasons which had formerly prevented a new Election, being still as cogent as ever. We are therefore to understand, that the same secret Management which had operated so successfully on this Side of the Tweed, was also extended to the other: It is a known Fact, that, to humour the Kirk-Party, two of their Leaders were put into the Posts of King's Advocate, and Lord Justice Clerk: That the Correspondence which had been discover'd with France, was such as would ever be kept up, as long as there was a disaffected Party in the Island: That the great Use made of the Discovery, was to disgrace and over-awe the Jacobites; and that the Duke of Hamilton was once more made King's Commissioner, at once to reconcile him to the Government, and to soften all his Followers.

The King's Letter to the Parliament. Upon the 18th of April the Session was open'd; and in the Preamble to the King's Letter, his Majesty not only affirms, That, ever since his coming to the Crown, he had been firmly resolv'd to hold a Parliament in that his ancient Kingdom, in Person, but that he persisted still in the same Resolution, and would not give it over, hoping to find a favourable Opportunity for persuing it, since it appear'd to him so necessary for the full Settlement of his said Kingdom. His Majesty, in the same Paragraph also suggested, That nothing but his necessary Presence abroad, during the time of Action, or in England during the Sitting of his Parliament there, had hitherto hinder'd his Purpose: And having made this Offering to the natural Haaughtiness of the Scottish People, gave them farther to understand, That they were to look on his calling them together, while he himself was absent from Britain, as a

A. D. 1693. Proof of the entire Confidence which he plac'd in their Affection to him and his Government: As alſo, that he had fully inſtructed his Commiſſioner in all things that ſeem'd to him (the King) neceſſary to be done at that Juncture for the Support of the Government, and the Safety of the People; reſerving what was omitted, and would admit of Delay to his own Preſence amongſt them. His Majeſty then perſuades himſelf, That they would heartily concur in ſecuring the Nation againſt the Deſigns of bad Men at home, and of Enemies abroad, and in whatever elſe his ſaid Commiſſioner ſhould propoſe to them in his Name, for the common Intereſt of King and People: In order to which, in a particular manner, he recommended Moderation and Unanimity to them, eſpecially in Church-Matters, and that they would provide proper and healing Remedies for the Diſorders which thoſe Matters had occaſion'd. And, laſtly, he moreover recommended to them Diſpatch, and that they would employ the time allotted them in doing what was moſt neceſſary, and in ſhunning ſuch Matters of Debate as would require the conſulting of him, which the Diſtance between them would not allow time for.

The Lord Commiſſioner and Lord Chancellor's Speeches.

This was the Subſtance of his Majeſty's Compliment; and as to the Speech of the Commiſſioner, it conſiſted but of three ſhort Paragraphs: In the firſt, he aſſur'd the Houſe, That his Majeſty was firmly reſolv'd to ſupport the preſent Eſtabliſhment both in Church and State: In the ſecond he infer'd, from the Dangers and Fears they had been in, a Year before, of an Invaſion, the Expediency of putting the Nation in a better Condition, againſt the worſt Events: And in his third and laſt, as a proper Return to his Majeſty for granting them a Seſſion, he beſought them, to begin with thoſe things that were moſt neceſſary for the King's Service and their own Security; which he judg'd to be the giving Supplies of Money, and the putting of the Kingdom in a Poſture of Defence.

The Ceremonial of the Day was cloſ'd by the Lord Chancellor, Tweedale, who not only enlarg'd on the ſame Points already touch'd upon in the King's Letter and the Speech of his Subſtitute, but contended for ſuch new Laws as might ſtrengthen the Authority of the Government, and recover their almoſt ruin'd Trade. He alſo urg'd the Neceſſity of a competent additional Force for the Security of the Nation and a ſuitable Fund to maintain them. And again, recurring to the Re-eſtabliſhment of their Commerce, he yet farther call'd upon them to provide Men of War to ſerve for Convoys, and alſo to cover their Coaſts: And he concluded his Harangue in theſe Words: "If you ſet about theſe things vigorouſly and cordially, his Majeſty will put a juſt Value upon your Actings, as a grateful Acknowledgment of what he hath done for us, and a ſuitable Return to the Care he hath of us; and, by the Bleſſing of God, this Parliament will prove a healing and a happy Parliament."

And a healing Parliament it prov'd: For A. D. 1693. ſuch was the Effect of the ſecret Management, that the very Men who had broke up in ſuch a Flame, who had follow'd his Majeſty with their Remonſtrances into England, and who had not been ſuffer'd to meet during ſo long an Interval, for fear of their Reſentment, appear'd to be now in the moſt conformable Diſpoſition imaginable; and, inſtead of inſiſting on their former Demands, did not ſo much as put his Majeſty in mind of them, or of any one Clauſe in their boaſted Inſtrument of Government, which he had left unfulfill'd. On the contrary, in their Anſwer to the Royal Letter, which was approv'd, Nemine Contradicente, they content themſelves with laying hold on the Hopes which his Majeſty had given them, of honouring his ancient Kingdom with his Preſence, with acknowledging his Majeſty's Goodneſs in calling them together ſo ſeaſonably, expreſſing their Satisfaction in the Choice he had made of a Commiſſioner, and promiſing to concur with his Grace in whatever ſhould be found neceſſary for the Peace of the Kingdom, and that with ſuch Calmneſs and Diſpatch, as ſhould evidence to the whole World their Perſuaſion, that, next to the Favour of God Almighty, the Subjects of that Kingdom depended wholly on the Stability of the preſent Settlement; and how deeply ſenſibly they were of the great Duty which they ow'd to his Majeſty, as their Deliverer, as well as their dread Sovereign.

The Parliament's Anſwer to the King's Letter.

But if theſe Profeſſions were acceptable at Court, their Actions were more ſo; for on the very firſt Day that the Committee for conſidering of the Security of the Nation met, they reſolv'd, That for the Defence of the Kingdom, it was neceſſary that four new Regiments of Foot and two of Dragoons ſhould be added to the Standing Forces of the Kingdom; and that for maintaining the ſame, and defraying the other Charges of Government, a Supply ſhould be given to their Majeſties of a hundred and fourteen thouſand Pounds Sterling: And when they made their Report, three Days after, it was approv'd by the Houſe, Nemine Contradicente. Proceeding in the next Place to Ways and Means, they farther agreed, that forty-five thouſand Pounds Sterling ſhould be raiſ'd by an additional Tax upon Malt, to be raiſ'd quarterly: That ſixty-three thouſand Pounds ſhould be raiſ'd by ten and a Half Month's Ceſs, over and above the ſeven and a Half Months which ſtill remain'd to be paid of the former Ceſs: And they reſolv'd to raiſe forty-five thouſand Pounds more, by a Poll-Tax. All which ſeveral Sums, it was given out, were to maintain ſix thouſand three hundred Men till Martinmaſs, 1694, to fill the Magazines with Arms and Proviſions, and ſatisfy the Country for their Arrears. His Majeſty, having alſo requir'd the Privy Council to levy Seamen for the Service of his Navy, and their Lordſhips having iſſu'd their Orders accordingly, for the levying every fourth Man in the Ports, which had furniſh'd none laſt Year, and every eighth Man

Upon which it was resolv'd, That the Lord-Clerk-Register should bring in an Act for that purpose; which was done accordingly, and pass'd into a Law: And that the Government might have all the Assistance in their Power to give it, they moreover appointed a monthly Fast to be kept, for the Preservation of their Majesty's Persons and the happy Success of their Arms. The same Day a Report having been made by the Committee of Electors of such Commissioners of Shires and Boroughs as had absented themselves, ever since the Meeting of Estates was converted into a Parliament, it was resolv'd, that all the said Absentees should be fin'd, conformable to an Act formerly pass'd for that Purpose; as also, that the said Shires and Burghs should be order'd to elect new Commissioners in their steads: And whereas the Heritors of the Shire of Forfar had refus'd to elect any Commissioners at all, an Order was made for their appearing before the House, to answer for their Disobedience. Such Noblemen as had not attended the Service of Parliament, and were not prepar'd with a sufficient Excuse, were fin'd; and, lastly, such Commissioners as refus'd to take the Assurance, were not only fin'd in like manner, but, as in the Case of the Absentees, their Seats were vacated, and the Shires and Boroughs they represented, were order'd to make a new Choice.

The Report of the Committee of Secrecy with respect to the Designs of the Jacobites.

While these things were transacting, the Committee who had made such Dispatch in providing for the Security of the Nation, made their Report concerning the Danger it had been expos'd to; which was to this Effect, viz. 1. That it appear'd by sufficient Proofs, that a Design had been, and still was, carrying on, both there and in France, for invading the Kingdom with a foreign Force: That Correspondences had been esthablish'd, Concerts had been form'd, and Assurances had been given both abroad and at home, for effectuating such a Design, which had lately proceeded so far, that Declarations had been actually prepar'd: That the raising of Men, and the naming of Officers to command them, had been resolv'd on; and that Reconciliations had been made among the different Parties of the Disaffected. 2. That the Proofs were plain, that the late King James's Interest had been at the Bottom of the late Debates concerning the Elections of Edinburgh: And that it appear'd he had been desir'd to interpose his Authority by Letters from that Kingdom. Several Letters and Papers were read to the House, as the Grounds of their Report, which were explan'd by those who made it; and then the Question being put, Whether the Report, as brought in, should be approv'd or not, it was carry'd in the Affirmative. A. D. 1693.

The Proofs of those Designs from Letters, &c.

The Letters, &c. thus read, were those which Burnet says were intercepted, and which, according to him, treated of the Easiness of recovering Scotland, in case no Time was lost. They were afterwards printed at Edinburgh, by Authority (together with the Explanations made in Parliament by Mr. Secretary Johnston, who was the great Factor for the Court at this Crisis) and re-printed at London, and are still extant. The first three of them only prove, That the Jacobites had some secret Designs on foot, and kept up a secret Correspondente, in order to carry it on: But in the Letter C, which is writ by Nevil Payne (who was now lodg'd in the Tolbooth in Edinburgh, in order to be brought to a Trial, as it was given out) and in that mark'd E, by another Hand, there are manifest Traces of a Concert; but of what nature, by whom manag'd, or where, or when it was to operate, we have not sufficient Authority to determine. Payne, after speaking of the Reconciliations mention'd in the Report, makes use of these Expressions: "And now (December 3) I assure you all things here are in perfect Order for bringing on the (w) Trial as speedily as your (x) Brother pleases, and the sooner the better, I am sure; for his (y) Adversary is very diligent in searching out new (z) Agents that are like to be more able and faithful to him, than those he has hitherto employ'd; and I assure you succeeds extremly in his Design, and has, in a manner, incited all the (a) Mechanics by this Means, to be entirely his; so the Cause may grow worse, but cannot mend by Delay of the Trial." And again, "In the mean time, care must be had, that his (b) Letters of Attorney be fairly and fully drawn, as methinks is easy to be done: And I would have sent a Draught as I told you in my last, but that I cannot with all my Diligence procure a Copy of the last, to make a true Judgment, why it is so universally cry'd out upon by those of the Creditors who have seen it." In Letter E, the Reconciliation is also touch'd upon, and then the Writer proceeds in the following Words: "I thank God, your Estate in these Parts is in very good Condition, and the Generality of all that have Stock, or dare any way venture, are resolv'd to join you; so that Trade is in a fair way of succeeding here. I have now at this time (December 25) a Messenger with James Balfour (i. e. Payne) after whose Return I shall make little Stay in those Parts: You shall know by me what you may rely on, where the Money shall be rais'd, and who the chief Paymasters; which is all I can do." The Secretary himself adds, That Intelligence having been receiv'd, That one Captain Maire was going to England upon some unaccountable Design, four Officers were privately order'd

A. D. 1693. order'd to ſeize and ſearch him for Letters, which they did accordingly on the 26th of December; but finding only one Letter about him which ſeem'd to relate only to Trade, they neither detain'd him nor it: That, however, it was plain, that this was the Anſwer which the Writer of Letter E expected from Balfour, and which was to be forwarded to Melfort; becauſe the Officers recollected it was ſign'd Balfour, and directed to Mr. Gray, which was the Name ſubſcrib'd to Letter D; and both D and E, were writ in the ſame Hand: That Payne himſelf confeſs'd in Confidence to one, whoſe Office, as well as Allegiance, oblig'd him to a Diſcovery, that an Invaſion was deſign'd: That King James had his Officers ready both in England and Scotland; and that the Attempt would be certainly made ſome time in the Spring, and, poſſibly, ſooner than was apprehended: And, laſtly, That it could be made appear by other Proofs, that a Deſign was actually carrying on in the North this Winter: That one was ſent from King James to carry on that Deſign: That his Inſtructions were concerted by the Miniſters of both Courts, Verſailles and St. Germains: That Lord Melfort was the original Procurer of theſe Inſtructions: That the Nature of the Deſign, and the Character of the Perſon employ'd, were equally bad: That the ſaid Perſon did actually come into the North: That he return'd to London in the Spring; and, in all Probability, he was the ſame Perſon who ſign'd himſelf Gray, and who brought about the Reconciliations.

This is the Sum of the Secretary's Evidence; and how confidently ſoever the two Undertakers, Payne, a cloſe Priſoner, and Gray, the itinerant Factor for the Party, had diſcours'd of the Diſpoſition of King James's Friends, &c. it was utterly unimaginable, that a Kingdom ſhould be ſhaken by ſuch feeble Endeavours; and the Event ſhew'd, that thoſe who could place any Dependence on ſuch a ſlimſey Project, were rather in a Condition to excite Pity, than Terror, in their Enemies.

As to the plain Proofs, that King James's Intereſt had been at the Bottom of the late Struggles in relation to the Magiſtracy of Edinburgh, the only Paſſage in the Letters which ſeems to regard that Affair, is in that of Payne, above quoted, and which runs in the following Words: "This (meaning the extraordinary Zeal of one Mrs. Smith in the Service of King James) makes me beg, that ſince there is the Clerk of the Town ſhe lives in (Edinburgh) is newly dead, the Place (which we are told, was one of the moſt beneficial in that Kingdom) may be procur'd for her Huſband or Son; a Line from your Brother (King James) doth it, and I am very ſure it is impoſſible for him to employ his Pen more deſervedly." But theſe Struggles did not relate to the Town Clerk's Place only; the whole Body of the Magiſtracy had been chang'd at Michaelmas, by the Interpoſition of the Court, but with ſuch irregular Circumſtances, that the oppoſing Party, who had the Letter of the Law in their Favour, procur'd them to be ejected, and A. D. 1693. another Set to be inſtated in their Room; which was no ſooner done, than they alſo were ejected in their Turn, by Order of the Council; and by the ſame Authority the Former were reſtor'd, and continu'd to act, in ſpite of all Oppoſition. This drew on an Appeal by Petition, to his Grace the Commiſſioner: A Hearing was granted; and, upon the Iſſue, the ſaid Order of Council was not only confirm'd, but thoſe in Poſſeſſion were reſtor'd to all the Rights of their Office from the time of their Election; and the Sentence paſs'd againſt them was reſcinded and made void.

Thus it appears, that, however plain the Proofs were, they were not ſo full as might have been expected: But, as uſual on the like Occaſions, theſe Diſcoveries were thought ſufficient to warrant all manner of Severities againſt the ſuffering Party; for, over and above the Fines and Expulſions already mention'd, Order was given for putting the Earl of Seaforth and Mr. Cromſtal on their Trials; and ſuch Perſons as were under Bail, and refus'd to take the Oath, namely, the Earl of Hume, the Lords Drumcairn, Oxenford and Stormouth, were impriſon'd; the Several Lords committed. two firſt in the Caſtle of Edinburgh, and the two others in that of Stirling: And an Act was brought in and paſs'd, by which it was made Treaſon for any Subject of that Kingdom to go to France after the firſt of June, or to ſtay there after the firſt of Auguſt, without Leave from the King or Council; as alſo, to make all Correſpondence or Commerce by Letters with any in France, without the Authority before mention'd, likewiſe Treaſon. Nevil Payne, ſo often mention'd, was alſo threaten'd with Trial; and, according to Biſhop Burnet, there was full Evidence againſt him in his own Letters; but, ſurely, not without the Help of Innendos; and, as formerly ſuggeſted, he made a ſhift to ward off the Danger, by threatning alſo in his Turn to involve all thoſe who had made their Peace with the Government in his Ruin, who were ſo numerous and ſo conſiderable, that it was thought expedient to ſpare him for their Sakes.

And now, by way of Sweetener, the Committee of Security, by the Recommendation of the Commiſſioner, brought in an Act for the Comprehenſion of ſuch of the Epiſcopal Clergy as ſubmitted to take the Oaths by the 10th of July; of which, the following Account is given by the Hiſtorian of his own Times: "The Matters of the Church were brought to more Temper than was expected; the Epiſcopal Clergy had more moderate Terms offer'd them; they were only requir'd to make an Addreſs to the General Aſſembly, offering to ſubſcribe to a Confeſſion of Faith, and to acknowledge Preſbytery to be the only Government of that Church, with a Promiſe to ſubmit to it: Upon which, within a Fortnight after, they did that, if no Matter of Scandal was objected to them, the Aſſembly was either to receive them into the Government of the Church; or, if they could not be brought to that, the King was to take them into his Protection, and maintain tain them in their Churches, without any Dependence on the Presbytery. This was a Strain of Moderation that the Presbyterians were not easily brought to; a Subscription that own'd Presbytery to be the only legal Government of that Church, without owning any Divine Right in it, was far below their usual Pretensions. And this Act vested the King with an Authority very like that which they were wont to condemn as Erastianism. Another Act was also pass'd, requiring all in any Office in Church or State, to take, besides the Oath of Allegiance, a Declaration, call'd, The Assurance, owning the King and Queen to be their rightful and lawful Sovereigns, and promising Fidelity to them against King James, and all his Adherents. The Council was also impower'd to tender these, as they should see Cause for it, and to fine and imprison such as should refuse them."

The Bishop also adds, That the Session ended calmly: But how should it do otherwise, when the King had found Means to recover the whole Presbyterian Party, and they had found Means to subdue all their Adversaries? And for his Majesty's Conduct to the Scots afterwards, it is thus freely and justly treated by the same Author, in the following Words: "But the King seem'd to have forgot Scotland so entirely, that he let three Months go over before he took Notice of any of their Petitions: And tho' he had ask'd, and had Supplies, for an Augmentation of Forces, and many had been gain'd to consent to the Tax by the Hope of Commissions in the Troops that were to be levied, yet the King did not raise any new ones, but mis'd the Supply, and apply'd it to other Uses. This began to raise an ill Humour that had been almost quite laid down in the whole Course of this Session, which was thought a reconciling one. The Clergy let the Day prefix'd for making their Submission to the Assembly, slip, and did not take the Oaths; so they could claim no Benefit by the Act that had been carry'd in their Favour, not without some Difficulty: And the Law that was intended to save them, did now expose them to Ruin, since by it they, not taking the Oaths, had lost their legal Rights to their Benefices: Yet they were suffer'd to continue in them, and were put in hope, that the King would protect them, though it was now against Law. They were also made to believe, that the King did not desire that they should take the Oaths, or make any Submission to Presbytery: And it is certain, that no public Signification of the King's Mind was made to them; so they were easily impos'd on by Surmizes and Whispers. Upon this the Distractions grew up a-fresh: Many concluded there, as well as in England, that the King's Heart led him still to court his Enemies, even after all the manifest Reasons he had to conclude, that the Steps they made towards him were only feign'd Submissions to gain such a Confidence, as might put it in their Power to deliver him up."

A. D. 1693. Foreign Affairs.

We are now at Liberty to pass over to the Continent, and persue the Course of those Affairs which are most apt to excite the Attention of an English Reader, tho' they are the most ruinous to the Interest of England: But before we can attend his Majesty to Holland, and from thence to the Army, it will be necessary to touch on some of the French Exploits during the Winter; for Winter itself could not put a stop to their Enterprizes, tho' it retarded their Successes.

Attempt on Rhinfelt by Tallard.

And first, on the Side of Germany, Count Tallard had Orders, as it's said, not to besiege, but to take Possession of Rhinfelt and the little City of St. Goar connected with it, situated on this Side of the Rhine, about six Leagues from Coblentz, and ten from Mentz; a Place considerable only for the Castle of Rhinfelt, which stands on the Top of a Hill like a Sugar Loaf, and the Fort of Kats, which cover'd it on the other Side of the River. On the 16th of December, the Place was invested with eighteen Battalions of Foot, ten Squadrons of Horse, and twenty Pieces of Cannon. The Trenches were open'd the next Day; on the 21st the Batteries began to play, and between that and the 30th, the Besiegers attack'd the Counterscarp three several times with the utmost Vigour, of which they were once Masters; but before they had time to make a Lodgment or throw up any Works for their Security, they were forc'd to abandon it, by the redoubled Efforts of the Garison, under the excellent Conduct of the Governor de Gertz. The Landtgrave of Hesse had opportunely thrown five Regiments into the Town in this Interval; and, having collected together all his Horse, as also having been re-inforc'd with two thousand more of Brandenburgh and Neuburgh, on the 31st he pass'd the Rhine at Coblentz, and oblig'd those of the Enemy posted at Buckolts to cover the Siege, under the Command of General St. Fremont, to dislodge: Whereupon the Besiegers, in a Pannic, gave over their Attempt; and on the first of January, at Night, broke up their Camp, set it on fire behind them, and march'd off with Precipitation: Notwithstanding which, the Nature of the Ground was such, that the Landtgrave, who had nothing but Horse under his Command, could take no Advantage of this Disorder.

Another on Huy by Mr. de Boufflers.

About the same time, three several Bodies of French, consisting in all of between sixteen and eighteen thousand Men, under the Command of Mr. de Boufflers, invested Huy, and made a Feint of reducing the Place: But after the Alarm had taken, and the Confederates were in Motion to relieve it, broke up their Camp, exchang'd their Prisoners, and retreated towards Namur; having first in vain endeavour'd to raise a Commotion in Liege, and establish'd a Correspondence with the Mutineers, by whose Assistance they hop'd to have got Possession of the Place; for the Prince-Bishop having procur'd Intelligence of their Conspiracy, obtain'd a Re-inforcement from Maestricht time

A.D. 1695. time enough to defeat it, and secur'd his own Authority by disarming and confining the Ringleaders.

While the Noise of these Attempts was yet ringing in the Ears of the Confederates, the same Mr. de Beauffiers who had try'd these Practices on Huy and Liege, put himself at the Head of another large Body of French, consisting of forty-four Battalions, and Cavalry in Proportion; and on the fifth of January invested Furnes, which, together with Dixmuyde, had been reduc'd by the Duke of Leinster and the English Forces in the Close of the Year, and had been since strengthened with several additional Works. The very Day that he came before the Place, he cut off its Communication with Newport, the same Night he caus'd his Trenches to be open'd, and the next Day he summon'd Count Horn, the Dutch Governor, to surrender; which he did in a few Hours, without firing a Gun; and the Garison were conducted to Newport: In consequence of which, Dixmuyde was abandon'd: And thus the whole Fruit of our late expensive Expedition was thrown away at a single Cast.

Count Horn's Conduct arraign'd on that Occasion.

The Clamours of the English against the Dutch grew upon this Occasion ten times louder and fiercer than ever; and Count Horn, in particular, was so severely attack'd, that he found himself under a Necessity to take all the Methods in his Power for his Justification. Accordingly, a Letter which he had receiv'd from the Elector of Bavaria was made public; and that again was supported by the Unanimous Opinion of the Council of War, which he call'd to deliberate on the French Summons, and the said Letter of his Electoral Highness. The Former was to this Effect: "That from the Posts which the Enemy had taken, it was reasonable to think they would besiege Furnes: That his Troops were come up; and, if possible he would make an Attempt to relieve him: That, however, as the said Posts were well known to him (the Governor) and as the French began to fortify themselves, he was at Liberty to do what he thought convenient, without staying till the last Extremity, since the Preservation of the Garison was of more Consequence than the Preservation of the Place, &c." And as to the Latter it turn'd on the following Considerations, viz. That seeing the Enemy had drain'd away all the Water on the North Side of the Town, in which its principal Strength consisted: That they had advanc'd their Trenches to the Moat, in which there was little Water: That the Rampart had no Flanks, and being besides of new Earth, could not be expected to withstand the Batteries of the Enemy: That the Attack towards the Canal of Dunkirk was advanc'd within a hundred Paces of the Moat: That the Attack on the Newport Side was advanc'd within fifty Paces of the said Moat: That through the Defect of Cannon, the Enemy had Liberty to post themselves where they pleas'd: That the Garison was too weak and sickly to defend Works of such Extent: And that the Inundation which they were promis'd from Newport did not take Effect, it was resolv'd to capitulate without Delay, and a Parley was beat accordingly. To all this, some after Thoughts of the Governor and his Officers were also added, in a Letter from the Governor to the States; namely, That the Works were not only slight, because new, but because of the great Rains which had lately fallen, and which had much weaken'd them: That the Enemy had no less than twelve Pieces of Cannon and fourteen Mortars on one Battery: And, lastly, that the chief Blame was to be laid on the People of Newport, who refus'd to make the great Inundation, as they were desir'd, and whose Conduct on this Occasion, they urg'd, ought to be examin'd into, for the Prevention of the like Mischief for the future. The military Reader will be the best Judge of the general Force of these Allegations: But if that particular one relating to the Inhabitants of Newport, on which so much Stress is laid, is Matter of Fact, it follows, that what is said in the London-Gazette (No. 2834) to excuse the Elector of Bavaria for not making any Attempt to relieve the Place, is not so. For it is there said, That his Electoral Highness being come to Newport on the first, with a Design to draw the Troops out of the Garisons on that Side, found the Attempt impracticable, by reason the Governor of Newport had open'd the Sluices, and put all the Country round under Water. It is added, that he urg'd this very Circumstance in his Letter to Count Horn, tho' the Letter itself bears Witness to the contrary. And in another Paragraph in the same Paper, it is again suggested, That Count Horn himself was induc'd to surrender the Place, because of the manifest Impossibility of its being succour'd; the whole Country being so overflow'd, that the Elector, who had drawn his Troops together, could not come near it. Upon the whole we are told, that the King was so dissatisfy'd with Count Horn, that he never cast an Eye of Favour on him more: And this we are to look upon as a sufficient Recompence to the People of England, for having been at so vast an Expence to so little Purpose.

His Defence.

A.D. 1695.

Before we proceed any farther either with the Measures of the Cabinet, or the Operations of the Field, it is proper to inform Posterity, that the Opening of this Year was sadden'd with one of the most calamitous Visitations that ever astonish'd the World; for though Malta and Sicily were the only Sufferers, so tremendous was the Shock, so vast the Destruction, that the Universe seem'd to be affected, and all Men apprehended, that no Part could be so miserably convuls'd, without endangering the Whole.

A dreadful Earthquake in Malta and Sicily.

In the Beginning of January both those Islands were alarm'd with repeated Earthquakes; every one of which would have been esteem'd sufficiently terrible, if the last had not, in a manner, effac'd the Remembrance

A. D. 1695. brance of the Former. On the ninth, about ten at Night, ſo great was the Agitation, that it was believ'd no worſe could happen; and when it ceas'd, that the Danger was over: But this prov'd no more than a Prelude to another Paroxyſm; on the 11th, at three in the Afternoon, which in Malta ſhook every Houſe, Church, and Edifice of every kind to their very Foundations, half-ruin'd many, damag'd all, and even threw down a Mountain; by the fall of which, the Grand Maſter and his Train, who happen'd to be then hunting on the Skirts of it, had like to have been cruſh'd to Pieces. But what Malta fear'd, bore no Compariſon to what Sicily at the ſame Inſtant felt: There, nothing was wanting but the Trumpet of the Archangel and the Appearance of the Judge in the Clouds, to denote the grand Cataſtrophe of all things: Mount Etna roar'd to the very Center: The whole Globe ſeem'd to diſſolve: Villages, Towns, and Cities, with all their miſerable Inhabitants, diſappear'd like Bubbles: The Air was not only chok'd with the Duſt ariſing from ſo general a Ruin, but at the ſame time all on fire with continual Lightnings, and rent with continual Thunders: The Sea left the Shore for above two Miles together, and then roſe in Heaps, and threatned to overwhelm the Earth. All the Elements were thus at war; and the diſtracted Sicilians, who ſaw themſelves beſet with Deſtruction on every Side, in Deſpair concluded, That Providence itſelf had deſerted its Charge.

Between thirty and forty Towns and Cities, together with a vaſt Extent of Country, was involv'd in this amazing Calamity: And of theſe the far greater Part were wholly ſwallow'd up. In Auguſta, while the Horror of the Earthquake was at full, four hundred Barrels of Gunpowder were fir'd by the Lightning, and, together with the Caſtle, blew up above a thouſand Perſons who had taken Sanctuary there, as the Place of moſt Security; beſides whom, full four thouſand more periſh'd in the Ruins of the Town. In Minieo, three thouſand were kill'd; in Sentini as many more; in Vizzini as many more; in Siragoſſo ſix thouſand; in Raguſa ſeven thouſand; in Sciateilo eight thouſand; and in Catanea, which ſunk down at once, with as much Noiſe, as if the whole Fabric of the Earth had rent aſunder, eighteen thouſand. In all, between ſeventy and eighty thouſand Perſons.

Conduct of the Switzers complain'd of by the Confederates.

To return; one of the important Affairs left depending laſt Year, and which drew the Attention of the Public at the Beginning of this, was the Conteſt which ſubſiſted between the Confederates, more eſpecially, the Emperor and King of Spain, and the Swiſs Cantons. By the Treaty of Milan, the ſaid Cantons oblig'd themſelves to obſerve a ſtrict Neutrality; and that ſuch Troops of theirs as were in the French Service ſhould be employ'd only for the Defence of thoſe Counties and Places as France ſtood poſſeſs'd of in the Year 1663; in Conſideration of which, the ſaid Princes had paid them all their Arrears, had given them a double Penſion, and allow'd them other very great Advantages; notwithſtanding which, the ſaid Cantons, in Violation of the ſaid Treaty, had ſuffer'd the French not only to recruit, but to augment their Corps, and to employ them offenſively againſt the Confederates, as appear'd moſt notoriouſly and undeniably, at the Battle of Steinkirk and the Siege of Namur, in which were employ'd no leſs than twenty-five Battalions. Of this Infraction the Imperial and Spaniſh Miniſters had complan'd very freely, and not receiving the deſir'd Satisfaction, their Principals had farther ſhew'd their Reſentment, not only by ſtopping the ſaid Penſion, but by cutting off all Communication with their Dominions, and, in particular, by prohibiting the uſual Supplies of Corn which the Switzers had from thence, and which, upon account of the Dearth then raging in France, were more neceſſary to them than ever. But neither had this any better Effect: On the contrary, buoy'd up by the Promiſes of France, and the real Advantages they deriv'd from that Crown, they gave the Auſtrian Miniſters to underſtand, That they would not have their Hands tied up: Upon which thoſe Miniſters reply'd in their Maſters Names, That neither would they have their Hands ty'd up: But withal ſignify'd, by way of Sweetener, That, in caſe they would yet alter their Meaſures, and do Juſtice to the Confederates, all things ſhould be reſtor'd to their ancient Footing. The Affair came at laſt to be diſcuſs'd in a general Diet held at Baden, but ſtill with no better Succeſs than before; for though an Expedient was propos'd, it ſatisfy'd neither Party; and the Aſſembly broke up without coming to any Determination. This the Confederates underſtood to be a downright Refuſal of their Suit, and complain'd of it accordingly in a circular Memorial: But, nevertheleſs, in Conſideration of the Proteſtant Cantons, and ſome few of the Catholics, who declar'd in the Diet for a ſtrict Obſervation of the Neutrality as requir'd, as alſo, perhaps, of the Engagements which ſome of them had enter'd into, to hinder the War from approaching too near their Territories, the Prohibition was taken off their Commerce, and they were allow'd to ſupply themſelves with Corn, as before.

A. D. 1693.

The Emperor and the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh reconcil'd.

It is out of all Doubt that this manifeſt Inclination of the Cantons to favour the Views and Intereſts of France, was a very ſenſible Mortification to the Confederates: But on the other hand, to ballance the Chagrin which they felt on this Occaſion, Ways and Means were found out to reconcile the Emperor to the two potent Electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh; and in Conſequence of which, the Latter once more engag'd to furniſh ſix thouſand of his Troops for the Service of Hungary; and the Former to ſend twelve thouſand to the Upper Rhine. The Princes of Lunenburgh were alſo prevail'd with to recruit the Corps which they had ſent thither the preceding Year, and to continue their Complement both in Flanders and the Empire. The

Elector

A. D. 1693. Further Proceedings in relation to the ninth Electorate.

Elector of Hanover indeed was ſcarce in Poſſeſſion of his new Dignity, and therefore ſtood in need of all the Helps which the two Courts of London and Vienna could give him, to remove the Difficulties which remain'd, and which were far from being inconſiderable, out of his way. The three Electors of Triers, Cologne, and Palatine, the King of Sweden, as Duke of Bremen, and the Archbiſhop of Saltzburgh had not declar'd themſelves; and many other Princes had proteſted againſt it, as equally a Violation of the Emperor's Coronation-Oath, and of the Golden-Bull. France had, moreover, an Emiſſary (Mr. le Noble) in the Empire, to feed the Flame of Oppoſition; and, in particular, offer'd a Neutrality, as it was ſaid, to all thoſe who reſolv'd to perſevere in it. And in the Inſtructions of Mr. d'Avaux, who was ſent early this Year to the Court of Sweden, and thoſe of Mr. Bonrepos to that of Denmark, to embark thoſe two Crowns, if poſſible, in the Meaſures of France, the Princes of Lunenburgh were not forgot: They were conſider'd at Verſailles as Deſerters from the French Intereſt; and it would have been held a Reproach to the Grandeur of that Monarchy, if they had not felt the Marks of its Reſentment.

On the other hand, in Conſideration of the preſent Importance of that Houſe to the Confederacy, the Emperor condeſcended to diſpatch the Baron d'Eck, in the Capacity of Envoy to the ſaid three Electors, to acquaint them with his Reaſons for having rais'd the Duke of Hanover to the Electoral Dignity, and to ſollicit their Acquieſcence. The ſame Affair was alſo one of the great Points that employ'd the Diet at Ratiſbonne; and tho' the Elector of Cologne, the Archbiſhop of Saltzburgh, and the King of Sweden, were induc'd, not only to yield to the Inſtances of his Imperial Majeſty, but to congratulate the new Elector in Form upon his Promotion; many of the reſt adher'd to their former Sentiments, and even with ſo much Heat, as almoſt ſeem'd to endanger the Peace of the Empire.

The Congreſs of Cologne.

In the mean while, as a ſort of perpetual Congreſs was held at the Hague, of the Miniſters of the Confederate Princes, ſo an occaſional one was now held at Cologne, to adjuſt, if poſſible, the interfering Views of the German Princes, and expedite the opening of the Campaign. This was compos'd of the Miniſters of the Emperor, Great Britain, Treves, Cologne, Saxony, Brandenburgh, Bavaria, Palatine, Heſſe, Munſter, &c. aſſiſted by ſeveral General Officers: And it was given out, that the Objects of their Deliberations, were not only to provide for the Security of the Frontier, both on the Upper and the Lower Rhine, and to eſtabliſh the neceſſary Magazines, but to aſſemble ſuch a Force ſo early in the Spring, that the Confederates might have it in their Power to prevent the Deſigns of the Enemy, and turn Invaders themſelves: But the Matter of moſt Difficulty was to adjuſt the Point of Command: The Electory of Saxony had come to a Reſolution to take the Field in Perſon, and to put in ſuch a Claime as, both in Complement to his Rank, and the Strength he was to furniſh, could hardly be ſet aſide. The two Rival Generals of laſt Year, namely, the Landtgrave of Heſſe, and the Prince of Barreith, alſo renew'd their Pretenſions: And, on the other hand, the aſſociated Circles offer'd to augment their Quotas both of Men and Money, very conſiderably, in caſe the Imperial Court could be prevail'd on to recall the Prince of Baden from Hungary, and to procure him the Poſt of Honour on the Upper Rhine.

Diſputes about the Command.

It is eaſy to imagine that ſo many different Factions created a Ferment that was not over favourable to the Common Cauſe: And as none of thoſe who form'd the Aſſembly had Credit enough to ſubdue it, all that remain'd was to adopt ſuch an Expedient as ſerv'd to gain time, and thereby to prevent a Breach. Accordingly, Advantage was taken of the Propoſal made by the Circles to tranſfer the Affair to Vienna: And having provided for the Security of Coblentz, and taken ſuch other Meaſures as theſe Diſtractions could admit of, the Aſſembly broke up.

A. D. 1694.

The Pope ſolicits a Peace between the Emperor and France.

As to the Imperial Court, it appear'd to be animated with a more active Spirit than ordinary: The Pope, now entirely won over to the Intereſt of France, but pretending a fatherly Concern for the bleeding Condition of the Chriſtian World, had again importun'd his Imperial Majeſty to clap up a Peace with France, in order to drive the Turks out of Europe; which, according to him, there was now the faireſt Opportunity imaginable for, and towards which, he himſelf offer'd to contribute largely; had remonſtrated how ineffectual the Operations of the Confederates had hitherto prov'd; how much they had loſt by their Experiment; how unlikely it was, that while their Church was ſo divided, their Views ſo different, their Reſolutions ſo tardy, their Performances ſo defective, they ſhould have any better Succeſs: And, laſtly, had urged, that, for all theſe Conſiderations, and, alſo, becauſe the French Court were ſo cordially inclin'd to Peace, that they had offer'd him (the Pope) Carte Blanch for the Terms, it was alike the Intereſt of his Imperial Majeſty, Spain and Savoy, to accept of his Mediation, to ſheath the Sword without Delay, and, in Effect, to leave the Maritime Powers to ſhift for themſelves. To all which, his Imperial Majeſty had, in Subſtance, reply'd, That as the notorious Ambition of France, the Acquiſitions ſhe had made, and the Purpoſes ſhe avow'd, had brought on the War, ſo the Superiority ſhe had hitherto been able maintain againſt ſo many united Enemies, was the main Reaſon for continuing the War till Time and Perſeverance ſhould turn the Ballance againſt her; ſince nothing was more obvious, than that the Power which, ſingly, was able to withſtand the joint Efforts of almoſt all his Neighbours, would give the Law to every one of them, as ſoon as the Band was broke, and the Confederacy diſſolv'd: And that in order to

The Reply on Behalf of the Emperor.

A.D. 1693. detect her inſidious Purpoſes, his Holineſs had nothing elſe to do, than to propound to them the following Queſtions, by way of Preliminaries, viz. Whether they would acknowledge and confirm the Renunciation made by the late Queen of France, of the Spaniſh Succeſſion, in all its Clauſes, which they had ſo ſtrongly diſputed in the Year 1667; whether they would reſtore the Duchy of Lorrain, without Condition or Limitation; whether they would reſtore the Countries they had taken from the Empire ſince the Treaty of Munſter; and whether they would renounce their Alliance with thoſe very Turks, which his Holineſs was ſo zealous to have driven out of Europe?

The Mediation of the Engliſh and Dutch Miniſters at the Port defeated by the Intrigues of France.

Whether the Inſtances of the Maritime Powers at all contributed to this firm Reply, does not appear. But this is apparent enough, that the Drift of their Meaſures was entirely oppoſite to theſe Importunities of his Holineſs: A Peace between the two Courts of Vienna and Conſtantinople, as we have ſeen, was one of their moſt favourite Purſuits; and accordingly, they left nothing unattempted to accompliſh it; but ſtill without Succeſs: The French had ſtill the Aſcendancy in the Divan, and undertook ſo poſitively to diſable the Efforts of the Emperor in Hungary the next Campaign, by the mighty Diverſion they propos'd in Germany, that Hemſkirk the Dutch Embaſſador at the Port, could neither obtain an Audience, nor an Anſwer to the Propoſals which he had deliver'd in Writing to the Grand Vizier. It is true, the Refuſal was ſoften'd by a great Shew of Regard and Civility, and ſome Excuſes, that the Delay was only made till the Arrival of Lord Paget: But even when his Lordſhip did arrive, they continu'd as backward as ever to enter into any Negotiation, and employ'd the Interval to make all poſſible Preparations for a vigorous Campaign. It muſt, however, be ſuppos'd, that either the Imperial Court did not expect, or did not deſire any Succeſs from the good Offices of the Mediators; for as if they expected a double Storm both from the Turks and their moſt Chriſtian Allies, they exerted themſelves in a very ſignal manner, to be ſufficiently cover'd againſt the Violences of both. Of the Preparations on the Side of Germany, ſomething has been already ſaid: And on the Side of Turkey, over and above the Brandenburgh and other Auxiliaries, care was not only taken to recruit the Imperial Forces already on the Frontier, but alſo to re-inforce them with additional Corps, and to make ſuch a Diſpoſition in all reſpects as ſhould enable the Duke of Croy, who was to command in chief, in the Room of the Prince of Baden, to act offenſively, at leaſt, if not to give the Law to the Enemy. Again, ſuch Aſſurances were given to the Venetians of a firm Purpoſe and real Ability to make an extraordinary Effort, that they alſo were induc'd to recollect all the Powers of their State, in order to do the ſame; and leſt the King and Republic of Poland ſhould alſo be induc'd by the French Embaſſador and the Tartarean Envoy, who acted in concert, to ſtrike up a ſeparate Peace with the Turks, the Imperial Miniſter in that Kingdom, Count de Noſtitiz, was diſpatch'd with Orders to make the ſtrongeſt Inſtances imaginable both to his Majeſty and the Diet, to reject the ſaid Offers, and to proſecute the War. The Diet was held at Grodno in the Beginning of the Year; and at the Opening of it, the King not only recommended the Propoſal, made by the ſaid Envoy, to their Conſideration, but left the whole Affair of War or Peace to be decided as they thought fit. Such, however, was the Diverſity of Opinions which prevail'd amongſt them, that the Term limited by the Conſtitution for their Sitting, elaps'd before they could come to any Deciſion at all: And when, by way of Expedient, it was propos'd to prolong the Seſſion for a Week or a Fortnight, as by unanimous Suffrage might have been done, two Negatives defeated the Project, and broke up the Diet in Confuſion. Unhappily, the Imperial Miniſter did not arrive till the ſaid Term was on the Point of expiring; and as the Expedient propoſed for continuing the Diet was aſcrib'd to his Influence, ſo the Departure of the two Deputies was plac'd to the Account of France: All that now remain'd, was to make his Application to the King, to ſummon the Senate to hear his Propoſals, which he had not time to lay before the Diet: And though he was not able to draw the Republic into ſuch vigorous Meaſures as he contended for, the ſudden Death of the French Embaſſador render'd his Negotiations ſo much the more eaſy at Court: In Conſequence of which, he made a ſhift to traverſe the Intrigues of the Tartars, and to prevail with the King to continue the War during another Campaign, though in a way that neither did Honour to himſelf, or any material Service to the common Cauſe.

Counter Negotiations with the King and Diet of Poland.

Dilatory Proceedings on the Side of Savoy.

It was, however, ſtrange, in the midſt of all theſe unuſual Endeavours of the Imperial Court, to find, that in the Side of Italy, the Allies ſeem'd to be faſt aſleep: Of Recruits ſent out of Germany; of Contributions rais'd by the Imperialiſts from the Italian Princes and States, by way of Commutation for Winter-Quarters; of Remittances made from Spain, and Subſidies paid by the Maritime Powers to the Duke of Savoy, and of Conferences held with his Royal Highneſs, by the Governor of Milan, and the Imperial Miniſter, &c. the Gazettes made frequent mention: But of any one military Motion that ſeem'd to promiſe an effectual Campaign, not one ſingle Article eſcap'd, till the Summer was half over: And, in Excuſe for this amazing Inactivity, where it was ſuppos'd and believ'd, that the Allies were ſtrongeſt, and the French weakeſt, no other Pretence was aſſign'd but the frequent Indiſpoſitions, Agues, Impoſtumes, &c. of his Royal Highneſs; except that, now and then, a Whiſper eſcap'd, that theſe Indiſpoſitions were political; and that he had ſome favourite Point to carry with one Side or the other,

A. D. 1693. other, before he would give his Conſent to the Plan of Operations for the year. What Authority there was for this Whiſper, has not reach'd us: But then we find it declar'd in the London Gazette, (No. 2870.) that his Royal Highneſs was ſo well recover'd before the End of April, N. S. that he repair'd to Chiari for the Air: In another Article from Turin, dated May 16, that he continu'd at the ſaid Place ſo well, that the whole Diſcourſe of thoſe Parts turn'd on his immediate taking the Field: In a third, dated the 26th, That the Duke of Schomberg arriv'd at Turin on the 23d from Flanders, and waited on his Royal Highneſs at Chiari on the 25th: In a fourth, dated June the 6th, That his Royal Highneſs held a Council of War at Turin, May 30, at which aſſiſted the Governor of Milan and the ſaid Duke Schomberg: In a fifth, That between the 19th and the 23d he held another Council of War, in concert with General Caprara, &c. In a ſixth, That Prince Eugene, with a new Title of Field Marſhal, arriv'd there towards the End of June, from Vienna: In a ſeventh, dated July 10, that in the Day before his Royal Highneſs had a return of his Ague: And, laſtly, in an eighth, dated the 24th, That on the 18th his Royal Highneſs ſet out from Turin, to put himſelf at the Head of the Army, which ſoon after decamp'd, and, in four ſeveral Bodies, took the Rout of Suſa, with a ſeeming Reſolution to attack that Place; which was not, however, the real purpoſe, as will be explan'd in its Place.

Unqueſtionably, if the ſeveral Powers which form'd the Confederacy could have agreed to proſecute the War on that Principle, which would have moſt diſtreſs'd the common Enemy, and would have been content to wait for their Share of the Spoil, till that Diſtreſs had taken place, ſome Expedient would have been found to quicken his Royal Highneſs's Motions, to induce the Court of Spain to make one great Effort on the Side of Catalonia; to prevail with the German Princes, for once, to take the Field in time; to induce the maritime Powers to follow the Blow which they had ſo lately given the French at Sea; to make all theſe ſeveral Operations ſo to coincide as to time, that all might ſerve to countenance and ſupport each other; and, laſtly, to lie on the Defenſive in Flanders, till ſuch an Opportunity ſhould ariſe out of the Events of the Year, as might authoriſe the Riſque of an Action, and open a Way for the making ſome ſuch Acquiſition as might countenance the annual waſte of Blood and Treaſure on that ſide.

Difficulties in abundance, it muſt be ſuppos'd, lay in the way: Every one of theſe Powers had a ſeperate Intereſt: Every Day, as uſual, diſcover'd ſome new Jealouſy, or produc'd ſome new Miſunderſtanding: Savoy was always a Trimmer: The Germans were more inclin'd to prolong their Subſidies than finiſh the War. Spain was in ſuch a Lethargy as neither Danger nor Diſhonour could rouſe her from. And as to England, unleſs her great Effort was made in Flanders, the King, who was the Soul of the Confederacy, could not have been gratified. But great Difficulties muſt be expected in great Actions; and it ought to be the Glory of great Minds to ſurmount them, if ſurmountable; or if not, to make uſe of the firſt favourable Opportunity to give over an impracticable Experiment. A. D. 1693.

It is certain, that if the Power that was now arm'd againſt France had been properly directed, the Odds would have been againſt her: But as the French Court were always Maſters of their own Meaſures, and thoroughly acquainted with thoſe of the Confederates, they made the beſt uſe imaginable of their own Strength, and they drew every Advantage that could be drawn from the Weakneſs of the Enemy. The Diſpoſitions of France for opening the Campaign.

Thus whether they relied without reſerve on the Abilities of Mr. Catinat, who had hitherto ſerv'd with ſuch Succeſs againſt Savoy, and who, about this time, was rewarded with a Marſhal's Staff, together with Meſſieurs de Boufflers, de Noailles, de Tourville, de Joyeuſe, de Villeroy, and de Choiſeul, or on the Indiſpoſition of his Royal Highneſs, they remain'd ſo free from Apprehenſions on that ſide, that they remanded a conſiderable Corps of Horſe and Foot, which had been detach'd from the Upper Rhine, by way of Reinforcement; and contented themſelves with making ſuch Diſpoſitions as might enable them to lie on the Defenſive only. But then, to oblige his Catholic Majeſty to ſlacken his Efforts, either in Italy or Flanders, or to ſtrike ſuch a Terror thro' his Miniſters and Subjects as ſhould oblige him to negotiate a ſeparate Peace, they increas'd their Preparations in Catalonia, and play'd that very Game againſt the Spaniards, which the Spaniards ought to have play'd againſt them.

On the Rhine, Mr. de Lorges was early at his Poſt, and beſtirr'd himſelf with ſuch extraordinary Aſſiduity to collect his Forces, fill his Magazines, and put his Army in motion, that all the Gazettes of Europe took the Alarm, and were fill'd with the Preſages of a Storm at hand, and of the Miſchiefs to be apprehended from it, wherever it ſhould fall. About the ſame time Meaſures were alſo taken for aſſembling another Army on the Meuſe, under the Command of M. de Boufflers, and a flying Camp, of between ſeven and eight thouſand Men on the Moſelle, under the Marquis de Harcourt. But the Attention of the French Court was principally directed to the Motions of the Confederates, under King William and the Elector of Bavaria: It was there they knew the great Effort would be made; and they reſolv'd that M. de Luxemburgh ſhould have no Reaſon to complain of the want of Supplies of any ſort: And, notwithſtanding the enormous Preparations, neceſſary for ſuch a Variety of Services, they had ſtill ſuch Reſources, as enabled them both to provide for the Security of their Coaſts, in caſe of an Attack from England, which had been ſo often threaten'd, and even to make a Figure by Sea, not unworthy of

A. D. 1693. that they made by Land, as the Events of the Year will but too fatally manifeſt.

As to his Majeſty of England, he ſet out for Holland on the 24th of March; but the Wind proving contrary, he did not arrive there till the 2d of April: And notwithſtanding his Impatience to be in action, it was the Middle of May, N. S. before he took the Field. We are therefore to ſuppoſe, that he had ſtill many Negotiations to perfect, and many Difficulties to ſurmount; and the Hiſtory of ſuch Intervals of theſe, would be worth more, perhaps, than the Hiſtory of a Campaign: But the Receſſes of the Cabinet are very rarely unfolded, and thoſe of Loo have hitherto prov'd inacceſſible: Of his Majeſty's conferring frequently with the States; of his giving Audience to foreign Miniſters; of his poſting to the Hague, and poſting back again, we find frequent mention; but ſcarce ever of the Occaſion.

The King arrives in Holland.

M. Hallewyn proſecuted for intriguing with France for a Peace.

Only we find that one M. Hallewyn, a Member of the States-General, and his Brother, the ſenior Burgo-Maſter of Dort, had the Misfortune, in this Interval, to be accuſed of high Crimes and Miſdemeanors againſt the Republic, and underwent a rigorous Proſecution on that Account. His Majeſty attended in Perſon, when their Caſe was reported to the States; and as well from that Incident as from the Nature of the Charge, it is reaſonable to conclude he was ſtrongly prejudic'd againſt them. The Burgo-Maſter was accus'd of going into Switzerland, and there entering into a Concert with M. Amelot, the French Miniſter to the Cantons, for ſetting on foot a Negotiation of Peace, without being authoris'd ſo to do; and in contempt of the ſeveral Edicts from time to time ſet forth, forbidding all Correſpondence with France, on any Terms whatſoever: And it was prov'd, That in purſuance of this Concert, he receiv'd and entertain'd M. Roberti de Pille du Pleſſis, who had been ſent to confer with him by the Court of France, under the Security of certain Tokens which had been ſettled between the ſaid Miniſter and the Priſoner: And that he finally came to this Agreement with him, the ſaid du Pleſſis, That as ſoon as he receiv'd authentic Aſſurances of the Moſt Chriſtian King's Inclinations to a (c) general Peace, he would make a Propoſal to the Magiſtracy of Dort, and prevail with them to lay it before the States-General. What was ſtill more unlucky for the Burgo-Maſter, M. du Pleſſis himſelf was alſo ſeiz'd and impriſon'd: And by an intercepted Letter directed to him, it appear'd, that he was impower'd by his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty to promiſe the ſaid Burgo-Maſter twenty thouſand Crowns, in caſe he made good his Engagements; and the other Cities of the Republic ſhould be induc'd, by the Example of Dort, to declare for Peace. The whole Proceſs laſted till the End of July, when the Burgo-Maſter was ſentenc'd to be impriſon'd for Life, and his Eſtate to be confiſcated; du Pleſſis to be impriſon'd during the War, at his own Expence, and afterwards baniſh'd for ever: And nothing material appearing againſt Allewyn, the Elder, after a very rough Confinement under the Dienaers, or Goalers, who had the Charge to common Malefactors, was acquitted.

State of Europe for Aug. 1693.

A. D. 1693.

To return: The Rendezvouz of the confederate Forces was appointed at Deighem, in the Neighbourhood of Bruſſels: And ſcarce had his Majeſty taken Poſſeſſion of his Quarters there, before he received Advice, That the Marſhals de Lorges and de Choiſeul had taken Advantage of the uſual Tardineſs of the Germans, to give them a very conſiderable Blow; but that their Troops had grievouſly tarniſhed the Glory of their own Succeſs, by the brutal Uſe they had made of it.

M. de Lorges paſſes the Rhine.

The Fact was this: The two Marſhals having aſſembled their Army in Little Holland, paſs'd the Rhine, without oppoſition, at Philipſburgh, on the 16th and 17th of May, N. S. to the Number of fifty thouſand Horſe and Foot: On the 18th they detach'd M. de Chamilli with twenty thouſand to inveſt Heydelberg; and with the Remainder they paſs'd the Mountains, in queſt of the Prince of Baden, who had taken Poſt near Hailbron, but was in no condition to encounter them. On the 21ſt M. de Chamilli came before the Place; and the ſame Night, between Ten and Eleven o'Clock, open'd his Trenches. Heidekief, a Major-General, and Knight of the Teutonic Order, was Governor: The Garriſon conſiſted of about two thouſand four hundred Men: Many of the Burghers were alſo in Arms, and appear'd determin'd to uſe them; General Thongen had given them Aſſurances of Relief; and the Regiment of Darmſtad was actually in full March to reinforce them. This was the beſt Side of their Circumſtances; and the worſt was, That the Soldiers and the Townſmen were at variance; that the French had a Party amongſt the latter; and that the Governor himſelf was, in every reſpect, unworthy of the Confidence plac'd in him. Hence it follow'd, That the Bravery of ſome was render'd ineffectual by the Cowardice and Baſeneſs of others; and that when the Aſſailants had been actually repulſed no leſs than four Times, and had given over the Attack, the Governor, in a Pannic, oblig'd the ſeveral Parties upon Duty to abandon their Poſts, ſpik'd up ſome of the Guns, order'd the reſt to be diſmounted, the Proviſions to be deſtroy'd, &c. And when, at the Inſtance of the Burghers, he would have reſum'd the Defence of the Place, it was too late: The Enemy had been inform'd of the Advantage,

(c) Biſhop Burnet ſays, The French work'd on the Dutch by their ſecret Practices, to make them hearken to a ſeparate Peace; but does not explane what he aſſerts, by any Reference to this Affair of Hallewyn.

A. D. 1693. Heydelberg storm'd.

Advantage, had return'd to the Aſſault, were become Maſters of the Works, and in an Inſtant let looſe all the Horrors of a Storm on the miſerable Inhabitants. The Governor was the firſt to make his Eſcape to the Caſtle, the Gates of which he caus'd to be ſhut with ſo much Precipitation, that no leſs than ſix hundred of his Garriſon were left expos'd to the Fury of the Enemy, and cut to Pieces under the Walls. The ſame Fate overtook all the Burghers that were found in Arms; and even Numbers of thoſe who had thrown them down: When Cruelty was weary'd, not ſatisfied, Luſt and Rapine took their Turns to rage: Every Houſe was ranſack'd; Numbers were ſet on fire: Even the Churches were no longer Sanctuaries: Inſtead of yielding Protection to thoſe who took refuge there, they could not protect themſelves: The ſame Hand that robb'd the Altar, left it reeking with human Blood: When the Capuchins implor'd the Commanding Officers to ſpare their Church and Monaſtery, their Suit was not only rejected, but they were told, That their Orders were to treat this City in the ſame manner as they had formerly treated Spire, Manheim, Frandendole, &c. and not leave one Stone upon another: And if the Accounts tranſmitted from Germany at that Time, are to be depended upon, their ſavage Deportment in a manner verified that ſavage Declaration: For they ſuffer'd their Soldiers to violate the Repoſitories of the Dead; and not only to break open the electoral Vault, but to throw the Bones and Aſhes of the electoral Family about the Streets: When all Quarters of the Town were on fire, the Inhabitants, to the Amount of about fifteen thouſand, without reſpect to Age, Sex, or Circumſtance, having been ſtripp'd to their very Skins, were driven in a Herd to the Caſtle, to quicken the Capitulation: For the Place being incapable of lodging ſo vaſt a Multitude, they were kept in the open Air, in a manner pil'd upon each other, and in hourly Expectation of a Bombardment; ſo that the Torture they were expos'd to within, equall'd the Violence they had ſuffer'd without: And even when they were ſet free upon the Surrender of the Caſtle, numbers of them died in their March, (which was by Night, along the Banks of the Necker) of Hunger, Cold, Fatigue, and all the Anguiſh of Mind ariſing from ſuch a Burſt of Calamities.

Cruel Behaviour of the French.

London Gaz. No. 2785. 2786.

All Europe rung with the Horrors of ſo dire a Tragedy: And ſo fierce was the Reſentment of the Germans, while it was yet freſh before their Eyes, that a Party of French ſoon after falling into the Hands of the Imperial Huſſars, they cut them all to Pieces, except two, whom Prince Lewis of Baden, ſent back to M. de L'Orges, with a Meſſage to this Effect, That he was come from a War againſt the Turks; and that he expected Chriſtian Enemies would have treated each other with Chriſtian Uſage: But that he found the French acted more like Barbarians than their Turkiſh Allies: That the Deſtruction of Heydelberg, the Maſſacre of the Inhabitants, and the frequent Violations of the Cartels which had been ſettled between the two Armies, ſhew'd that they had neither Fidelity nor Mercy; and that, therefore, he ſhould, for the future, make ſuch Reprizals upon them as the Huſſars had done, till Concern for themſelves had taught them to ſhew Compaſſion for others. A. D. 1693.

The ſame Commander was alſo as much exaſperated againſt Heidesdorf, the late Governor of Heydelberg, as againſt the French themſelves: He cauſed him to be put immediately under arreſt, and a Proceſs to be iſſued out againſt him; on the Iſſue of which, it appearing, that he was guilty of every Article charged upon him, he was condemn'd to be degraded from his Knighthood, to be drawn in a Cart along the whole Line of the Army, to have the Sentence of the Court-Martial read to him at the Head of his own Regiment, and then to loſe his Head. But after the firſt Parts of the ſaid Sentence had been rigorouſly executed, the laſt was remitted, at the Interceſſion of the Order he had once belong'd to, and had ſo foully diſgrac'd, on condition that his Sword ſhould be broken over his Head by the common Executioner; and that he ſhould be baniſhed out of the Circles of Suabia, Franconia, Auſtria, and the Upper Rhine: And ſo dear, it ſeems, was Life to him, that he accepted the Continuance of it, even on theſe ignominous Terms; but nevertheleſs did not enjoy it long; for having been convey'd by the Executioner in his Cart over the Necker, the Peaſants roſe upon him, and knock'd him o' the Head among the Vineyards, whither he had wander'd for Shelter.

Sentence paſs'd on the Governor of Heydelberg.

The Moſt Chriſtian King, in the mean time, willing to derive every kind of Advantage from every Succeſs, ſent his Royal Mandate to the Archbiſhop of Paris to celebrate the Reduction of Heydelberg with a ſolemn Te Deum. "I order'd my Couſin "the Marſhal Duke de L'Orges, ſaid he, "to make himſelf Maſter of Heydelberg, "and he has executed my Orders.—This "Conqueſt, which begins the Campaign ſo "gloriouſly, affords me Time, a freer En"terance into the Heart of the Empire, "and an almoſt certain Preſage of farther "Succeſs." And it was become ſo much the more neceſſary to keep up the Spirits of his People, by feeding that Vanity, becauſe the Weight of the ſeveral Burdens and Oppreſſions they groan'd under, was about that Time render'd almoſt inſupportable by ſuch a Scarcity of Corn, as was but one Remove from a Famine; and as had created Mutinies in ſeveral Provinces, which all the Terrors of an arbitrary Government had been ſcarce ſufficient to quell. But then theſe tumid Expreſſions were but ill countenanc'd by what immediately followed in Germany: For tho' the two Marſhals continued their March towards Hailbron, and made ſeveral Attempts to paſs the Necker, in order to attack the Prince of Baden, they were always repulſed, and at laſt found it their beſt way to diſmount their Batteries and decamp. And now it is reaſonable to think, the Prince would have found an Opportunity to be amply

But tho' he had an Interview with the Elector of Saxony at Lohr, and left no Expedient untry'd to bring about that Junction, the grand Point of the Command broke all his Measures; and all he could do was to ſtrengthen his Army with about five or ſix thouſand Recruits; and, upon Advice that M. de L'Orges had form'd a new Deſign to lay the Duchy of Wirtemberg under Contribution, to march towards Conſtadt, by which Motion he diſconcerted the Marſhal's Project, and oblig'd him to take Poſt at Obſtadt, near Bruchſal.

Who alſo prevents their Deſign on Wirtemberg.

Order of Time now requires that we ſhould follow the Courſe of the French Proceedings at Sea, as far, at leaſt, as theſe Proceedings had any Connection with Italy or Spain.

And firſt it is neceſſary to obſerve, that the Maritime Powers, at this Period, ſeem to have taken the Ocean for their Province, and to have left the Vindication of the Mediterranean to his Catholic Majeſty. It ought alſo to be recollected, that we left the Spaniſh Fleet, at the Cloſe of the laſt Year, after an inactive Cruize, in the Bay of Naples, where it was laid up for the Winter.

That the French Court ſhould be deeply ſenſible of their Loſs at la Hogue, is what muſt occur to every Man's Imagination; but that, in the Midſt of ſuch a Variety of Enterprizes, all of ſuch Difficulty, Expence, and Importance, they ſhould reſolve not only to repair that Loſs, but to be firſt in Action on the ſame Element, could be imagin'd by none but ſuch as are thoroughly acquainted with their amazing Reſources, and the Vigour of that Spirit they are directed by.

A French Project to burn the Spaniſh Fleet at Baiæ,

The 12th of March, N. S. the Count d'Eſtrees, with twenty-two Men of War, eight Fire-ſhips, and a ſufficient Number of Tenders, &c. ſet ſail from the Hieres: And it ought to be remembred, that an Account of this Incident, dated from Paris the 27th, was inſerted in the London Gazette of the 27th, O. S. following, with this Addition, "But they do not tell us which way they "took their Courſe; tho' it is believ'd "here, he (d'Eſtrees) is coming to the "Ocean; and that the Marquis de Chaſteau "Renaud is going out with ten or twelve "Men of War from Breſt to meet him." The Courſe they took however, was to Naples, before which Place they came on the 18th following; and their Commiſſion was to deſtroy the Spaniſh Fleet, then lying at Baiæ, if they had found it practicable. But the Viceroy having receiv'd timely Information of their Purpoſe, had taken ſuch Precautions, that after hovering upon the Coaſt for three or four Days, they ſail'd away without firing a Gun; and on their Return were overtaken by a Storm, which diſabled ſeveral of their Ships, and oblig'd them to put into Toulon to refit: Nor ought it to be forgot, that one of them of forty-four Guns, and two hundred and forty Men, fell in with an Engliſh Merchant Ship, commanded by one Captain Barret, who defended himſelf from Sun-riſe till Night, with a Reſolution that prov'd invincible: For having been boarded no leſs than three ſeveral times, he clear'd his Ship as often; and having beat in the Frenchman's Stern, carry'd away his Foremaſt and Main-top-maſt, kill'd fifty-two of his Men, wounded thirty-five, and made fifteen Priſoners, oblig'd him to ſheer off.

found impracticable.

A. D. 1693.

On the 11th of May, N. S. M. d'Eſtrees ſet ſail again, and having been join'd at Sea by the Gallies from Marſeilles, made for the Coaſt of Spain, to co-operate with M. de Noialles in reducing Roſes: Accordingly, being arriv'd before that Place on the 29th, it was immediately inveſted; and on the 9th of June following ſurrender'd by Capitulation; as was alſo the Fort de Trinité, (or as it is otherwiſe call'd, the Caſtle of Ampurias, ſituated on the Gulph of Roſes) three Days after; the Spaniards being in no Condition to give the Enemy the leaſt Interruption, either by Land or Sea.

Roſes taken by the D. de Noialles *and Count d'*Eſtree.

This gave King Lewis another of thoſe Opportunities to regale his good People with a Te Deum, which he was ſo fond of; and as in the Preamble of his Letter to the Archbiſhop of Paris, on that Occaſion, he was pleas'd to vaunt, That the Number of his Enemies, which had enforc'd him to divide his Armies, had only furniſh'd him with ſo many more Opportunities to enlarge his Conqueſts; ſo in the Body of it, he affected to be no otherwiſe delighted with theſe Conqueſts, than as they were ſo many Pledges for reſtoring the Tranquility of the Public.

Another Te Deum celebrated at Paris.

His Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty had ſet out from Verſailles, on his Way to Flanders, on the 15th of May, N. S. but having been overtaken by a ſlight Indiſpoſition, halted at Queſnoy for ſome Days, and did not reach his Army till the 2d of June. Madam de Maintenon, and her Court of Ladies, made a Part of his Train; and ſuch was the Pomp he was ſurrounded with, that it rather reſembled a Triumph than a March.

His Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty ſets out for Flanders.

Great was the Expectation of the Public at this Time: His Army was computed at one hundred and twenty thouſand Men, completely furniſh'd with Neceſſaries of all Sorts; and as it was become a Maxim of the French Court that their Monarch ſhould never take the Field but in order to ſome great Exploit, it was fully believ'd, that he would have ſat down before Maeſtricht, Charleroy, Huy, Bruſſels, or Liege. As to the Army of the Allies, our own Gazettes take notice, that it was not fully form'd at this time; but that, on the contrary, they were join'd on their March from Dieghem to Park, near Louvain, which was on the 5th of June, by the Engliſh and Scots Foot, by all the Horſe and Dragoons, and by a Body of twenty thouſand Men which the Earl of Athlone had drawn together in the Neighbourhood of Maeſtricht. His Majeſty of England has, nevertheleſs, been highly extoll'd for that Motion, as it prevented the

A Diſſention in Liege. Among theſe Huy and Liege ſtood foremoſt; and it was apprehended that they would begin with the former, in order to facilitate the Reduction of the latter. The Court of France, who had their Emiſſaries every where, had contriv'd to ſet the Biſhop and Chapter of Liege at variance by the offer of a Neutrality, which the Chapter had their Reaſons to accept, and the Biſhop to refuſe; and the Controverſy growing warm, each Side had recourſe to their Principals for ſuch Countenance and Aſſiſtance as ſhould enable them to withſtand the other.

K. William's Precautions to hinder it from falling into the Hands of the French. This was the Situation of that City when King Lewis arriv'd in his Camp; and no ſooner had King William ſufficient Grounds to conclude that the Storm which was gathering was like to fall on that Place, than he ſent the Duke of Wirtemberg thither, to concert ſuch Meaſures with the Biſhop as ſhould be thought neceſſary for his Security: He alſo detach'd nine Battalions from his Army to reinforce the Garriſon, which then amounted to twenty thouſand Horſe and Foot: Beſides which, the Elector Palatine, with his Troops, lay in readineſs to march to their Aſſiſtance in caſe of Need. His Majeſty alſo threw four thouſand Men into Maeſtricht; and having alſo extended a ſuitable degree of his Providence to Huy, Charlroy, &c. remain'd on the Defenſive at Park, with about forty thouſand Foot, twenty thouſand Horſe and Dragoons, and one hundred and fourteen Pieces of Cannon.

During this Interval, viz. on the 7th, his Majeſty of France review'd his Forces (which it ought to be remember'd, conſiſted of the two Armies under the ſeveral Commands of the Marſhals Luxemburgh and Boufflers) at Gembloux; and on the 10th cauſed a ſtrong Detachment, of upwards of twenty thouſand Horſe and Foot, to paſs the Meuſe at Namur, under the Command of the latter; which, it was at firſt ſuppos'd, were to have open'd the Campaign with the inveſting Huy; but which, in reality, took their March thro' the Countries of Luxemburgh, Triers, and the Palatinate, towards the Upper Rhine, where the Dauphin was now to act as Generaliſſimo: The Reſidue of M. de Boufflers's Troops had Orders to join the grand Army, under the Duke de Luxemburgh: And theſe Diſpoſitions having been made, on the 12th his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, with his Train of Ladies, immediately departed from Namur, on his Return to Verſailles.

and returns to Verſailles.

If this was Matter of Surprize to all Europe, it was alſo Matter of Triumph in the Camp of the Confederates, as appears by an Article from thence in the London Gazette, which contains theſe Words. "ſures have been broken by the great Care "which has been taken in providing for "the Defence of Leige, Charleroy, and our "other Frontier Places, &c." It was alſo repeated and declar'd by the ſame Authority, that great Numbers of Deſerters continually came over to the Allies from the French Camp, upon every Motion they made; and that the general Complaint of all of them was, of the great Scarcity of Money and Proviſions which prevail'd there: From whence the Sanguine and Unexperienc'd at home took the Hint, to raiſe their Imaginations to ſo high a Pitch, as it was natural they ſhould, that they dreamt of nothing but Victory, Glory, Triumph, and all thoſe other dazling Circumſtances, which not only take off the Horrors of Deſtruction, but even render it agreeable.

A. D. 1693. His Meaſures ſuppos'd to have been broke.

M. de Luxemburg, however, on the third Day after the King his Maſter's Return, remov'd from Genap to Meldert, where he fix'd his Head Quarters, without receiving the leaſt Interruption from the Allies, tho' within half a League of their Camp, and tho' the Out-guards appear'd in ſight of each other: On the Contrary, his Majeſty perceiving that the Marſhal had poſted himſelf ſo as to flank his Left Wing, he order'd ten Battalions to ſtrengthen his Camp on that Side, under the Cover of twenty-eight Pieces of Cannon.

For above a Month the two Armies continued in this Situation; and the reſpective Generals ſeem'd only on the Watch for ſuch an Advantage as would juſtify the Riſque of an Engagement. Both Parties, in the mean time, were ſufficient Sufferers by the Weather; for the Rain fell in ſuch Abundance, and the Water ruſh'd in ſuch Torrents from the Hills, as to force along with them ſuch Tents, Waggons, Horſes, and even Houſes, as were in their way: But ſtill it was given out in the London Gazette, that the French having the worſt of the Situation, were the moſt incommoded: And while it was affirm'd on one Hand, that Proviſions, both for Man and Horſe, were plentiful and cheap in the confederate Camp, it was affirm'd on the other, that the Price of the like Proviſions in that of the Enemy, was increas'd after the Rate of three hundred per Cent: To which it is alſo added, That their Men were very ſickly.

Gazette Accounts of the Situation of the two Armies.

It ought, indeed, to be obſerv'd, 1. That the Garriſon of Charleroy were particularly active in ſurpriſing the French Convoys: And that once in particular they forc'd the French Lines, between Mons and Maubeuge; and having penetrated into the Enemy's Country, burn'd ſeveral Villages, and carry'd off a thouſand Head of Cattle, above a hundred Priſoners, and alſo ſeveral of the Inhabitants by way of Hoſtage, for the Contributions they had demanded: And, 2. That when it was certain that the Dauphin, with his Detachment, had paſs'd the Moſelle, a large Body of Foot, Horſe, and Dragoons, were draughted out of the Garriſons of Liege and Maeſtricht,

A. D. 1693. ane poſted at (d) Huy, under the Command of Count Serclaes de Tilly, to ſtraiten the Enemy's Camp on that Side; with what Effect may be gather'd from the Effort that was made by the Marſhal Duke of Luxemburgh in Perſon, at the Head of fifty Squadrons, and ten Battalions, together with ſome Field-pieces, not only to diſlodge but deſtroy them; which, nevertheleſs, he did not wholly ſucceed in: For the Count having receiv'd Intelligence of his Approach, had juſt time enough to paſs the Saer, at the Expence of three of his Squadrons, who being appointed to cover his Retreat, were moſt of them cut off, and with the Loſs of his Baggage.

This was the Exploit of the 14th of July, and which was only preparatory to a farther Deſign of the Marſhal's, to reduce Huy under the very Eyes of the confederate Army: And whether King William, and his Collegue, the Elector of Bavaria, had any Foreſight of his Purpoſe, and thought it adviſable to derive ſome Advantage to themſelves, from a Meaſure which they could not prevent, the Duke of Wirtembergh was, ſome few Days before, detach'd with thirteen Battalions of Foot, and twenty Squadrons of Horſe, or, as others ſay, eleven Regiments of each, to force the French Lines between the Schelde and the Lys, which he gallantly and ſucceſsfully perform'd on the 17th, according to the Dutch Accounts at three, but according to the Engliſh, at four ſeveral Places, and afterwards laid the whole Country, as far as Liſle, under Contribution.

The Duke of Wirtemberg forces the French Lines.

Thus far the Courſe of the Campaign was chequer'd with good and ill; and each Party ſeem'd to have their Share of both: But from henceforward we ſhall find that the Landſcape was all Clouds of Darkneſs and Tempeſt on one Side, and all Serenity and Sun-ſhine on the other.

On the 18th, the ſame Day that the French Lines were forc'd, as above, the Duke of Luxemburgh quitted the Camp which he had occupy'd ſo long, and march'd towards Huy, which was inveſted the next Day by M. de Villeroy, who had the Command of the Siege: M. de Luxemburgh himſelf undertook to cover his Approaches; and in regard there were no leſs than three Poſts to carry, namely, the Town, Fort Picard, and the old Caſtle; and the Confederates were ſo near him, he caus'd Lines of Contravallation to be thrown up, for his greater Security: But the Confederates did not remove from Park to Tirlemont till the 20th, upon which Morning the Town capitulated, before the Batteries of the Beſiegers began to play; and on the 23d the two Caſtles did the ſame; the Governor being made a Priſoner of War, and the Garriſon, who had mutined againſt him, being conducted to Liege.

Huy inveſted and taken.

The 24th the Confederates advanc'd from Vellem to Hoportinge; but being there inform'd of the Fate of Huy, and apprehending the next Attempt of the Enemy would be upon Liege, detach'd ten Battalions to reinforce the Garriſon of that Place, and return'd to Nether-Heſpen the next Day.

And it appears there was ſome Reaſon for that Apprehenſion: For the Duke of Luxemburgh had ſcarce taken Poſſeſſion of Huy, before he march'd on to Liege, to reconnitre the Works which had been thrown up for its Defence; and to try what could be done, by fair Means or foul, to wreſt that City from the Confederates. Accordingly, finding it too ſtrong, and too well garriſon'd to be reduced by Force, he renew'd the Offer of a Neutrality, in the King his Maſter's Name, but without Effect; for tho' two of the Capitulars, and ſome others, contended for the Acceptance of it, their unſeaſonable Boldneſs only ſerv'd to draw down the Indignation of the Prince-biſhop upon them, who caus'd them to be ſeiz'd, and ſent Priſoners to Mauſtricht.

States of Europe for Neutrality.

Reſolv'd, however to find his account in this Motion, he caus'd a large Quantity of Bavins to be cut, and made ſuch other Diſpoſitions as ſeem'd to manifeſt a ſettled Purpoſe to undertake the Siege: But when he had ſufficiently eſtabliſh'd that Notion, all of a ſudden, on the 28th, at Five in the Morning, he quitted his Poſt at Hellicheim, which was ſeven Leagues diſtant from the Confederates, and marching in four Columns, his Infantry in the Middle, his Cavalry on the Wings, paſſed the Jaar, near its Source, and between certain Villages, to attack them in their Camp, if they made it their Choice to wait for him, or to fall upon their Rear, in caſe they endeavour'd to avoid an Action. He knew they were much weaken'd by the ſeveral Detachments they had made: While he was on his March his Scouts brought him Intelligence that they continued in the ſame Poſture; and ſuch uſe did he make of the Time, that by Four in the Afternoon he arriv'd near the Village of Racou, with two Regiments of Dragoons, which he poſted in the Villages of St. Gertrude and Hautwinde, and ſupported with the Battalions of Foot, which, having been deſtin'd for the Lines, had encamp'd apart from the Army, and, for that Reaſon, were able to come up firſt.

M. de Luxemburgh makes a Feint to inveſt Leige.

But all at once marches towards the Camp of the Allies.

The Appearance of this Body, it ſeems, gave the firſt Alarm to the Allies: But tho' alarm'd, they were not immediately undeceiv'd: On the contrary, being ſtill under a Perſuaſion that Liege was the great Object of the Enemy's Attention, they look'd on this

(d) According to Mr. Boer, in his Life of K. William, and Mr. Tindal, who tranſcribes him almoſt Word for Word, this Party was intended to reinforce the grand Army: But I have choſe to rely rather on the Gazette in this Point; as alſo in the ſubſequent, relating to the Expedition of the Duke of Wirtemberg: For, whereas they aſſert, that the French quitted their Poſt on the 13th of July, and that their doing ſo gave the King an Opportunity to detach his Highneſs on that Service, the ſaid Gazette, in an Article dated from his Majeſty's Camp at Park, July 15, N. S. is expreſs, That the French were ſtill in their Camp; and that the Duke of Wirtemberg had been detach'd before: In another Article from Paris, dated the 16th, the Rencounter between M. de Luxemburgh and Tilly is fix'd to the 14th; and in a Third, of the 20th, that the French did not begin their March towards Huy till the 18th.

A. D. 1693. this Motion as a mere Feint, or matter of Amuſement only; at leaſt the Story is thus told by the French, with this Addition, That the King and the Elector were the firſt Perſons who diſcover'd the Truth: But, according to the London Gazette, they receiv'd Advice, That the Duke of Luxemburgh was advancing with a Reſolution either to attack them, or to gain a Day's March upon them towards Louvain: But both Accounts agree, that they immediately mounted their Horſes to make their own Obſervations, were immediately convinc'd of the Fact, and were reſolv'd to put themſelves in a Poſture to expect the Enemy. Accordingly Orders were given for the heavy Baggage to file off towards Lewe, and for the Infantry to entrench themſelves, which was undertaken and perform'd by thirty Men out of every Battalion; after what Manner, and with what Effect, will beſt appear from the Account of the general Diſpoſition of the Allies, given by the Marquis de Feuquieres, who was one of the Lieutenant-Generals upon this Service, under the Duke of Luxemburgh, to this Effect:

The Poſture of the two Armies.

The River Geet form'd the Right of their Camp; the Rivulet of Landen the Left; the Front of the Right was cover'd by a thick Hedge, which could not be paſs'd by above one Man at a time, and which not only extended very near the Geet, but alſo to the Village of Neerwinden, which was in their Center. Behind that Village there was an Eminence which ſlop'd to the Village of Romſdorff, which was ſituated on the Banks of the Brook: There was alſo a hollow Way which was form'd by this Slope, between the ſaid Village and Eminence: Both Romſdorff and Neerwinden were intrench'd, or rather, as according to other Accounts, the Entrenchment was continued from one Village to the other; and their whole Front was cover'd with above a hundred Pieces of Cannon, advantageouſly mounted on the ſaid Eminence, which commanded all the Approaches.

The ſame Author alſo obſerves, that the firſt four Battalions of the French, which came up after M. de Luxemburgh, ſecur'd the Villages of St. Gertrude and Hautewinde, were employ'd to diſlodge certain Detachments of the Allies, poſted at Landen, which nearly fronted the Left of their Camp, and which was to be on the Right of the French in the Diſpoſition of their Attack: And he farther obſerves, that the ſuffering this Poſt to be acquir'd too eaſily, was the firſt Error committed by King William in the Courſe of this great Affair: For, continues he, it gave M. de Luxemburgh an Opportunity of poſting forty Battalions in the Night, between Landen and Romſdorff, and to the Left of Landen, in Front of the Enemies Left, which, in conſequence of this Motion, and by reaſon of a Moraſs in the Rear of their Camp, which border'd on the Geet, was ſo ſtraiten'd for want of Room, that all the Horſe on that Side became wholly uſeleſs. Theſe forty Battalions were moreover ſupported by ſixteen Squadrons of Dragoons, which were order'd in the Night to ſtretch to the Right of Landen; and before the Battle began, were poſted above the Brook, oppoſite to the Left Wing of the Enemy's Horſe, already ſo ſtraiten'd, to diſcover the Paſſes of the Brook, and to break in upon their Flank, if occaſion ſhould offer. The Center which M. de Luxemburgh, for want of a ſufficient Front, diſpos'd into eight Lines of Horſe and Foot intermix'd, was, between the Hours of Five and Six in the Morning, form'd into ſo judicious a Motion by that General, that their March towards the Enemy, form'd an Order of Battle of two Lines. The Foot, to the Left of the firſt and ſecond Line, was order'd to attack the Village of Neerwinden; and the Horſe of the Left Wing to extend themſelves towards the Geet, oppoſite to the Right of the Allies; and to charge the Horſe on that ſide, provided they could force the Hedge, and form within it; which, however, they were to attempt, or not, according as they ſaw the Attack on the Village of Neerwinden proſper; becauſe it was impoſſible for them to poſſeſs the Ground within the Hedge.

A. D. 1693.

Such was the general Diſpoſition of the two Armies, the Moment before the Engagement began: And it appears from this Repreſentation, ſays the Marquis, that we were oblig'd to obſerve two Methods of Attack, preparatory to the general one, which we were to make upon that whole entrenched Front; which Front was otherwiſe unapproachable without ſuſtaining the Fire of the two Villages in flank.

The Battle of Neerwinden, or Landen.

As ſoon as the French Army began to advance, which was between four and five o'Clock in the Morning, the cannonading began on both Sides; and tho' that of the Confederates was extremely well pointed and ſerv'd, ſuch was the Diſcipline of the Aſſailants, and the Reſolution of thoſe who led them on, that the Havock which it made, neither deterr'd the one, or repuls'd the other, tho' the nearer they approach'd, the more terrible it became.

Between Seven and Eight the Attack upon Neerwinden, and the Body of Foot which defended it, was begun by ſix Brigades, under the Command of three Lieutenant-Generals, viz. the Sieurs de Rubantel, the Count de Montchevrel, and the Duke of Berwick; and according to all the French Accounts, the Village was ſoon carried by the Aſſailants, and as ſoon regained by the Defendants, who were not long in Poſſeſſion of it, before they were again ejected; being unable to withſtand the Torrent of freſh Troops, which M. de Luxemburgh continually pour'd in upon them: The ſame Writers, however, admit, that ſuch were the Efforts made by King William on the other Hand, that he once more recover'd that important Poſt; and, at the ſame Inſtant, had the Pleaſure to ſee the Enemy repuls'd on every Side.

The ſame variety of Succeſs is alſo acknowledg'd by M. Dijckvelt, one of the States Field-Deputies; as alſo by the King himſelf,

A. D. 1693. himſelf, in the ſeveral Accounts tranſmitted to their High and Mighty Lordſhips: But thoſe ſet forth in the London Gazette inſiſt, that the French were repulſed in every Attack they made; and that the Allies had every where the Advantage, till three or four o'Clock in the Afternoon.

M. de Feuquieres, on the other Hand, more than inſinuates, that it was owing to the ill Conduct of the French General, who had the Command in Chief of their Right Wing, and to a Want of Preſence of Mind in thoſe who had render'd themſelves Maſters of Neerwinden, that the Battle laſted ſo long, and that the Allies were not beaten out of the Field, almoſt at the firſt Onſet: According to him, the Latter had never regain'd the Village at all, if thoſe who had driven them out had immediately ſet themſelves to level the little Mud Walls, of about five Foot high, and one thick, which the Peaſants of theſe Parts occaſionally make uſe of, inſtead of Hedges, to divide their Grounds: This, he tells us, they might have effected in a few Moments; in which Caſe they would have been able to have extended their Front; whereas, for the Want of theſe Precautions, they were confin'd to the Breadth of the Street; and when they had fought their Way to the End of it, they always found the Enemy rang'd in a Front, ſufficient to cover thoſe that fled, and to rout their Purſuers.

This explanes what is meant by the Want of Preſence of Mind in thoſe Troops: And as to the ill Conduct of the General, he adds, That the Orders which M. de Luxemburgh had given, viz. for his Right to engage the Enemy's Center and Left, as ſoon as they ſaw the Attack on Neerwinden ſucceſsful, were not executed by the ſaid General: And this Omiſſion, he repreſents, as ſo much the more inexcuſable; becauſe, 1. The ſaid Village was recover'd by the Aſſiſtance of a great Part of thoſe Foot, which were poſted on the Left of the Allies: 2. Becauſe the Trenches on that Side were, by that Motion, in a very remarkable Manner expos'd: 3. Becauſe it was remonſtrated to him, That the making a proper Uſe of ſo favourable an Opportunity, would, in all Probability, decide the Fate of the Day: And, 4. Becauſe he ſuffer'd the ſame Opportunity to ſlip out of his Hands the ſecond time, as he had done the firſt.

The Marſhal de Villeroy was the General thus cenſur'd: But then it ought to be obſerv'd, that the Marquis de Feuquieres, who ſerv'd under him, and who had a Purpoſe of his own to ſerve, at the ſaid Marſhal's Expence, is the only Cenſurer: And, according to the licenc'd Narrative of this Battle, printed at Paris, which in part agrees with This of M. de Feuquieres, and alſo with That ſent to the States by King William, when M. de Luxemburgh had ſeen his Troops a ſecond time forc'd out of Neerwinden, he paſs'd on to the Center, and even to the Right, to explore ſome new Method of carrying on the Attack, and found none at that time practicable: For, after ſpecifying ſeveral little Advantages obtain'd by the Marquis de Gregni, the Prince of Conti, and others, it is expreſſly ſaid, That he, the Duke, M. de Villeroy, and the Prince, took a View of the Ground; and obſerving a Ditch full of Water, which was impaſſable to Cavalry, they all were of Opinion, that nothing more could be hazarded on that Side: It is alſo ſaid, That M. de Luxemburgh then return'd to the Left, with the Brigade of Guards, and other freſh Troops, to make his laſt Effort on the Village of Neerwinden, accompany'd by the Prince of Conti, and M. de Villeroy, who is particularly mention'd for having undertaken to introduce five Squadrons of the Houſhold Troops, into the Entrenchment to the Right of the Village, at a Paſs ſo narrow, that only two Horſemen could enter a-breaſt, which he perform'd; and it is withal acknowledg'd, that this Corps, after a briſk Charge, was overpower'd by the whole Line of the Confederates, and oblig'd to take ſhelter under the Fire of their Infantry; on which Occaſion the Duke of Chartres, who had fought at their Head, was ſurrounded, and had been taken Priſoner, if his own perſonal Valour had not ſav'd him. It is added, That M. de Luxemburgh, at the ſame Inſtant, having diſcover'd and forc'd ſeveral other Paſſes, enter'd into the Plane at the Head of the Carabineers, and ſeveral other Regiments; and, alſo, that the Marquis de Harcourt, who had march'd from Huy, on hearing the Noiſe of the Cannon, with twenty-two Squadrons, pour'd in with his whole Corps, to ſhare the Danger and Honour of the Day. A. D. 1693.

Thus we find the Streſs of the Action once more laid on forcing the Village of Neerwinden, on the Right of the French Army: But that an Effort had been previouſly made on the Left, agreeable to what is ſuggeſted in the Paris-Account, and in Oppoſition to what is ſuggeſted by M. de Feuquieres, we alſo find acknowledged in That of his Majeſty, above cited, in theſe Words. "The French, therefore, ſeeing "they could not force our Right Wing, fell "upon our Left, in the Village of Landen; "and being repuls'd, after a furious Engage-"ment, they return'd a ſecond time, with "freſh Supplies. The King, who was "gone to give the neceſſary Orders to the "Right Wing, return'd very ſeaſonably to "the Left, where, for above an Hour, the "Combat was very bloody; but at length "we became Maſters of the Village, and "drove the Enemy quite out of it; upon "which they drew off their Men from "that Attack, and carry'd them towards "our Right, where they had been firing all "along, but very faintly; and tho' the "Enemy had always had the worſt in their "Left Wing, which acted on that Side, "yet they always preſerv'd one Part of the "Village of Winden." The Truth of this laſt Circumſtance is alſo to be collected from the French Accounts; and what follow'd upon this laſt Effort of M. de Luxemburgh, is ſo fairly told in his Majeſty's own Narrative, that we need only tranſcribe it. "The King, who was every where to give his

A. D. 1693. his Aſſiſtance, after he had brought all Things to good order in the Left Wing, haſten'd towards the Village, and led up the Engliſh Infantry twice to the Entrenchment, where they fought with great Reſolution, as they had done all along.

The Elector was now ordering two Battalions to attack the Enemies Left Wing, while three others attack'd them in Front; but before he could put his Deſign in Execution, the Enemy being re-inforc'd with the Troops of their Right Wing, poſſeſſed themſelves of the Avenues of the Village, and made way for their Horſe, ſeconded by the Infantry in the Hedges. The firſt Cavalry that paſs'd forward (thoſe commanded by M. de Villeroy, &c. muſt be ſuppos'd) were repulſed; but our Infantry, not able to endure the Shot that galled them in the Flank of the Entrenchment, were forc'd to retreat: And in regard our Cannon on that ſide was no longer well ply'd, the Enemy's Cavalry broke in Pell-mell, and began to extend themſelves towards their Left, along the Hedges, poſſeſs'd by their Infantry; the moſt Part of that Cavalry being compos'd of the King's Houſhold. When they had formed ſome Squadrons, they charged the Hanover-Troops, put them in Diſorder, and, at the ſame time, paſſed on, and overturn'd the Spaniards that ſtood upon the Right of the Hanover-Cavalry. The King ſeeing this Diſorder, advanc'd with part of the Left Wing; but that being too far diſtant, the Enemy gave them no time to form it; but having flank'd the Dutch Horſe, broke them before the Engliſh could draw into a Line; ſo that they were forc'd to charge as they found themſelves, which they did with ſucceſs, beating down all before them; but the Right Wing having already been forc'd to paſs the River, the Engliſh were environ'd."

We muſt now return to M. de Feuquieres, who, as before hinted, for the ſake of raiſing a Trophy to himſelf, gives the moſt particular Relation of the Sequel: "The General of our Right, ſays he, having march'd in Perſon with the Troops which M. de Luxemburgh had form'd, I was left alone to command that Wing, which I immediately rang'd in a Diſpoſition to attack the Enemy's Left, when they ſhould furniſh me with an Opportunity, which they were very ſoon pleas'd to do, by diſplacing their Foot again, and even ſooner than they had perform'd the ſame Motion twice before, becauſe they ſaw that M. de Luxemburgh had renew'd his Attack with a greater Number of Troops. I ſuffer'd them however to march, till I judg'd it impoſſible for them to return before I had carried their Entrenchments. The Charge of the Attack I committed to the Marquis de Crequi: I poſted myſelf at the Head of the Horſe to the Right, and led them up to the Enemy's Front, which was only clos'd with the Carriages of their Artillery laid a-croſs. This the Enemy obſerving, and finding the Body of Foot they had left behind inſufficient to withſtand our Efforts, inſtead of continuing their March to ſupport their Right at Neerwinden, they endeavour'd to return to their Poſt, but were intercepted by the Marquis de Crequi; This remaining Body, therefore of their Foot, which conſiſted of nine Battalions, form'd themſelves into a hollow Square, to oppoſe the Horſe with which I had enter'd the Entrenchment: But the Deſtruction of theſe nine Battalions was not my principal View at that time; For that Part of the Camp which I had forc'd being the higheſt Ground in it, I had from thence a View of the Prince of Orange, who was marching below me with all his Right to renew his Attack on Neerwinden, not knowing that his Left had been forc'd: I diſpos'd my Horſe in order of Battle, with their Front to the Flank of his Troops, in order to charge them, if they continued their March to Neerwinden: I alſo ſent Advice to M. de Luxemburgh of our Succeſs; upon which he made a vigorous Effort with all his Left and Center, and poſted them between Neerwinden and the Enemy's Front, which being too much ſtraiten'd in that Ground, by a Bend of the Geet, were eaſily forc'd by our Left, and either cut in Pieces, or drown'd in the River." He adds, That the Confederate Horſe to the Left, who had not appear'd in the Front of the Line, were diſpos'd in a kind of a Rectangular Form, with their Front to the Brook of Landen: And, that when they ſaw the Entrenchment forc'd, they immediately ſhrunk away without any Moleſtation; which, he admits, was their wiſeſt Courſe; becauſe they had not Room enough to make ſuch a Diſpoſition as might render them ſerviceable.

A. D. 1693.

Thus we are to conclude, That if the firſt ſeat in the Temple of Fame was due to M. de Luxemburgh, the ſecond was equally due to M. de Feuquieres: And yet, in the Paris Account, all that is ſaid of the Iſſue of the Battle is ſumm'd up in theſe Words: "Their Right being broke by the Marquis de Harcourt, &c. and driven headlong into the Geet, which in many Places was fill'd with an infinite Number of Men and Horſe, their Left made no longer a ſtand; ſo that there was every where Confuſion among them, and only ten or twelve Squadrons, and two or three Battalions, which were fartheſt advanc'd in their Retreat, got out of ſight, and made a ſhift to eſcape, without moleſtation, becauſe we were not able to come up with them."

The Victory, no doubt, was complete; (tho' one of the Temporiſers on the Side of the Allies, in defiance of common Senſe, as well as Matter of Fact, was pleas'd to call it a pretended one): But none of the Accounts publiſh'd in England, Holland, &c. will allow, that the Rout was ſuch as it is here repreſented.—In M. Dijckvelt's Letter to the States, it is ſaid, The Retreat was made in very good Order: In the King's Narrative it is ſaid, That his Majeſty, ſeeing that the Forces of the Enemy were extremely too numerous for his Men to make any farther Reſiſtance, he ſent Orders to the Generals of the Infantry, and of the Left Wing,

A. D. 1693. to retreat to Lewe, which was done; the Enemy (M. de Feuquieres and his Wing, it muſt be underſtood) that were forming two Lines on the riſing Ground, not daring to attack them in their Retreat: The ſame thing is echoed in the Third Account ſet forth in the London Gazette: Biſhop Burnet is expreſs, That the French loſt ſo many Men, and ſuffer'd ſo much in the ſeveral Onſets they had made, that they were not able to purſue a Victory which coſt them ſo dear. In the Supplement to de Neuvilles Hiſtory of Holland, M. de Luxemburgh is introduc'd, ſaying, "That he admir'd the Retreat which "the Prince of Orange had made ſo much, "that he ſhould have been proud to have "made the like, in the like Circumſtance." The Author of the State of Europe was pleas'd to aſſure his Readers, That he had been aſſur'd, that the French King, ſpeaking of the Action, had ſaid, "Luxemburgh had "attack'd like the Prince of Condé, but the "Prince of Orange had made a Retreat like "Marſhal Turenne." (e) The ſame thing is alſo repeated by all our Hiſtorians. And, laſtly, it is agreed on all Hands, that the King remain'd ſo long in the Field of Battle, making the beſt Diſpoſition in his Power, for the Preſervation of his Troops, that it was with great Difficulty he preſerv'd himſelf, by recovering the Bridge which he had caus'd to be made at the Village of Neer-Heſpen.

But if the Retreat was really ſo well conducted, a Share of the Merit appears to belong to ſome of thoſe gallant Men, who had the Honour to command under his Majeſty: It is acknowledg'd, in his own Narrative, that he rejoin'd a Part of his Guards, a Part of Ramſey's Brigade, and the Horſe of his Left Wing, at the Village laſt nam'd; whence it is natural to ſuppoſe, that when they ſhrunk away, in the Manner ſpecified by M. de Feuquieres, it was in order to wait for him at that Paſs, and provide for his Safety: It is alſo acknowledg'd in the ſame Paper, That on the riſing Ground of Tirlemont he rejoin'd the Elector of Bavaria, with the Relicks of the Right Wing; and that with this Body he march'd that Night to Beterſem. The London Gazette farther adds, That on the 4th of Auguſt, General Talmaſh join'd his Majeſty at Eppigem, with the Engliſh Forces from Dierſt, whither he had made a very good Retreat; and that the Earl of Athlone, and M. d'Overkirke, came in at the ſame Place, with ſome Part of the Horſe, which had alſo made their Eſcape.

As to the Loſs on both Sides, Dijckvelt is wholly ſilent; in the King's Narrative it is only ſaid, "That in regard the Army is not yet all come together, we cannot tell what our Loſs is: We only underſtand that it is leſs than we thought it was at the Beginning; and 'tis very probable that the Enemy's Loſs A. D. 1693. is greater than ours, eſpecially among the Foot.—We have loſt ſome Colours, but we have taken a great Number from the Enemy." The London Gazette, No. 2891. roundly aſſerts, That the Enemy had loſt double the Number that the Allies had done. The ſame thing is repeated in No. 2893, as alſo in No. 2895, and in 2892. A Captain under the Duke of Wirtenbergh, who came ſoon after to London, is made to ſay, "That our Loſs did not exceed nine or ten thouſand Men, including the Wounded and Priſoners; whereas that of the French, by their own Confeſſion, was much greater; ſome reckoning ſixteen thouſand, and ſome twenty-five thouſand: And that we had not loſt any of our Cannon, except ſeven or eight Field Pieces." Again, in No. 2895, the Loſs of the Confederates is ſettled at 158 Officers, and 2939 private Men; near one Third of which were computed to be Priſoners: And it is added, That we took in the Battle fifty-five Standards and Colours, and about four hundred Priſoners: And yet, again, in No. 2897, we have a new Liſt, of Officers kill'd, 214; wounded, 296; private Men kill'd and taken, 6005; wounded, 3958.

On the other Hand, according to the Paris-Account, the French took ſeventy-ſix Pieces of Cannon, eight Mortars; both the Equipage and Ammunition of the whole Train; ſixty-ſix Standards, twenty-two Colours, twelve Pair of Kettle-Drums, and fifteen hundred Priſoners, of whom two hundred were Officers. In the ſame Paper it is alſo ſaid, That the Loſs on the Side of the Confederates, if all the Advices from their own Countries were to be relied on, amounted to twenty thouſand Men: Whereas the Loſs on their Side was computed at two thouſand Men kill'd, and three or four thouſand wounded.

M. de Feuquieres reduces the Loſs of the Confederates, as to Men, to eighteen thouſand kill'd and taken; but increaſes the Article of Cannon to one hundred and four Pieces.

Some of the Dutch Prints, ſet forth at that time, made no Scruple alſo, to countenance the Paris Account, not only by tranſcribing the Liſts it contain'd, but by admitting, That after the Camp had been forc'd, the French took ſixty Pieces of Cannon and ſome Mortars: And that for ſeven Standards and Colours, which the Confederates had taken and (f) kept, they had loſt eighty. And it ought not to be forgot, that the Author of the Jacobite Paper, quoted in the Notes below, in order to expoſe the extravagant Endeavours of the London Gazette, to impoſe on the Public at this Conjuncture, takes the Pains to (g) compare his Papers with the Dutch Recueils, as alſo with the Paris Gazettes;

(e) Theſe are the very Words of the Narrative, as it ſtands in the State of Europe: But in a Jacobite Paper, call'd Remarks on the London Gazette; another Paper publiſh'd by Authority, call'd, a Relation of the Battle of Landen, is cited, as affirming, that theſe two Lines did adventure to attack the Allies in their Retreat.

(g) After what Manner may be ſeen in the following curious Specimen, which I have Reaſon to believe is ſcarce any where elſe to be met with.

"The Gazette, Auguſt 3. ſays, That 'tis certain our Loſs is not ſo great as that at Neerwinden; which, according to the laſt Year's Gazette, did not amount to three thouſand Men. Gazette, Auguſt 4. 1692. This is ſtill more myſtical, therefore we muſt try if we can inform ourſelves other ways. Now, in order to the ſatisfying this Queſtion, we muſt,

It

1. Know, how strong the Confederates were before the Battle: How far they are, or expect to be reinforced; and to what Number the Army will amount after the Reinforcement. These three Things will give us a true State of the Loss. Now the Gazette, August 3. confesses the Army, when they fought, to be about forty-five thousand; which Expression ought rather to be interpreted above the Letter than otherwise; it being the Interest of the Gazetteer, after a Defeat, to diminish the Confederate Forces. However, we will be so fair as to take him at his acknowledged Number of forty five thousand.

The second thing to be enquir'd, is the Number of the Recruits, which we may learn from the Gazette of July 27. in these Words, "Our Army will be speedily reinforc'd with "twenty-five Battalions, and forty Squadrons, who are with "the Duke of Wirtenbergh; besides which, there are thirty "Battalions at Leige." The Gazetteer must mean, that the Battalions at Liege were to make part of the Reinforcement; otherwise to what Purpose were they mention'd? If this were not his Meaning, he might as well have said, "Besides the "Reinforcements, which we expect from the Duke of Wir-"tenbergh, there are thirty Dutch Battalions in New Bata-"via, in the East-Indies;" which though true would be horribly impertinent. We may observe farther, that the Forces the Gazette mentions at Leige, were not long since detach'd thither; ten Battalions being sent but eight Days before the Fight. (Relation of the Battle, &c.) 'Tis no Wonder, therefore, if they should be drawn back after so great an Accident: And if this Point were not sufficiently proved, M. Dijckvelt's Letter to the States General would put it beyond Dispute. This Gentleman, who had a public Character in the Dutch Army, gives his Masters a short Account of the Action, in a Letter of July 30, which is inserted in the Slip of August 4. At the End of the Letter we have these Words: "Our Army will be very numerous in a short "time; for besides twenty-five Battalions and forty Squa-"drons, with which the Duke of Wirtenberg forc'd the Lines, "there are moreover thirty Battalions at Leige."

Taking therefore these Liege Battalions into the Reinforcement, as we evidently must, let us see what it will amount to. There are twenty-five and thirty Battalions, which make fifty-five. Now reckoning five hundred to a Battalion, which is no extraordinary Computation, and the Number will be twenty-seven thousand five hundred Men. Add to these the forty Squadrons of Horse, at one hundred and fifty in a Squadron, and the Cavalry makes six thousand; which added to the former, mounts the Reinforcement to thirty-three thousand five hundred. If you please we will cut off six thousand five hundred of this Number, and state the Recruits but at twenty-seven thousand, and then the Reckoning will be made upon a low foot. Having done this, let us see how numerous the Confederates will be after the Reinforcement. For Satisfaction in this Enquiry, I shall, as formerly, apply to the London Gazette. That of August 3. affirms, that the Confederates, after the Duke of Wirtenberg, &c. has joyn'd them, will have an Army of fifty thousand Men. Let us call up the whole, The Confederates were forty-five thousand before the Fight; they have, and expect a Reinforcement of twenty-seven thousand, which added to the other, makes seventy-two thousand: After which Reinforcement they were not higher than fifty thousand Men. Now if we subtract fifty out of seventy-two there remains twenty two, which Number contains the Loss of the Confederates. So that, even by the Gazetteer's reckoning, the Battle has cost the Confederates twenty-two thousand Men. This Account agrees with several Letters of good Intelligence from Flanders, and with the Paris Gazette, which mentions the kill'd and wounded to amount to above twenty thousand. To this the Recueil, a Dutch Print, August 13. adds fifteen hundred Prisoners, of which two hundred were Officers of Note.

I mention the Paris Gazette, because it concurs with our Gazetteer. Besides, this Gazette is a Paper of Reputation, and is more relied on, even in the Confederacy itself, than that of London. To give one Instance, we may remember, the last Summer, that the Paris Gazette gave us as fair an Account of their Loss at Sea, as we receiv'd at Home from Admiral Russel's Journal; as may be seen by comparing the two Papers. Now those who give a just Relation of their Misfortunes, can't, in Reason, be suspected of Art when they report any remarkable Success. In such Cases there is scarce any Temptation to strain Truth: for the naked Representation of Fact is a sufficient Advantage. Indeed great Kings scorn to embase their public Intelligence with such uncreditable Alloy: For, in soft Language, to deceive and misrepresent, to maim and murder Truth, are mean and inglorious Practices: I wonder any thing that pretends to be a Government, can stoop so low. But we gain'd so much by romancing in 88, that I'm afraid we shall never leave it. Then the French League, and the Impostor Prince, and the handful of Irish, who, after they were routed and disbanded, were to massacre the whole Nation. English and Dutch Arjaies and all: These and a great many other Bull-beggers work'd beyond Expectation in that Annus Mirabilis. But if they think to keep the People under the same Vassalage of Belief, and always ready to swallow the same Absurdities, I hope they may be mistaken. To return to our Gazetteer, some of whose scatter'd Sentences being tack'd together, we see make it evident, that the Confederates have lost above twenty thousand Men. However, the Gazetteer gives us to understand, That 'tis certain our Loss is not so great as that at Steenkirk. Did we then in earnest loose twenty thousand Men at Steenkirk, and could we not find in our Hearts to own above three thousand? This is a Discovery would never have come out, had it not been upon this Occasion. In short, either our Loss was greater at Steenkirk than in the late Battle, or it was not; if it was, then we may perceive what an exact History we had of that Action the last Year; if it was not, then this Summer's Gazette endeavours to impose very unfairly upon the Nation. Now tho' 'tis pretty plain the London Gazetteer did not give us much above a third Part of the Steenkirk Misfortune, yet it was, in reality, far short of the present Accident. For I desire to know of the Gazetteer, whether more than one third of the Army was engag'd at Steenkirk? Did the Confederates then loose their Cannon, and great Part of their Baggage? Was the General's Plate taken at Steenkirk, and his Tent left the Duke of Luxemburgh to write his Letters in? Did the whole Army go off routed and broken into little Bodies, at Steenkirk; or did Mr. Harcourt come in and defeat several thousands in their Retreat? But after all, 'Tis certain the French have lost double the Number we have, Gazette, August 27. Pray how is this certain? Did we remain upon the Field to count the Slain? No, we were forc'd to retire. Have we muster'd since the Battle? We don't pretend to this neither: I suppose because Our Forces are not all of them come together. (Relation of the Battle, &c.) Have we receiv'd an Account from the French? That cannot be; for this Gazetteer (August 3.) tells you, They have publish'd none; and the Paris Gazette says the same. How then, are we certain? No doubt by Instinct, as we are certain of every thing else. For I perceive the Gazetteer does not pretend to come by his Knowledge the same way with other Mortals. Most People, I believe, would be so far from thinking the Gazetteer's Relation certain, that they would scarce imagine it possible. Indeed, how should it? For the French were granted to be almost two to one. This gives them the Advantage of fighting fresh Men, against those who are fatigued. Farther, they lost'd the Camp, and had three or four almost unresisting Hours to slaughter in. And to compleat the Misfortune of the Confederates, several thousands of them were left upon, and purfued into a River, by a fresh Enemy. (Recueil, August 13.) I shall now, in the Second Place, examine the Gazetteer's Relation concerning the Cannon and Baggage, &c. and here the first Gazette, July 27, says nothing of the Matter, which is a plain Confession that all was lost, (and thus we must construe the Gazette in like Cases.) The Gazetteer was apprehensive of this Inference, and therefore in his next of July 31, he brings in his Captain, (above cited) who secures all into a Trifle. And since he has put this Captain upon the Nation for an Intelligencer, he must be answerable for him. Now this Gentleman assures us, That we have lost none of our great Cannon, but only seven or eight Field pieces. I confess this looks like a Man, who can distinguish between a Cannon and a Pistol, that I was some time before I could believe the Gazetteer would put it upon us. I could not, at first, imagine he would give his Pais to such a ridiculous Story to travel the Nation: I was willing, for the Credit of the Gazette, to suppose an Error in the Press; and that instead of we have lost none of our great Cannon, &c. it should have been said, we have saved none of our great Cannon, but seven or eight Field pieces. That this was the true Reading I thought I had Reason to conclude, both from particular Relations of this Circumstance, and from the general Issue of the Battle. However, considering the Gazetteer's Custom, I believe the Print may be much more correct than the Story. Let us examine which way the Cannon could be saved, to bring the Point to a short Issue: If the Artillery was saved, it must be sent off either before, in, or after the Fight: That it was not sent away before the Fight is unquestionable; for would the Confederates part with their Cannon when the French were in sight, when they expected an immediate Attack, and design'd to keep within their Intrenchments? would they unfortify their Camp, and lay themselves open to the Enemy? We may as well suppose they would send away their Pikes and Musquets as their Cannon upon such an Occasion. Farther, to suppose the Artillery sent away, during the Fight, is as unaccountable as the former Scheme: For can we suppose they would part with their principal Defence at the time they were using it? We may as well imagine they detach'd half their Men, and chose to fight with the Remainder. From hence it appears, That unless the Cannon was sav'd in the Retreat, we must give it for lost. Now I appeal to any one of common Sense whether this was not impossible, when the Defeat was so entire, and the Flight made with such Haste and Precipitation? Could the Horse

A. D. 1693. Remarks on the King's Behaviour.

It appears, however, from the Evidence both of Friend and Foe, that the King's Behaviour, in all the Extremities of this dreadful Day, was ſuch as warranted the high Opinion which had been entertain'd of his Courage and Preſence of Mind. Not ſatisfy'd with receiving Reports, and giving Orders merely, he viſited every Poſt in Perſon: He undertook to remove every Difficulty; he fac'd every (b) Danger; and even when retreating, was rather over-power'd than vanquiſh'd. He had taken but two Hours Repoſe, and that in his Coach, the Night before; he had continued on Horſeback from the very Dawn: Several had been kill'd by his Side: One Muſquet-ball paſs'd thro' his Peruke, a ſecond thro' the Sleeve of his Coat, a third left a ſmall Contuſion on his Side; and theſe ſeveral Eſcapes gave the Gazetteer occaſion to ſay, "That God Almighty could not be ſufficiently prais'd for having, as it were by Miracle, preſerv'd him."

But if his Majeſty's Behaviour, during the late Action, has been ſo highly and juſtly extoll'd, his expoſing himſelf, and his Army, to ſuch an Attack has been as ſeverely condemn'd: "It was very inconſiderate, ſays the Marquis de Feuquieres, in this Prince to hazard a general Engagement, after he had ſo ſenſibly weaken'd his Army by the ſeveral Detachments which he had made under the Duke of Wirtembergh, and for the Security of Liege: And that more eſpecially, as he had more than ſufficient time to paſs the Geet, and to cover himſelf from the Poſſibility of an Attack, by poſting himſelf on the other Side." According to Boyer, Tindal. Others, moſt of his general Officers were of Opinion, That this was the only proper Meaſure he could take: And Biſhop Burnet, who ſays, That he acquir'd more Honour in this unfortunate Day, than when he triumph'd at the Boyne, not only admits, that he might have ſecur'd himſelf by paſſing the River, but adds, That his Conduct in not doing it was much cenſur'd, conſidering his Strength and the Enemy's; which is repreſented in our Gazettes as double to that of the Confederates.

On the other Hand M. de Feuquieres intimates, That the King was induc'd to make ſo deſperate an Experiment, by a Perſuaſion, that after ſo fatiguing a March, it would be impoſſible for the French Foot to force a Paſs which was ſo well (i) prepar'd to receive them; and that he ſhould be able to deſtroy them, in caſe they attempted it: Others again inſinuate, That having long importun'd his Allies to increaſe their ſeveral Proportions of Troops, without Succeſs, his Majeſty thought it worth his While to be beat, to convince them of their Error, and that as long as the French had the Superiority in point of Numbers, they would have the like Superiority in every Effort they made: But, not to enlarge on ſo horrid an Idea, as the ſacrificing ſo many thouſands of Lives, for the ſake of enforcing a Negotiation, if any Credit ought to be given to ſo ſtrange a Suggeſtion, it muſt be ſuppos'd, that the Allies could ſcarce fail of turning his Majeſty's own Artillery upon himſelf; or, in other Words, of urging, That if Numbers were ſo eſſential to Succeſs, it was ſcarce adviſable to invite ſuch a Loſs, by venturing on a Battle, when he had ſo conſiderably diminiſh'd his own.

A. D. 1693.

Suite de l'Hiſt. de Hollande, Tome I. p. 253.

Indeed, the very Event before us ſerves to ſhew, that ſuperiority of Numbers, may, in part, be balanc'd by ſuperiority of Situation: For, notwithſtanding the Triumphs of the French Court upon it, the Field of Battle, and the Trophies it was cover'd with, was all they gain'd by their Victory. It is true, in his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's Letter to the Archbiſhop of Paris, appointing another Te Deum to be celebrated on this ſignal Occaſion, he is pleas'd to make uſe of theſe pompous Words, "There is no-"thing which my Enemies have not Reaſon "to fear, after ſo terrible a Defeat, and no-"thing which I have not a Right to hope "for." And yet, inſtead of purſuing the Vanquiſh'd, after they had been yet farther weaken'd, by the Loſs of ſo many thouſands, their Cannon, &c. and ſeizing all the Advantages which might have been expected from ſo total a Rout, they retir'd half way back towards the Camp, which they had quitted in the Neighbourhood of Liege, and contented themſelves with ſending certain Detachments of Horſe into the Diſtrict of Bois-le-duc, to raiſe Contributions, which were lodge the Artillery in their Holders, or did the Foot run away with it under their Arms, as St. Denis is ſaid to carry off his Head? I deſire not to be miſunderſtood; I am far from being pleaſed with the Misfortune of any Party; I lament the Loſs of the Engliſh, and heartily wiſh we might have Peace and Juſtice, without the Expence of an Ounce of Blood; but ſuch a Reporter as the Gazetteer cannot be too much expos'd.

'Tis now time to look after the Baggage, if there be any. The Gazette, Auguſt 31, aſſures us it was all ſav'd, being ſent away the Day before the Fight. Under Favour, not all ſent away, for no doubt they left Ammunition to fight with; they left Proviſion and their Tents too, unleſs they intend never to eat or lodge there more. Now, to put their Men, after they were fatigu'd with fighting, and embarraſſed with the Wounded, upon a March of ſeveral Miles for Lodging and Refreſhment, is a Strain of Diſcipline ſomewhat extraordinary. I think the Gazetteer is too free with the Confederates, for as he repreſents the Matter, they ſeem to deſpair at the Approach of the Enemy, and reſolv'd, before hand, to quit their Camp. But to ſay this is Injuſtice to the Confederates, who behaved themſelves with Bravery and Reſolution, and were far from making ſuch an ignoble Proviſion as the Gazetteer's Account ſuppoſes.

(b) Tradition ſays, That in leading up certain Regiments, who kept too reſpectful a Diſtance, he thruſt his Sword thro' a Hedge, which was between him and the Enemy, and ſaid, Gentlemen, you muſt fire thro.

(i) This ſeems to be an Acknowledgment, That his Diſpoſition was, in general, a good one; and yet in a Note of Mr. Tindal's we are told, That M. de Luxemburgh, in reconnoitring his Camp, took occaſion to ſay, Now I believe Waldeck is dead. But, according to Burnet, the like thing was ſaid with regard to M. de Lauvois, on the Side of the Allies, when the French miſcarried in their Attempt on Rhinebergh. Vol. II. p. 110.

This Relation, together with that of Count Tilly's taking the French Baggage, ſixty Pieces of Cannon, &c. was ſo ſuperlatively extravagant, that I thought it had been calculated only for the Meridian of England; and that the Gazetteer would never have ſent it beyond Sea in his French Tranſlation; but upon Enquiry I find he has Courage in all Languages: I ſuppoſe he might preſent the Allies with this Narrative by way of Triumph, to ſhew to what Degree we may be practiſed upon, and how far he is Maſter of our Underſtandings.

A. D. 1693. were soon after oblig'd to withdraw, by other Parties of the Confederates.

This alone was sufficient to manifest that M. de Luxemburgh had disabled himself by his own Victory. But M. de Feuquieres makes no Difficulty to confess it; and also declares, That the Censures pass'd on M. de Luxemburgh for the State of Inactivity which he remain'd in, for some time afterwards, were equally groundless and inexcusable.

Having, however, been reinforc'd by Draughts out of the neighbouring Garrisons, as also from the Coasts of Picardy and Normandy, where a Descent from England was no longer apprehended, together with a considerable Detachment from the Dauphin's Army in Germany, the Marshal made several new Motions towards the End of August: (still without any Molestation from the Confederates, tho' it is affirm'd by our Historians, they were become as strong as ever, by the recalling the Duke of Wirtembergh, &c. And tho' the London Gazette continued still to assure the Public, that the French Troops were sickly, and in a very ill Condition) On the 9th of September, N. S. he caus'd several Parties to possess themselves of all the Approaches to Charleroy, and the next Day he invested it in form.

Burnet, (k) asserts, This was after the King (William) left the Army: But it is certain his Majesty did not leave the Army till the 5th of October, during all which time, and for some Days afterwards, the Governor and Garrison defended the Place with all the Bravery imaginable, having made three successful Sallies, and behav'd, in all Respects, so as to deserve Relief, if it had been possible to give it them. But that Place was so environ'd with the French Conquests, that, unless by forcing the Lines of the Besiegers, no Attempt of that Nature could be made: All, therefore, that was done in this Interval, was the detaching the Elector of Bavaria, and the Duke of Wirtembergh, with thirty Battalions and forty Squadrons towards Flanders, to amuse the Enemy; who, after a Parade of five Days, return'd to the Camp without attempting any thing farther.

Charleroy invested.

On the 11th, therefore, (after having not only sustain'd a general Storm, but repuls'd the Assailants on all Sides) the Governor beat a Parley, and surrender'd the Place; upon which Occasion his most Christian Majesty thought fit to appoint another Te Deum; and also to insult the Allies in his Mandate to the Archbishop of Paris, with the following Expressions: "I thought I "could not break up the Campaign in "Flanders more advantegeously than with "the Reduction of Charleroy, which totally "shuts out the Enemy from the Countries "which I have conquer'd." And, again, "The long Resistance (made by the Be"sieg'd) is not so much owing to their "Valour, as to the Care I caus'd to be "taken of the Lives of my Soldiers; under "a Persuasion that the Enemy, beaten as "they had been at Neerwinden, would "not be in a Condition to succour the "Place, &c." and takes.

A. D. 1693.

Thus ended the Campaign in Flanders; and our next Province must be that of Germany.

The Sequel of the Campaign in Germany.

And, first, as to the Dauphin's March with so large a Body of Troops from Flanders, towards the Rhine, we are to understand, that it was in Consequence of the new Engagements, which the French Court had enter'd into with the Divan; and which we are told were of so strict a Nature, that two of the Turkish Chiauxes accompany'd M. de l'Orges, by Stipulation, to observe the Progress he made; and to adjust, if possible, a Correspondence in the several Efforts that were to be made on the Empire, by the Grand Signior on the one Side, and his most Christian Ally on the other.

But, notwithstanding the Presence of these licenc'd Spies, and that the Emissaries of France at the Port, would scarce suffer the Word Peace to be mention'd there, the Dauphin was furnish'd with a Manifesto, containing Offers of an Accommodation, which he caus'd to be scatter'd along the Borders of the Rhine, in hopes, that what with the recent Remembrance of the Fate of Heydelbergh, and what with the Apprehension of yet farther Excesses from a more numerous Army, the German Princes, or some of them at least, would have been indue'd to embrace them; and, if out-voted in the Diet, would have consulted their own particular Interest in accepting a Neutrality.

A Manifesto set forth by the Dauphin, containing Offers of Peace.

And as to the Contents of this Piece, it is set forth in the Preamble, That, whereas several Princes of the Empire earnestly desir'd that the most Christian King would specify on what Conditions a Peace might be obtain'd, his Majesty thought himself oblig'd to make known the said Conditions, as well by the Means of the King of Sweden, who had been the first to offer his Mediation, as others equally desirous to re-establish the public Tranquility; together with all the Securities which could be reciprocally requir'd to render it perpetual. The Treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen were then mention'd as the Basis of this Peace: After which it was propos'd to convert the twenty Years Truce, concluded at Ratisbon in August 1684, into a defensive Treaty, with such Alterations as might be a convincing Proof to the Empire, that his Majesty had no Thoughts of making any new Conquests, namely, 1. That in Recompence for the City and Fort of Strasburg, which his Majesty was in Possession of, and purpos'd to keep in perpetuity, Montroyal and Trearbach should be ras'd and restor'd to the Princes to whom they belong'd; under a Proviso, that they should never be re-fortified. 2. That all the Works of Fort Lewis, and Hunningben, beyond the Rhine, should be demolish'd. 3. That

A. D. 1693. 3. That Philipſburgh, with its Fortreſs, and Friburgh, together with all their Fortifications, ſhould be reſtor'd.

Here followed certain Paragraphs, tending to diſplay his Majeſty's Goodneſs and Bounty, in making ſo many and ſo great Conceſſions for the Sake of Peace; and to convince the Germans how extremely well it was worth their while to accept them.

And then it was farther ſignified, That his Majeſty was moreover willing to reſtore Heydelbergh, and all the Dependencies of the Palatinate to the Elector thereof; as alſo, to indemnify him with reſpect to the Clames of the Ducheſs of Orleans, his Majeſty's Siſter-in-Law, on the Succeſſion of that Houſe, and to put the ſaid Elector in full and peaceable Poſſeſſion of the Whole of his Dominions.

Proceeding, in the next Place, to the Article of Lorrain, it was added, That tho' upon the Refuſal of the late Duke to accept of the Proviſion which had been made in his Favour, by the Treaty of Nimeguen, the Empire had no longer any Right to interpoſe in that Affair, his Majeſty was nevertheleſs willing to allow his Son an Equivalent for that Duchy, by way of annual Revenue.

His Majeſty was yet farther pleas'd to admit, That in caſe any Re-unions had been formerly made, which were not conformable to Treaty, Commiſſioners might be appointed, on both Sides, to examine afreſh the Complaints which might be preferr'd: And if the ſaid Commiſſioners could not agree in their Deciſions, to refer the Matter finally to the Arbitration of the Republic of Venice.

Laſtly, he declar'd, That in regard he was deſirous of a general Pacification, he was ready to agree to ſuch reaſonable Propoſitions as ſhould be offer'd to regulate the Differences ſubſiſting between him and the other confederated Powers at War. And that this Paper-Battery of his might do ſo much the more Execution, he was pleas'd to conclude with a Period, which was in Subſtance as follows:

"Theſe are the Conditions upon which the Tranquility of the Empire, and conſequently that of all Europe, may be ſpeedily re-eſtabliſh'd; and which the French Ambaſſador at Stockholm has receiv'd Orders to impart to the King of Sweden, as the Ultimatum of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty; to the End, that he may, if he pleaſes, communicate the ſame to the Emperor and Empire; and that, ſo they may be inform'd with the ſooneſt of the Advantages laid before them: Alſo, that in caſe they refuſe theſe Advantages, they may thank themſelves for the Miſchiefs and Miſeries of a War, which they chuſe to prolong; and which cannot fail to ſpread farther, and grow more inſupportable, conſidering the additional Force with which the Dauphin is to carry it on."

The ſame communicated by the Swediſh Miniſter to the Diet.

In Effect, the whole was a Copy of the Memorials, ſeverally preſented by M. d'Auvaux to the King of Sweden; and by M. de Bourepos to the King of Denmark; and again by the Miniſters of theſe ſeveral Powers communicated to the Diet of Ratiſbon; where it operated in a manner very different from the Expectation of the French Court. For the firſt of theſe Miniſters having declar'd to the Diet, previous to the Delivery of the ſaid Memorial, That the Orders he had receiv'd were ſimply to preſent it to the Conſideration of the Powers concern'd, not to adviſe the Acceptance of the Offer therein contain'd, the Envoy of Brandenburgh was authoris'd to repreſent to him, firſt in the Name of the Elector his Maſter, That if thoſe Offers were accepted, the Ruin of Germany would be the inevitable Conſequence: And that in order to be ſecure from the Encroachments and Inſults of France, it was abſolutely neceſſary for the Confederates to be ſo far Maſters, as to have it in their Power to oblige her to obſerve the Treaties of Munſter and the Pyrenean, by a Reſtitution of all ſhe had ſince uſurp'd, and by conſenting to a ſufficient Barrier. Secondly, To aſſure him, That his ſaid Maſter was highly ſatisfied with the candid and upright Conduct of his Swediſh Majeſty, in communicating the French Offers, without recommending the Acceptance of them. And, Thirdly, To return him Thanks, in Behalf of the Empire, and, in general, of the whole Confederacy; as alſo, to intimate their Hopes, That he would ſo far proceed in his good Offices, as to let the French Miniſters at Stockholm know how unjuſt and ignominious his Propoſals were eſteem'd by the Germanic Body: And that his Majeſty would have the Goodneſs to interpoſe in ſuch a manner as ſhould oblige France to treat on a much more reaſonable Plan, if ſhe had any real Intentions to treat at all.

Reſentments it occaſion'd.

The Miniſters of ſeveral other Powers took occaſion alſo to ſignify, how highly their Maſters reſented the very Offer of ſuch ignominious Terms: And with regard to the Aſſertion of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, That ſeveral Princes of the Empire had importun'd him to ſpecify his Demands, the ſame Miniſters undertook to purge their Maſters from all Concern in that Application, by ſigning a formal Declaration to the contrary; and alſo a Proteſt againſt every ſuch Proceeding, as having a Tendency to deſtroy the Union amongſt the Princes and States of the Empire, which had been found ſo neceſſary for the Support of the common Cauſe againſt the common Enemy.

Laſtly, even the Miniſter of Denmark was pleas'd to declare, That tho' his Daniſh Majeſty was, indeed, well inclin'd to employ all his good Offices for the Re-eſtabliſhment of the Peace, thoſe Inclinations of his regarded a general Peace only: And that he was ſo far from prompting or countenancing a ſeperate Treaty, for the particular Convenience or Gratification of any of the Confederates, that both as a Confederate, and a Member of the Empire, he was determin'd to take ſuch a Part as ſhould be agreeable to this Declaration, and to his Attachment to the general Intereſt.

And

A. D. 1695.

And this laſt Circumſtance naturally leads us to explane another of the French Devices, which took place in this Interval, namely, to ſpirit up the Daniſh Court to proſecute their Clame on Saxe Lawenburgh by the Sword; whereby they hop'd to be avenged on the Houſe of Lunenburgh, and, at the ſame time, to throw the Empire into Confuſion.

The King of Denmark induc'd to bombard Ratſburgh.

Accordingly, after a Variety of menacing Expreſſions, and ſome military Motions to countenance them, his Majeſty of Denmark aſſembled an Army of about 12,000 Men at Oldeſloe, in Holſtein, about the Middle of Auguſt; from whence he detach'd a Body of Horſe on the 17th, to take Poſſeſſion of certain Poſts in that Duchy, which they did, without Interruption: But in the mean time the Princes of Lunenburgh did not fail to re-inforce the Garriſon which they had thrown into Ratſburgh, nor to draw together the Remains of their Troops, to which the Elector of Brandenburgh was alſo pleas'd to join 4000 more, that thoſe Princeſs might be in a Condition to ſtand their Ground, without being forc'd to recall their Contingent from the Service in Flanders.

But the great Object both of his Electoral Highneſs, and, indeed, of all the Princes of the Confederacy, was to accommodate the Diſpute in an amicable way; and, notwithſtanding the joint Endeavours of the Miniſters of the Emperor, England, Sweden, Holland, &c. his Daniſh Majeſty proceeded ſo far as to inveſt the Place on the 1ſt of September, and to bombard it from four ſeveral Batteries with ſo much Effect, that the next Day a Ceſſation was offer'd and agreed to; after which the Negotiations were renew'd; and having been prolong'd till the 9th of October, produc'd a proviſional Treaty, which was ſign'd that Evening; and in which it was agreed,

A Treaty of Accommodation.

1. That the antient Friendſhip, and good Correſpondence which had ſubſiſted between his Majeſty and the Houſe of Lunenburgh, ſhould be renew'd and confirm'd. 2. That the Fortifications of Ratſburgh ſhould be entirely demoliſh'd within three Weeks after the Exchange of the Ratifications. 3. That immediately after the ſaid Demolition, the Princes of Lunenburgh ſhould withdraw their Artillery and Troops, with an Exception to 200 Men, who were ſtill to remain in the ſaid Duchy, to keep Poſſeſſion thereof. 4. That the Day after the Exchange of the Ratifications, the King of Denmark ſhould begin to withdraw all his Troops from before Ratſburgh; and that in fourteen Days they ſhould entirely quit the Country. 5. That all Hoſtilities ſhould ceaſe from the Day of ſigning the ſaid Treaty: That the Daniſh Forces ſhould exact no farther Contributions, and ſhould be puniſh'd in caſe of Miſbehaviour. 6. That the King of Denmark ſhould in no Manner attempt to decide the Succeſſion of Saxe Lawenburgh by Force, againſt the Houſe of Lunenburgh, much leſs diſturb the ſame in the Poſſeſſion thereof, but ſhould leave the Diſpute to be determin'd according to Right. And, 7. The Mediators undertook to guaranty the Treaty, and to ſee it carry'd into Execution, as Occaſion ſhould ſerve.

A. D. 1695.

Thus the Houſe of Lunenburgh was not only defended againſt Denmark, but left in Poſſeſſion of the Duchy: And if any Douceur was granted to his Daniſh Majeſty, in Recompence of ſo many Conceſſions to them as are contain'd in the Treaty, the Secret was ſo well kept, that it has eſcap'd the Notice of Hiſtory.

Laſtly, What Effect this Turmoyle, in the Circle of Weſtphalia, had on the general Syſtem of Germany, is hard to explane; but no doubt it had ſome: And if the French Miniſters were not ſufficiently attentive to every Advantage which was poſſible to draw from it, they deviated, in this Inſtance, from the uſual Tract of their Policy.

The Dauphin arrives at Montroyal.

To proceed: On the 30th of June, N. S. the Dauphin, with his Army, reach'd Montroyal; and about the Middle of July he join'd M. de l'Orges, one of whoſe Parties had juſt before forc'd the Poſt of Zwegenberg, and taken the Caſtle by ſtorm. Some Days were ſpent in refreſhing the Troops after their March, in re-inforcing certain Poſts, in ſending out Parties, &c. or rather, under thoſe Pretences, in deliberating on a Plan of Operation. At length, however, they mov'd in two Bodies towards the Necker; and at the ſame Inſtant the Prince of Baden diſpatch'd Expreſs upon Expreſs to the Elector of Saxony, and the Landgrave of Heſſe, whoſe Troops were ſtill in ſeperate Camps, remote from each other, with the moſt preſſing Inſtances to join him; which the common Danger induc'd them to do; as alſo to ſettle the Point of Command, (concerning which, ſo many Difficulties had been ſtarted by the Elector of Saxony, that the Imperial Court thought fit to ſend the Baron Bennerberg, in the Capacity of Envoy Extraordinary to his Electoral Highneſs, to endeavour to ſurmount them) the Saxons being allotted the Right Wing, under their Elector, the Heſſians the Left, under the Landgrave, and the Center to the Imperialiſts, under the Prince of Baden.

and paſſes the Necker.

On the 29th of July the Dauphin paſs'd the Necker, between Marbach and Conſtadt, and on the 31ſt came in ſight of the Allies. His Army conſiſted of between 60 and 70,000 Men: The Allies were ſcarce 50,000; but then they were ſo poſted, that the French could draw no Advantage from their Superiority: Their Right being covered with impaſſable Woods and Waters, their Left with Rocks inacceſſible, and their whole Front diſpos'd in three Lines along the Ridges of a Hill, in the Form of a half Moon, under the Protection of their Artillery.

The Impoſſibility of forcing ſuch a Camp was apparent; and yet that ſomething like an Attempt might be made, on the firſt of Auguſt all the French Horſe, ſuſtain'd by 4000 Grenadiers, having ſkirted the Left Wing of the Germans, took Poſt at Kruppenback; the next Day the whole Army advanced; ſome Batteries were rais'd; and ſuch a Diſpoſition was made, as if they were on

A. D. 1693. on the Point of making a regular Attack: But having carried the Farce thus far, a Council of War was held on Horſeback, in the Field; and at the Inſtance of Meſſieurs de l'Orges, de Choiſuel, de Boufflers, and thoſe who commanded under them, the Dauphin was induc'd to drop the Curtain; or to ſpeak more plainly, to diſmount his Guns, and remand his Forces to their Camp, which he alſo abandon'd on the 6th, in order to repaſs the Necker. But tho' it was the 13th before he had fully completed that Motion, all the Moleſtation which he receiv'd in his Retreat, was from the Huſſars, and other Irregulars of the Allies, who hung upon his Rear, and glean'd up ſuch Stragglers as had the Misfortune to be left expos'd to their Fury.

But finding it impoſſible to force the Camp of the Allies, repaſſes it again.

But the good Poſture of the Germans was not the only Conſideration which induc'd his Royal Highneſs to make this Retreat; his Horſe were in a very ill Condition, Numbers of his Men were ſick, and his Army was but indifferently furniſh'd with Proviſions: For the whole country being their Enemies, the Peaſants ſhewed no Mercy to ſuch Foragers as fell into their Hands: And before ſuch Meaſures could be taken as might have enabled him to face the Enemy again, he receiv'd Intelligence of the bloody Action in Flanders, accompany'd with Orders to detach M. de Boufflers, with 12000 Men, to reinforce the Duke de Luxemburgh, and 10,000 to M. de Catinat at Piedmont; as alſo to expedite his own Return to Verſailles; and to leave M. de l'Orges to act on the Defenſive, during the Reſidue of the Campaign.

and returns to Verſailles.

His Parties, nevertheleſs, had Time allow'd them to complete the Ruin of Heydelbergh, by demoliſhing whatſoever remain'd undemoliſh'd; as alſo to fall upon the Duchy of Wirtembergh, with Fire and Sword, by way of Revenge, for their refuſing to pay 400,000 Rix-Dollars, which the French, at the Inſtance of the Swediſh Envoy, had agreed to accept, by way of Compoſition for the Arrears of four Years Contributions: And poſſibly it was for the Sake of reſcuing this favourite Duchy out of their Hands, that the Confederates at laſt decamp'd from Hailbron: For it was not till the 29th of Auguſt that they put themſelves in Motion: And no ſooner had they diſappointed the Enemy in their Deſign on Tubingen, and oblig'd them to evacuate Eſlingen, Stutgard and Vahingen, than the Army ſeparated; the Saxons (with an Exception to 4000 Foot and 2000 Horſe, who had 300,000 Florins, by way of Conſideration for their wintering on the Frontiers) and the Heſſians returning home about the Middle of September; and the Prince of Baden remaining but a little while longer in the Field, to obſerve the Motions of M. de l'Orges, who having conſum'd the Forage in the Briſgaw, broke up his Camp and paſſed into Winter-Quarters.

About the ſame time that the Dauphin arriv'd with his Army in Germany, the Allies began to enter upon Action in Piedmont, after having left 4000 Germans and Spaniards to block up Caſal.

A. D. 1693. Campaign in Piedmont.

It has been already hinted, that the firſt Rout they took was towards Suſa; and it was alſo given out that their Purpoſe was to recover that Place. But this Motion of theirs was no other than a Feint, to amuſe M. Catinat, who had taken Poſt in the Neighbourhood of that Place with a Part of his Army. And that he did take Poſt there, is treated as an Error of Judgment by M. de Feuquieres; as alſo that he ſhould continue on the Defenſive for ſo long together, when the dilatory Proceedings of the Allies gave him ſo fair an Opportunity to have acted offenſively with Advantage: Had he, according to that military Critic, aſſembled his Forces in the Plain of Milleſleurs, near Turin, which was at equal Diſtance from the two out-lets of the Valley of Suſa and Pignerol, he would have ſecured the Superiority through the whole Courſe of the Campaign; and might have directed his Efforts againſt Turin itſelf, which was the great Object of the French Arms in thoſe Parts. Whereas, by miſ-judging his Ground, and waiting for them to begin firſt, he gave them time to collect their Strength, and ſuſpend their Animoſities, and expos'd himſelf to all the ill Conſequences of the Practice which they tried upon him. For, while he perſuaded himſelf that their Intention really was to fall upon Suſa, and in order to provide more effectually for the Security of that Place, he drew ſome other Corps from the Detachment which he had poſted on the Hills of Pignerol, all at once they made a Diſpoſition to attack the latter by three ſeveral Paſſes; who ſeeing themſelves in danger of being overpower'd, and out of the Reach of Aſſiſtance, abandon'd their Lines without waiting to be forc'd. The Spaniards, under the Command of the Marquis de Leganez, about the ſame time alſo made themſelves Maſters of the Vallies of Perouſa and Pragelas; and M. Catinat continuing to retreat till he gain'd the Col del Feneſtrelle, the Duke of Savoy ſat down before Pignerol; and by way of preparatory to the Reduction of that Place, began with the Fort of St. Bridget. The Trenches were opened the 30th of July, and the ſame Day the Spaniards taking Poſt before Pignerol, that important Place was ſhut up on all Sides. St. Bridget, nevertheleſs, held out till the 13th, and then the Garriſon, who had defended themſelves with great Bravery, ſeeing the Breach practicable, and the Beſiegers preparing for a general aſſault, withdrew in the Night into the town, leaving a Mine under one of the Baſtions, ready to burſt, behind them; which ſprung ſoon after, but without doing the Miſchief intended to the Troops of the Allies, who took Poſſeſſion of the Place.

Errors imputed to M. Catinat.

Pignerol inveſted.

It was now believed that Pignerol would have been beſieg'd in form: But on the Iſſue of a Council of War, it was reſolved only to bombard it for the preſent, and then to go in queſt of M. Catinat, before Pignerol bombarded.

A. D. 1693. the Reinforcements came up which he expected from Catalonia and Germany. Accordingly, all the Forts and Redoubts which the French had rais'd along the River Chisoa, to secure the Paſſage of their Convoys to Pignerol, to the Number of about thirty, having been demoliſh'd, and the whole Valley of Pragellas having been laid waſte, as far as Feneſtrelles, to deprive the Enemy of what Subſiſtence they might draw from thence, the Bombardment was actually begun the 27th of September, tho' the Towns-men made an Offer of 40,000 Piſtoles to be exempted from that Viſitation, and continued for three Days: After which, at another Council of War, it was farther reſolv'd to blow up Fort St. Bridget; which having been alſo perform'd, on the 2d of October the Army decamp'd, with Intention to advance to the little River of Sangon, which deſcends from the Mountains about a League from Rivoli, and falls into the Po, below Moncalie, but proceeded no farther than the Rivulet of la Quieſole, or Ciſola, about three or four Miles from Pignerol, where they were join'd by their Horſe, which had been poſted for ſome Days in the Neighbourhood of Orbaſſon: What occaſion'd this ſudden Halt, was the Advice which his Royal Highneſs receiv'd, That M. de Catinat, having receiv'd the Recruits he expected, had alſo made a Motion that very Day, and had poſted his Right at Rivoli, and his Left towards Beinaſco.

London Gazette, No. 2918.

Errors committed by his Royal Highneſs.

It is obſerv'd by M. de Feuquieres, that the Valley of Suſa was the only Place where M. de Catinat could aſſemble his Horſe; that Rivoli was the only Paſs thro' which he could march from thence towards the Enemy; and that the Duke of Savoy committed a very great Error in ſuffering the French to get Poſſeſſion of both theſe Advantages, which laid him under a Neceſſity to face them at Marſaglia, between the Rivers of Ciſola and Nova, which in that Seaſon of the Year were almoſt dry. He, the Duke, imagin'd, however, if the ſame Author is rightly inform'd, that even by this Diſpoſition, the Advantage of the Ground was of his Side: For, in caſe of a Defeat, it was eaſy for him to retire towards the Po, near Villa-Franca and Saluces: Whereas, in caſe he was victorious, the French muſt, of Neceſſity, be driven back into the Valley of Suſa; and by marching a Part of his Foot to Cumiana and Javan, which commanded the Entrance of the ſaid Valley on the other Side, he made no doubt of being able to cut of their Retreat; in conſequence of which he reckon'd, that not only Suſa and Pignerol would fall into his Hands, but that he ſhould find himſelf in a Condition to make another Irruption into Dauphiny, and even to take up his Winter Quarters at Lyons and Grenoble.

Such, we are told, were the ſanguine Expectations of his Royal Highneſs, and the Motives that induc'd him (tho' prevented in his firſt Purpoſe of taking Poſt at Rivoli) to hazard an Engagement which he might have eaſily avoided.

On the 3d both Armies came in ſight, and ſeverally drew up in order of Battle; A. D. 1693. the Left of the Confederates being compos'd of the Troops of Spain, as well Horſe as Foot, under the Command of the Marquis de Leganez, and three Imperial Regiments of Horſe and Dragoons. The Imperial and Piedmonteſe Cavalry cover'd the Right, which was commanded by the Duke of Savoy, aſſiſted by Count Caprara: And the Infantry of his Imperial Majeſty, of the King of Great Britain, and of his Royal Highneſs, both completed that Wing, and alſo form'd the Center, which was commanded by Prince Eugene of Savoy, who had under him the Marquis de la Parelle, and the Count de las Torres: For Duke Schomberg, who, in the Right of the King his Maſter, was entitled to the third Poſt in the Army, having been deny'd his Rank, refus'd to take any Command at all, and made it his Choice to charge at the Head of his own Regiment, in the Capacity of a Colonel only.

Duke Schomberg diſguſted.

What his Royal Highneſs moſt apprehended was, That M. Catinat had an Intention to gain a March upon him, and ſit down before Turin: And it was in order to defeat this Intention of the Marſhal's, or to have it in his Power to fall upon his Rear, in caſe he perſever'd in it, that he quitted the high Grounds of Piaſaſca, and extended his Right towards the Sangon: But by this Motion he not only gave the Marſhal an Opportunity of covering his Right with the Skirts of thoſe Eminencies, but expos'd his own Left to be attack'd without any Coverat all.

That Day, however, paſs'd over without any Attempt on either Side: And at a Council of War, held in the Evening, it was reſolv'd, by the Confederates, to continue under Arms all Night, as alſo to ſend away all the Baggage, and to remove ſomewhat nearer the Enemy, who were poſted between Orbaſſan and Piaſaſco, that they might be ſo much the more in readineſs to obſerve their Motions in the Morning.

Accordingly, at Day-break, they (the Enemy) were perceiv'd, at a ſmall Diſtance, forming themſelves in order of Battle; upon which the Confederates immediately halted, and drew up in the ſame Order as the Day before, as well as the Ground would permit; with this additional Circumſtance, That they poſted eight Pieces of Cannon on a riſing Ground, which was on their Right, together with a Body of Foot to guard them: And the Expediency of this Meaſure is pointed out by M. de Feuquieres, who ſays, That his Royal Highneſs had provided no better Security for his Troops even on that Side, than two ſmall Woods, or rather Coppices, which it was not difficult even for the Cavalry to penetrate.

London Gazette, No. 2918.

It was now diſcover'd that M. de Catinat had greatly the Superiority in point of Number; and it is probable a Diſcovery ſo unexpected ſtruck a Damp in the Confederates: For inſtead of continuing to advance, as they had hitherto done, and as might have been expected from theſe who had reſolv'd to fight at all Hazards, they continued

nued in their Lines for two Hours together, obſerving the Countenance of the Enemy, who, it is ſaid, made no Motion during that Interval likewiſe: But then, in the ſame Breath, it is added, That the detach'd Parties of the Allies brought Advice, That certain Squadrons of the Enemy, having made their way thro' the Vineyards, with which the whole Country were in a manner cover'd, appear'd in flank of their Right Wing; which ſeems to indicate, That tho' the Groſs of M. de Catinat's Army continued motionleſs, theſe Squadrons made uſe of that very Interval to obtain that Advantage. But however that may be, no ſooner had the Allies detach'd the Regiments of Palſi and Caraffa, together with ſome Foot, to hold theſe Squadrons in check, than the French began the Attack on the Spaniards, on the Left; not as uſual, with a regular Fire of their Infantry; but having receiv'd that of the Allies, charged them with Bayonets fix'd, and Sword in Hand; and were either ſo well ſupported, or met with ſo little Reſiſtance, that they ſoon diſorder'd the whole Wing; for it being form'd of Battalions and Squadrons intermix'd, all ſucceſſively gave way, and were, in the End, not only totally routed, but thrown in that Confuſion, on the Center and Right Wing, which, according to the Confeſſion of their very Enemies, behav'd with the utmoſt Bravery; having three ſeveral times repuls'd the Enemy; and the laſt ſo effectually, that it was, for a while, ſuppos'd that Victory was on the Point of declaring for them: But on the fourth Attack, the Enemy being conſiderably reinforced with freſh Troops, the Spaniards and Milaneze being ſurrounded and driven, as before obſerv'd, upon the Germans, who were, at the ſame time, vigorouſly charg'd by the Gend'armerie, the Infantry expos'd in Front, Flank and Rear, without any Horſe to cover them, it was found impoſſible to continue the Diſpute which had laſted between four and five Hours, any longer. Accordingly Orders were given for a Retreat: And we are told in the London-Gazette, that, vanquiſh'd as they were, they made a good one: In a letter to the States-General it is even ſaid, That the French did not make the leaſt Shew of purſuing them: But the French themſelves declare, That they continued the Chace as far as Turin: And Others affirm, That near 3000 Spaniards in a Body, apprehending that no Quarter would be given them, threw themſelves at the Feet of the French Soldiers, with their Beads in their Hands, and croſſing themſelves over and over, beſought their Mercy, as being good Catholics, and not Lutherans.

The French begin the Attack.

and obtain a compleat Victory.

Suite de l'Hiſtoire de Holl. Tom. 1. p. 261.

Different Accounts of the Loſs on both Sides.

There is as little Agreement in the ſeveral Accounts of the Loſs on each Side, as in the manner of the Retreat: According to the London-Gazette, the whole Loſs of the Confederates, kill'd, wounded, and taken, amounted to no more than 5500 Men: Whereas that of France, under the ſame Heads, is ſwell'd up to between 6 and 7000: But according to the French Account, the Loſs of the Allies amounted at leaſt to 8000 Men, and on their Side at moſt to 1500 or 2000. A. D. 1693.

That all their Cannon, except eight Pieces, and above a hundred Colours and Standards, fell into the Hands of the Conquerors, is admitted on all Sides: And the real Colour of the Action may be collected from what is more particularly related of the Behaviour of the brave but unhappy Duke of Schomberg in the Letter before cited, to the States-General, as follows: "The Troops of his Majeſty of Great Britain, who were in the Corps de Battaille, particularly diſtinguiſh'd themſelves, and the Duke of Schomberg, who commanded them, fought at the Head of his own Regiment, and would not accept of any other Command. The Count de las Torres deſir'd him, after the third Attack of the Enemy, to take upon him the Command, and to cauſe a Retreat to be made by the Center and Right Wing, which as yet had not ſuſtain'd any great Detriment: But the Duke reply'd, That it was firſt neceſſary to have his Royal Highneſs's Order, and till that came it was fit to ſtand the Enemies Fire; adding, That he found Things were ſo far gone, that they muſt either overcome or die. The Valour of that General is greatly to be admir'd. He had the Misfortune to be wounded in the Thigh; and his Valet de Chambre, ſeeing him fall, ran to him, and call'd out for Quarter, but was kill'd before he could be heard. The Duke was, at the ſame Inſtant, taken Priſoner; and ſoon after ſent back on his Parole to Turin;" where he dyed on the 17th following, more applauded than lamented: For thoſe who envy'd his Accompliſhments, could not forbear to acknowledge them, and having paid that Debt to his Merit, were pleas'd with a Vacancy which they hop'd to fill with their own. The Earl of Warwick and Holland, then upon his Travels, accompany'd his Grace that Day as a Voluntier, and ſo far ſhar'd in his Fate, as to be wounded, and taken Priſoner, tho' his Wound did not prove mortal: And in the ſaid Letter to their High and Mighty Lordſhips, we find it farther acknowledg'd, That the greateſt Loſs fell on the Troops of Spain; and yet that of the Regiments in the Pay of Great Britain, not a Third were left: As alſo, that of Schombergh's own Corps, no leſs than eighteen Officers were taken Priſoners, and moſt of them mortally wounded.

Account of the Behaviour and Death of the Duke of Schomberg.

The Earl of Warwick, a Voluntier in the Battle, wounded and taken Priſoner.

Laſtly, in his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's Letter to the Archbiſhop of Paris, appointing another Te Deum to be celebrated on occaſion of this new Victory, we find the following Expreſſions. "After having happily prevented the Execution of ſeveral Projects, which the Enemy had form'd againſt Pignerol, and forc'd them to riſe from before it; my Couſin, the Marſhal de Catinat, whom I had order'd to fight them, wherever he ſhould find them, came up with, and attack'd them on the 4th of this Month, in the Plain of Marſaglia, near Turin; Nine

A. D. 1693. Nine or ten thouſand of the Enemy were ſlain upon the Spot; near 2000 were made Priſoners; thirty-four Pieces of Cannon, and 106 Colours, of Horſe and Foot, were taken. The broken Remains of their Army fled thro' as many Ways as they could find, and left mine in Poſſeſſion of the Field of Battle, and every other Circumſtance which could conſtitute a complete Victory."

Partial Accounts ſet forth by the Confederates.

But how much ſoever the French triumph'd, and with what Reaſon ſoever they did ſo, the Confederates, as uſual, put the beſt Face imaginable on ſo bad an Affair. The London Gazette not only gave out that the Allies made good their Retreat to Moncalier, but alſo that they had received a Reinforcement, and were again preparing to march againſt the Enemy: And another Writer, on the ſame Side, is hardly enough to aſſert, That when the ſeveral Corps, which had been diſpers'd at Marſaglia, were all rejoin'd, they were found to be 25000 ſtrong; whereas the Gazette, laſt quoted, in order to leſſen the Glory on one ſide, and diminiſh the Diſgrace on the other, inſiſts, That the Number of the Allies, before the Battle, was but 22000, whereas the French were 36000.

No. 2919.

State of Europe for November.

The Truth, however, is, that they were ſo far from being in a Condition to take the Field again, that the Marquis de Leganez repair'd immediately to his Government, to make the beſt Proviſion he could to remedy the Misfortune; the Duke of Savoy thought only of the Preſervation of Coni, into which Place he made a ſhift to throw a Reinforcement, which, on Paper, amounted to 2500 Men: And, in the mean time, M. de Catinat ſent out his Parties, on every Side, to lay the Country under Contribution; which they did wherever they came, without Meaſure or Mercy.

M. Catinat unable to form the Siege of Coni.

But even he had ſuffer'd ſo much in the late Engagement, that, notwithſtanding his preſent Superiority, and the extreme Deſire he had of finiſhing the Campaign, with the Reduction of Coni, he was forc'd to deſiſt from that Project; and, having furniſh'd the ſeveral Garriſons of Caſal, Pignerol and Suſa, with as much Ammunition and Proviſions as he could ſpare, and ſecur'd ſeveral important Poſts, to facilitate his Return in the Spring, made the neceſſary Diſpoſitions for repaſſing the Mountains, in order to procure his Troops the Refreſhments which they ſtood ſo greatly in Need of, after the Fatigues of the Campaign.

New Offers of France to the Duke of Savoy.

But while he yet remain'd at Saluces, and was employ'd in exhauſting and laying waſte the Country round about him, the King, his Maſter, left no Method untried either to obtain a ſeperate Peace with the Duke of Savoy, or to get a firm Footing on the other Side of the Alps, under the Pretence of purchaſing Winter Quarters: M. Chanlais was diſpatch'd to Turin, on the very firſt News of the Victory, with new Offers, which the Pope was induc'd to ſupport with all his Weight and Influence; and M. Catinat himſelf is ſaid to have us'd his utmoſt Efforts, to open a Negotiation with his Royal Highneſs: But whether thoſe Offers did not, as yet, come up to that Prince's Expectations, or the Confederates once more out-did them, he thought fit to reject them: And as to the other Propoſal, concerning Winter-Quarters, tho' it found abundantly more eligible to receive Money from France on that Conſideration, than to furniſh Money to the Germans, to be exempted from the Burden and Terror of military Gueſts, not only the Princes of Italy could not be prevail'd on to accept it, but even his Holineſs himſelf, partial as he was, to the Intereſts of his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, turn'd a deaf Ear as often as he was ſolicited on that Subject, as dreading above all Things to ſee the leaſt Pretence adminiſter'd of extending the Flame of War into Italy: But then he became more urgent than ever with the Imperial Court, to accept the Propoſals of France, or, at leaſt, to make ſuch Advances on that Side, as might gradually make way for an Accommodation: And to render his Inſtances more effectual, when the Prince de Lichtenſtein, the Imperial Miniſter at Rome, beſought a new Supply, to enable his Maſter to proſecute the War againſt the Infidels, he, the Pope, reply'd, as he had formerly done, That in caſe his Imperial Majeſty would quit the Confederates, and turn his whole Force againſt the ſaid Infidels, he would grant him more conſiderable Sums than had been granted to him by his Predeceſſor: But otherwiſe, he inſinuated, the 400,000 Rix Dollars, which he had already caus'd to be remitted to Cardinal Colonitz, was all he ſhould furniſh at preſent, towards that Service.

His Holineſs ſtill an Advocate for Peace.

This, according to the Pretences of his Holineſs, was acting up to the ſublime Character of the common Father of Chriſtendom. But the Truth was, that King Lewis had connected him yet cloſer to his Intereſt, by cauſing the French Biſhops, who had aſſiſted in the Aſſembly of 1682, to retract the four Propoſitions, and to diſavow all that was done therein, to the Prejudice of the Rights of the Holy See; as alſo by accompanying the Act of Retractation with a moſt reſpectful Letter in his own Hand: So that alike, when he, the Pope, took ſo much Pains to forward the good Work of Peace, and when he granted the Bulls of Confirmation to the Biſhops of his Majeſty's Nomination, he was paying the Price of that Submiſſion, and acting as a Partiſan of France.

A. D. 16[illegible]

But we haſten prematurely to the Cloſe of the Year; and it is ſtill incumbent on us to purſue the other Branches of the War.

From the Facts already laid down it appears that the Moſt Chriſtian King was not eſteem'd a more dutiful Son at Rome, than a faithful Ally at Conſtantinople: It appears, that tho' the Cry of France, at the laſt of theſe Places, was War, and at the former Peace, both aroſe from the ſame Motive, and were to anſwer the ſame Purpoſe; and that the two Grand Signiors had their common Cauſe, as well as the confederated Papal and Proteſtant Powers.

A. D. 1693. But notwithstanding this Union of Interests, and the vigorous Resolutions taken in the Divan in consequence thereof, to so low a State was the Power of the Turkish Empire reduc'd, in the Course of so long and tedious a War; and so generally averse were both the Soldiery and the People to the Continuance of it, that their Preparations for opening the Campaign were yet more tardy than those of the Germans: And when it was expected that the Grand Signior, in Person, would have taken the Field, in order to give an additional Spirit to the Efforts of his Troops, all of a sudden the Prime Visier, who by this time had been gain'd entirely by France, and consequently had nothing in view but the Prosecution of the War, was depos'd, and the Caimacan was advanc'd in his stead: An Incident which was esteem'd alike favourable to the Negotiations of the English and Dutch Ministers for a Peace, and to the Operations in the Field: Accordingly those Ministers severally demanded Audience, and communicated, over again, the Plan of Peace, which they had to offer in the Capacity of Mediators: But tho' the Terms were, in many Instances, more moderate than those formerly insisted on, no Disposition appear'd to embrace them: On the contrary, the new Visier, as to what related to the War, proceeded in the Foot-steps of the old, and acted, in all Things, as if the Establishment of his own Power depended on his retrieving the Glory of the Empire.

A new Grand Visier.

That some Advantage might, however, be deriv'd from the Disorder of the Turkish Affairs, General Heusler, who had the chief Command in the Absence of the Duke de Croy, was order'd to invest Jeno, a fortified Place on the River Marot, which was of great Consequence to the Security of Transilvania on that Side; and after a Siege of twelve Days (l) carry'd it. The same General also reduc'd a Castle call'd Villaguswar: But when it was farther expected that he would have proceeded on to Giulia, he chang'd his Rout, and repair'd to the general Rendezvous near Essecke.

Jeno taken.

In the Beginning of July, and not before, the Duke de Croy left Vienna, to repair to his Post; and having taken a Review of his Army in the Neighbourhood of Peter-Waradin, found it in so good a Condition, that it was resolv'd, in a Council of War, to pass the Danube and Saave forthwith, and to sit down before Belgrade: But in regard that the Passage over the last of these Rivers might be render'd both difficult and dangerous, in case the Turks should think proper to dispute it, a Letter was address'd to General Veterani, who commanded the Imperial Troops in Transilvania, intimating a Purpose to besiege Temeswar, and desiring that he would approach the Tibisque with his Army, in order to facilitate the Duke's Passage over that River: This Letter was dispatch'd by an Express, who had Orders so to direct his Journey that he might be sure to fall into the Hands of the Bassaw of that Place: And in hopes the Event would answer the Design, the whole Army pass'd the Danube on the 23d: In six Days more they reach'd the Saave; and having thrown over a Bridge at the Isle of Zingari, and cover'd it with several Redoubts, on the 30th pass'd that River also, without Opposition: For the Turks confiding in the Letter which they had intercepted, had directed their whole Attention to Temeswar; and instead of being under any Pain for Belgrade, had detach'd 3000 Men from the last of those Places, to reinforce the former.

A. D. 1693.

The Imperialists pass the Danube and Saave,

Thus the Imperialists had not only leisure for their Passage over the Saave, but also to remove their Bridge lower down, for the sake of a nearer Communication with Semelin, on the Danube; to which Place all their Provisions, &c. were brought by Water. On the 30th the Trenches were open'd; and, tho' the Place was strongly garrison'd and strengthen'd with additional Works, as the Grand Visier had not, as yet, taken the Field, it was presum'd, that the Turks were not in a Condition to raise the Siege, and had no other way to preserve that important Place, than by accepting a Peace on the Plan which they had hitherto refus'd. The German, Dutch and English Gazettes were fill'd, from time to time, with the Success of the Besiegers: And tho' it was at last confess'd, that the Grand Visier, who had fallen into Transilvania, with an Army of 60,000 Turks and Tartars, and advanc'd almost as far as Cronstadt, had chang'd his Resolution, and was returning, full Speed, towards the Danube, the Expectation of the Public was still kept as high as ever: For it was suggested that General Veterani was to wait on the Visier, in his Retreat from Cronstadt, on one Side, that the Duke de Croy was to expect him in his Entrenchments on the other: That the Imperial Fleet had taken Possession of the Mouth of the Saave; that General Heusler had cut off the Communication of the Besieg'd with Temeswar; and that, in general, the Siege went on successfully; the Imperialists being advanc'd so far, that they hop'd, in two or three Days, to be lodg'd on the Counterscarp. But when it was fully believ'd that the next Post would convert this Hope into certainty, the Advices it brought were, That the Besiegers had storm'd the Counterscarp on the 7th of September; but before they could make a Lodgment, were oblig'd to quit it again, having had above 1000 kill'd and wounded in that desperate Service; among the first of whom was General Sybilsdorf, who commanded the Bavarians:

and besiege Belgrade.

(l) Which the Confederates were pleas'd to consider as a Ballance on the general Account to the taking of Reses, as appears by the following Paragraph in the London-Gazette, No 2870, dated from his Majesty's Camp at Park. "Yesterday in the Evening the Enemy made a treble Discharge of their Artillery, for the taking of Reses, in Catolonia; and we may make them the like Return for the taking of Jena, in Hungary."

A. D. 1695. variant: That the next Day the Duke de Croy receiv'd Advice of the Vifier's Approach: That on the 9th a grand Council of War having been held, it was reſolv'd on the Iſſue, in Conſideration of the Army's being much weaken'd, of the Strength of the Garriſon, (which by the way was now ſaid to conſiſt of 10,000 Janiſaries, whereas the Number talk'd of at firſt was but 6000 Janiſaries, and 1000 Spahis) and of the Likelihood of its being conſiderably reinforc'd, to give over the Enterprize: That on the 10th the heavy Baggage, Cannon, &c. was embark'd, and ſent over the Saave: That on the 11th the Garriſon made a vigorous Sally: That on the 12th the whole Army, being divided into two Bodies, croſs'd the Saave, over two Bridges, which they burn'd, as ſoon as they had withdrawn the Troops out of the Works which they had thrown up to cover them: That the next Day they took Poſt at Semelin; and that on the 14th the Grand Viſier made his Entrance into Belgrade, which he had thus the Glory to reſcue.

He did not, however, think proper to paſs the Saave, in order to force the Imperialiſts to a Battle; but contented himſelf with ſending out Parties to haraſs their Rear, and to make Incurſions into Upper Hungary; one of which, conſiſting of 4000 Turks and Tartars, was overtaken by General Hofkirken, in the Neighbourhood of Giulia, and entirely routed, with the Loſs of 1000 Men, moſt of their Horſes, and all the Proviſions which they had collected for the Relief of that Place; which Succeſs, how ſmall and inconſiderable ſoever, ſerv'd the Imperial Miniſters for a ſplendid Paragraph in their Advices to foreign Courts, and to ſet a Gloſs on the feeble and fruitleſs Efforts of the Campaign.

Inactivity of the Poles. Of the Poles, and their Enterprizes, during this Summer, nothing need be ſaid, for they attempted nothing: It is true, they had an Army in the Field, but it was in no Condition to act, or even to face an Enemy: Beſides, his Poliſh Majeſty was more intent upon finding fault with the Conduct of his Imperial Majeſty, than upon mending his own: And ſuch a Spirit of Diſſention and Animoſity had taken Poſſeſſion of his Grandees, that when the Payment of the Army, ſuch as it was, came under Conſideration, Sabres were drawn, ſome were kill'd, and the Queſtion had like to have been decided by the Sword.

Ineffectual Operations of the Venetians. Then as to the Venetians, tho' they were abundantly more zealous for the Proſecution of the War than the Poles, and better provided to make a Figure in it, they had the Mortification to ſee the Campaign brought to an End, without obtaining any one ſuch Advantage as might countervail the Expence of it. The Doge, Moroſini, commanded on board their Fleet in Perſon; and it was for a long while given out, that he had ſome great Deſign in view: But having review'd his Army at Napoli di Romania, and received Intelligence that the Seraſquier of Negropont, who had the Command of the Turkiſh Forces on that Side, had Orders to act on the Defenſive, and was poſted ſo advantageouſly, that it was ſcarce poſſible to force his Entrenchments, he advanced to the Iſthmus of Corinth, which he took Poſſeſſion of, and left a ſufficient Body of Horſe and Foot to defend it: After which he ſet ſail to the Archipelago, with all his Men of War, and ſeventeen of his Gallies, in queſt of the Turkiſh Fleet: But the latter not chuſing to venture thro' the Dardanels, his Serenity was forc'd to return to Napoli di Romania, without any other Matter of Triumph, than that he could find no Enemy to combat with. A. D. 1695.

Amazing Weakneſs of Spain. Laſtly, it remains to be ſaid, That tho' the whole Spaniſh Nation ſeem'd to be extremely ſenſible of the taking of Roſes, and undertook, by voluntary Contribution, to raiſe ſeveral thouſands of Horſe and Foot, to reinforce the Army on that Side, that Senſibility, and thoſe Contributions, produc'd but little Fruit: The Duke of Medina Sidonia did, indeed, provide for the Security of Gironne, by throwing a Reinforcement into it, and poſted the Reſidue of his Forces under the Cannon of the Place: But he was never enabled to act on the Offenſive: And ſo little did the French apprehend from theſe extraordinary Efforts of theirs, that immediately on the Surrender of Fort de la Trinite, they embark'd 6000 Men on board their Gallies, to reinforce M. de Catinat, which will ſerve to account for the Inactivity of M. de Noialles, during the Reſidue of the Campaign.

And now having paſs'd through all the ſeveral Provinces of the War by Land, it is time to follow the Courſe of it by Sea. It has been already obſerv'd, that M. d'Eſtrée, with the Toulon Squadron, had aſſiſted in the Reduction of Roſes: And we find an Article in the London-Gazette of June 29, dated from Paris, which ſays, That he ſet Sail on the 16th from that Place, with his Squadron, towards the Ocean.

The French Preparations at Breſt, &c. But the naval Preparations of France did not regard the Mediterranean Service only, nor proceed in the common Forms only: On the contrary, as if reſolv'd that the Efforts of this Year ſhould efface the Loſſes of the laſt, and as if they eſteem'd their Empire incomplete till they had added the Dominion of the Sea to that of the Land, they converted as many large Ships as they could buy into Men of War; they repair'd and refitted all they were in poſſeſſion of before: They would not ſuffer a Merchant Ship to put to Sea till the Navy-Royal was completely mann'd: And that every Individual might be perſuaded that his own private Advancement depended on advancing, as far as in him lay, the Intereſt and Glory of his Maſter; as, alſo, that the Sea-Service had a Share of the Royal Concern as well as the Land, the Year was open'd with a general Promotion of Sea-Officers, in which all were ſeverally conſider'd according to their Merits, Services and Sufferings.

As all theſe Meaſures ſerve to diſplay the Wiſdom of the Court of France, the Effect as viſibly diſplay'd their Power: For at the

A. D. 1693. same time that they ſent ſo many Armies into the Field, they fitted out ſuch a Navy as almoſt extinguiſh'd the Memory of la Hogue, in all who ſaw it: And tho' the Ships of which it was compos'd were equipp'd at the ſeveral Ports of Rochfort, Louis, Havre, Dunkirk, &c. ſo great was their Vigilance on one Hand, and ſo aſtoniſhing the Remiſſneſs of the Maritime Powers on the other, that all got ſafe to their Rendezvous at Breſt, not only without any Loſs, but even without any Moleſtation.

The naval Conduct of England at this time.

To account for this, and all that follow'd upon it, two Things are poſitively aſſerted by almoſt all our Engliſh Writers, namely, That the French had exact and circumſtantial Intelligence of all our Preparations, and that we, on the contrary, had none of theirs: Endeavours have been alſo us'd, by many of theſe Writers, to lay the Blame of all on the Admirals Killegrew and Delaval, who, together with Shovel, had the joint Command of the Engliſh Fleet; and whether juſtly or not will be the fitteſt to pronounce, when we have ſeen the Evidence on both Sides.

Now it is agreed on all hands, that the Trade of England had ſuffer'd as much in waiting for Convoys, as that of France had done by the general Embargo which had been laid on their Merchant Ships, for the Sake of manning their Fleet: Biſhop Burnet's Words are theſe: "We were ſending a very rich Fleet of Merchants Ships to the Mediterranean, which was valued at many Millions: Some of theſe had lain ready a Year and half, waiting for a Convoy, but were ſtill put off by new Delays; nor could they obtain one after Ruſſel's Victory, tho' we were then Maſters of the Sea. They were promis'd a great one in the Winter. The Number of the Merchant Ships did ſtill increaſe, ſo that the Convoy which was at firſt deſign'd, was not thought equal to the Riches of the Fleet, and to the Danger they might run by Ships that might be ſent from Toulon to intercept them. The Court of France was watching this carefully; a Spy among the Jacobites gave Advice, That certain Perſons, ſent from Scotland to France, to ſhew with how ſmall a Force they might make themſelves Maſters of that Kingdom, had Hopes given them for ſome time; upon which ſeveral military Men went to Lancaſhire and Northumberland, to ſee what could be expected from thence if Commotions ſhould happen in Scotland. But in February the French ſaid they could not do what was expected; and the Scotch Agents were told, That they were oblig'd to look after the Smyrna Fleet, which they reckon'd might be of more Conſequence than even the carrying Scotland could be. The Fleet was ready in February, but new Excuſes were again made; for it was ſaid the Convoy muſt be increas'd to twenty Sail; Rook was to command it. A new Delay was likewiſe put in, on the Pretence of ſtaying for Advice from Toulon, A. D. 1693. whether the Squadron that was laid up there was to lie in the Mediterranean this year, or to come about to Breſt. The Merchants were very uneaſy under thoſe Delays, ſince the Charge was like to eat up the Profits of the Voyage. But no diſpatch could be had; and very probable Reaſons were offer'd to juſtify every new Retardment."

Thus it is not only admitted, that very great Hardſhips were put upon the Merchants, but alſo, that thoſe Hardſhips ſubſiſted even while Ruſſel was at the Head of the Fleet, and before Killegrew and Delaval were promoted to the Admiralty Board. But it is neceſſary to be more preciſe than the Biſhop has been: And tho' it was on the 24th of January that thoſe two Admirals, together with Shovel, were appointed (m) Admiral and Commander in Chief of the Fleet, they receiv'd their Commiſſion from the old Board, and were not made Commiſſioners themſelves till the 23d of March following, when it muſt be ſuppos'd they were actually engag'd in fitting out the Fleet: For we learn by Secretary Burchet, that on Naval Hiſt. the 18th preceding, they receiv'd Inſtruc- p. 480. tions to proceed to Sea, without expecting particular Orders, by which Opportunities of Service might be loſt; and to uſe their utmoſt Endeavours to annoy the Enemy and protect the Trade.

It follows, that if the Fleet was ready in Fe- The Fleet poorly man'd, and worſe victual'd. bruary, they, the ſaid Admirals, were not anſwerable for not putting to Sea, till they had ſailing Orders. But it is demonſtrable that the Fleet was not ready ſo ſoon. There are two Proclamations, ſtill extant, in the Gazettes of February 20 and 27, the one for compelling Seamen to come in, and the other offering a Month's Pay to all Volunteers, by way of free Gift, or Bounty Money. Beſides which, Burchet is expreſs, that there was ſo great a Want of Men, that it was at firſt propos'd, and in part executed, to take half the Seamen from all Privateers; and that no better Remedy could be at laſt found, than to embark five Regiments of Foot: As, alſo, that the Fleet was ſo ill furniſh'd with Proviſions, that all the Ships Companies were reduc'd to the Neceſſity of quartering ſix Men on the Allowance appointed for four. It farther appears by the Gazettes, That the Dutch Fleet, which was to cooperate with ours, did not begin to join us till towards the End of March: Mention is particularly made of Vice Admiral Callenburgh's coming to anchor at Spithead on the 28th, with three Ships of the Line: By an Article from the Hague, dated April 28, N. S. we learn, that ſeven of the Amſterdam Squadron did not ſet ſail from thence till the 25th; as alſo, that Admiral Allemonde, with three Firſt and Second Rates, was ſtill behind: We learn alſo, by another Article from Portſmouth, that the ſaid Admiral, with thoſe three Ships, and two others, did not arrive there till the 4th of May,

(m) Theſe are the Words of the Gazette. See No. 2859.

A. D. 1691. May, O. S. And, laſtly, we learn by yet another Article from the ſame Port, that it was yet ſix Days longer before the Zealand Squadron join'd the united Fleet.

With relation to the Engliſh Fleet, it alſo appears, by the ſame Authority, That the Firſt, Second and Third Rates did not come into the Downs, from the Buoy of the Nore, till the 28th of April: That the ſame Evening the Admirals hoiſted their Flag on board the Britannia: That on the 4th of May they ſet ſail for Spithead: And that on the 7th they reach'd St. Helens.

Late at their Rendezvous.

The whole Fleet, when aſſembled, was to have conſiſted of one hundred and two Sail, (beſides Brigantines, Bomb-Veſſels, and Hoſpital Ships) of which ſeventy were of the Line: But when the firſt general Council of War was held, which was on the 8th, and a Plan of Operations came to be deliberated upon, it appear'd that the Liſt of thoſe at the Rendezvous was far ſhort of that Number. For, according to Burchet, the Reſult was proviſional, That in caſe the Fleet could be made up to Seventy, they would proceed to Breſt, and endeavour to deſtroy the French Ships as they lay; and it is ſaid ſuch a Number of Ships was inſiſted on, becauſe of the Uncertainty they were in whether the Toulon Squadron had join'd them: And that they did not proceed on that Expedition immediately, ſufficiently proves that the ſaid Number could not be made up.

Thus it appears, that even towards the Middle of May, the Combin'd Fleet was not in a Condition to proſecute the only Plan which it appears they had before them: That the Blame which this Tardineſs very juſtly deſerv'd, ought to be divided equally between the two Nations: And that from the Difficulties already touch'd upon, with regard to manning and victualling the Engliſh Fleet, the Admirals ſtand, in a good degree, excus'd, notwithſtanding all Suggeſtions to the contrary.

It is true a Defect of Intelligence is acknowledged: But then the whole Board of Admiralty, together with the Lord Viſcount Falkland, who preſided at it, and even the Secretaries of State are equally liable, with them, to all the Imputations ariſing from it.

But what renders the Defect of Intelligence yet more extraordinary, is the Paris-Articles inſerted in our own Gazettes concerning the Toulon Squadron, and the naval Preparations at Breſt. One of theſe which ſpecified when the ſaid Squadron firſt ſet Sail has been already recited; and it is fit, in this place, to inſert another dated May 22, and like the Former publiſhed here exactly ten Days after, viz. "They write from Toulon that the Count d'Eſtrée ſailed (the ſecond Time) on the 11th inſtant from the Iſles of Hieres with Twenty-two Men of War, ſix Fireſhips, and two Galiots with Bombs, having ſent out two Frigates ſome Days before with Orders, which the Commanders were not to open till they were ſix leagues at ſea, and that Thirty-five Gallies were gone from Marſeilles to join him."

The ſame Paragraph alſo ſpecified, that on the very Day the Toulon Squadron ſailed, ſeventeen Men of War from Port Louis and Rochfort arrived at Breſt: And though it ſhould be acknowledg'd, that nothing poſitive could be gathered from theſe Advices, as to the Junction of the two Squadrons, it had been the Talk of the whole Year, that they were to join ſomewhere: This Talk had been ſufficiently authoriſed by the Diſpoſitions known to be making at each of theſe Ports: It was natural to conclude that the greater body would have advanced to meet the Leſs: And if common Senſe had been conſulted in the counter Operations on our Side, Care would have been taken, that the Breſt-Armament ſhould not have failed without our being appriz'd of it: As alſo that the rich Fleet of Merchantmen bound to the Mediterranean, after having waited ſo long for a Convoy, ſhould not have run any Hazard at all. But through a ſurprizing Infatuation, the uſe of Scouts and Advice-Boats ſeems to have been forgot on board the Fleet at this Criſis, and the Uſe of ſecret Service money at the Secretary's Office; and inſtead of Information, our Meaſures were grounded upon Conjectures only.

It appears, however, that the Conjectures made on board the Fleet, were rather more rational than thoſe made at Court. For another Council of War having been held on the 15th of May, to conſider how the Streights's Fleet, with the Trade bound to Turkey, might, moſt ſafely, proceed under the Conduct of Sir George Rook, it was reſolved, on the Iſſue of the Debate, That IF the Toulon Squadron was come out of the Streights, ten Men of War, a ſmall Frigate and a Fireſhip, would be ſufficient for their Convoy: As alſo that the ſeparate Convoy, for Spain, ought to proceed with them, while the Body of the Fleet accompanied both out of the Channel: But that IF the two French Fleets were not joined, it was proper the whole Squadron ſhould forthwith proceed with theſe Convoys. On the other Hand, IF the French Ships were joined, it was judged adviſable for the main fleet to proceed with the Mediterranean Squadron, as far as a Council of War might think proper, when they ſhould be in the Soundings: But that IF no certain Advice could be got of the Toulon Squadron's being come out of the Streights, or where they were, before the Fleet failed from St. Helens, the Mediterranean Convoy of ten Men of war, &c. ſhould remain at St. Helens until Intelligence could be gained.

Burchet. p. 451.

This was the Pretence for the new Delay complained of by Burnet: And yet by this Pretence we ſee, a Proviſion was made for the Safety of the Trade.

But on the 19th following, the lords of the Admiralty, in obedience to her Majeſty's Commands, ſent Orders to the Admirals to ſail in company of the Squadron bound to the Mediterranean, and of the Virginia and Bilboa Convoys; and that, after they had proceeded with them as far as might be judged requiſite, they ſhould order thoſe bound

But Ordered to ſail at a Venture.

A. D. 1693. bound to the Streights to ſteer ſuch a Courſe to Cadiz, as might be thought moſt ſafe by a Council of War, with reſpect as well to the Breſt Fleet if gone out, as to the Toulon Squadron; and then, with the Body of the Fleet, to put in execution the Inſtructions they had receiv'd.

Upon this, another Council of War being called, it was finally determin'd, That the Fleet and Mediterranean Squadron ſhould proceed together thirty Leagues, W. S. W. from Uſhant; after which, on receiving the proper Signals, Sir George Rook, and the other Convoys, ſhould go forward, according to the Orders he had received from the Lords of the Admiralty.

Agreeable to this Reſolution, the whole Fleet ſet ſail on the 30th following; and the Wind, which was N. E. and by N. when they weigh'd, continued ſo favourable, that on the 4th of June they found themſelves at the Diſtance agreed upon at the Council of War, for parting with Rook, and the Ships under his Care: Hereupon another Council of Flag Officers, Engliſh and Dutch, being held, it was determin'd, That ſince they had receiv'd no Intelligence of the Enemy, they would accompany the Mediterranean Squadron twenty Leagues farther, and then return to the appointed Stations, taking up the Cruiſers; and from thence to their Rendezvous, ten Leagues N. W. of Uſhant; which they did accordingly; having parted with the Trade, and their Convoys, on the 6th in the Evening.

Remarkable Articles from Paris in the London-Gazette.

Now it is moſt remarkable, that in the very ſame Gazette, viz. of June the firſt, which gave Advice, That the Fleet ſet Sail from St. Helens, May 30. there is another Article from Paris, dated June 1, N. S. containing, among other Particulars, the following: "From Breſt we have Advice, That "the French Fleet, commanded by M. de "Tourville, ſail'd thence on the 26th of "laſt Month (N. S. muſt be underſtood); "and from Toulon they write, That the "Count d' Eſtrée, who was forc'd back by "the contrary Winds, ſail'd again on the "14th paſt, with the Squadron under his "Command." So that if the Lords of the Admiralty, or the Secretaries of the State, had only thought fit to have forwarded this Piece of public News to the joint Admirals, they could not have grounded the Reſolution of their Council of War, above cited, on their having NO Intelligence; and it may be preſum'd, that they would have accompanied the Trade, not only till they were out of Danger, but till the Enemy had been caught in their own Snare.

In the next Gazette the Paris-Article farther ſets forth, That, according to other Letters from Breſt, the French Fleet was gone towards Belle-Iſle. This, one would have thought, might have been taken for a ſort of Confirmation of the former News: But, according to Burnet, ſo incredulous was the Secretaries Office become on this Head, that even when a Ship brought Advice, That M. de Tourville was actually at Sea, it was diſbeliev'd.

overbid'd by the Miniſtry.

Thus it happen'd, that till the 17th, the Admirals, with their huge Fleet, continued at their Station off of Uſhant, in a State of Incertainty and Inactivity: But, having then receiv'd Intelligence, by one of their own Ships, which had been at laſt ſent to look into Breſt, That two or three ſmall Fiſhing-Boats were all the Veſſels they could diſcover there; as alſo, from another Quarter, That a great Number of Ships had been diſcover'd off of Scilly, they concluded theſe were the French Fleet, and reſolv'd to go in queſt of them: But neither did this Queſt of theirs continue long: For, having been farther inform'd, that this great Number of Ships were no other than a Fleet of Danes and Swedes, under the Convoy of one ſingle Man of War, and being in Want of ſeveral Kinds of Proviſions, on the 21ſt they came to Anchor in Torbay.

The main Fleet returns to Torbay for want of Proviſions.

By this time the Court had not only receiv'd Advice upon Advice, That the French Fleet were at anchor in Lagos-Bay, between Cape St. Vincent and Faro; but, being convinc'd the News was true, and in great Pain for the Conſequences of it, had ſent repeated Advices and Orders after Rook, to warn him of his Danger, and to provide for his Safety: Being, however, apprehenſive that theſe Advices might never overtake him, they were no ſooner appriz'd of the Return of the Fleet, than they diſpatch'd freſh Orders to the Admirals, to provide as ſoon as poſſible for his Reſcue: But when theſe Orders were taken into Conſideration by the Council of War, and it was propos'd to proceed to Liſbon immediately, for the Purpoſes recommended in them, a Queſtion aroſe, Whether their Proviſions would enable them to do ſo? And upon an Enquiry, it was declar'd, they would not; ſo that all they would undertake upon the Reſult, was, To proceed in Search of the Enemy, in caſe they could be furniſh'd in fourteen Days, with ſuch a Stock as would ſerve them ten Weeks, at whole Allowance. But no ſooner had the Lords of the Admiralty given the neceſſary Orders for ſupplying them with all poſſible Diſpatch, than they ſent a ſort of Remonſtrance to her Majeſty, againſt the Project they had before approv'd: For they rais'd a Doubt, whether it were adviſable to proceed to Liſbon; ſince if the French were join'd, and ſhould proceed Northward, the Coaſt of England might be expos'd to Inſults: And they dropt an Inſinuation, That if the Orders, which had been ſent after Rook, did overtake him, they were ſo full that he would be able to provide for his own Preſervation; and if not, it would be too late for them to attempt it.

Rook finds the Lark into Lagos Bay for Intelligence.

And this laſt ſurmiſe prov'd to be the very Fact: The Advice-Boat diſpatch'd after him never came up with him; for having a fair and full Gale, he thought it adviſable to make the moſt of it, but not without taking all the Precautions in his Power: For being, on the 15th of June, about ſixty Leagues ſhort of Cape St. Vincent, he order'd the Lark, a ſpeedy Sixth Rate, to

A. D. 1693. ſtretch a-head of all his Scouts into Lagos-Bay, to get what Intelligence was to be had there of the Enemy, tho' without the deſir'd Effect: The Captain of her, in the Night, hawling ſo cloſe within Shore, that he lay becalm'd; while the Fleet having ſtill the Advantage of the Gale, proceeded on as before. And now it is time to obſerve, That the Paris-Article, which gave an Account of the ſailing of the Breſt Fleet, contain'd the naked Truth: And, therefore, what Burnet affirms, That they ſail'd from thence ſo ſuddenly, that they were neither completely mann'd nor victuall'd, (the Deficiencies in both thoſe Articles being ſupplied by Tenders, which were ſent after them) is ſo much the more extraordinary: Indeed, the Uſe he makes of it is altogether as extraordinary: For he adds, "This ſudden and unprovided Motion of the French Fleet, look'd as if ſome ſecret Advice had been ſent from England, acquainting them with our Deſigns." But, in Truth, we had then form'd no Deſigns to acquaint them with. They ſail'd the 16th of May, O. S. the final Orders of our Admiralty-Board for ſailing were not dated till the 19th, as we have already ſeen: In theſe Orders the joint Admirals were left at Liberty to proceed as far with the Convoys, as they ſhould think requiſite; and the Fleet did not ſail till eleven Days after that. If, beſides, the ſailing of the French Fleet had been in conſequence of any ſuch Intelligence, receiv'd from hence, and with any ſuch premeditated Deſign of laying in wait for the Smyrna Fleet, as hath been ſuggeſted, the Motion would have been as ſecret as it was ſudden. The contrary of which was the Caſe: And if a proper Uſe had been made of that Paris-Article, in all probability the maritime Force of France, or the greateſt Part of it, had been ruin'd at a Blow: We muſt, therefore, ſuppoſe, that if they had any Advice from hence, it was of the Deſign firſt entertain'd, of making an Attempt on their Ships, as they lay in the Harbour of Breſt; and that if they did leave that Harbour ſo ſuddenly as the Biſhop aſſerts, it was in order to avoid the Danger, and to join M. d'Eſtrées, before our Fleet could be in a Condition to follow them.

It is true, they enter'd into Lagos-Bay on the 28th of May, O. S. and they continued there till Rook fell in with them: It is alſo true, that Father Daniel affirms, That the Moſt Chriſtian King had Advice of the Smyrna Convoy, and directed M. de Tourville to way-lay it: But we have already ſhewn, that this Advice could not be particular; and as to the Fact in groſs, it was known to all Europe: That as to M. de Tourville's continuing ſo long in that Bay, it was the Place appointed for M. d'Eſtrées to join him; and it was expected that he would have been able to do ſo, before the Engliſh and Dutch could come up; in which Caſe they would have been a full Match, even for the whole united Fleet: The latter having under his Command ſeventeen Men of War, and the former ſeventy-five, in all, ninety-two: Laſtly, it is affirm'd, that de Tourville, A. D. 1693. in this Interval, diſpatch'd no leſs than four Frigates, ſucceſſively, to apprize d'Eſtrées of his Arrival, and to preſs him to uſe the utmoſt Diligence to join him: And it is apparent from the Conduct of this Commander, and the Incidents attending the Encounter we are now to treat of, that he was utterly uncertain, whether his Intimation would be to riſle a Convoy, or preſerve his own Fleet.

The Lark not returning, and Rook holding on his Courſe, as before ſpecified, all Night, his Scouts, in the Morning, fell in with two of the French Scouts; one of which made off, and the other linger'd behind till Afternoon, when the Chatham, of fifty Guns, came up with, and engag'd her, tho' a Ship of ſeventy Guns; but, in the mean while, diſcovering eight or nine Sail more under the Cape, tack'd about to carry the News to the Admiral. Falls in with the French Fleet.

Thus far we follow the Account given by Rook: But from that aſcrib'd to M. Fourbin, who had the Command of one of the Enemy's Scouts, we learn farther, That the Orders he receiv'd were to diſcover, in caſe he fell in with a great Number of Ships, whether they were Merchant Men, or Men of War, and to make his Report accordingly: That having made the moſt accurate Obſervations he could, he reported them to be the Merchant-Fleet, bound to the Mediterranean, not the united Fleet: And that, notwithſtanding the Report, he, M. de Tourville, ſet Sail, and ſtretch'd out before the Wind, to ten Leagues diſtance; which he, M. Fourbin, declares, he was not able to account for; but which, no doubt, aroſe in part from his Apprehenſions of the ill Conſequences of any Miſtake; and the Obligations that lay upon him, to provide firſt for the Security of his own Fleet, and then for the Deſtruction of the Enemy. Fourbin's Memoirs.

Rook, on the other Hand, having call'd a Council of War, propos'd keeping the Wind, or lying by all Night, that ſo a full Diſcovery of the Enemy's Strength might be made next Morning: But in this he was overrul'd by the two other Flag-Officers, Rear Admiral Hopſon, and Vice-Admiral Vandergues, who urg'd, That as the Wind was freſh northerly, it afforded a fair Opportunity of puſhing for Cadiz. Nor ſatisfied, however, with this Opinion, becauſe fearful of being ſurrounded with a Strength ſuperior to his own, the Admiral, before it was ſign'd, call'd in five or ſix Captains, who then happen'd to be on board: But they concurring unanimouſly in it, he acquieſced; and Orders being given accordingly, they ran along Shore all Night, with a preſs'd Sail, and forc'd ſeveral of the Enemy's Ships to cut from their Anchors in the Bay. Calls a Council of War. Butchet. Lon. Gaz. In which it is reſolv'd to puſh there for Cadiz.

In this Interval a French Fireſhip fell in among them, whether by Accident or Deſign, is hard to pronounce; and the Captain and Crew being examin'd by the Admiral, the Account they gave was, That the Squadron conſiſted of no more than fifteen Ships of the Line: That they were nevertheleſs commanded They take a French Fire-Ship, which gives them falſe Intelligence.

A. D. 1693. commanded by three Flag-Officers, namely, M. de Tourville, M. de Villet, and M. Lemon. That they had with them thirty odd Sail of Store-Ships and Merchant-Men, bound to Toulon, or to join M. d'Eſtrée: That they had been becalm'd off the Cape; and that having water'd, their Commander deſign'd to make for the Streights, without any Purpoſe to wait for our Fleet.

The Enemy ſeem to retire. On the Morrow, by Break of Day, being off of Villa-Nova, it fell calm; and at the ſame time they diſcover'd about ten Sail of the Enemy's great Ships, and alſo ſeveral of their ſmall ones, in the Offing; the former of which ſtood away, being aſſiſted by their Boats, which had them in Tow: And as to the latter, ſome they ſir'd and ſome they abandon'd: It is added, that ſome of theſe fell into our Hands; and that a Train was laid in one of them which blew up twenty Men.

The Admiral bears down upon them. And now from this haſty Retreat of the Enemy's great Ships, and the apparent Confuſion of their ſmall, both the Admiral and Council of War were induc'd to believe entirely the fallacious Intelligence which they had receiv'd from the Fire-Ship; and in Conſequence of it, when the Sea-Breeze ſprung up, bore away along Shore upon the Enemy: But, to their great ſurpriſe, obſerv'd, that the farther they advanc'd, the more of the Enemy they diſcover'd: Indeed, thoſe that plied up towards them were not above ſixteen Sail, with three Flags, (viz. the Admiral, and Vice-Admiral of the Blue, and the Rear-Admiral of the White) which ſeem'd to correſpond with the Report; but then they were able to count diſtinctly as many more, as made up eighty in all, five of which, under the Vice-Admiral of the White, ſtood off to Sea, in order to get the Wind, and fall in among the Merchant-Men; and the reſt ſpread to Leeward, promiſcuouſly, as far as the Eye could reach.

About Three in the Afternoon, our Squadron being within four Miles of the Enemy, Vice-Admiral Vandergoes brought to, and The Dutch Admiral adviſes a Retreat. acquainted the Admiral, by Meſſage, That, being now ſenſible of the Snare they had been led into, he was for avoiding an Engagement, if poſſible; not only for the Sake of the Merchant-Men, but for fear of being over-power'd, and endangering the whole Squadron. The Admiral, on the other Hand, either imagining that he was too far advanc'd to think of a Retreat, or, perhaps, a little heated with the late Negative which had been put on his Opinion, in the Council of War, was rather diſpos'd to run the Riſque, than endeavour to avoid it: But on Reflection, adopted the Motion; and having brought to, ſtood off with an eaſy Sail, A Diſpoſition made accordingly. that ſo the Dutch, and the heavy Ships, might work up to Windward; ſending, at the ſame time, the Sheerneſs with Orders to the ſmall Ships, which were near the Land, and could not, as he judg'd, keep up with the Fleet, to endeavour to get along Shore in the Night, and ſhelter themſelves in Faro, St. Lucar, or Cadiz. A. D. 1693.

Having taken theſe Precautions, and ſeeing the Admiral, and Vice-Admiral of the Blue, with eight or ten of the Enemy's Ships gaining faſt upon him, he thought it time to make Sail, and his Example was follow'd by the reſt of the Squadron: Notwithſtanding which the Purſuers came up with the Leeward and Sternmoſt Ships of the Fleet, which were three Dutch Men of War, all Third Rates, and ſome of their Merchant-Men, who finding it impoſſible to eſcape, tack'd about and made for Shore; but fought ſo deſperately all the while, that they found Employment for the whole Diviſion of the Enemy, and thereby afforded the Admiral, and the reſt of their Friends, ſufficient Leiſure to make their Eſcape. Deſperate Defence of three Dutch Men of War.

Thus inſtead of encloſing the whole Fleet, which was part of M. de Tourville's Deſign, by ſtretching out to Sea, theſe three Dutch Men of War, and two Engliſh, viz. the Sheerneſs, and the Smyrna Factor, and ſuch of the Merchant-Men, of both Nations, as were under the Wind, were all they had to prey upon; unleſs they had divided their Strength as they ought to have done, and while one Part had follow'd the Fugitives into Shore, the other had follow'd Rook, and the Trade, which made a Shift to accompany him: And in one of the French Accounts, it is ſurmis'd, that it was owing to the Miſbehaviour of the (n) ſaid advanc'd Diviſion, which, inſtead of keeping the Wind, or giving Notice to thoſe to Leeward, of the ſudden Tack which Rook, Vandergoes, &c. had made, contented themſelves with encloſing thoſe three Men of War, and the Trade they cover'd, only; but it is acknowledg'd, in our own, That if the Enemy had ſhewn as much Reſolution in perſuing their Advantage, as they had ſhewn Conduct in obtaining it, not a Ship could well have eſcap'd; for the Admiral and Vice-Admiral of the Blue, were within Shot of Sir George Rook, when they tack'd and ſtood into the Shore, after the Dutch; which tacking, as hath already been obſerv'd, ſav'd the reſt of the Fleet. Ill Conduct of the French. Burchet, &c.

As to the Loſs ſuſtain'd upon this Occaſion, it is ſcarce poſſible to make a tolerable Eſtimate: So much was it magnified by the French; ſo much was it diminiſhed by the Engliſh. Two of the three Dutch Men of War were taken, the Third got into Cadiz; as did alſo the Smyrna Factor, and the Sheerneſs into the Groyne: And of the Trade, ſo environ'd as above, ſome eſcap'd into the neighbouring Ports, many were (o) taken, and more were deſtroy'd.

Being

(n) This Diviſion was commanded by M. Gabaret, who finding himſelf thus cenſur'd, recriminated on M. de Tourville: And from the Controverſy on both Sides, it appear'd, that they had let ſlip one of the greateſt Opportunities that ever Fortune threw into the way of Men of Enterprize.

(o) Twenty four, according to the Marquis de Quincy; eighteen, according to Burchet; twenty-nine, according to others: Of what Nation, is ſpecified by none. It is, however affirmed, in the London Gazette, that only one Engliſh, and that a ſmall one, was taken: But how inaccurate, not to ſay how partial the Government Accounts of this Diſaſter

A. D. 1693. They come before Cadiz,

Being moreover desirous to scrape up the very Gleanings of their Harvest, they came before (p) Cadiz on the 10th, with a Design to force out those Ships which had taken Refuge there: But all, except two, which were intercepted and burnt, having withdrawn within the Puntals, and being cover'd with the Cannon of the Works, were happily in a Condition to defy their Efforts. Notwithstanding which, M. de Tourville not only linger'd before this Port for three Days, after the Action, if it may be call'd one, but return'd again on the 29th, and continued there till the 8th of July; when he weigh'd and stood for the Streights: The same Day he also detach'd fourteen Men of War, and two Bomb-Vessels, to take or burn the Merchant-Ships which had ran in there, and which durst not put to to Sea again for fear of M. d'Estreé on one side, and their first Enemy on the other. These consisted of eight Danes and Swedes, two Genoese, four English and one Hollander: But the French were pleas'd to make a Distinction between the Ships of the three former Classes, as belonging to neutral Powers, and the two last, by giving the one Notice to quit the Harbour, and sending in two Frigates, and certain Chaloupes, fill'd with Soldiers and Seamen to destroy the other: It did not, however, prove so easy a Task as they imagin'd; for Captain Littleton, of the Smyrna Factor, having sent ninety of his Hands to the Assistance of his Countrymen, they repels'd the Enemy with Loss: And when they return'd to the Charge, with Bombs and Carcasses, and it was judg'd impossible to save them, the English came to a Resolution to sink their Ships, which was done accordingly; but the Hollander more prudently unloaded his, and then left her to the Mercy of the Enemy. A. D. 1693.

as also Gibraltar,

The Detachment then rejoin'd M. de Tourville; and no other Feats remaining to be perform'd on that Side, the whole Fleet pass'd the Streights, to join M. d'Estreé, whom the Westerly Winds had hitherto hinder'd from joining them: On the 19th this Junction was made; and the whole Coast took the Alarm: For the French were now absolute Lords of the Mediterranean, and in a Condition to do what Mischief they pleas'd: The English were, on that very Day, (the 9th O. S.) holding a Council of War in Torbay; and as to the Spanish after were, may be gathered from the following Remarks upon them; which however ought to be regarded with some Caution, as being known to come from a disaffected Quarter.

"I shall begin with the Loss of the Streights Fleet; and here I shall,

1st. Very briefly shew the Gazette's Account of this Accident to be perplex'd, and disagreeing with itself.

2dly. That 'tis imperfect, and far short of Matter of Fact.

1. His Account is dark and inconsistent. His Business here is to let us know the Fortune of the English. Now had he been dispos'd to inform us of what had passed, he would (after the List of those which escaped with the Admiral) have immediately mention'd the others which gain'd the Ports of Spain, and distinguish'd the English from the rest. This Account had been easy and intelligible: But his Design, it seems, was not to be understood. To this Purpose he gives you the Number of those with Admiral Rook: Then tells you how many were missing; and at last sets down those which were got into Cadiz and St. Lucar; and intermixeth them with Dutch, Danes, &c. and with part of his latter List. And by this confus'd Relation, he has convey'd himself out of Sight: But, upon Enquiry, I believe it will appear, he has lost himself as well as his Reader.

Let us compare his Lists from the Gazette of July 17. [Note, Those Lists are the same which are still extant in Burchet.]

His first List contains those English Merchant Ships which were with Admiral Rook. The Number of these is fifteen, beginning with the George, and ending with the Fidelity. His second List consists of those English Merchant-Men which were missing; this begins with the Columbia, and ends with the Mary Flower, and in all makes twenty four Ships.

His third Account is of those Ships which escaped into Cadiz and St. Lucar, which though it does not reach the Number of what was missing, yet it brings in nine English, seven in Cadiz and two in St. Lucar, which were unmention'd in his former Lists. Their Names are,

The Johanna and Anne; the Success, commanded by Isaac Steenbam, and therefore different from the Success in the missing List, whose Master was David Bishop.

The Sarah and Elizabeth; the Sarah, Marmaduke Royden; the Sarah, commanded by Lawson; the John, commanded by Ware; the Tetuan Merchant; Captain Cooper, his Ship not named; the Malaga Factor, Captain Newland; and therefore different from that Ship of the same Name in his second List, which was commanded by Rich. Lowe. Now where a Man pretends to be particular in naming the Ships which were safe, and those which are missing, one would think the joining these two Numbers should comprehend the whole Fleet: But, besides, that he is far short of the Sum Total, as will appear by and by, there is an unusual Accident happen'd to the Computation; for he has brought in nine Merchant-Men, seven to Cadiz and two to St. Lucar, which were unmention'd in the former Lists. So that by his Account we have nine Sail, which were neither safe nor missing, neither in the Enemies Hands nor their own, which I confess is something extraordinary.

I am now, in the Second Place, to prove his Account far short of Matter of Fact.

We must go back to his former List. The Number with Admiral Rook is fifteen, the List of those missing is twenty-four; so that it seems the whole Fleet of English Merchant-Men, bound (as himself tells us, Gazette July 17.) to Smyrna, Scanderoon, Messina, Gallipoli, Alicant, Cadiz, St. Lucar, Venice, Tunis, Malaga and Leghorne, consisted but of forty Sail. But this is a great Mistake; for 'tis granted, by all the Merchants of London, (and by many of them too much felt) that the English, when they fell in with the French at Lagos-Bay, were about eighty Sail of Merchant-Men.

This Number the Gazetteer ventures to abridge into forty, to conceal the Loss of the rest. And here we may observe, that the Fleet bound to Smyrna consisted of eight Dutch and eleven English; the Dutch were all taken and destroy'd at Lagos; and two of the English were then destroy'd, and four since at Gibraltar, making above two thirds of the Value of the eleven. The Saffan, worth above 50,000*l.* was likewise burnt at Lagos. The Gazetteer owns the Misfortune at Gibraltar; (and that at Malaga) but as for the rest, he knows not of one English-Man taken, except the Friendship, a small Vessel, of about seventy Tuns. (Gazette, July 17.) This Relation he afterwards repeats with more Assurance. Of the English, (says he) there is but one Ship taken, either Man of War or Merchant-Man, except a small Vessel call'd the Friendship. (Gazette, August 5.) Now by this Account one would imagine all was well; but if we observe him a little closer, we shall find he is not so hardy as to affirm, that none of the English were burnt or sunk at Lagos-Bay. This he durst not say. Now if they are destroy'd this way, they are as much lost as if they were taken, though not with the same Advantage to the Enemy: But the Gazetteer hoped to conceal the Matter, by saying they were not taken. And since the Confederacy is deeply concern'd in this Misfortune, I shall just mention the whole from the Dutch Prints. The Recueil, August 6. informs us, that the French took two Dutch Men of War, one of sixty-six, the other of sixty-eight Guns, and burnt a rich Pinnance, and an English Man of War of fifty-six Guns. Besides these, the French took twenty-five Merchant-Men, and burnt forty-five, which in all makes seventy four. All this was done at the Bay of Lagos. The same Intelligence (Recueil August 13.) continues the Narration of this Misfortune, and says, That the Sieur Carthagen burnt four English Smyrna Ships, and one Dutch Man, at Gibraltar, and took seven; that Count d'Estreé took four, and burnt some; so that here are sixteen more lost, which added to the former Number of seventy four, makes ninety, besides those burnt by Count d'Estreé. And if the Ships destroy'd at Malaga are not included, the Misfortune rises still higher. Remarks on the London Gazette, 4to. p. 1, 2.

(p) Burchet (and after him another naval Historian) most unaccountably asserts, That they first pass'd thro' the Streights to Malaga, and then return'd to Cadiz.

A. D. 1693. Spaniſh Fleet of Men of War and Gallies, which had ſail'd on the 3d from Naples, they were glad to take Shelter in Port-Mahon, and to throw up a variety of Redoubts for their farther Security.

It is, however, remarkable, that in this triumphant Situation the French Commanders did not think fit to proceed to Extremities with the Spaniards: On the contrary, the united Fleet being come to Anchor on Malaga. the 20th before Malaga, within (9) half Muſquet-ſhot of the Town, M. de Tourville ſent a Bark a-ſhore, to acquaint the Governor, That his Deſign was to burn the Engliſh and Dutch Merchant-Ships in the Port; not to injure the Town, unleſs he undertook to defend them; in which Caſe he ſhould be conſtrain'd to bombard it: To which the Governor gallantly anſwer'd, "Let him do as he pleaſes; the Merchant-"Ships are under the King of Spain's Pro-"tection; and I will protect them at all "Hazards." The Ships were no more than four Dutch and one Engliſh: And yet we are told, That not only a Party of arm'd Chaloupes, under the Cover of eleven other Veſſels, Frigates and Fireſhips, were employ'd in deſtroying them, but that M. de Tourville himſelf, either in a Bravado, or to ſet a new Gloſs on his Character, which had been tarniſh'd in the late Rencounter, threw himſelf into one of the Chaloupes, and headed the Attempt in Perſon. The Governor, on the other Hand, was as good as his Word; and what with the Shot from the Town, and from the Ships, this formidable Detachment was twice repuls'd: De Tourville himſelf was in danger of being kill'd with a Cannon-Ball: And at laſt the Dutch did here, what the Engliſh had done before at Gibraltar; that is to ſay, they ſunk their Ships themſelves, to prevent their being burnt by the Enemy: And the Engliſh-Man having before landed eighty-ſix Bales of Silk, and not ſinking faſt enough, was taken. The Skirmiſh laſted about ſix Hours; very little Damage was done on either Side; and a ſort of Ceſſation enſued: For M. de Tourville having requeſted the Governor to ſend him a Supply of freſh Proviſions, as he had before done at Cadiz, and the Governor having comply'd with that Requeſt, they made no other Attempt during their Stay in that Port, which was till the 27th following. When, alſo, they and Alicant. appear'd before Alicant, on the 6th of Auguſt, N. S. but ſeven Ships came to an Anchor before the Town; and their Buſineſs was only to levy a Contribution of freſh Proviſions, which the Towns-men chearfully furniſh'd, for fear of a Bombardment, with which they were menac'd in caſe of Refuſal.

appear in ſight of Barcelona. It was, however, apprehended, and not without Reaſon, that, notwithſtanding all this Shew of Gentleneſs and Forbearance, they only ſav'd their Stores, for the Sake of aſſiſting M. de Noailles in the Siege of Barcelona: In ſight of that City, it is certain they hover'd ſeveral Days: And it has been ſurmis'd, that nothing prevented the Execution of that Project, but the Remonſtrances of that General, whoſe Army was ſo enfeebled by the Detachment, which he had been oblig'd to ſend to Italy, that inſtead of embarking in any ſuch Enterpriſe, he found himſelf oblig'd to withdraw from the Neighbourhood of Gironne into Rouſſillon; after which M. de Tourville proceeded to Toulon, where he arriv'd about the 16th of Auguſt. A. D. 1693. and proceed to Toulon.

London Gazette, No. 2905.

It is now time to ſpeak of Sir George Rook, and his Squadron; who, having made the beſt Enquiry he could after the Ships that were miſſing, and diſpatch'd the Lark to England, with an Account of the Diſaſter which had befallen him, bore away with the Remainder to Madeira for Water, and in hopes ſome of the ſcatter'd Ships would have re-join'd him there. But of theſe the Monk, Captain Fairborne, was the only one: Having, therefore, put his Squadron into the beſt Condition he could, he ſet Sail again on the 27th of June, and arriv'd at Cork on the 3d of Auguſt, with twelve Engliſh and two Dutch Men of War, beſides Fire-ſhips and Tenders, and between forty and fifty Sail of Merchant-Ships of both Nations; all of which had not only loſt their Voyage, but incurr'd ſuch Expences, as the Profits of Many would ſcarce repay. Rook makes for Madeira. arrives at Cork.

Here he receiv'd Orders, from the joint Admirals, to ſend ſix of his principal Ships to the main Fleet, and to continue with the reſt at Kinſale: But, having an Inclination to return home himſelf, no doubt to clear up his own Conduct, and improve his Intereſt upon it, tho' other Reaſons, or rather Pretences (ſuch as the want of ſeveral Species of Proviſions, and that no ſudden Service could be expected for the Ships ſo ſtation'd) are aſſign'd for it, he choſe to command the Detachment himſelf, and to leave the reſt under the Orders of Captain Fairborne. and ſets ſail for the main Fleet.

According to the Reſult of the Council, held in Torbay, on the 9th of July, above-mention'd, the main Fleet was to proceed forty Leagues S. W. from Uſhant; and then to conſider, whether it was moſt proper to remain there, or to remove to ſome other Station for intercepting the Enemy; and on the 18th following they ſet Sail: The ſix Ships of Rook's Squadron were to have join'd them at their Station: And a Fleet of forty Victuallers follow'd them, with a farther Supply of Proviſions, under the Convoy of the Dreadnought, Winchelſea, and two Dutch Men of War. But when they were got into the Bay of Biſcay, they met with ſuch tempeſtuous Weather, as not only did them conſiderable Damage, but forc'd them back again to Torbay, where they came to Anchor once more, on the 16th of Auguſt, and the ſame Day were which puts to Sea again. London Gazette, No. 2890. But is driven back by contrary Winds.

(9) Theſe are the Words of the London Gazette. But I am inclin'd to think, That half Cannon-Shot would have been near enough o'Conſcience.

A. D. 1693. were join'd by Rook and the Victuallers; which having been ſeperated from their Convoys at Sea, had accidentally fallen in with his Squadron, and were driven in together with him, by the ſame Storm.

Still, however, the Nation was in hopes that the Fleet would have made one Adventure more, to balance the Loſſes and Diſgraces of the Year: The French Fleet was ſtill to return to Breſt; and the Advocates for the Government had, with more Confidence than Diſcretion, given out, that they would not be ſuffer'd to return as peaceably as they ſet out. Mr. Burchet is alſo expreſs, That not above five Engliſh Ships, and one Dutch, were incapable of Service till they had been repair'd; and that Orders were at firſt given for refitting all ſuch as were but ſlightly damag'd for immediate Service: But all at once other Councils and other Meaſures took Place: On the 25th of Auguſt the Admirals were order'd round to St. Helens: The Regiments, which had been ſo long on board, were diſtributed into Quarters of Refreſhment on Shore: All the Three-deck Ships, except four, were ſent to Black-Stakes; and on the 19th of September, by his Majeſty's Command, fifteen Dutch Ships of the Line, and two Frigates of thirty-ſix Guns each, were ſent home, in order to be laid up.

The Fleet recall'd.

Thus ended the Expectations of the Year; and with ſo much the more Regret to the Public, becauſe it was ſoon after underſtood, that the main Body of the French Fleet, under the Command of M. de Tourville, and M. de Chateau Renaud, were then actually at Sea, on their Return to Breſt, where the Former arriv'd, without the leaſt Interruption, on the 21ſt of October, N. S. following.

And now, after having been thus particular in the Detail of our naval Conduct, which appears to have been one continual Miſcarriage, it may be expected, that we ſhould haſten to the Effects of it, on the Intereſts, Paſſions, and Reſentments of the People at home: But that we may have the whole Proſpect clear before us, it is ſtill neceſſary to premiſe, That, at the very time, when the Mediterranean-Traders of all Sorts, had waited ſo long for a Convoy, were grown ſo impatient to be furniſh'd with one, and the Seas were open to them, becauſe neither of the French Squadrons was in a Condition to ſail, a Project was form'd againſt the French Settlements in the Weſt-Indies; and the Execution of it was committed to Sir Francis Wheeler by Sea, and Colonel Codrington, Governor of the Leeward-Iſlands, and Colonel Foulkes, by Land. The Squadron appointed for this Service, which, it ſeems, was here underſtood to be a very eaſy one, conſiſted of two Third Rates, ſix Fourths, three Fifths, one Sixth, three Fire-Ships, one Store-Ship, one Hoſpital-Ship, one Bomb-Veſſel, and a ſufficient Number of Tranſports for the Land Forces: Beſides which, it was to be reinforc'd by three other Fourth Rates, already at the Weſt-Indies. The Land-Forces were to conſiſt of about 1500 Men, which were to be join'd with 800 more, which had been rais'd at Barbadoes; and alſo, with all the Forces of the Leeward-Iſlands. A. D. 1693.

Sir Francis Wheeler's Expedition againſt the French Settlements.

In the Beginning of January this Squadron ſet Sail, and on the 1ſt of March they arriv'd at Barbadoes; where it was reſolv'd, at a Council of War, to make their firſt Attempt on Martinico: Accordingly, having ſent Advice of their Purpoſe to Colonel Codrington, together with a Requiſition, that he would join them there, they ſet Sail on the 30th; on the (r) 1ſt of April, according to the London Gazette, they came to Anchor in the Cul de Sac-Marine; and having, the next Day, landed about 1560 Men, without Oppoſition, inſtead of proceeding on any regular Plan, applied themſelves only to ruin the Sugar Works, which they continued to do for ſeveral Days together; the Planters, and their Negroes, leaving all, and flying to the Woods for Shelter. On the 10th they were join'd by Colonel Codrington; and the next Day the more ſolid Purpoſes of the Expedition being taken into Conſideration, at a Council of War, it was debated, whether it would be moſt adviſable to begin with Fort Royal, (s) or Fort St. Pierre, and determin'd for the Latter. Accordingly, the Troops which had been landed, having been re-imbark'd, they ſet Sail for that Place, and on the 17th landed their whole Force, which amounted to upwards of 3000 Men, in the Neighbourhood of it: The reſt of the Day was ſpent in ſkirmiſhing with certain advanc'd Bodies of the Enemy; and when thoſe were repuls'd, in deſtroying all the Plantations within their Reach: On the Morrow they took Poſſeſſion of an Eminence within Cannon-Shot of the Town; and mounted certain Field-Pieces upon it, with which they fir'd into the Entrenchments of the Enemy; but with ſo little Effect, that the Latter took Courage and ſallied out on the Aſſailants: It is true, the Engliſh affirm, and the French admit, that they were driven back again to their Lines: But whereas the Former alſo affirm, that they never ſhew'd themſelves again; the Latter, on the contrary, maintain, That having receiv'd a Reinforcement from their Governor-General, they not only repuls'd the Engliſh in their turn, but forc'd them from the ſaid Eminence, and defeated them in ſeveral other Skirmiſhes.

However this may be, on the 20th, almoſt all the Commanders, except Wheeler himſelf, and one Lieutenant-Colonel, gave in their Opinions in Writing, at a Council of War, That they ought to give over the Attempt, becauſe the Enemy was ſuperior in Number; becauſe our own Forces were part ſickly, part undiſciplin'd, and one Third of them Iriſh Papiſts, who could not be depended upon; becauſe the Roads were almoſt

(r) Burchet ſays the 15th. (s) According to the French Account they attempted both

A. D. 1693. almoſt impaſſable; becauſe the Fort was a regular Fortification; and becauſe if they ſhould be defeated it would be found almoſt impoſſible for them to recover their Ships; in which Caſe not only Barbadoes, but alſo the Leeward-Iſlands, would be expos'd to the Deſigns of the Enemy.

Unſucceſsful at Martinico, Dominica, &c.

In fine, ſuch Weight had theſe Reaſons, or ſo willing were theſe concern'd to be ſway'd by them, that, on the Iſſue of the Debate, the Attempt was actually given over; and the next Day, but one, the Troops were re-imbark'd.

The Loſs ſuſtain'd on this Occaſion, according to the Gazette, was but 120 kill'd, and 160 wounded; but according to the French Accounts, 500 kill'd, 200 wounded, and 100 taken Priſoners: And Burchet, in effect, authoriſes this Liſt, by ſaying, That in three Days time, the Number of the ſick, wounded and kill'd, amounted to 800: Nor, whatever the Loſs was, does it appear, by any Account, that the Invaders acquir'd any Profit or Honour to balance it.

Their next Adventure was to Dominica, where they arriv'd the next Day: And here again the Commodore preſs'd for an immediate Attack on that Place; but as above, was over-rul'd by the Land-Officers: They did not, indeed, declare abſolutely againſt him; but they urg'd, that the Enemy were yet ſtronger here than at St. Pierre; and that it would require ſix Weeks or two Months, to reduce them; whereas they knew, that his Orders were poſitive to leave thoſe Parts by the laſt of May; and the Barbadoes Men were moreover as preſſing to return home, as if they were afraid the Ardour of the Commodore would get the better of the Scruples of thoſe he was connected with.

Under theſe Difficulties and Diſcouragements therefore, he was forc'd to give over all farther Thoughts of Action in thoſe Parts; and nothing remain'd but to gratify his Auxiliaries by ſuffering them to depart; and to repair with his Squadron, and the reſt of the Land-Forces, to St. Chriſtophers, for Water, and ſuch other Refreſhments as he ſtood in need of.

Accordingly, on the 4th of May he arriv'd there; and on the 11th following, in purſuit of his Inſtructions, he ſet Sail for Boſton, in New-England, where he arriv'd on the 12th of June: Sir William Phipps was ſtill Governor of that Province; and with him he had Orders to concert an Expedition to Quebec, which was to be undertaken out of hand: But ſuch an Expedition, even at that time of Day, requir'd no leſs than 4000 Men; and ſuch Preparations as, in that Country, would have requir'd full four Months to complete: Whereas Sir William had never receiv'd the leaſt Inſtructions or Notice concerning it; and was out of Meaſure amaz'd, at ſo extravagant a Propoſal.

Finding, therefore, that the Orders he had receiv'd, with regard to Quebec, were utterly impracticable, and unwilling to return without ſome viſible Proof of his Zeal for the Service, he ſet Sail on the 3d of Auguſt for Newfoundland, with a Reſolution to make an Attempt upon Placentia. Here he arriv'd on the 18th, and calling a Council of War, laid before them ſuch Informations as he had receiv'd, concerning the Strength of the Place, namely, That the Soldiers and Inhabitants were computed at about 2000 Men: That they had ſeveral large Privateers in the Harbour, but no Men of War; (nor, indeed, had they heard of any, in any Part of their Voyage) and that the Enterance into the ſaid Harbour, which was very narrow, was guarded by three Cables laid a-thwart, and a ſtrong Fort, mounted with thirty large Cannon, and palliſaded towards the Land: Beſides which, ſome ſlight Works had been thrown up on the neighbouring Hills. He alſo accompany'd theſe Informations, with an Offer to ſtorm the Harbour, in caſe the Land-Officers would furniſh him with ſome of the Soldiers out of the Tranſports, to work his Guns; (for by this time he had ſcarce Seamen enough left to ply a ſingle Tire) and would alſo co-operate in the Attempt, by making a Diverſion on Shore at the ſame time. But the Land-Officers (many of the Principal of whom were dead) were ſtill of a different Opinion; and having eleven Voices in the Council, againſt ſix, his Propoſal was, on the Queſtion, rejected; and all that he could obtain was, the ſending a Detachment of arm'd Frigates, and a Party of Soldiers, to deſtroy the Settlement at St. Peters, which they effected.

A. D. 1693.

Having thus fulfill'd his Inſtructions, as far as it lay in his Power, he ſet Sail from the Bay of Bulls, on the Eaſt Side of the Iſland, (where he had put in for Wood and Water on the 28th, and where he was detain'd by bad Weather untill the 22d of September) on his Return to England; but ſo poorly Mann'd, and in ſo ſhatter'd a Condition, that it was not without great Difficulty and Danger he reach'd Portſmouth on the 18th of October.

He returns home.

Thus we are at laſt come to a Cloſe of the Loſſes and Diſappointments of this unfortunate Year: And as to the Credit-Side of the Account, it contains but two Things, and both ſo inconſiderable, that they are ſcarce worth Notice; viz. 1ſt, The driving the French out of the Factories, which they had begun to eſtabliſh on the Coaſt of Guinea, by the African Company; and, 2dly, The Recovery of thoſe other Forts and Factories, which they had taken from the Hudſon's-Bay Company, in time of Peace.

Now we ought not to forget, that when the People enter'd into the War with France, it was under a Perſuaſion, that every Year would be a Year of Victory, Triumph and Glory: And while we remember this, we cannot wonder that their Mortification ſhould be as great as their Diſappointment. In the preceding Year the Diſgrace at Steenkirk had been, in part, alleviated by the Succeſs at la Hogue: But in This the French appear'd

A. D. 1693. appear'd as irreſiſtible by Sea as by Land; and inſtead of making Acquiſitions from them, we were only a Prey to them. It was, beſides, manifeſt, that our Misfortunes were the Fruits of our Miſconduct; and even thoſe who could bear the Loſs, could not forgive the Wickedneſs and Folly which occaſion'd it: In particular, the Blow which our Trade had receiv'd from the Enemy, being a national Miſchief, as well as a national Diſgrace, was what every Man thought he had a Right to complain of: And as to thoſe, who were either the immediate Sufferers, or more immediately liable to the like Viſitation, that is to ſay, the whole mercantile Body, their Reſentment was ſuitable to the Smart that caus'd it. They had a Meeting upon the Occaſion; and agreed upon an Addreſs, or rather Remonſtrance, to her Majeſty, in which they ſet forth, very freely, the Hardſhips impos'd upon them by the want of Convoys, &c. the Calamity which had overtaken them, and the Neceſſity of a more ſufficient Management for the time to come. This Addreſs was preſented the 16th, and receiv'd with all the Grace and Tenderneſs which it deſerv'd; the Lord-Keeper Somers declaring to them, in her Majeſty's Name, That ſhe had the deepeſt Senſe of the Loſſes which the Traders, both of the City and the Kingdom, had ſuſtain'd; and that ſhe had given Directions to a Committee of the Privy-Council, as well to examine into the Cauſes of the Misfortune, as to take effectual Care to prevent the like Complaints for the future, &c.

The Merchant's Remonſtrance to the Queen.

The Lord-Keeper's Anſwer.

A Loan of Money requir'd of the City.

That, however, a farther Advantage might be deriv'd from theſe healing Expreſſions, than merely compoſing the Minds of the Complainants, an Intimation was given to ſome of the Principal of them, that unleſs a Sum of Money could be advanc'd, by way of Loan, to the Government, it would be impoſſible for her Majeſty ſo fully to anſwer her own gracious Purpoſes, as the preſent Exigence requir'd: And ſo effectually was this Point labour'd in the City, that the Lord-Mayor was induc'd to call a Common-Council, and that Common-Council was induc'd to adopt ſuch an Addreſs, as ſeem'd to reflect more Credit on the Government, than what ſuch a Series of Diſgraces and Diſappointments had depriv'd it of. For in the firſt Paragraph they made uſe of theſe ardent Expreſſions, "We, &c. out of a deep Senſe of the infinite Goodneſs of God to this Nation, in the ſignal Deliverance of his ſacred Majeſty from thoſe Dangers in which he hath ſo lately, for our Sakes, expos'd his Royal Perſon, even to the Admiration of his Enemies, do, heartily, and unfeignedly, in the firſt Place, return to Almighty God, our moſt humble Thanks, and, in the next, in all Humility congratulate your Majeſty, upon ſo ſenſible a Providence as the Preſervation of that Prince, in whoſe Life, not only our Laws and Religion, but even the Liberty of Europe is ſo INTIRELY WRAPP'D UP." In the Second, as a proper Return to the gracious Anſwer, given by the Lord-Keeper to the Merchants in her Majeſty's Name, they proceeded thus: "We do, with all Chearfulneſs, render our hearty Thanks to your moſt gracious Majeſty, for ſo great a Condeſcention; no ways doubting but your Majeſty will continue to give ſuch good and ſeaſonable Directions, that the Trade of this your Kingdom, in which the Proſperity of it doth ſo much conſiſt, may be better ſupported for the future." And, laſtly, they concluded thus: "And as we have hitherto, from a Senſe of our Duty, demonſtrated to the whole World, our great Zeal for your Majeſty's Service; we, having now a freſh Opportunity of ſhewing the ſame, by a chearful and unanimous advancing of Money for the preſent Emergencies of your Majeſty's Affairs, humbly beg Leave to aſſure your Majeſty of our firm Reſolution to continue our hearty Endeavours, upon all Occaſions, to ſupport your Majeſty's Royal Authority and Government againſt all Perſons, to the uttermoſt of our Power."

A. D. 1693.

Addreſs of the Lord Mayor, &c.

This Addreſs was preſented the next Day after the former, which is all that need be ſaid of it: The Sum demanded of the City was 300,000 l. But whether the Caſh of the Citizens fell ſhort, or their Zeal and Confidence cool'd, we read but of 170,000 l. paid into the Exchequer: And as to the Proceedings of the Committee of the Council, with regard to our naval Miſmanagement, they were yet leſs Satisfactory to the Public, than this partial Loan was to the Court. That there had been a Miſmanagement, was too notorious to be denied: But when the Blame came to be fix'd, all the ſeveral Parties within the Reach of it, had their ſeveral Advocates, who made the Caſe their own, and contriv'd to render their Skreen as broad as poſſible: But the Drift of the Enquiry ſeem'd to bear hardeſt upon the Admirals: While their Flag was yet flying, ſeveral Queſtions were ſent to them by the Lords of the Admiralty, touching their parting with Rook, their not endeavouring to gain Intelligence at Breſt, &c. and they were alſo examin'd afterwards, by the ſaid Committee, in a manner ſo little to their Satisfaction, that they publicly complain'd of Lord Falkland, (who, as firſt Lord of the Admiralty, was liable to Cenſure as well as themſelves) for having ſtifled ſomething that was material to their Juſtification: And yet ſo great was the Aſcendancy of that Nobleman, that he procur'd a Declaration of Council, to be publiſh'd in the Gazette, That the ſaid Complaint (or as it is there call'd Report) was falſe and ſcandalous; tho' it is alſo admitted, in the ſaid Declaration, that ſomething happen'd which might miſlead the Admirals into that Error.

A Privy-Council-Enquiry into the Miſconduct at Sea, fruitleſs.

Burchet.

Now, in this very Paper, enough was acknowledg'd to authoriſe the Suſpicions and Diſcontents of the Public; but nothing was inſerted in it which had the leaſt Tendency to remove or leſſen them: Indeed, we are told by Biſhop Burnet, That the Miniſters were

A. D. 1693. were so broke to Pieces, that they acted without Union or Concert; and that it was the Business of each to justify himself, and to throw the Blame on the others: And we find that the Party which had so long and so loudly clamour'd, That the King was betray'd, did not fail to make use of this Opportunity, to raise that Clamour higher than ever. The same Prelate also takes upon him to point out who these Betrayers were, in the following extraordinary Terms: "A good Share of this (t) was cast on the Earl of Nottingham; the Marquis of Carmarthen was much suspected; the Earl of Rochester began now to have great Credit with the Queen, and seem'd to be so violently set against the Whigs, that they look'd for dreadful Things from him, if he came again to govern: For being naturally warm, and apt to heat himself in Company, he broke out into Sallies which were carried about, and began to create Jealousies, even of the QUEEN herself." Jealousies, that is to say, of her being as violently set against the Whigs, as the Lord who had so much Credit with her; not of her betraying the King's Affairs, as the Bishop's loose way of expressing himself seems to intimate. But then, according to the Prejudices he had imbib'd, the Difference was scarce a Shade between corresponding with France, and living in Charity with the Tories: The King had taken the Whigs to himself, and he had left the Tories to the Queen; and by this two-fold Connection he hop'd to have the joint Services of both Parties: But the Fact was just otherwise; for neither of them was satisfied with this Partition of Favour and Power: And it is certain, that if the Earl of Rochester, and the rest of the Tory-Ministers, were violently set against the Whigs, the Whigs, at this Crisis, as violently insisted, That the Government could never be well and faithfully serv'd by any but themselves.

Ministers accus'd by B. Burnet.

In this Ferment was the Cabinet, the Court, and the Nation, when his Majesty, having induc'd the States-General to make a very considerable Augmentation in their Forces, both by Sea and Land, and employ'd the most pressing Instances with all the confederated Powers to do the same, arriv'd in (u) England, from Holland; and a Session of Parliament approach'd, according to the Prelate last quoted, "With great Apprehensions, occasion'd by our ill Success, and by the King's Temper, which he could no way constrain, or render more complaisant; but chiefly from the Disposition of Men's Minds, which was practis'd on, with great Industry, by the Enemies of the Government, who were driving on Jealousies daily."

Who these Enemies were, he does not stay to explane; the Jacobites we must suppose he means: But if they were industrious in driving on Jealousies of the King and Queen, the Whigs were as industrious in driving on Jealousies of their Ministers: So that, if practising on the Dispositions of Mens Minds that way, constituted an Enemy to the Government, it is but fair to pronounce, That both were Enemies alike: But if the King was really betray'd, as he, the Bishop, more than surmises, Jealousy was not only allowable, but laudable; and if not, he stands self-condemn'd, for endeavouring to perpetuate a Jealousy which had no Foundation. A. D. 1693.

The same Author also says, That the King, upon his Return, saw the Necessity of changing both his Measures and his Ministers. Whence we are to suppose, that hitherto, at least, he had made an ill Choice of both. But though he did, soon after his Arrival, proceed to a Change of his Ministers, we shall find the Bishop himself insinuating that it was against the Grain; and that, instead of changing his Measures, he chang'd his Ministers, on purpose to avoid it; his Words are these: "He express'd his Dislike of the whole Conduct at Sea, and nam'd Russel for the Command of the Fleet next Year: He dismiss'd the Earl of Nottingham, and would immediately have brought the Earl of Shrewsbury again into the Ministry: But when that Lord came to him, he thought the King's Inclinations were still the same that they had been for some Years; and that the Turn which he was now making, was not from Choice but Force: So that went off; and the Earl of Shrewsbury went into the Country: Yet the King, soon after, sent for him, and gave him such Assurances, that he was again made Secretary of State, to the general Satisfaction of the Whigs. But the Person who had the King's Confidence, to the highest Degree, was the Earl of Sunderland, who, by his long Experience, and his Knowledge of Men and Things, had gain'd an Ascendant over him, and had more Credit with him than any Englishman ever had: He had brought the King to this Change of Counsels, by the Prospect he gave him of the ill Condition his Affairs were in, if he did not entirely both trust and satisfy those, who, in the present Conjuncture, were the only Party that both could and would support him. It was said, that the true Secret of this Change of Measures was, That the Tories signified to the King plainly, that they could carry on the War no longer; and that, therefore, he must accept of such a Peace, as could be had: This was the most pernicious thing that could be thought on, and the most contrary to the King's Notions and Designs; but they being positive, he was forc'd to change Hands, and to turn to the other Party: So the Whigs were now in favour again, and every thing was done, that was like to put them in good Humour. The Commission of the Lieutenancy, for the City of London, on which they had set their Hearts, much more, perhaps, than it deserv'd, (t) Reproach must be understood, arising from our want of intelligence of the Motions of the French, while they seem'd to know every thing that we either did or design'd to do; for these are the very Words of the Bishop's Charge.

(u) He landed at Harwich, October 29. lay at Colchester that Night, and reach'd Kensington the next.

A. D. 1693. serv'd, was so alter'd, that the Whigs were the superior Number; and all other Commissions were much chang'd: They were also brought into many Places of Trust and Profit; so that the King put his Affairs chiefly into their Hands: Yet so, that no Tory, who had expres's'd Zeal or Affection for the Government, was turn'd out: Upon this the Whigs expres's'd new Zeal and Confidence in the King."

Remarks upon his State of Things.

There was a Necessity of inserting this whole Section entire, because of the many extraordinary Things it contains: But then we ought also to observe, that a more inaccurate, or a more inconsistent Section is not to be found in the whole Work. For can it be admitted, that the King was, at once, under a Necessity to change both his Measures and his Ministers; and to change his Ministers, because he could not be prevail'd upon to change his Measures? Or can it be admitted, that he was induc'd, by the Earl of Sunderland, to make this Change; and, yet, that he should be forc'd upon it by the Positiveness of the Tories? That he did place more Confidence in that Lord, than any other Englishman, cannot be deny'd: But that he should do so, is an irresistible Proof, that either he did not disapprove the Violences of the late Reign, or that these Violences were the Effect of Perfidy beyond Example. Lastly, the whole Matter contain'd in that Section, is huddled together, without any Regard to order of Time, or that Progression of Things, which, unless regularly mark'd, can never be sufficiently understood. Tho' Russel, for Example, was restor'd to the Command of the Fleet, on the 6th of November, the Commission of the Admiralty was not alter'd till the 11th of May following: Tho' Lord Nottingham was soon remov'd from the Secretary's Office, Lord Shrewsbury was not prevail'd upon to accept the Seals till the Beginning of March: And all the other Changes took place in such a manner, as very sufficiently manifested, that, next to the Mortification of being oblig'd to put an End to the War, the King was most apprehensive of being in the Hands of those, who were, by Profession, jealous of his Prerogative.

Proclamation for a Thanksgiving.

But, to proceed: As, in the Beginning of the Year, a solemn monthly Fast had been appointed by Proclamation, to implore a Blessing on their Majesty's Arms, &c. it was thought advisable now, towards the Close of it, to appoint as solemn a Thanksgiving. Accordingly, the first Act of State that was made public, after the King's Return, was a Proclamation to that Purpose, in which are the following Expressions: "Forasmuch as it hath pleas'd Almighty God, of his infinite Goodness, in answer to the Prayers, humbly and devoutly offer'd up to him, to preserve their Majesty's, and their Government, against the Designs and Attempts of their open and secret Enemies; and to protect his Majesty's Person from the many and great Dangers of the War, in his late Expedition beyond the Seas, and to bring him back, in safety, to this Kingdom: Their Majesties, therefore, adoring the divine Goodness, and duly considering, that such great and public Blessings, do call for public and solemn Acknowledgements, have thought fit, and with the Advice of their Privy-Council, do appoint, &c. In what manner the People went thro' with this Ceremonial, is not mention'd: But, surely, if their Hearts accompany'd their Lips, it must be acknowledg'd, That they were both in the most philosophic and religious Disposition, that ever any Nation was.

A. D. 1693.

The Session of Parliament, which occasion'd such Apprehensions, was open'd the 7th of November; on which Occasion his Majesty was pleas'd to make the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

The King's Speech at the opening of the Session.

I am always glad to meet you here, and I could heartily wish that our Satisfaction were not lessen'd at present, by the Disadvantages we have receiv'd this Year at Land, and the Miscarriages of our Affairs at Sea. I think it is evident, that the Former was only occasion'd by the great Number of our Enemies, which exceeded ours in all Places. For what relates to the Latter, which has brought so great a Disgrace on the Nation, I have resented it extremely; and as I will take Care, that those who have not done their Duty shall be punish'd, so I am resolv'd to use my utmost Endeavours, that our Power at Sea may be rightly manag'd for the future: And it will well deserve your Consideration, whether we are not defective, both in the Number of our Shipping, and in proper Ports to the Westward, for the better annoying our Enemies, and protecting our Trade, which is so essential to the Welfare of this Kingdom.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I am very sensible of the great Affection wherewith you have always assisted me to support the Charges of the War, which have been very great; and yet I am persuaded, that the Experience of this Summer is sufficient to convince us all, That to arrive at a good End of it, there will be a Necessity of increasing our Forces, both by Sea and Land, the next Year.—Our Allies have resolv'd to add to theirs; and I will not doubt but you will have such Regard to the present Exigencies, as that you will give me a suitable Supply to enable me to do the like. I must, therefore, earnestly recommend to you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, to take such timely Resolutions, as that your Supplies may be effectual, and our Preparations so forward, as will be necessary both for the Security and the Honour of the Nation."

Whether this was a Speech of his Majesty's own composing, or whether it was suggested by Lord Sunderland, in concert with the new Lord-Keeper Sommers, who had also a large Degree of his Majesty's Confidence and Favour, is wholly undetermin'd: But whose Advice soever prevail'd in the drawing of it, the obvious Drift of it is, to smooth the way for such an additional Supply, as would defray the Expence of

A. D. 1693. of the additional Forces, by making a Sacrifice of Secretary Nottingham, and such other Tories as had fewest Friends at Court, and were, at the same time, most obnoxious to the People. For we are not to understand, that, because the Whigs had once more obtain'd the Upper Hand in the Cabinet, they were wholly Masters: On the contrary, the Marquis of Caermarthen, tho' so particularly pointed out by Burnet, as one of the Lords they hated most, continued still at the Head of the Council-Board; as did also Lord Godolphin, at the Head of the Treasury: And such a Temper was observ'd towards the Marquis of Hallifax, the Earl of Mulgrave, and others of the same Faction, that they thought it worth their while to leave the Lords Nottingham, Rochester, &c. to form an Opposition by themselves: This Temper was, besides, so much the more necessary, because the Tories were as yet so powerful in both Houses, that, without their Assistance, no Point could be carried in either: And, as to the Commons, they had, in general, behav'd so much to the King's Satisfaction, that he did not care to part with them. A. D. 1693

A Remnant of the Tories still continued in the Ministry.

It is true, Burnet is very positive, that from the time the Lord Hallifax was driven out of the Cabinet by the Whigs, he uniformly studied to give the Ministers all the Trouble he could: What he said on that Occasion, has been already cited; and when he comes to speak of that Nobleman's Death, he repeats it, That he had gone into all the Measures of the Tories; that he studied to oppose every thing, &c. But, unluckily, there is a Tract of his (the Marquis's) still (w) extant, call'd, An Essay upon Taxes, calculated for the present Juncture of Affairs, 1693, which he introduces as follows: "Since it is of the last Consequence to every true Englishman, that the present War should be carried on, for the Preservation of our Liberties and Religion, against the common Enemy of both; and notwithstanding the false and foolish Insinuation of some discontented Jacobites, that a Peace with France is more (x) necessary than a War,

The Marquis of Hallifax an Advocate for the War.

(w) In the Collection of Charles Montague, late Earl of Hallifax, who had writ in the Title-Page of it, with his own Hand, these Words, By the Lord Marquis of Hallifax.

(x) Several Tracts were publish'd about this time, recommending Peace in the most forcible and pathetic Terms; and among the rest, one call'd, The poor Man's Petition to the Lords and Gentlemen of the Kingdom, which concludes in these tragical Terms.

"Peace is the Voice and the Wishes of the People; and we cannot but pray to God that it may be the Pleasure of the Court, and the Decree of Heaven. This is the Language of all Sorts; the City and the Country, the Rich and the Poor, have no divided Interest in this. Here the different Opinions of Religion and Policy center and agree; the Williamites and the Jacobites have no Quarrel upon this Subject; but all confpire together to put up their united Prayers for a speedy, an honourable, and a lasting Peace. 'Tis this alone that can make us happy and content; and banish the Fears that have so strongly possess'd us, of being invaded by Want and Misery. 'Tis this alone can set our Hearts at ease, and remove those sad Omens and unpleasant Bodings we fancy to ourselves of future Evils, of Hunger, and Famine, and cruel Deaths: and this alone will free us from the Voice that sits, at present, so heavy upon our Shoulders, that we cannot easily imagine the Popery and Slavery we were made to fear, could have produced any Severities so dreadful and tormenting.

"There is another thing too, of no less Moment, which we cannot but propose to your Consideration, because we are so very much concern'd in it; we mean the many thousands of Souls that yearly perish in the War. And whether the Sacrifice of so many Lives has already attain'd, or the Sacrifice of so many thousands more be likely to attain, the Advantage propos'd when the War first begun, we shall leave to your grave and wise Judgments, though we cannot but think a vulgar Capacity may easily determine. No Success has crown'd our Arms that yielded any Triumphs, but in one Engagement at Sea, which was over-balanc'd by two Defeats we receiv'd from the Enemy before: and has been but too severely reveng'd, by burning and taking so many of our Straights Fleet this last Year, and forcing the rest, shamefully, to fly home again to our Ports, and cutting off, for a while, the whole Trade of the Mediterranean. All our other Victories were gain'd over our Countrymen, or at least our Fellow Subjects, for which our Brows ought rather to be shaded with Cypress than adorn'd with Laurel. But whether we have beat, or whether we have been beaten by our Enemies, we, of the poorer and meaner Rank, are still the Men who have been the main Sufferers in these mighty Slaughters, and must be so till this Fountain of Blood be stopt. How then can you behold such a tragical Scene every Year, and not endeavour, as well as pray, for Peace. To continue the War, is to set up a Shambels and a Slaughter-house for the Commons of England, who are drag'd against their Wills, and forc'd upon the Swords of their Enemies in foreign Parts; and all this to defend the Country of Strangers, not their own. How dare you promote such Butcheries any longer, and not relent and tremble? Will you do nothing to prevent this Stream of Blood, and not be afraid lest the Almighty Arm should smite you with some grievous Plague; or lay upon you the Curse and Burthen of the blood-thirsty and deceitful Man? God may harden the obstinate to that degree, that they may despair of Mercy, and lay violent Hands upon themselves. Remember Sir William Temple's Son, who long since drown'd, and Mr. Haywood, who lately hang'd himself. Though we are now accounted no better than Sheep for the Slaughter, and are beheld with no better Eye than the poor Slaves and Gibeonites were in the Land of Israel; yet how can you imagine that Saul, and his bloody House, will escape, if you persevere still to slay us? Just Heaven will some time certainly visit you for such unrighteous Slaughters of the Natives of your own Nation. How can you then go on to blow the Coals, and heap up more Fuel to burn and destroy your Fellow Citizens; and never consider that at last it may prove a funeral Pile to yourselves? Good God! what a dreadful Fate hangs over these distracted Kingdoms; that there should not be wise Men enough left that can see, or if they can, that dare speak for the Interest of their bleeding Country. But if that Bleeding be deny'd to a sinful and infatuated People, is there no Remain of Humanity in your Breasts? No Love left for your English Brethren? Is there not one that has Pity on his dying Countrymen? Not one Man of Piety or Mercy amongst you, that will hasten to atone the destroying Angel? That will beseech him to say, It is enough, and to sheath the Sword again; but suffer the angry Weapon to devour us still, and drink our Blood, till we are utterly confum'd? Think with yourselves, how many comfortless and disconsolate Widows the Sword has made; and cast an Eye of Tenderness and Compassion towards them, in their Loneliness, and Tears, and Distress. Behold the Droves of fatherless Children, that, being destitute of Food and Rayment, and surrounded with Penury, and extreme Necessity, crowd about your Doors, and cry aloud for Relief; and plead like so many Orators, to persuade and convince you, that 'tis the Interest of England to make an End of the War. Such real and doleful Complaints, from such lamentable Objects of Pity, we hope, will have the good Fortune to strike upon the sensible and tender Part; and set you effectually on work, to procure that blessing, which, of all others, we most desire in this World, A speedy and a lasting Peace.

"'Tis our Prayers, and all our Design in this Paper, that it may have that Prevalence and Effect upon you: But if this will not move you, which is written with the Tears of the Living, and convey'd to you with the mournful Air and Sighs of the miserable Reliques of a ruin'd Nation, who yet survive the tragical Fate, and bewail the sad Catastrophe of their dear Brethren and Friends, who have fallen in the preceding Campaigns: The next shall be dated from the Graves of the Dead at Steenkirk, and not from the Shades of those who lie unbury'd at Neerwind and Landen. It shall speak the Language of Pain and Torment: It shall be fill'd with the lamentable Cries of the Wounded, and the ghastly Figures of those who have rotted and starv'd in the Ditches of Holland, or the Barns and Hospitals of Flanders? It shall pierce your very Hearts and Bowels, with the strong Shrieks and Groans of those who are ready to gasp and expire; and accuse Death of no other Cruelty but coming too slow to make an End of a weary Life. The Ink shall be of a Crimson or a Scarlet Hue: The Pen shall be dipt in the Sanguine Waters of Brabant, that have been stain'd by the untimely Deaths of the bravest of our Englishmen. It shall flow with the Purple Gore of the River Ghent; and the Characters shall be all over drawn with the Blood of your Slain, unpitied, as well as unreveng'd Countrymen.

A. D. 1693. War, and that it is more carry'd on for the Sake of others than ourſelves; and that, if it were neceſſary, it might be better carry'd on by ourſelves alone, than in Conjunction with the Confederates: And that the only way to ſecure our Liberty and Religion, to obtain a ſafe and ſpeedy Peace, and avoid the great Burdens we are ſubject to, for the carrying on the War, were to caſt off the preſent Government, and take Meaſures with King James and the King of France: Yet there is nothing more clear than, that theſe Notions are altogether abſurd and impracticable; and that the true Meaning of them is only to give up all that is dear to us, into the Hands of two Princes, who have always preſerr'd the Deſign of ſubverting our Religion, to all other Conſiderations whatſoever: And that it is much better to fight for Flanders than for England, and in Conjunction with Confederates than alone, is what will bear no Diſpute." A. D. 1693.

Now Burnet himſelf, as we have ſeen, allows, that the Tories ſplit on this very Meaſure of carrying on the War: And it is ſcarce to be conceiv'd that the Marquis would have compos'd a Tract expreſsly in Favour of it, together with a (y) Project for ſupporting the extraordinary Expence of it; or would have ſuffer'd it to be made public at a Time, when the Strivings of the Two Factions turn'd chiefly if not wholly on that Point, if he had not been ſome Way or other, compris'd in the Coalition of this Year, and found his Account in adopting that Point which (y) Which is ſo curious, ſo rational, and ſo conſtitutional a Performance, that I ſhall inſert it not only for the Information but Imitation of future Ages.

" As to the laſt Particular I undertook, which was to give my Opinion what Methods were the moſt eligible to raiſe Money by, having, in ſome Meaſure, prevented it by paſſing my Cenſure upon thoſe that are now in Practice and Vogue, I ſhall conclude all, with propoſing, That of the antient Way of Subſidy upon a true Pound Rate, according to the Wiſdom and conſtant Practice of our Anceſtors, as the moſt equal, moſt reaſonable, and moſt ſuitable to our Condition, and therefore moſt eligible above all others; which I ſhall endeavour to prove by theſe Arguments following, and by anſwering thoſe Objections that are uſually made againſt it.

But before I come to theſe Particulars, I think it neceſſary to give ſome general Account of the Form and Method of Subſidies, Tenths and Fifteenths: the two latter having been totally deviſed, and the former but rarely, and not purſuant to the old Method ſince the Beginning of the Civil War.

A Subſidy before the War, did uſually amount to 70,000 l. the laſt Subſidy Book being the Rule by which the future were given; wherein every Man's Land was valued at a certain Rate beyond Reprizes; and, this was not altered but once in an Age; when there was an Act made on Purpoſe to make a Review, by the Oaths of the Commiſſioners, Aſſeſſors, and Examination of the Parties themſelves, or any other Perſon knowing therein; and all the Variation otherwiſe in the Subſidies, was in the Perſonal Eſtate and Money; and the Allowance for Debts, and a great Number of Children; to which they had Regard upon Application made by the Parties, purſuant to the Proviſion made in theſe Acts; all Perſons under Five Pounds in Perſonal, and Three Pounds in Real, as formerly rated in the King's Books above Reprizes, were excepted; and all Goods and Stock in Trade, and Houſehold Stuff, except wearing Apparel, were included; and a Subſidy was four Shillings in the Pound upon real Eſtates, and two Shillings and Eight Pence upon perſonal, payable by two Payments. And although Two Shillings and Eight Pence, may ſeem to be leſs upon Goods, than Four Shillings upon Land; yet when it is conſider'd, that Lands are rated according to the annual Profits, and not their intrinſick Value of Purchaſe; and that this is almoſt treble the Profit of Money at Five per Cent. and that all other Goods have no Profit in Intereſt to attend them, Perſonal Eſtate is more than doubly charged, as I have before aſſerted.

Vide Coke's Inſt. Vol. 4. p. 33, 34.

As to the Tenths and Fifteenths, they were a certain Rate impoſed on Cities, Towns, and Boroughs, in Reſpect of their moveable Goods, and did amount to above 20,000 l. but there was uſually a Clauſe, to reſerve a Sum for ſuch Cities and Towns, as were decay'd.

As to the Arguments for the Subſidy, or Pound Rate, having ſaid too much already, I ſhall reduce them to very few Heads.

Firſt, That it is equal in the Impoſition, no Body can deny; nor that any can pay more than he is rated by any Body's being under valued.

Secondly, That it is made more equal and reaſonable by the Allowance of Debts, empty Houſes, decay'd or unprofitable Lands. But as for Lands, let or unlet, ſince the Profits may be made in Land as well as otherwiſe, there was never any Allowance; the Reaſons not being the ſame with Houſes, which are a Burthen, and yield no Profit.

Thirdly, Here the Clergy, and all that have Eſtates upon old Rents, and Perſonal Eſtates in Money and Goods, &c. ſhall pay; though the Aſſeſſment brought in the full Value, yet the Commiſſioners did make an Allowance for the Poor of the Perſon, according to his Quality.

But I come now to theſe Objections, which are uſually made againſt it, viz.

Firſt, That it is impracticable, as late Experience hath proved.

And Secondly, That it will not raiſe ſuch Sums as are requiſite for the preſent Juncture.

To the firſt of theſe I anſwer, That the Experience of all former Ages is a ſufficient Evidence; and the Reaſons of the late Failure have been two viſible ones:

Firſt, The Countenance that the Monthly Aſſeſſment hath met with from the Court; and the Diſcountenance this has found, when the Parliament granted the firſt and ſecond Aid, and the King to name Commiſſioners, they put in all the ſame again that were in the Monthly Aſſeſſments, which, as it was the higheſt Diſſervice imaginable to the Crown, in Favour of their particular Countries, ſo it is like to prove the moſt fatal to the Nation, by diſabling it to raiſe any great Sums from the great Inequality of it, and inclining the Party oppreſs'd to embrace any new Project that may hazard the preſent Government, or prove deſtructive to the Nation.

Secondly, The zealous Endeavours of the Weſtern and Northern Members to continue the Monthly Aſſeſſment, which is ſo favourable to them; which when they conſider the Conſequences before mentioned, I hope will be no longer inſiſted upon, at ſuch a Time as this; when all that's dear to them is at ſtake.

But to ſhew, that this is eaſily practicable, if the Parliament will follow the Method heretofore uſed by their Anceſtors,

I ſhall refer you to the Quotations in the Margin, and to 32 H. 8 cap. thoſe Acts which you will find in the Statutes at Large; 50. p. 715. the where the Aſſeſſors were upon Oath, and the Commiſſioners Aſſeſſors and named by the King with Power to examine all Perſons upon Parties paying Oath: But if theſe Methods be thought too rigorous, I propoſe, upon Oath. that the Commiſſioners may only be of his Nomination ac- 34 H. 8. cap. cording to the Right of the Crown, and the Practice of all 28. p. 833 the Ages, whoſe only Power is to ſee the Aſſeſſors do their ſame Duty, to put the Law in juſt Execution; and that every Man 37 H. 8. cap. may be bound to deliver into the Aſſeſſor the true Value of 25. p. 893. the the Lands, in the Place where it lies, according as it is in ſame rented, and in ſuch Lands, according to the higheſt 2 & 3 Edw. Value that it pays in Pariſh Taxes, with any Thing that is 6. cap. 36. p. rented, under Pain, to forfeit a Year's Value for every Con- 970 & 971, cealment of all that he has in that Place; and that the Com- the ſame miſſioners have Power to examine any other but the Perſon 3 & 4 Edw. himſelf concerning the Value of the Land, and the Pariſh 6. cap. 25. Taxes, in Order to an equal Pound Rate; and to levy the p. 1004. 1005. Penalties upon Concealments: And if it ſhall be thought rea- the ſame. ſonable to allow any Thing for the Port of the Perſon, that 7 Edw. 6. it be aſcertained by a Tenth, or any other Part, to be deducted cap. 12. p. by the Commiſſioners from Perſons above a certain Quality; 1052, 1053. but to loſe that Benefit upon any Concealment. the ſame.

As to the not raiſing a conſiderable Sum, there can by no 4 & 5 Parl. Way be ſo much raiſed, as by this; for we find by Experi- & Mar. cap. ence, that the Monthly Aſſeſſment tho' now ſcrew'd up 13. p. 1158. higher than ever, does not raiſe above 60,707 l. 18*s.* but 8. 1159. the every 12 d. in the Pound will raiſe a Million, and the 4 ſame. that were given by the Way of 12 d. the firſt Year would have raiſed four Millions, which I prove thus: The Monthly Aſſeſſments at 70,000 l. per Menſem, raiſe 840,000 l. per Annum, and of this I am ſure, not near a third Part of England pays above 12 d. in the Pound, and ſome not above 3 d. and ſo upwards to a Shilling: Now if theſe two Thirds were brought to pay a Shilling, and the others reduced. I leave it to any reaſonable Man to judge, whether the remaining 160,000 l. would not have been raiſed, eſpecially if Money and perſonal Eſtate are called in to Aid; and this I ſhall obſerve to you, That all the Home Exciſes of the Province of Holland, as I have been credibly informed do not raiſe above a Million, and the reſt of the Provinces not above half a one, tho' multiplied and extended to the utmoſt, and therefore, if laid only upon ſome few Things here, would not raiſe ſuch Sums as are imagined, and for that Reaſon alſo are not worth the Experiment, to change the antient Methods of our Anceſtors, which will be found in the Concluſion, the moſt equal and reaſonable of all others.

A. D. 1693. which the Lords Nottingham, Rochester, and the other exasperated Chiefs of that Party, had rejected.

In one Word, we shall also find, That tho' the Historian of his own Times is also pleas'd to say, that every thing was done to put the Whigs in good Humour, the Intractable of that Party, (and some few there were which Disappointments had made so) tho' at mortal Enmity with the Tories, were put on the same footing with the proscrib'd among them, and had also their Fits of Opposition, tho' seperate from them, and for Ends and Purposes peculiarly their own: And it was from this strange Mixture of disagreeing Parts and Principles, and the Uncertainty of finding out any Medium of Reconciliation, that those great Apprehensions arose, which have been already mention'd in a Quotation from Bishop Burnet.

Vote of the Commons to support the Government, and next to enquire into the Miscarriages at Sea.

It was six Days before the Commons could satisfy themselves, whether they should take the Miscarriages of the Fleet, which stood foremost in the King's Speech, or the suitable Supply, first into Consideration: But then the Resolve was unanimous, That they would support their Majesties and their Government, and next enquire into these Miscarriages; as also take into their Consideration how to preserve the Trade of the Nation.

The Enquiry prosecuted first.

But so eager and impatient was the Spirit of Enquiry, which now shew'd itself under the Countenance, if not the Direction, of the Throne, that this Vote was nevertheless not over-strictly observ'd: On the contrary, before any Progress had been made in the Supply, nay, before the Estimates had been deliver'd in, the Turkey Company were call'd upon to act as Accusers, by producing Copies of all their Petitions, both to the Commissioners of the Admiralty, and to her Majesty, for Convoys: And, on the other Hand, Lord Falkland, on Behalf of himself, and the rest of the said Commissioners, deliver'd in Copies of all the Orders and Directions which had been given to Sir George Rook, in relation to the Streights Fleet; together with a List of all the Ships, great and small, at that time in Commission.

The next Step they took was to examine Rook; and, it being then presum'd by some, that they had sufficient Evidence before them to authorise it, the following Question was put, That upon Examination of the Miscarriages of the Fleet, this House is of Opinion, That there hath been a notorious and treacherous Mismanagement of the Fleet this Year. But tho' the Mismanagement was admitted by all, the Majority would not be induc'd to think that any Treachery had been prov'd: It was therefore propos'd, by way of Amendment, that the Word Treacherous should be left out; and upon a Division it was resolv'd in the Affirmative, by 140 against 103. As this was a great Point carry'd, it was thought a proper Opportunity to narrow the Question yet farther, by leaving out the Words, of the Fleet this Year, and inserting, in that Affair, in their stead; which was done accordingly:

And thus it appear'd to be the Sense of the House, not that the Fleet in general had been mismanag'd, which would have involv'd the Admiralty, as well as the Admirals, but that the Mismanagement was to be confin'd to the Miscarriage only. A. D. 1693.

The next Questions debated were, 1. Why the Streights Fleet was stopp'd, till the main Fleet went out? And, 2. Why the main Fleet did not convoy Sir George Rook's Squadron, and the Merchant-Ships, out of Danger of the French? What Answer was given to the first of these Questions, which, it must be allow'd, was a very pertinent one, has not been specified: But to obviate the last, it was alledg'd, That the Fleet was not sufficiently victuall'd, and that, in particular, there was a Want of Beer.

The State of the victualling examin'd.

This involv'd the victualling Office in the Debate: A State of the Provisions, when the joint Fleet set Sail, as also when they parted with Rook, was taken into Consideration; and the main Question, upon the whole, was put on the Article of Beer, namely, Whether there was sufficient Beer on board the main Fleet, at the time of the said Seperation, to enable them to convoy the Merchant-Ships out of Danger of the Brest Squadron? Now the Beer, according to the computation made by the Agent of the said Office, would have lasted till the 21st of July; and Rook, as we have seen, fell in with the French on the 16th of June. Conscious, therefore, that this Pretence would not hold, those who were for explaning away the Miscarriage, as much as possible, mov'd, That the Words, And the Toulon Squadron, might be added by way of Amendment: But this Motion was at once so frivolous and unfair, and betray'd so much the Weakness of the Cause it was calculated to serve, that, after it had been sufficiently expos'd, it was rejected by 191 Voices, against 165. It was then mov'd, that such Members as were concern'd in the victualling the Navy, might withdraw; but that passed in the Negative, without a Division: And, as a last Expedient, the Party for the Admirals having had Recourse to the previous Question, that also was over-rul'd; and the main Question being then put, it pass'd in the Affirmative, Yeas, 188; Noes, 152. Burchet. p. 483.

Vote thereon.

Certain Motions against the Admirals over-rul'd.

Thus far (that is to say, till the 27th of November) the Face of the House seem'd to be set against the Admirals: But on the 29th following, when they had undergone a farther Examination, and the Merits of the Case had been farther debated, a Disposition appear'd in their Favour: For a Motion being made, and the Question put, That it appear'd to the House, that the said Admirals did receive Information, on the 11th of May preceding, That part of the Brest-Squadron was ready to put to Sea, it pass'd in the Negative, Yeas, 161; Noes, 170. And, again, on the 6th of December, when all the Four had been re-examin'd, and a new Motion was made, That, by not gaining such Intelligence, as they might have done, of the Brest-Fleet, &c. they

A. D. 1693. were guilty of a high Breach of Truſt, to the great Loſs and Diſhonour of the Nation, it was again reſolv'd in the Negative, Yeas, 175, Noes, 185.

What is ſtill more remarkable, on the very next Day, viz. the 7th, Mr. Harley brought in a Report from the Commiſſioners, for taking and ſtating the public Accounts, which contain'd a ſort of Charge of Peculation againſt Lord Falkland, the firſt Commiſſioner of the Admiralty, who, for the Sake of exculpating himſelf and his own Board, had, all along, endeavour'd to faſten the whole Blame of our naval Miſcarriages on the Admirals. The Sum of this Charge was, That one Mr. Rainsford, Receiver of the Rights and Perquiſites of the Navy, being examin'd by the ſaid Commiſſioners upon Oath, had confeſs'd, that the Accounts he had deliver'd in, did not contain all that he had receiv'd and paid, within the time of the ſaid Account: And, moreover, that he had paid 4000 l. to the ſaid Lord, by a particular Order of his Majeſty's under the Signet. That the ſaid Lord, having made his Appearance before the Commiſſioners, had acknowledg'd the Receipt of the ſaid Sum; and moreover declar'd, That he had paid 2000 l. of it, by his Majeſty's Order, to a Perſon who was no Member of either Houſe, and whoſe Receipt he had for the ſame: But that the remaining 2000 l. was ſtill in his Hands; and that, having attended his Majeſty ſince his return, he told him, he had Directions for him therein.

Charge againſt Lord Falkland.

This Charge was alſo ſupported by the Copy of a Letter from Lord Falkland to Rainsford, directing him, in virtue of the King's Order, to pay his Lordſhip the ſaid 4000 l. for his Majeſty's Service, &c. Rainsford had, beſides, acknowledg'd, That he had had the Original in his Cuſtody, till a few Days before, when the ſaid Lord deſiring to ſee it, had put it in his Pocket; and this being alſo reported to the Houſe, it was eſteem'd ſo unfair a Proceeding, that he had no ſooner been heard in his Place, and was withdrawn, according to the Cuſtom obſerv'd on the like Occaſions, than a Motion was made for committing him to the Tower, and, for a while, hotly debated; but, in the end, over-rul'd by a Majority of (z) thirty-eight Voices: That, however, he might be made ſenſible in his turn, of the Diſpleaſure he had incurr'd, it was reſolv'd, That he ſhould be call'd in and reprimanded in his Place, which was done accordingly.

He is reprimanded in his Place.

It is proper to obſerve, that this was among the Occurrences of December 7, and that it reſted here for ſome Weeks after; as if thoſe who had the Direction of it, had all the while fix'd their Attention on the Proceedings of the Houſe of Lords, with relation to the Miſcarriages at Sea, which were ſtill under the Conſideration of that Houſe.

But if the Enquiry into that Affair, which, as before obſerv'd, had been ſet on foot under the Countenance of the King, did not anſwer his Majeſty's Purpoſe in the Houſe of Commons, in that of the Lords, it took a quite contrary Biaſs: For after Examination upon Examination, and Debate upon Debate, it was reſolv'd, Not that there had been no Miſcarriage, but that the Admirals had done well in the Execution of the Orders they had receiv'd. Almoſt all the Whig-Lords, however, appear'd againſt them; and (a) ſeveral join'd in a Proteſt againſt this Reſolution, which was founded on the following Reaſons, viz. 1. That tho' they, the Admirals, had Orders to ſteer ſuch a Courſe with the Turkey Fleet, as ſhould be thought moſt ſafe by a Council of War, with relation to the Breſt as well as the Toulon Squadron, it did not appear to them that any Council of War had been held from the 22d of May, till the 4th of June; and that even this Council of War was not held till after the Signals had been given for the Seperation of the Fleet; nor had been held at all, if it had not fell Calm, which hinder'd Rook from obeying theſe Signals. 2. That tho' it did appear that the Admirals had then receiv'd no Intelligence of the Enemy, it did not appear that they had even propos'd to procure any, according to their Orders. 3. That to procure ſuch Intelligence, was the Duty of an Admiral, or General, whether they had any ſuch Orders or not. 4. That their not ſending one or more good Sailors to look into Breſt, before they parted with Rook, was the chief Cauſe of the Misfortune which enſued. 5. That tho' it appear'd, by the Admirals own Letters to the Admiralty, that in the Opinion of the Council of War, the Orders of that Board, in relation to Rook's ſailing, were unreaſonable and impracticable, they never apply'd for an Explanation, which look'd as if they rather deſign'd an artificial Excuſe for doing nothing, than the Diſcharge of the Truſt repoſed in them. 6. That Rook's Narrative, which might have given farther Light into the Summer's Conduct, was not allowed to be read. 7. That this Vote ſeem'd to be a Vote of Approbation; in which it not only differ'd from the Opinion of the greateſt Part of Europe, but might be of ill Conſequence, by giving our Allies no very fair Proſpect of better Succeſs. And, Laſtly, That this Vote had a Tendency, both to ſtop any farther Enquiry into the Miſcarriage in queſtion, and even any Proſecution of the King's, in caſe he ſhould think fit to proceed in it, by his own Authority."

The Admirals obſtruct'd by the Lords.

Proteſt on that Occaſion.

The Admirals having been thus effectually ſkreen'd, tho' not juſtified, it became the Buſineſs of the Majority in the Houſe of Lords, not to faſten the Blame of the Miſcarriage upon Lord Nottingham, as it would be reaſonable to expect, from the Manner in which his Name has been mention'd by Burnet, but to exculpate him, and to turn the Force of the Enquiry on Sir

The Force of the Enquiry turn'd on Mr. Secretary Trenchard.

A. D. 1693. Sir John Trenchard, the Whiggiſh Secretary: Lord Nottingham, for Inſtance, laid before the Houſe, an Extract out of a Letter, dated from Paris, June 1, N. S. and receiv'd May 30, 1693, containing theſe two Articles, viz.

1. "There are ſixty-eight Ships, in which there are 30,118 Men, and 4876 Guns.

2. We have News ſince, That this Fleet was ſail'd, and was out of Sight."

And thus it being made appear to the Houſe, that the Misfortune was not owing to want of Intelligence at the Secretary's Office, the next Queſtion that occur'd was, Whether this Intelligence had ever been communicated to the Admirals? But as the Party who now drove on the Enquiry had ſomething more in view, than what was comprehended in that Queſtion, they choſe to move for an Addreſs to the King, requeſting, That ſuch Lords, as were of the Privy-Council, might have his Majeſty's Permiſſion to acquaint the Houſe when the ſaid Intelligence was communicated to theſe Commanders; which was carried and preſented accordingly. And now it was but natural to conclude, that as the firſt Hint of this Queſt had been deriv'd from the Throne, and the King had, in a manner, engag'd to puniſh thoſe who ſhould be found guilty, the Houſe would have been readily furniſh'd with all the neceſſary Informations. But when it appear'd, that neither the Admirals nor Lord Nottingham were to be the Victims, it became the Study of thoſe at the Helm, rather to evade the Point, than clear it up: For tho' the Lords of the Council were ſeemingly empower'd to give the Houſe the Satisfaction deſir'd, it is certain they gave it none at all: For which they were pleas'd to ſay amounted to no more than this, That they took it for granted the ſaid Intelligence was communicated, but could not be preciſe as to the Time.

Lords Addreſs for relation to Intelligence receiv'd from France.

Account given by the Privy-Counſellors unſatisfactory to the Houſe.

The Meaning of this being very well underſtood by thoſe who had the Lead, the next Expedient they had recourſe to, was to ply the ſame Battery by the Means of the Houſe of Commons: Accordingly it was mov'd and carry'd, That all theſe Particulars might be communicated to them at a Conference, together with a Requeſt of their Lordſhips, That they, the Commons, would enquire, by the moſt proper Means, of their own Members, who were Privy-Counſellors, whether, and when, the ſaid Intelligence had been communicated to the Admirals.

They call upon the Commons at a Conference, to make the ſame Application.

On the 16th of January this Conference was held, and three Days after (for ſo long it was before the Commons came to any Reſolution upon it) an Addreſs was voted for a Copy of the Letter, and alſo for his Majeſty's Permiſſion, to ſuch of their Members as were of his Privy-Council, to give them the Information requir'd: But as if both the Court and the Houſe were now become equally averſe to the farther Proſecution of this troubleſome Affair, no Progreſs was made in it for above a Fortnight; about which time the Lords, growing apprehenſive of the Truth, and being ſtill in the ſame Diſpoſition, demanded another Conference, under the uſual Caution, for maintaining a good Coreſpondence between the two Houſes, which being granted of courſe, made way for a Recapitulation of all that had paſs'd at the Former, with the Addition of ſome Expreſſions, ſignifying their Lordſhip's Hopes, That, in conſequence thereof, ſome farther Information might have been had, in order to the Diſcovery of ſome of the Miſcarriages in the laſt Summer's Expedition at Sea, and concluding thus, "But their Lordſhips not having yet heard any thing from this Houſe, concerning this Matter, thought fit, at this Conference, to remind them of it, as a Buſineſs the Lords conceive to be of great Conſequence, and fit to be enquir'd into."

A. D. 1693. Another Conference on the ſame Subject.

This ſecond Conference was held the 8th of February; and it being now apparent that Lord Nottingham, and his Party, were determin'd, that Trenchard ſhould have his full Share of all which had been, or could be imputed to his Lordſhip, the laſt of thoſe Miniſters found himſelf oblig'd to give the beſt Account he could for himſelf, of the Fact in queſtion, which, however he had the Caution to pre-adjuſt with his Friends; and to preſent, in writing, to the Houſe on the 10th, in theſe Words, viz. "That he believ'd the Earl of Nottingham did, on May 31, bring, to a Committee of Council, a Letter from Paris, dated June 1, N. S. and receiv'd May 30, O. S. an Extract of which the Lords communicated to the Houſe: But he did not remember the Letter was publicly read at the Committee, tho' ſeveral of the Lords might read it ſingly. But that it remain'd in the Hands of the Earl of Nottingham; there being no Reſolution taken, at the ſaid Council, that the ſaid Letter ſhould be communicated to the Admirals of the Fleet. That, to the beſt of his Remembrance, a Liſt of the French Fleet, being part of the ſaid Letter, was, the ſame Day, ſent to him by the Earl of Nottingham; a Copy of which Liſt he ſent to the Admirals, as does appear by comparing it with the Papers, delivered by them to this Houſe. That the ſame Day there came a Letter from Scilly, dated May 7, with Advice, That the French Fleet was ſeen off of that Iſland; which Letter being publicly read at the Committee, a Copy thereof, together with the beforemention'd Liſt, was immediately ſent, by two Expreſſes, to the Admirals of the Fleet, and receiv'd by them."

Mr. Secretary Trenchard delivers in a written Account of what had paſs'd in Council on that Occaſion.

Thus for the Sake of ſkreening one Man, the whole Council was expos'd to the Indignation and Contempt of the Public. For that a Letter of ſuch Importance, as that from Paris, ſhould not be formally read, nor that no public Reſolution ſhould be form'd upon it, argued either the moſt Remiſſneſs, or the leaſt Ability that ever diſgrac'd a Government. And after this has been ſaid, the Streſs of the Queſtion laid on the Minute, which intimates the Sailing of the Remarks thereon.

A. D. 1695. the French Fleet, not the Liſt: If, therefore, Lord Nottingham tranſmitted the Latter to Trenchard without the Former, Trenchard is only anſwerable for not applying to him for both, as it is plain he was appriz'd of the Contents of both: But if Lord Nottingham did actually tranſmit both, as it is reaſonable to think he did, from his adventuring to lay them together before Parliament, we ſhall be forc'd to conclude, That there was as much Wickedneſs in ſuppreſſing the moſt ſignificant of the two, as there was Diſingenuity in acknowledging the Receipt of the one, without any mention of the other.

Laſtly, if it may be ſuppos'd that Miniſters can be influenc'd by the Views and Intereſts of the Parties they belong to, to the Prejudice of their Country, (and unleſs that Suppoſition may be made, there can be no Authority for ſurmiſing, as the Whigs have done, that the Turkey Fleet was purpoſely detain'd, till the French were in readineſs to deſtroy them) it will follow, That it is as impoſſible not to ſuſpect Trenchard of practiſing that way, as to juſtify the Suſpicions rais'd on Lord Nottingham: It was to gratify him (Nottingham) and his Friends, that Ruſſel had been turn'd out; and nothing could keep him out but the good Service and Succeſs of thoſe who were employ'd in his Room: It was, therefore, incumbent on his Lordſhip to contribute all that was in his Power to their Succeſs; and he could not be ignorant, that all depended on their having timely Intelligence of the Motions of the French Fleet; whereas Trenchard, whoſe Connections were with the Whigs, knew, that in communicating ſuch Intelligence, he extinguiſh'd the very Hopes of his Party, and, conſequently, deſtroy'd his own Support.

Thus, if there was any Treachery in the Caſe, we have all the Lights before us, which have, as yet, been diſcover'd, for tracing it to its Source: Indeed, when nothing of that Nature could be fix'd on the Admirals, great Endeavours were us'd to make a Traitor of Anſelm, their Secretary: But tho' it appear'd that he herded with Jacobites, nothing could be prov'd upon him; and, as we have already ſhewn, it was ſo late before any Reſolution was taken, that he had ſcarce any thing material to betray. A. D. 1695.

Upon the whole matter, Trenchard's Paper was communicated to the Lords at a Conference, by way of Anſwer to the Requiſition they had made: And Lord Nottingham having thus extorted a ſort of Juſtification out of the Mouths of his Enemies, the whole Affair was ſuffer'd to drop by degrees; and Hiſtory was furniſh'd with a new Inſtance, That in England the Offence might be notorious, and yet the Offender remain both unpuniſh'd and unknown.

In the mean time, however, that is to ſay, on the 9th of February, Lord Falkland's Affair was again brought before the Houſe; and it appearing, by his own Confeſſion, to the Commiſſioners for taking and ſtating the public Accounts, That he had begg'd, and receiv'd of the King, the Remainder of the Sum which Rainsford had undertaken to furniſh for his Majeſty's ſpecial Service, being 2000*l.* it was reſolv'd by the Houſe, on the 17th, That, by ſo doing, contrary to the ordinary Method of iſſuing and beſtowing the King's Money, he was guilty of a high Miſdemeanor, and Breach of Truſt; and that he ſhould be committed to the (b) Tower, during the Pleaſure of the Houſe. Lord Falkland's Affair reſum'd. He is committed to the Tower.

About the ſame time, and for the ſame End, that is to ſay, to blaſt the Whigs and their Leaders, who, as we have ſeen, were now the reigning Party at Court, thoſe active Members, Harley, Foley, and Harcourt, preſented, from the Commiſſioners of Accounts, a State of the Receipts, and Iſſues of the Revenue; as alſo, two ſeveral Reports concerning Moneys iſſued for Secret Services, and to Members of Parliament; by which it appear'd, that a Court-Influence was as (c) prevalent Reports from the Commiſſioners of Accounts of Moneys, &c. iſſued to Members.

(c) And of which Advantage was, at this time, very ſhrewdly taken by the Jacobites, to write and publiſh as follows:

"Poſterity will be as much aſtoniſh'd how the Subjects were able to pay ſuch infinite Sums, as that ever an Houſe of Commons ſhould be ſo extravagantly prodigal in granting them, and will ſet an eternal Brand of Infamy upon thoſe Members (already in good meaſure diſcover'd) who to obtain Offices, profitable Places, or quarterly Stipends, have combin'd, not only to vote whatever hath been demanded, but, that they may be thought worthy of their Wages, in ſome Things exceeded the Expectation of the Government.

I will not preſume to calculate what hath been diſtributed to theſe Penſioners ſince the Revolution, though ſome reckon it at a Million. And there are who can tell that Mynheer B——tinck, and Guy of Heydon, are Captains of the Band, and when 150,000*l.* was lodged for ſuch Secret Service: And ſince their Stipends out of the Treaſury hath diſcover'd ſeveral of them, 20,000 Guineas at a time, out of the Privy Purſe, is intruſted with Benſinck, the Dutch Almoner, to be diſtributed according to order. So much are theſe Stipendaries preferr'd before Soldiers, who adventure their Lives for the Government, and yet are ſome Months in Arrears for Subſiſtance; none being carreſſed but ſuch as ſtudy and labour to augment the Exchequer.

It is remarkable, that ſuch as have been hitherto detected, have had no other Plea, beſides their Merits in promoting the Abdication. One of which, rather than he would quit that Topick, caſt a very indecent Reflection upon the P. of O. his firſt Declaration, wherein his Highneſs was careful to avoid all Expreſſions, as if he had the leaſt Deſign upon the Crown: And yet this doughty Knight (Sir J. Guiſe) affirm'd, that at Exeter, in recompence of his Service, in going to fetch, and accompany the Prince hither, to the Hazard of his Life and Fortune, he had promiſed him the Weeding, that is, the Underwood of the Foreſt of Dean. This ſort of Claim of Merit, not only opens a wide Gap to let in Swarms of other Pretenders, but manifeſtly ſhews that the Price of the Abdication is never to be diſcharg'd, while ſuch Jackalls are able to find Prey for the Belgick Lion, or till the People (when they are made ſenſible of ſuch Combination) ſhall take ſome effectual Courſe to ſecure their Purſes, which they ought more to endeavour than againſt Highwaymen, and their underhand Setters, who ſwear not whole Countries and Kingdoms, as theſe Penſioners do. Surely we ought to learn ſomething from Camels and Dromedaries, Beaſts of Burden, who crouch down to take up their Load; but when they find it more than they are able to bear, either refuſe to riſe, or elſe caſt their Load. I leave the Application: tho' I know it will not be made by ſuch as deſign to load us till our Backs are broke; and that, by a ſeeming Contradiction, of laying the heavieſt Burden upon us, by taking all we have from us." Price of the Abdication, 4to. p. 5, 6, 7. Nor were the Jacobites the only Perſons who join'd in this Cry: For it was about this time alſo that the famous Standing-Money Paper, as it was call'd, and which, in the State Tracts, Temp. Guil. III. is imputed to C. Lowndes, Eſq; was ſet forth; wherein it is ſaid, "That the Houſe is ſo officer'd, that by thoſe that have Places and Penſions, together with their Sons, Brothers and Kinſmen, and thoſe who are fed with the Hopes of Preferment, and the 100 great Influence theſe have upon

A. D. 1693. prevalent in the Reign of King William, as it had been in that of King Charles, when it was so much decry'd; and that many of the most determin'd Whigs were become as obnoxious to it, as the most pliant Tories: For, not to insist on occasional Bounties, free Gifts, &c. it appear'd, that many of the Persons, depriv'd of Places, to make room for others, were quieted with Pensions, equal in Value to their former Salaries; and even, that many who were taken into Employment, not being satisfied with their Salaries, were in a manner brib'd with additional Stipends to accept them.

But what seem'd to be the principal Motive of making these Reports at this Crisis, was the Mention that was made in them of Admiral Russel. Sir John Guise, who was one of the first of the English Gentry that had join'd the Prince of Orange, had, as a Consideration, begg'd of his Highness, the Weeding of the Forest of Dean, or, in other Words, the Fall of all the Hasel, and other Trees, not coming under the Denomination of Timber: But his Majesty being afterwards inform'd, that what he had given for 7000 l. was worth upwards of 20,000 l. reduc'd his Grant to his Intention, and reserv'd the Residue to be dispos'd of as he should find occasion. Of this 500 l. had been given to one Mr. Osborne, to be laid out on the Borough of Heydon, in Yorkshire, 2500 l. had been issued for Secret Services to Mr. Guy, (Secretary to the Treasury, and Representative of that Borough) and the remaining 10,000 l. was bestow'd on Mr. Russel, in consideration of his many faithful Services, especially destroying a considerable Part of the French Fleet; and this at the time when Burnet would have us believe, that the King was so much possess'd against him; and the Majority of the House of Lords appear'd to have so ill an Opinion of his Conduct in that very Encounter.

And now it is high time to treat of the Estimates and Supplies of the Year.

Estimates for the Sea Service, 1694, laid before the Commons.

For the Sea Service 40,000 Men, including two Regiments of Marines, were demanded; 36,470 of which were to be employ'd on board six First-Rates, nine Seconds, forty-four Thirds, nineteen Fourths, eight Sixths, and twenty-six Fire-Ships, for the Channel, Ocean, and Mediterranean Service, and the Residue on board Convoys and Cruisers: The Sum necessary for this Service, was computed at 2,346,132 l. that is to say, for Wages, Victuals, Ordnance, Stores, Wear and Tear at 4 l. 5 s. per Man per Month, 2,210,000 l. Hospital-Ships and hired Tenders 27,580 l. Ordinary of the Navy 85,740, and 22,812 l. for the Officers of the Marines. A. D. 1693.

Nor was this all: The Queen, during her Administration of the Government, had issued a Proclamation for continuing all the Seamen, belonging to the First, Second and Third Rate Ships in Pay, during the Winter, which was clos'd with a solemn Promise, that such Seamen, as yielded Obedience to it, should be paid their Wages, down to Michaelmas of the current Year, before the Fleet set sail on the next Summer's Expedition. Now it appear'd by the Account laid before the House, that the Sum due for Wages alone, to these unhappy Men, amounted to no less than 1,036,415 l. And so great was the Discontent which want of Money, bad Victuals, and worse Usage had created amongst them, that neither the severest Discipline, nor even Death itself (for Numbers of them were (d) hang'd for Desertion, and some for demanding their Pay, which was call'd Mutiny) could suppress it. When, therefore, these Estimates were brought in, it was also suggested, that a Sum of Money would be immediately wanted for the Use of the Navy; and so apparent was the Necessity, that 400,000 l. was granted by way of Advance; and the said Grant was accompany'd with a Resolution, importing, That in case the said Sum could be rais'd on the Credit of the Exchequer in general, the House would take care to see the Lenders repaid with Interest, after the Rate of seven per Cent, under a Caution, however, that this manner of Proceeding should not be drawn into Precedent for the time to come. They also pass'd an unanimous Vote, That the Sum of 500,000 l. should be rais'd towards the Discharge of the Wages due to Seamen. But tho' the whole Kingdom rung with the Disorders, Abuses and Oppressions which had crept into our Marine, and even this partial Provision in their Favour seem'd to imply a Suspicion, that the Accounts deliver'd in were not over fairly made upon some honest, mistaken, Country Gentlemen, (who are possibly over frighted with the French) that the King can baffle any Bill, quash all Grievances, state Accounts, and rectify the Articles of Limerick." And, again, "I could name a certain Gentleman, who exactly resembles Harry Care, that the last Sessions, when the House was a little out of Humour, dispos'd of no less than 100,000 l. in three Days time, for secret Services. Who are in Places we may find out, but God knows who have Pensions; yet every Man that made the least Observation can remember, that some who open'd loudly at the Beginning of the last Sessions, who came up as eager as possible for Reformation, had their Mouths soon stop'd with Hush Money, &c."

(d) On which truly melancholy Occasion, some of the Tars themselves set forth a Hand-Bill, which began with these Words: "All Gentlemen Seamen that are weary of their "Lives, and desire to serve K. W. on board the Navy Royal, "shall have, for Encouragement, fair Promises and no Performances, as follow: For each able Seaman 24 s. per "Month, to be paid when he can catch it, and be hang'd "for Mutiny, if he demands it, &c."

As also a Ballad, in which are the following Stanzas:

But now suppose they had done ill
In asking Pay too roughly, still
When 'twas their Due, and Need so prest,
They might have Pardon found at least.
The King and Queen some merciful call,
But Seamen find it none at all.

To Robbers, Thieves, and Felons they Freely grant Pardons every Day;
Only poor Seamen, who alone,
Do keep them in their Father's Throne,
Must have at all no Mercy shewn,
Nay, tho' there wants Faults, they'll find one.

It is also remarkable, that this Arrow was not drawn out of a Jacobite Quiver; for in the last Stanza are these Lines.

God bless our noble Parliament,
And give them the whole Government;
* * * * * * * * *
* * * * * * * * *
For England's sinking, unless they Do take the Helm and better sway.

A. D. 1693. made up, the House shew'd no Disposition to take the State of the Navy into their serious Consideration, or to make such wholesome Provisions as might prevent the Enormities complain'd of for the time to come; on the contrary, when certain (e) low but well-inform'd Men, offer'd, in print, to furnish them with sufficient Matter to warrant an instant Enquiry, instead of receiving the Countenance and Encouragement they deserv'd, they were brow-beat and repuls'd, as if they themselves had been the Criminals.

On the 5th of December the Pay-Master, Lord Ranelagh, presented to the House, by his Majesty's Command, a State of the War for the ensuing Year; together with a Computation of the Expence: By which it appear'd, that the Number of Men requir'd was 100,403, that is to say, Horse, Officers included, 14010; Dragoons, 5219; Foot, 74480; and Servants, 6848; the whole Charge of which was estimated at 2,220,411*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.* and to this immense Sum were tack'd two Articles more; namely, For the Train, 210,773*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.* and for general Officers, Levy-Money, Transports, Hospitals, &c. 450,000*l.* in all, 2,881,194*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*

100,403 Men demanded for the Land Service.

And here it ought to be observ'd, that tho' in the Course of five several Sessions which this Parliament had sat, the Court, by the Dint of Influence and Management, had generally made a Shift to secure a Majority out of the most abandon'd of both Parties, they had now the Mortification to see the most abandon'd of them astonish'd and confounded at so enormous a Demand; not indeed for Conscience Sake, or out of Tenderness to their Fellow-Subjects, but under an Apprehension, that the Nation, with one Voice, would enter their Protest against such insupportable Evacuations, and declare, that their Deliverance was like to cost them more than it was worth.

That, therefore, they might stand, in some degree, justified to the People, they call'd for all the Treaties subsisting between his Majesty and his Allies; they examin'd the Proportions of Troops, furnish'd by each of them respectively; and finding that the whole Amount of the Augmentations, mention'd by the King in his Speech, rose no higher than 30,000, of which only one Moiety, furnish'd by the Dutch, was like to be employ'd in Flanders, finally resolv'd, that the Establishment of the Year should consist of no more than 83121 Men, Officers included; that to make up this Number, six new English Regiments of Horse, four English Regiments of Dragoons, and fifteen of Foot, should be rais'd: That 1,990,781*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.* should be allow'd for their Pay: That

210,773*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.* the Sum demanded, should be allow'd for the Train; 31,058*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* for the general Officers; 100,160*l.* Levy-Money, and 40,803*l.* for Transports. A. D. 1693.

Upon the Article for Hospitals and Contingencies, the House divided; the Opposers maintaining, That 60,000*l.* was sufficient for that Service; but on putting the Question, it pass'd in the Negative, (Yeas, 120; Noes, 184) and the next Day, but one, 147,000*l.* was allow'd: In all 2,520,581*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* which fell short of the Pay-Master's Estimate 360,613*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*

But what enflam'd yet farther the Necessities of the Year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Hampden) presented an Account to the House of the Deficiency of the Million Contribution Bill, which amounted to 118,506*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* and that of the 300,000*l.* to be rais'd by a Review of the Quarterly Poll, which was 293,692*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.* And the Preservation of the Public Credit, which was now become the great Hinge of Government, requir'd, That these several Sums should be provided for out of the first Supply that was given.

412,199*l.* voted for Deficiencies.

Accordingly, it being the Sense of the House to begin with a Land-Tax, (f) four Shillings in the Pound was propos'd and carried; and in drawing up the Bill, care was taken, That these Deficiencies should not only be provided for out of the first Supply, but in the first Place; after which the Surplus was appropriated to the Land and Sea-Service, the Payment of the Navy and Ordnance in course, &c. And by a special Clause, Provision was made, That, over and above the Ships of War which were to form the Grand Fleet, and to be employ'd in remote Convoys, forty-three Men of War, four of which were to be Third Rates, and sixteen Fourth Rates, should cruize in proper Stations, for the Security of Commerce, which had been hitherto so notoriously neglected.

A Land-Tax of four Shillings in the Pound.

And now, at our very Entrance into the Province of Ways and Means, it becomes necessary to make a Digression, for the Sake of contrasting the Conduct of the Malcontents to that of the Courtiers.

The Former, not content with debating every Court-Point which came before them, had done themselves the Honour to introduce all the popular Bills of the preceding Sessions; namely, the Bill to regulate Trials in Cases of Treason; that for the more frequent calling and meeting of Parliaments; and that concerning free and impartial Proceedings in Parliament; and took all Opportunities of shewing the Expediency or Necessity of their passing into Laws. The Courtiers, on the other hand, who had nothing in Conduct of the Malcontents.

(e) One Hodges, Everett, Crossfield, &c. of whom we shall have further Occasion to speak hereafter. Captain George St. Lo. Commander of the Portsmouth Man of War, moreover set forth a Sketch of the Seamens miserable Case this very Year, in a Tract of his call'd England's Safety; or a Bridle for the French King; together with a Scheme to render that illegal and barbarous Practice of Impressing unnecessary, by obliging all the several Classes of Watermen, Fishermen and Navigators, to furnish 20,000 Men, in time of War, for the public Service: In consequence of which he undertakes to shew, That the Condition of the Navy would be much improv'd; and a Saving would accrue to the Public of 564,000*l.* annually.

(f) By two several Votes, viz. one for a Million to be charged upon Land, December 21, and a second for the like Sum on the 26th, which, by a special Order, were afterwards comprix'd in one Bill.

A. D. 1693. in view but the gratifying the King in the Profecution of the War, as far as they durſt, and making good Bargains for themſelves, look'd on theſe Bills as ſo many Batteries againſt their Power and Credit; and tho' they ſaw the Danger of rejecting them, reſolv'd to do it, at all Hazards, rather than endanger their Seats, by giving way to a new Parliament, or part with their Places and Penſions, in Complement to a new Self-denying Ordinance.

But then we ſhall find, that they had the Addreſs to vary their Conduct, in relation to them, ſo as to divide the Odium among the ſeveral Branches of the Legiſlature: As the Treaſon-Bill, for Example, did not ſo immediately affect the Views and Intereſts of either Party as the two others, it met with ſo ſlow a Paſſage thro' the Houſe of Commons, that it dy'd of Neglect in the Houſe of Lords.: Whereas the Bill for frequent Parliaments, which, in three Weeks time, had been hurried thro' all the Forms of the Houſe, to the third reading, was rejected by a Majority of ten Voices. (Yeas, 136; Noes, 146) And when another Bill, of the like Import, was ſent down to them from the Lords, it met with the ſame Fate, except that the Houſe was fuller, and the Majority greater; the Yeas being 172; the Noes 197. And then, as to the laſt of the three, it was paſs'd by the Commons, and ſent up to the Lords without a Diviſion; as if by Permiſſion from above, (in order to refreſh their faded Credit, and ſilence the Clamours of the People) and under an Implication, that it would be defeated elſewhere. When, however, it was return'd to them by their Lordſhips, with certain Amendments, by one of which the very Speaker of the Houſe was not permitted to hold any Office of the Crown, they rejected thoſe Amendments, and aſſign'd their Reaſons at a Conference; as if, in hope, that ſome Controverſy would enſue, which might furniſh them with an Opportunity of getting rid of the Bill with Grace, and thereby exempting the Crown from the Scandal of doing their Drudgery. But if that was their Purpoſe, they met with a very ſenſible Diſappointment: For their Lordſhips (g) return'd the Bill the ſame Day, with a Meſſage, ſignifying, That they did not inſiſt on their Amendments, and had agreed to the Bill.

A Place-Bill paſs'd by the Commons, and the Lords,

1693-4.

Thus the like Difficulty devolv'd on his Majeſty, which he had incurr'd twice before: As the Houſe of Commons was then conſtituted, and as a Majority there was of ſuch Importance to the favourite Point of profecuting the War, the paſſing it was impracticable; on the other Hand, nothing could be more unpopular than to reject it; nor had any Party of Men been more clamorous on the former Occaſion than the Whigs, with whom his Majeſty was now ſurrounded. And yet, notwithſtanding their former Opinion, or preſent Aſcendancy, or the Suggeſtion of Burnet, (who by the way makes no Mention of this whole Affair) That every thing was done that was like to put them in good Humour, when the Land-Tax Bill, and ſuch others as were ready, were preſented, on the 27th of January, for the Royal Aſſent, Thoſe were paſs'd, and This was rejected. A. D. 1693-4.

but rejected by the King.

And now we are come to one of the moſt extraordinary Tranſactions that, perhaps, is to be met with, either in our Annals, or thoſe of any other Nation: For that very Houſe of Commons, for whoſe Sake his Majeſty had been induc'd to take this impolitic Step, and, who had, for their own, rejected the Bill for (h) frequent Parliaments, which took its Riſe from the very ſame Conſideration, had the aſtoniſhing Reſolution to enter into an Expoſtulation with the King upon it, and to endeavour to ingratiate themſelves with the Public at his Expence; at leaſt their Conduct had this Appearance: For tho' the Motion of the Houſe, to reſolve itſelf into a Committee, in order to take the State of the Kingdom into Conſideration, and the Queſtion propos'd in that Committee, aroſe from the Intractable Whigs, the Majority gave into it, and the Reſolution it produc'd were carried without a Diviſion, both in the Committee and upon the Report.

Now theſe Reſolutions were,

1. That whoever adviſ'd the King not to give the Royal Aſſent to the Act touching free and impartial Proceedings in Parliament, which was to redreſs a Grievance, and take off a Scandal upon the Proceedings of the Commons in Parliament; is an Enemy to their Majeſties, and the Kingdom.

A Repreſentation order'd by the Commons thereon.

2. That a Repreſentation be made to his Majeſty, humbly to lay before him, how few the Inſtances have been in former Reigns, of denying the Royal Aſſent, to Bills for Redreſs of Grievances; and the great Grief of the Commons, for his not having given the Royal Aſſent to ſeveral public Bills, as particularly to the Bill above-mention'd, which tends ſo much to the clearing the Reputation of this Houſe, after their having ſo

(g) Tho' not without ſome debating, and a formal Diviſion of the Houſe, (Content 36; not Content 25) which was followed by a Proteſt of the Earl of Rocheſter and the Biſhop of London, for which they aſſign'd this Reaſon.

Becauſe, that an Act that complains of Corruption in former Parliaments, and deſigns to provide againſt it for the future, ought not, in our Opinion, to contain a Clauſe to allow any one Member of the Houſe of Commons, to be excepted from the general Rules preſcrib'd, to hinder all the Members from taking Employments; eſpecially the Speaker of that Houſe, who, if he can be capable of being corrupted, may, by himſelf alone, do much more Miſchief than a great many of the Members can do together; and this Clauſe allowing the Speaker capable of ſuch Advantages and Employments, which all other Members are debar'd from by Virtue of this Act, ſeems to eſtabliſh the Poſſibility of Corruption in him by a Law, which we conceive would be ſcandalous for the preſent, and of very dangerous Conſequence in time to come.

(h) It ought alſo to be remember'd, That in the Houſe-Money Paper, before cited, there is the following Paſſage: "There is a certain Secret that has ſtole out of our Cabinet, that one there, immediately on the King's refuſing the Triennial Bill laſt Seſſions, undertook that it ſhould be thrown out the next time they ſat, with as much Scorn and Contempt as was the Judges Bill. It is time to have Annual Parliaments inſtead of Triennial, ſince Privy Counſellors, and Lords of the Treaſury, both which Stations this Perſon enjoys, can ſo perfectly feel the Pulſe of a Parliament in an Interval."

A. D. 1693. so freely voted to supply the public Occasions.

And whereas the Second did not come up to the Spirit of the First, nor to the Purpose of those who had set this Measure on foot, the Members of the Committee, appointed to draw up the said Representation, took the Liberty to furnish out sufficient Matter for a new Debate, by grafting upon their Instructions the following supplemental Clause.

A Paragraph rejected. "We beg, Sir, you will be pleas'd to consider us as answerable to those we represent; and it is from your Goodness we must expect Arguments to soften to them, in some measure, the necessary Hardships they are forc'd to undergo in this present Conjuncture; and, therefore, humbly beseech your Majesty, for the removing all Jealousies from your People, (without which the Parliament will be unable to serve your Majesty, or to support the Government) to be pleas'd to follow the Course of the best of your Predecessors, and direct some Expedient, whereby your Majesty, your Parliament and People, may reap the Fruit design'd by that Bill, to which your Majesty, by ill Advice, was pleas'd so lately to deny the Royal Assent."

But tho' a Representation had been so easily carry'd, it appear'd upon the Report, That those, who, in hopes of obtaining a little Credit with the People, and on the Presumption of being pardon'd at Court, had join'd in it, never intended to deduce any Benefit to the Country from it: Knowing they had already put his Majesty's Patience and Forbearance to a sufficient Trial; and dreading the Effect of a new Experiment, they took Shelter under the Votes of the House, and insisted, that the Committee had no Warrant from thence, to lay his Majesty under any such Difficulty as was implied in the Motion of an Expedient to recover the Bill; and, upon the whole, prevail'd with the Majority to reject the Clause, A. D. 1693. and substitute the following one in its stead.

Another inserted in its stead. "Upon these Considerations we humbly beseech your Majesty to believe, that none can have so great a Concern and Interest in the Prosperity and Happiness of your Majesty and Government, as your two Houses of Parliament; and do therefore humbly pray, That, for the future, you would be graciously pleas'd to hearken to the Advice of your Parliament, and not to the secret Advices of particular Persons, who may have private Interests of their own, seperate from the true Interest of your Majesty and your People."

Having thus new modell'd the Address, nothing remain'd but to present it, which was done for the more ostentations Sake, by the whole House. The King, on the other Hand, affected to take time to consider of it, and appointed a Day for the House to attend him again, in order to receive his Answer, which Answer was as follows:

"Gentlemen,

His Majesty's Answer. I am very sensible of the good Offices you have express'd to me upon many Occasions; and the Zeal you have shewn for our common Interest: I shall make use of this Opportunity, to tell you, that no Prince ever had a higher Esteem for the Constitution of the English Government than myself; and that I shall ever have a great Regard for the Advice of Parliament.

I am persuaded, that nothing can so much conduce to the Happiness and Welfare of this Kingdom, as an entire Confidence between the King and People, which I shall, by all Means, endeavour to preserve: And, I assure you, I look upon such Persons as my Enemies, who shall advise any thing that may lessen it."

Debate thereon. All this was courtly and plausible enough; but so little to the (i) Purpose, that the Malcontents, on the Report of it to the House,

(i) In the Tacobite Paper, call'd, The Price of the Abdication, is the following Passage, "It might have been expected, that a direct and categorical Answer should have been given to so home an Address; yet it seems the House, for all the Millions given, must be treated only with whipt Cream, or perfum'd Airs; which would not have satisfied, if the Adepti had not found their Account in a previous Treat of a 23,000*l.* Distribution." The same writer also adds, "That if any of our preceding Kings had given such an Answer upon a Petition of Right, or the like Occasion, it would have enrag'd an Hornet's Nest; and no less than the voting a fresh Address, or adjourning till they receiv'd a more satisfactory Answer, would have contented the House." And, again, "How can any say, He hath a great Regard to the Advices of Parliaments? When, at that very same Instant, neither the Advisers of the rejecting the Bill are delated, nor the Prayer of the Representation touched upon.

How can one be perswaded, That nothing can so much conduce to the Happiness and Welfare of this Kingdom, as an entire Confidence between the King and People, without explaining what People are intended. For the complex Body of the People, and Pensioners, have very different Interests; and the Majority of the representative People, were, at the voting the Representation at least, no such Confidents, neither when the Le Roy advisera was pronounced, could it be truly said, That he would, by all Means, endeavour to preserve it: when, contrary to Expectation and Interest, it the Maxim laid down be true, the Prince rejected so solemn an Advice.

Since, therefore, such apparent Flaws may be found in the Assertory Part, it will be worth our Enquiry, how they are amended in the Promissory Part of the Answer, in these Words. And, I assure you, I shall look upon such Persons as my Enemies, which shall advise any thing that shall lessen it. Even Oracles never wanted Ambiguity. The Commons declare who were Enemies to the King and Kingdom; here those are characterized who must be reputed Enemies to the King only. It is not Tones, whether they be Enemies to the Kingdom or not, so they be but Friends to the King! How dexterous soever the Advisers of the Answer thought themselves, the not complying with the parliamentary Advice, and the so loose answering an Address of that Importance, will more than once rivet it in the Minds of the People, That a Pensionary Party, however unfaithful to the Interests of the Body of the People, are only to be carefsed, and have the Character of Friends; and the true Patriots of their Country must be calumniated with the Epithet of Enemies, who lessen the Confidence between King and People."

During this Session also, another Pamphlet was publish'd (which is still extant in the State Tracts of this Reign) under the Title of A Dialogue between Whig and Tory, probably by that eminent Revolution Patriot the Earl of Warrington, with a free Dedication to King William, in which is the following remarkable Passage. "In the next Place, Sir, let me desire you to avoid concerning yourself in Elections of Members in Parliament, or influencing them when chosen. The Parliament is a sacred Part of the English Constitution; and, like the Israelites Ark of old, is not to be touched profanely, but with great Danger to those who touch it to. And, therefore, Sir, it will be your true Interest to leave the People free to their Choice, and the Members free to their Opinions when chosen. It is still fresh in our Memories, how much the Practices of the late Reigns, in corrupting Elections, and closetting Members of Parliament, enrag'd the Nation, and they had Reason to reflect it: For it, for the Sake of a Vote, a Member of Parliament shall be plac'd or an Office of Trust he is not fit for, that is destroying the Government

A. D. 1693-4. House, mov'd for a Day to take it into Consideration; and this being agreed to, the first of February was appointed; when a new Debate arose; and, in the Course of it, every bitter thing was said, that either Wit or Malice could inspire; but all without Effect: For upon the Issue a Question being put, That an humble Application be made to his Majesty, for a farther Answer, it pass'd in the Negative, by so vast a Majority as 229 against 88: Whence we may gather how sincere that Majority were in the first Stage of this Affair.

And now we are at liberty to follow the Courtiers once more, thro' their favourite Walk of Ways and Means.

Time of Contribution to the Million-Annuity Bill enlarg'd.

The Second Money-Bill under Consideration, was a sort of Supplement to the Million Annuity-Act of January 26, 1692, and only enlarg'd the time for completing the Contributions thereon, which were, at this time, deficient 118,506*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* altho' 14 per Cent was allow'd for the Money so contributed; and several Excise Duties were appropriated for Payment of the said Duties: This had pass'd thro' both Houses, during the Controversy, and receiv'd the Royal Assent on the 8th of February, together with another Act, which provided, that their Majesties, their Heirs and Successors, and all claiming any Royal Mines under them, might have the Ore of the said Mines, at certain Rates, prescrib'd therein.

The Expedient which was next adopted, probably took its Rise from the Observations which had been made of Mr. Neale, their Majesties Groom-Porter's Success, in a Project of his, call'd the Profitable Adventure, by way of Blank and Prize; which was form'd on such a Principle, as secur'd a certain Gain to the Undertaker, and, at the same time, so flatter'd the Passions of the Adventurer, that every body who had but Money enough to purchase a Ticket, made no Difficulty to put all to the Hazard, for the Sake of being in Fortune's Way. This Project had been brought to Issue the first of November; before the End of that Month the Prizes were put in order of Payment; and when the Government made their first Experiment in the Lottery way, (which being founded on the Folly and Avarice of Mankind, has prov'd such an inexhaustible Source of Money ever since) Mr. Neale was made their principal Manager, for which express Authority was given in the last Clause of the Act.

The Sum to be rais'd by this Expedient was a Million; but then it was rais'd on such extravagant Terms, as shew'd, that the Nation were now to be the Bubbles, and not the Adventurers: For the Provision made, by way of Inducement to fill this Lottery, was after the Rate of 140,000*l.* a Year, to be paid for sixteen Years successively to the said Adventurers; and not only a new Excise-Duty, of Two-pence a Bushel, on Salt, but several additional Duties on Beer, Ale, &c. were impos'd, and most strictly appropriated, as a Fund for raising this annual Sum, and the Charge of Management. A. D. 1693-4. The first Lottery Bill.

The Bill was of so complicated a Nature, and consisted of such a Variety of (k) Clauses, that it took up a (l) longer time than ordinary, in passing thro' the usual Forms; and in this Interval the House was indue'd (by what Motives will appear in its Place) to receive that very Petition from the City of London, in relation to a parliamentary Provision for the Orphans, whose Fortunes they had most unjustifiably squander'd, which, so much to their Credit, they had rejected the Session before; and to pass a Bill for that Purpose, which consisted also of a great Variety of Clauses, and extended to a great Variety of Particulars, such as the City Lands, which were charg'd with 8000*l.* a Year; the City Aqueducts; 2000*l.* on personal Estates; and other Duties on binding Apprentices, making Freemen, Wines and Coals imported in the Port of London, &c.

A Provision made for the London Orphans.

By the 23d of March, however, both these Bills having been carried thro' both Houses, receiv'd the Royal Assent; and, upon this Occasion, his Majesty was pleas'd to express himself to both Houses as follows:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

When I consider how far the Year is advanc'd, what Preparations our Enemies make to be early in the Field, and how necessary it is that we should be ready to meet them, both by Sea and Land, I must earnestly recommend to you the Dispatch of those important Affairs, which you have under your Deliberation. The King in a Speech to both Houses presses Dispatch, &c.

I am very sensible of the good Affection which you have shewn in this, as well as former Sessions, by enabling me to carry on the War we are engag'd in, for our common Safety. There is nothing I have so much at my Heart as the Ease and Happiness of my People; and it is with great Reluctance that I am forc'd to ask such large Supplies: But since our present Circumstances make this unavoidable, Government two Ways at once: For to speak in the Phrase of the Ministry, it is making a Parliament of Cheats, and an Officer of Cheats at the same Stroke. Rejecting Bills offer'd by Parliament, of public Benefit, and for securing our antient Government, and the fundamental Rights of the Subjects, was highly displeasing to the Nation also in the late Reigns, and will be so in all Reigns; as was likewise the denying the People their undoubted Right of frequent Parliaments. They had, also, in the late Governments, an Invention to make a Pump of the Parliament, and by pouring a Pint of Water, to fetch out a Tun. This was justly most provoking to the Nation, and treasur'd up Wrath against the Day of Wrath."

(k) By one of which it was expressly mention'd, That no Member of the House of Commons should, at any time, be concern'd, either directly or indirectly, in the farming, collecting, or managing any of the Duties, Monies, &c. granted by this Act, or that should be granted by any other Act, except the Commissioners of the Treasury. &c.

(l) Nor was it perfect at last: For we find, that a new Bill (which has been most unaccountably entitled, An Act for raising Money by a Poll, payable quarterly) was almost immediately prepar'd, to clear up a Doubt which had arisen in relation to the Blanks. And tho' it had been asserted in the Former, that the Surplus of all the Sums to be rais'd by it, would never, in any Case, exceed 2400*l.* a Year, another Clause was added to this supplemental Act, which provided that the Monies that should arise from the several Rates and Duties of Excise, specified in it, during the last three Years of the Sixteen, and should remain, after all Demands and Arrearages had been satisfied, should be reserv'd and dispos'd, as should be directed by Parliament.

A. D. 1693-4. unavoidable, it shall be my Endeavour, that the Sums which are given shall be laid out, in the best Manner, to the Uses for which they are design'd.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

I take this Occasion to mention to you the Debt for the Transport-Ships, which were used in the reducing of Ireland. It grieves me exceedingly to see such a Number of Persons, who came so freely in, for so good a Service, brought to the last Extremities, for want of what is due to them. It is not possible for me to discharge this Debt without your Help: And as I doubt not but you have a just Commiseration of their Case, so I hope you will find out some way for their Relief."

And here we have a new Proof, that his Majesty had nothing farther to apprehend from the opposing Party in the House of Commons: There was not a forer Place in the Government than the forfeited Estates in Ireland: The King, as formerly mention'd, (p. 253.) had, in a manner, pass'd his Word to both Houses, that he would not dispose of them without their Concurrence: It was known, nevertheless, that he had dispos'd of them, without any Regard to his Word so pass'd: Several Motions had been made in relation to them; and during this Session in particular, a Bill had been brought in to vest the said Forfeitures in their Majesties, to be applied to the Use of the War: Here, therefore, was the fairest Opportunity imaginable to answer his Majesty's Request, with the greatest Propriety imaginable, by completing that Bill with an additional Clause for that Purpose. But no such thing was done; and from the Residue of the Session it appears, that a general Resolution had been taken to oblige the King his own way.

Projects for erecting a Bank.

The Expediency of erecting a national Bank, after the manner of those of Amsterdam, Genoa, &c. to answer a Variety of national Purposes, had, for some time past, been the Talk of the Public; and during this Session, two several Projects of that Nature had been communicated in form, both to the Ministers and the House of Commons. One of these was the Invention of Doctor Hugh Chamberlain, and propos'd the Circulation of Tickets on Land-Security; (of which we shall hear more hereafter) and the other of one Mr. William Paterson; but carry'd into Execution by the Credit and Interest of Mr. Michael Godfrey, Brother to Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, assisted by some of the most active Solicitors against the East-India Company, who having met with a new Repulse in that Affair, as will be farther explain'd, were now encourag'd to prosecute this other Scheme, as what had a like Prospect of rewarding their Trouble.

This last Project was founded on the Notion of a transferable Fund of Interest, and a Circulation by Bill, on the Credit of a large Capital of ready Money. Mr. Paterson had imparted it to the Ministers in the Year 91, and, at their Request, had form'd a Society of twenty monied Men, to countenance and support the Proposal: But no sooner had they done so, than the Ministers propos'd, that the King should furnish the Capital, and, consequently, become the grand Negotiator of all the Cash in the Kingdom: This put all to a Stand again; and tho', by way of Expedient, it was propos'd by some, that Exchequer-Bills, Tallies, &c. should be made current by Law, that so the Government might, of course, have the Use of the Money; such was the Dread which then prevail'd of a Government-Connection, that the Treaty broke off; and all that Year, and the next, pass'd over, without producing any Resolution concerning it. A. D. 1693-4. Paterson's Narrative. P. 2.

However, just before the opening of the Session we are now treating of, one of the Ministers, who is not nam'd, sent for Paterson, and encourag'd him to prosecute his Purpose anew, which he was easily induc'd to do; tho' on a Plan somewhat different from the Former: For the Project he now prepar'd, was for raising two Millions at seven per Cent. And this being laid before the Treasury-Board, he was told, that no Dependence could be plac'd upon it, unless countenanc'd by a like Society of Men as the Former had been. To procure such a Society therefore, became his next Effort; and so far did he succeed in it, that he prevail'd with forty Men to undertake for Subscriptions, to the Amount of 5000 l. each, as a Fund of ready Money to circulate 1,000,000*l.* at eight per Cent. Still, however, their Lordships affected to despair of Success; for having been us'd to give twenty, thirty, nay, sometimes forty per Cent. on Tallies, bearing eight per Cent. Interest, which had but four or five Years to run, they persuaded themselves that the Lenders would require double that Discount on these, which were to be issued on a Fund that had no positive Determination: Now no Men are more sensible or more vain of their own Importance than Money-Jobbers; or more adroit at discovering or improving every Opportunity that offers for the Advancement of their Interest: No sooner, therefore, had the Fears and Doubts of the Board given this Opening to the Persons we are speaking of, than some of them (against Paterson's Opinion) rush'd in with a new Proposal, to this Effect, That for a farther Encouragement to the Undertakers, and that the Government might be sure the Money would come in, eight per Cent. might be allow'd, not only for the Million to be advanc'd to the Government, but for 200,000 l. design'd to circulate the same, to which, we are told, the Treasury readily agreed.

But when the Scheme came to be open'd to the Gentlemen who were to assist in carrying it thro' the House of Commons, some of them remonstrated against it, as too extravagant to be countenanc'd, even in those extravagant Times; and those who were willing to go farther in supporting the Government, would not be prevail'd upon to adopt it, unless the Undertakers would oblige themselves to furnish the whole; which they declining, the Treaty went off, The Plan favorable times alter'd.

A.D. 1693-4 and the Lottery-Project took Place in its room, as the Sheet-Anchor of the Session.

It was, however, soon discover'd, that the Land-Tax, and the said Lottery-Project, would not answer the extraordinary Services of the Year; and, consequently, that there was a Necessity both of new Provisions, and of procuring an easy Passage for them through both Houses. By what Means this was done, we have been already appriz'd; and to what Effect, is now to be explain'd.

Paterson was too fond of his Conceit, and had rais'd too great Expectations from it, to be easily induc'd to give it over: Notwithstanding, therefore, all the Difficulties and Discouragements he had met with, he continued to prosecute it as before; on a Presumption that the Exigencies of the State, would, at last, drive the Ministers into that Port, which, according to his Notions, Reason and Expediency invited them to. Thus, on the Miscarriage of his last Attempt, he had immediately recourse to a new one, which was to raise and circulate 1,200,000*l.* upon a Fund of 100,000*l. per Annum*: And at this Crisis it was that Mr. Godfrey, and his Associates slept in, and, in effect, supplanted him: For tho' he continued to advise and assist in the Direction of the Measure, Godfrey stood foremost in it, and was considered, both by the Ministers and the Parliament, as the efficient Man on whom all depended, and to whom all Acknowledgments were to be paid.

It is brought into the House of Commons, and occasions great Debates.

At length, when the Bargain had been struck, and a Majority in each House had been pre-engag'd to support it, the Undertakers for the Court solemnly introduc'd it into the House of Commons; and their Advocates without, both in print and otherwise, set it forth as the only effectual Expedient in the whole Circuit of Ways and Means, to rescue the Nation out of the Hands of Extortioners and Usurers, to lower Interest, raise the Value of Land, revive and establish public Credit, facilitate the annual Supplies, and tye the People faster to the Government. On the other Hand, all the great Things which were said of it, only serv'd, among some People, to bespeak Opposition and create Clamour against it: And this Clamour and Opposition was of two Sorts: For some affected to be against it for the Sake of the Government, under an Apprehension, That the Undertakers would never be able to make good their Engagements; or if they were, That any sudden Pannic would induce the Contributors under them to withdraw their Money at a Moment's Notice; in which case, not only the Bank must fail, but the Government with it. And others again made no Scruple to surmise, that a Constitution of this kind had a natural Tendency to absorb either all, or the far greater Part of the Cash of the Kingdom: That as it was a Creature of the Government, Care would be taken to give it none but Government-Operations: That hence the very Wealth of the People might be made an Engine of Torture to the People. That more was to be apprehended from a Bank of Money, under such a Direction, than a Citadel: That in case the Intercourse, which would naturally arise between the Court and Corporation, should proceed without interruption, the Corporation would not only become of more Importance in the State than the City of London, but, probably, than the very Parliament itself: If not, that either the Motions of the Bank would interfere with, or, perhaps, overrule those of the State; or the State finding itself distress'd, might, in Resentment, be provok'd to serve itself, by way of Reprisal: That the shutting up the Exchequer in the last Reign but one, after the Bankers had been induc'd to depositе the Money there, which had been deposited with them, was alone sufficient to manifest the Danger of trusting any mighty Mass of Wealth within the Reach of Power; and that, in all Regards, from the time this new Wheel was added to the Machine of Government, all its Motions would be mysterious and unintelligible; and a very little Cunning might serve to ruin what all the Wisdom and Virtue of the Nation could never restore.

Arguments against and for it.

This is a Brief of what was advanc'd by Malcontent and Courtier, to forward or obstruct this important Measure: And only a Brief of the Controversy can be given; for a large Folio would scarce contain the Whole. A Vein of Passion and Interest ran thro' every Part of it; and tho' what was right and fit, seem'd to be the great Pursuit on both Sides, they were made use of by way of Gloss and Gilding only, and nothing could be more unlike than the Contents and the Surface.

But whoever had the best Intentions, or the best Reasons to urge in support of them, the Espousers of the Bank were the Majority, and carry'd their Point in almost every Stage of the Debate.

Abstract of the Bill.

The Title of the Bill was for granting to their Majesties several Rates and Duties upon Tunnage of Ships and Vessels, and upon Beer, Ale, and other Liquors; for securing certain Recompences and Advantages, therein mention'd, to such Persons as should voluntarily advance the Sum of 1,500,000*l.* towards carrying on the War against France: And, in the Preamble, it was farther said, that those several Rates and Duties were given to their Majesties, as a farther Supply of their extraordinary Occasions, for and towards the necessary Defence of their Realms. The Tunnage was granted for four Years, and consisted of various Articles, at various Rates; as, thirty Shillings per Tun on East-India Ships; fifteen on Italian and Turkey Ships; West-India ten; Holland three; Norway five; Ireland and Scotland two; Streights fifteen; Guinea, Africa and Hudson's-Bay twenty; Canaries, Madeira, Western Islands ten; Greenland and Russia ten; and Coasters, except such as only carried Sand, Lime or Slate, from Port to Port, Six-pence: And the Excises consisted of the Moiety, or half Part of the additional Duties, granted to their Majesties in the Year 91, for four Years; that is to say, Nine-pence

D. 1693-4. pence per Barrel on Beer; Home made Vinegar, one Shilling and Sixpence; Foreign, four Shillings; Beer or Mum imported, three Shillings; Cyder imported, four Pound per Tun; fingle Brandy, Sixpence per Gallon; double, one Shilling; Cyder sold by Retail, one Shilling and Sixpence per Hogshead; and Mead, Three-pence per Gallon: And these Exciſes were to be applied to the Uſes of this Act, from the 17th of May, 1697, which was juſt a Fortnight before the Tunnage Duties were to expire. By the Twelfth and Thirteenth Clauſes of the Bill it was provided, That the Amount of theſe Duties ſhould be kept ſeperate, and paid into the Exchequer weekly: By the Fifteenth, that their Majeſties might defray all ſtated and incident Charges, attending the Collection, &c. out of the Product. By the Seventeenth, That 140,000*l.* ariſing out of the ſaid Duties, ſhould be a yearly Fund, for ſatisfying and rewarding thoſe Perſons who advanc'd the Sum above ſpecified: And that in caſe the ſaid Duties did not produce the ſaid Sum yearly, the reſt of the Revenue ſhould be anſwerable for the Remainder. By the Eighteenth, that the ſaid 140,000*l.* ſhould alſo be kept apart in the Exchequer. By the Nineteenth, That their Majeſties might be empower'd to name Commiſſioners, under the Great Seal, for taking and receiving voluntary Subſcriptions, either from Natives or Foreigners, to the Amount of 1,200,000*l.* part of the ſaid 1,500,000*l.* and that 100,000*l. per Annum*, ariſing out of the ſaid yearly Impoſitions, ſhould be appropriated to the Uſe of the ſaid Subſcribers. By the Twentieth, That their Majeſties might incorporate the ſaid Subſcribers, by the Name of, The Governor and Company of the Bank of England, under a Proviſo, (which is contain'd in the Twenty-firſt) that at any time after the firſt of Auguſt, 1705, upon twelve Months Notice, and the Repayment of the ſaid 1,200,000*l.* the ſaid Corporation ſhould abſolutely ceaſe and determine. By the Twenty-third it was farther provided, that no Perſon ſhould ſubſcribe above 20,000*l.* By the Twenty-fifth, That they ſhould be no Corporation, unleſs one Moiety of the ſaid 1,200,000*l.* was advanced before the firſt of Auguſt. By the Twenty-ſixth, That they ſhould not borrow more than the ſaid 1,200,000*l.* except on Parliament Funds. By the Twenty-ſeventh and Twenty-eighth, That they ſhould not trade, on Pain of forfeiting treble the Value of the Commodity traded in, except in Bills of Exchange, Bullion, or Wares left in Pledge and forfeited. By the Thirtieth, That in caſe they purchas'd any Lands of Revennes belonging to the Crown, or advanc'd any Sum or Sums of Money to the Crown, by way of Loan, or Anticipation on any Fund or Funds, other than ſuch on which a Credit of Loan was, on lawful Conviction, they ſhould forfeit treble the Value. By the Thirty-third, That any Member or Members of Parliament might be Members of the ſaid Corporation. By the Thirty-fourth, That ſuch as ſhould contribute towards the raiſing of the remaining 300,000*l.* ſhould receive yearly Sums in proportion, after the Rate of fourteen per Cent. By the Thirty-fifth, That the Monies payable in virtue of this Act, ſhould be exempt from Taxes. By the the Fortieth, That if the Duties fell ſhort, the Deficiencies ſhould be made good out of the next Aid; and if no ſuch Aid ſhould be granted before the ſecond of February 94, out of the current Revenue. By the Forty-firſt, That over and above the 1,000,000*l.* already appropriated to the Uſe of the Navy and Ordnance, 1,500,000*l.* ſhould be appropriated to the ſame Services; and the Remainder of all other Grants, which had, or ſhould be made during that Seſſion, not already by this or any other Act appropriated, ſhould be applied for the Payment of the Land-Forces, Ordnance, Ammunition, and other Charges incident to the War. By the Forty-ſecond, That one Half of all the Money granted this Seſſion, except the Land-Tax, (out of which 1,000,000*l.* had been already appropriated to the Uſe of the Navy, and what was otherwiſe appropriated to pay the Recompences of thoſe who had furniſh'd the Loans) ſhould be applied to the ſame Uſe and Service, till the remaining 1,500,000*l.* ſhould be compleatly paid and ſatisfied. By the Forty-ſixth, That in order that it might the better appear how the Service appointed in the ſaid Land-Tax Bill, for ſecuring the Merchant-Ships in going out or coming home, by employing a ſufficient Number of Ships, by way of Cruizers and Convoys, the Lord High Admiral of England, or Commiſſioners for executing that Office, were requir'd to exhibit to the Commons, aſſembled in Parliament, at their next Sitting, a Certificate in writing, under his or their Hands reſpectively, of the Ships ſo employ'd. And, laſtly, "To the End that the great Duties of Exciſe, and the Powers given for the collecting and levying the ſame, might not be employ'd for the influencing of Elections of Members to ſerve in Parliament; which Elections, by the Conſtitution of this Government, ought to be (m) free and uncorrupt," (theſe are the Words of the Act) in the Forty-eighth, It is yet farther provided, that from and after the firſt Day of May, then next enſuing, no Collector, Supervifor, Gauger, or other Officer or Perſon whatſoever, concern'd any manner of way in levying or managing the ſaid Duties, ſhould, by Word, Meſſage, or Writing, or any other Method whatſoever, endeavour to perſuade any Elector to give, or diſſuade any Elector from giving, his Vote, in ſuch Elections, on pain of forfeiting 100*l.* and being render'd for ever incapable of ſerving in any Truſt or Office for the future.

Exciſe Officers forbad to meddle in Elections.

(m) Upon hearing the Merits of a Return for Stock-Bridge this Seſſion, the Election was not only declar'd void, on account of manifeſt Corruption, but a Bill was brought in for diſfranchiſing the ſaid Borough; and probably if it had been thought fit to eſtabliſh this Precedent, we had, by this time, got rid of the rotten Part of our Conſtitution.

ble Bill, which gave so much additional Strength to the new Government; and of which it was necessary to treat the more copiously, because Bishop Burnet has said so (n) little of it, and the rest of our general Historians nothing at all.

As to the particular Obstructions it met with in passing thro' the two Houses, and the Improvements it receiv'd, some of the Latter are visible in the Bill, tho' rather as Grafts upon it, than natural Shoots from it; and the Former were too numerous to be given in detail.

The Subscription to the Bank completed in ten Days.

All, therefore, that need be said further concerning it, relates to its Success, which, at that time of Day, when Government-Securities were not so greedily swallow'd as they have been since, was held astonishingly great; the whole Subscription being fill'd in ten Days after the opening it; and the Corporation, from the Moment of its Establishment, obtaining so great a Credit with the Public, that tho' the Court of Directors call'd in but 720,000 l. of the Money subscrib'd, they completed their Payment of the whole 1,200,000 l. before the Time prescrib'd by the Act. And yet such was the signal Ingratitude of those who had the Lead in it, that it was not without some Difficulty that Paterson was admitted to be one of the first Directors; and when some of his Friends occasionally suggested the Clames he had upon the Corporation, and the Reasonableness of assigning him a proper Recompence for the Charge he had been at, the Time he had lost, the Vexations he had undergone, and the Services he had done, the Answer sometimes was, That they were not appriz'd what his Services were; at other Times, That it was not the Business of the Directors, but of the King, the Treasury, or the general Court of the Bank, or all of them, to gratify him: And all that was at last done by them, was to recommend him to the Lords of the Treasury for a 1000 l. by way of Reimbursement, and thro' them to the King for a farther Reward.

A Bill to impose a Stamp Duty on Velum, Parchment, and Paper.

Still the Grants fell short of the Estimates; for which Reason it was still necessary to continue the Search of Ways and Means; and the Expedient next agreed upon, was, to impose several Stamp-Duties upon all Velum, Parchment, and Paper, made use of in almost every kind of Intercourse between Man and Man. This, in the Preamble, was call'd a free Gift, towards the extraordinary Occasions, which oblig'd their Majesties to a great and present Expence, for the necessary Defence of their Realms. The Term of the Grant was four Years. The Money to be rais'd upon the Credit of it was 330,000 l. at eight per Cent. His Majesty was authoris'd to issue a new Commission, and erect a new Office for the Management of it; and to defray the Expence out of the Monies arising by the Act; and both Office and Officers were made subject to the Orders of the Treasury-Board.

A new Duty impos'd on Hackney and Stage Coaches.

Lastly, to compleat the Burden of the Year, a Bill was brought in for the Licensing and Regulating Hackney and Stage Coaches; or rather for imposing a new Duty, and increasing ministerial Power under that Pretence: For, to carry this Bill into Execution, Power was given to the Crown to erect another new Office, under the Direction of five Commissioners, who were authoris'd to appoint such other Officers as they should find necessary, with such moderate Allowances as should be fit; (which are the Words of the Act) and tho' it be true, that some wholesome Provisions were made in it, for setting Bounds to the Insolences and Extortions of Drivers, the main Point was, the Profit to be deriv'd from it to the Government; which Profit was to arise in this manner, viz. The Number of Hackney Coaches was settled at 700: All were to be licens'd: The Price of a Licence was fix'd at fifty Pounds, to be paid down at the Office before the Licence was deliver'd; over and above which said fifty Pounds, a Rent of four Pounds a Year was reserv'd for each Coach, to be paid Quarterly. And because Stage-Coaches were not requir'd to pay any Fine for this Licence, they were oblig'd to pay double Rent, or eight Pounds a Year: There was not, however, any Clause of Loan in the Bill; and in the Close of it, special Provision is made, That if any Person or Persons, Bodies Politic or Corporate, should, at any time hereafter, procure or accept any Pension, Gift or Grant, for Years or Life, any Sum or Sums of Money, out of the Revenue arising by virtue of the said Act, any such Gift or Grant should be void; and that the Person or Persons offending should, moreover, forfeit 500 l.

Now it is observable, that in the Preambles of these Money-Bills, Care is taken to suggest, that the Expences of the War were as necessary as they were great; and neither in any Speech, or Message from the Throne, the least Hint is dropt, that the Most Christian King either sought, or was disposed to accept of Peace: And yet, over and (n) Which little is as follows: "Among other Funds that were created, one was for constituting a Bank, which occasioned great debates: Some thought a Bank would grow to be a Monopoly. All the Money of England would come into their Hands; and they would, in a few Years, become the Masters of the Stock and Wealth of the Nation. Others argued for it: That the Credit it would have, must increase Trade and the Circulation of Money, at least in Bank Notes. It was visible, that all the Enemies of the Government set themselves against it, with such a Vehemence of Zeal, that this alone convinc'd all People, that they saw the Strength that our Affairs would receive from it. I had heard the Dutch often reckon up the great Advantages they had from their Banks; and they concluded that, as long as England continued Jealous of the Government, a Bank could never be settled among us, nor gain Credit enough to support itself: And upon that, they judged that the Superiority in Trade must still lie on their Side. This, with all the other remote Funds that were created, had another good Effect: It engaged all those, who were concerned in them, to be, upon the Account of their own Interest, zealous for maintaining the Government; since it was not to be doubted, but that a Revolution would have swept all these away. The Advantages that the King, and all concern'd in Taxes, had from the Bank, were soon so sensibly felt, that all People saw into the secret Reasons, that made the Enemies of the Constitution set themselves with so much Earnestness against it." Vol. II. p. 124.

A. D. 1693-4. and above the ſeveral Offers formerly ſpecified, and by M. Amelot recapitulated to the Swiſs-Cantons, in the Beginning of Auguſt, it appears, that the Daniſh Miniſter, reſident at our Court, by order of the King, his Maſter, preſented a Memorial to his Majeſty, dated December (o) 11, O. S. 1694-3, which deſerves to be inſerted entire.

The Daniſh Miniſter's Memorial concerning Peace, and his Maſter's Mediation.

" SIR,

The Deſolation this preſent War carries into moſt Parts of Europe, together with the Duty incumbent on a Chriſtian King, to apply all the Remedies that lie in his Power to ſo general a Calamity, oblige the King of Denmark, my Maſter, to impart to your Majeſty, thoſe Propoſals of Peace which the Moſt Chriſtian King has communicated to him. My Maſter might have Reaſon to decline his Offices towards the Peace of Europe, and taking upon him ſo important a Negotiation, ſince the Advances he has already made, as well as the King of Sweden, have not only proved ineffectual, but likewiſe have been ſo miſconſtrued, as to render them ſuſpected. Nevertheleſs, it is moſt evident, that without any Proſpect of private Intereſt (the Union of the Northern Crowns, for the Security of the Trade of their reſpective Subjects being ſo well eſtabliſh'd, and enjoying the Priviledges of Neutrality, that the Continuation of the War might very much encreaſe the Riches of their Majeſties Dominions) the public Welfare of Europe, and the Deſire to ſee a juſt and laſting Peace reſtor'd, have prevail'd above all other Conſiderations. Wherefore the King, my Maſter, has repreſented to the Moſt Chriſtian King, That the Propoſals which he has made hitherto towards a general Peace, have been look'd upon, by the Confederates, rather as a Means to diſunite them, and to cruſh and ſubdue them one after another, than as a Mark of his ſincere Intentions of ſettling the public Repoſe. But his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, to remove all manner of Diſtruſt, has not only, by repeated Proteſtations, aſſured the King, my Maſter, of the Sincerity of his Sentiments in this Affair, but has likewiſe deliver'd a Project of general Peace, and added to the Conditions that concern the Empire, and which are already known to your Majeſty, ſome others relating to the reſt of the Allies, which are comprehended in the following Heads.

I. That notwithſtanding the Advantages his Arms have gain'd this Campaign, no Alterations ſhall be made in the Conditions his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty has already offer'd to the Emperor, the Princes and States of the Empire, and the Dukes of Lorrain and Savoy.

II. His Majeſty ſhall reſtore to the Catholic King the important Place of Roſes, that of Belvers, and whatever has been conquer'd in Catalonia, during the preſent War.

III. Towards the forming a Barrier in the Low-Countries, which may remove all manner of Jealouſy and Uneaſineſs from the States of Holland, his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty ſhall, upon that Conſideration, reſtore the Places of Mons and Namur to the King of Spain, and cauſe Charleroy to be razed. A. D. 1694.

IV. His ſaid Majeſty ſhall reſtore to the Biſhop of Liege, the Town and Caſtle of Huy, and recompenſe him for Dinant and Bouillon, by annexing, upon that Account, to his Biſhopric, ſuch a Portion of the Country of Luxemburgh, as ſhall be moſt convenient to that Biſhop, and judg'd equivalent by Arbitrators.

V. His Majeſty conſents, that the Treaty of Commerce, made at Nimeguen with the States, be renewed without any Alteration.

VI. His Majeſty thinks the States of Holland will be glad to obtain ſuch important Reſtitutions, and to put an End to the War, by a Peace ſo advantageous both to Spain and all the Allies; eſpecially after the proſperous Campaigns of France; which may ſtill be attended with others no leſs ſucceſsful. But that neither Holland, nor any other State of Europe, may have any Ground of Apprehenſion, that upon Pretence of new Rights, his Majeſty will extend the Boundaries of his Dominions in the Low-Countries, beyond what ſhall be regulated by the Treaty, his Majeſty declares, That, in caſe the King of Spain dies without Iſſue, he conſents that the Low-Countries fall to the Share of the Duke of Bavaria, upon Condition that the Emperor makes the ſame Declaration: And his Majeſty ſhall, as well for himſelf, as for the Dauphin his Son, confirm the ſaid Renunciation, by all the Formalities neceſſary for that Purpoſe, in behalf of his Electoral Highneſs.

His Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty hopes, that this laſt Engagement will, more than any thing beſides, ſecure, to the Confederates, the Firmneſs of the Peace they ſhall make with him: And he thinks, that, after ſuch advantageous Propoſals, the World will ſoon know whether Europe may hope to ſee the public Tranquility reſtor'd, or whether the Preparations of War are to be renew'd.

This, Sir, is what the Moſt Chriſtian King has communicated to the King, my Maſter, and which his Majeſty has commanded me to impart to you. He does, in no manner, pretend to preſcribe Rules to your Majeſty, ſince your Prudence will beſt judge what is moſt for your Glory and Intereſt; but, however, he thinks theſe Propoſals deſerve a ſerious Conſideration. And becauſe there is no mention made of England, the King, my Maſter, has made it, already, his Buſineſs, to encline the Moſt Chriſtian King not to inſiſt upon that which might put a Stop to the general Peace. In the mean time the King, my Maſter, thinks it neceſſary, that, in order to advance a Work ſo profitable and beneficial to all Europe, a Negotiation

(o) This is the Date of the original French; tho' in the Appendix to the Life of King William, it is ſaid to be dated the 19th.

A. D. 1693-4 tiation be set on Foot; and his Majesty is the more confirm'd in this Opinion, by reason the Winter will soon be over; and, that 'tis to be fear'd, lest by delaying till the next Campaign, an Opportunity be given to France either of enlarging her Conquests, or, by a powerful Irruption into Germany, and the Superiority of her Forces, to divide the Confederacy; which would give a just Pretence to that Crown of recalling the Offers she has already made, and render a Peace very difficult, if not altogether impossible. The King, my Master, does not only offer to become Guarantee, with all the Princes and Potentates that will concur with him, but likewise to unite himself, in particular, with your Majesty, by a most strict and indissoluble Alliance.

Upon the whole Matter, the King, my Master, is perswaded, that no body has more Reason to contribute to this Peace than your Majesty, since it will confirm to you the Glory and Advantages you have gain'd during the War; and will, besides, make Europe to be eternally beholden to your Majesty, for the Peace she groans after. If your Majesty thinks that there is any thing defective, in relation to the Security of the Peace, or that wants to be either alter'd or explain'd, the King, my Master, engages to procure to your Majesty, all the Satisfaction imaginable; and if you are pleas'd to confide in his Mediation, he will manage it to your Majesty's entire Satisfaction. Lastly, the King, my Master, has commanded me to assure your Majesty, that being, upon several Accounts, concern'd in the Prosperity of your Royal Family, he will, to the utmost of his Power, promote its Interest and Advantage; and desires your Majesty to be perswaded, that all the Advances he has made in this Affair, have no other Aim, and are grounded upon no other Principle."

Reflections thereon. Now, how short soever these Overtures might fall of the Views and Purposes of the Confederacy, or how impalatable soever a Peace of any Sort might be to his Majesty, it seem'd reasonable to conclude, that in Point of Equity, he ought to have consulted the great Council of the Nation upon it; and that, in particular, the Representatives of the People ought to have had all the Evidence, in relation to Peace and War, laid before them, that they might compare the Prospect of the Success, and the Value of their particular Share of it, with the certain Charge of the Adventure; and the Expediency of exhausting the Strength of twenty Years on the Efforts of ten. If this had been done, they had, indeed, been Judges of the Necessity, as well as of the Greatness of the Charge, brought upon the Nation; but as this never was done in a parliamentary way, if at (p) all, Posterity may be allow'd to wonder, that the Parliament, even in their own Acts, should discover so little Knowledge of what was doing, or so much Complaisance for what was done. A. D. 1693-4.

St. Maloes bombarded by way of Amusement to the Parliament and Nation. What seem'd yet farther to manifest, that the Court took almost as much Pains to amuse the English, as to humble the French, was the bombarding St. Maloes; an Undertaking which, as it was circumstanc'd, could answer no other End, unless to expose our naval Conduct yet farther, to the Derision of all Europe. The King, as we may remember, in a Speech from the Throne, had expressly promis'd his People, That a Descent should be made on the Coast of France, with a much more considerable Force than had been allotted for, but not employ'd in, that Service, the Summer before: And that as soon as he should be enabled, all possible Care and Application should be us'd towards it. That, therefore, he might not seem to have wholly forgot his Promise, or, at least, that the first Heat of the Session might be over, before it would be decent for any body to put him in Mind of it, a Squadron of Frigates and Bomb-Vessels, under the Command of Captain Philips, and Captain Benbow, were fitted out at Portsmouth, for a Secret Expedition; and care was taken to raise an Expectation in the Public, of something considerable to ensue. But after the Mountain had been for some Weeks in Labour, the Product of its Throws appear'd to be no more than this, That on the 16th they came before St. Maloes, that it was Ten o'Clock at Night before they could begin to fire upon the Place: That at Four in the Morning they were oblig'd to warp out, for fear of grounding: That at Eight they return'd, but lost much more time before they could re-commence their Fire: That the 18th they prosecuted the same Business the same way, and also prepar'd a Fire-Ship, by putting 100 Barrels of Powder, and 240 Carcasses on board her: That on the 19th they sent in the said Fire-Ship, and having laid her close to the Town-Wall, blew her up: That the Explosion threw down part of the said Wall, together with the Houses adjoining to it, and set the Town on fire in three or four Places: And that on the 20th, having demolish'd Quince-Fort, and taken about eighty Prisoners, (but not one of the Privateers, which had render'd this Port so obnoxious to the English Merchants) they put to Sea, and by returning home immediately, demonstrated that they had nothing farther in Commission. State of Europe for October.

But what Ends and Purposes soever this Feint was calculated to answer, or what Effect soever it had within Doors, without it only gave the Malcontents a new Pretext to villify the Government, which was done by (p) The Reader will recollect, that Bishop Burnet (Vol. II. p. 113) makes use of these Words, "They (the French) tried all possible Methods for bringing about a general Peace; or, if that fail'd, for a seperate Peace with some of the Confederates: But there was no Disposition in any of them to hearken to it; nor could they engage the Northern Crowns to offer their Mediation." Now the contrary of this last Assertion being thus notoriously the Matter of Fact, we must either suppose that the Secret was kept with the utmost Caution, or that the Bishop is one of the most inaccurate of all Historians.

by a great Variety of Pens, with a peculiar Bitterneſs; as may be gather'd from him who had the Boldneſs to ſay, "That a great many are now of Opinion, he will never attempt a Deſcent any more, till he makes one for good and all, where few will care to follow him."

A Dialogue between A. and B. concerning the Times, 4to. p. 46.

Another palliating but more ſolid Meaſure was alſo concerted about the ſame time: For while the Commons were yet in the Midſt of their Enquiry, concerning the laſt Summer's Miſcarriage, and the Merchants moſt affected by it, were loudeſt in their Complaints, Sir Francis Wheeler was appointed Admiral and Commander in Chief of the Squadron deſign'd for the Mediterranean; and Vice-Admiral Hopſon, and Rear-Admiral Nevil, to command under him: The Squadron was to conſiſt of ſixteen Third Rates, ſeven Fourth, one Fifth, one Sixth, ſix Fire-Ships, two Bomb-Ketches, an Hoſpital and a Store-Ship: He was alſo to be join'd by ſeveral Dutch Men of War; and he had Orders to take under his Convoy all the Merchant-Ships, bound to Turkey, or any other Port in Spain or Italy: As alſo, in caſe he arriv'd at Cadiz before the Spaniſh Plate-Fleet, to cruize for thirty Days in ſuch a Station as ſhould be agreed on at a Council of War, in order to prevent their falling into the Hands of the French, who had two Squadrons at Sea, under the Command of M. Chateau Renaud, and M. Gabaret. Part of the Squadron he was, however, to leave at Cadiz, in order to return to England, at the End of three Week, with ſuch of the Trade as ſhould then be ready to ſet Sail: With the reſt he was to proceed to the Mediterranean; and having fulfill'd his Charge there, was to return to Cadiz, in order to join the Spaniſh Fleet, and to act in Concert with them, till he judg'd the Turkiſh Convoys might be on the Return; when he was to repair to the Station appointed for the general Rendezvous, and to accompany them to England, together with all the other Merchant-Ships, from the Streights or elſewhere, that ſhould come in time enough, to put themſelves under his Protection.

Sir Francis Wheeler, with a ſtrong Squadron, appointed to convoy the Trade to the Mediterranean.

Thus if no Satisfaction could be procur'd for paſt Miſbehaviour, very ſufficient Care was taken to prevent a Repetition of the like Misfortune: And the Misfortune that did happen, as no human Sagacity could foreſee, ſo no human Management could prevent it. Theſe Orders were iſſued November the 20th: and on the 27th of October following, Wheeler ſet Sail from St. Helens. In his Paſſage to Cadiz, he fell in, two or three times, with the Squadrons of the Enemy before-mention'd; and if he had not the good Fortune to come up with them, he was at leaſt ſo fortunate as to ſend in the Trade to Oporto, Liſbon, St. Ubes, &c. &c. and to arrive, in ſafety, with the Remainder, conſiſting of 164 Ships, at Cadiz, on the 19th of January; having loſt Company but of one Ship of his whole Convoy, in his Paſſage.

Thus far, therefore, his Voyage was proſperous; and what increas'd that Proſperity, he found the Flota had eſcap'd the Enemy, and arriv'd there before him: But then he had the Mortification to find the Line of Battle-Ships totally unrigg'd; and tho' the Admiral undertook to put them in ſailing Order about the latter End of March, he was too well acquainted with their dilatory Proceedings to rely on his Aſſurances.

A. D. 1693-4.

Having, however, appointed Rear-Admiral Hopſon to execute the Orders he had receiv'd, with reſpect to the Homeward-bound Ships, he ſet Sail, with the reſt of his Squadron, on the 10th of February, for the Mediterranean; but meeting with contrary Winds, did not reach the Bay of Gibraltar till the 17th. It is nevertheleſs remark'd that the Wind was then favourable; and that he took advantage of it to detach three Men of War, and about thirty Sail of Merchant-Ships, to Alicant, Barcelona, and Majorca, which all came ſafe to Malaga the ſame Day: But lying by himſelf, with the Remainder, till Two in the Morning, it was his hard Fate to encounter one of the moſt violent Tempeſts, accompany'd with Lightning, Thunder and Rain, which had happen'd in the Memory of Man: It began about Seven, and laſted, with little or no Remiſſion, till the 19th; in which terrible Interval, many of the Fleet miſtook the Bay of Gibraltar for the opening of the Streights; and when they diſcover'd their Error, it was too late to prevent the tragical Effects of it: Their Sails flew like Paper: They had a Lee Shore, a mountainous Sea, and a foul Bottom: In a Word, their Anchors and Cables were all they had to truſt to: But even theſe fail'd; Numbers drove a-Shore; many were loſt; many more were miſerably ſhatter'd; and none eſcaped without conſiderable Damage; not to inſiſt on the Loſs of Cables and Anchors, and the diſmaſting of almoſt the whole Fleet.

The Admiral, and ſeveral other Ships loſt in a Storm at Gibraltar.

Rear-Admiral Nevil, and the Dutch Vice-Admiral Callembergh, with ſuch of the Squadron as were within Reach of their Signals, had the good Luck to hit the Streights, and to drive out to Sea: But Wheeler himſelf, in the Suſſex, and his whole Crew, which conſiſted of 448 Hands, were ſwallow'd up in the Deep, except two Moors, who were almoſt by Miracle preſerv'd.

Of thoſe forc'd on Shore, the Cambridge, a Seventy-Gun Ship, the Ludlow-Caſtle, a Bomb-Veſſel, two Ketches, four Turkey Ships, one bound to Venice, and one to Leghorn, were loſt: The Total of Lives deſtroy'd amounted to 857; and when the Reſidue of the Fleet were re-aſſembled at Gibraltar, ſo much it reſembled a general Wreck, and ſo much time was requiſite for refitting it, that inſtead of proſecuting their Voyage, they thought only of taking Shelter from the Enemy at Cadiz; and ſo unfavourable did the Winds continue, that it was the Beginning of May before they were able to accompliſh it.

Towards the End of March the News of this Calamity not only reach'd London, but was made public in the Gazette; and not to

A. D. 1693-4. to inſiſt on the raſh and ridiculous Uſe made of it by the Jacobites, (namely, that the very Elements were at War with the new Government; and that God himſelf, by ſuch Warnings and Chaſtiſements as theſe, call'd upon the Nation to return to their Duty) many of the Money'd Men, who conſider'd all Occurrences in a mere worldly Light, and drew no other Concluſions from public Affairs, than ſuch as regarded their own private Intereſts, took the Hint to conclude, that, while ſuch was the precarious Condition of Commerce, it would be leſs hazardous, and more profitable, to traffic in Government-Securities, than to expoſe their Effects to the Rage of the Sea, or of the Enemy: And it is aſſur'd, that in conſequence of this way of Reaſoning, great Sums of Money were, about this time, withdrawn out of Trade, (poſſibly to be employ'd in the new Bank) and a Rot among the Merchants and Manufacturers, produced not only a viſible Increaſe of Uſurers and Extortioners, but alſo a new Species of Dealers, (ſince better known by the Name of Brokers and Stock-Jobbers) who found Ways and Means to grow rich, without any Stock of their own to trade upon, merely, by bringing Buyers and Sellers together, and by making a Prey of both.

Further Proceedings in the great Diſpute concerning the Eaſt-India Trade.

Nor were theſe the only Inſtances of that harpy Spirit of Rapine, which began now to be viſible among the People. The Conteſt for the Eaſt-India Trade was inſpir'd by the ſame inſatiable Rage of Lucre: And from the Eagerneſs manifeſted by both Parties in carrying it on, every Courtier, and every Man of Conſequence, that either of them applied to, was indue'd to think, that the Prize was ineſtimable, and that he ought to ſet a Value upon his Services accordingly.

As no deciſive Meaſure had been reſolv'd on, during the laſt Seſſion, it was generally believ'd, at the Cloſe of it, that the Company had the beſt of that Conteſt; and to encourage that Belief, they not only talk'd of taking in new Subſcriptions, to the Amount of 756,000 l. (which, together with the 744,000 l. their old Stock had been rated at, made up the Million and a Half, voted, by the Commons, to be a Fund neceſſary for carrying on the Trade) but applied for a new Charter, (by what Ways and Means, will be explain'd in due time) to authoriſe them to do ſo, and having obtain'd an Order of Council to the Attorney-General for preparing one, gave out, That all Perſons were now ſatisfied with, and had agreed to the Regulations, on which the ſaid Charter was to be grounded; eſpecially thoſe who had ſolicited the Eſtabliſhment of a new Company by Act of Parliament. On the other Hand, no ſooner had this Aſſertion of the Company's taken Air, than their Antagoniſts preferr'd a new Petition to her Majeſty, in which they pray'd as before, for the Eſtabliſhment of a new Company, by a new, free, and national Subſcription; and declar'd, That the adding new Subſcriptions to the Imaginary Stock of the Company then ſubſiſting, would expoſe the new Stock to the Debts of the old; whereby the ſaid new Stock might be ſwallow'd up, and the whole Trade endanger'd. A. D. 1693-4.

This they thought would be ſufficient to deſtroy the Notion of a Compromiſe; and they farther preſum'd, that the Company, by their own Miſmanagement, had found out a way to ruin themſelves. For when the Bill for taxing ſeveral joint Stocks was before the Commons, and it was propos'd, that the Stock of the Eaſt-India Company ſhould be comprehended in it, at the Valuation of 744,000 l. ſuch Members as were Proprietors of the ſaid Company, pleaded in Abatement, That in caſe their Debts were paid, their Stock would be worth little or nothing; which ſerving only to authoriſe the Suggeſtion contain'd in the Petition juſt cited, the Commons, notwithſtanding that Plea, added a Clauſe to their Bill, which provided, That, in caſe the Governors and Treaſurers of the ſaid reſpective Companies, or any of them reſpectively, ſhould make Default in Payment of the ſaid ſeveral Sums, charg'd on the Stocks of the ſaid Companies, at the Days and Times ſpecify'd, according to the true Intent of the Act, the Charter of the ſaid ſuch reſpective Company ſhould be, and was thereby adjudg'd void: And the Company were ſo infatuated as to make Default in paying the firſt Quarterly Payment of the ſaid Tax, on the 25th of March, being the Day limited by the Act; whereby their old Charters not only became void, but freſh Arguments were furniſh'd againſt the paſſing a new one.

The Company forfeit their Charter by Non-payment of the Duty impoſ'd on their Stock by Act of Parliament.

Accordingly, for ſome time, the whole Affair was at a ſtand; and it was generally concluded, that the Court would have taken Advantage of the Forfeiture, to make ſuch a Settlement of the Trade, as the Commons had deſir'd, without any Regard to the three Years Warning, which had been allow'd, as a Point of Equity, while They were yet in Force.

But the Intereſt of the Company, it ſeems, was conſiderable enough, to ſuſpend the Effects of their Indiſcretion: For it ſoon appear'd, that the Court were in no Diſpoſition to take Advantage of the Forfeiture; and that, on the contrary, the Orders given for the drawing a new Charter, were not only calculated to reſtore to the Company their former Grants, but to authoriſe and eſtabliſh their new Regulations: This enflam'd the Controverſy more than ever: Their Adverſaries enter'd Caveats, at all the Offices, againſt the paſſing any ſuch Charter; and talk'd in ſo high a Strain upon it, that the Miniſters thought fit to give them a regular Summons before the Council, to ſhew Cauſe why the ſaid Company might not be re-eſtabliſh'd, &c. according to the Purport of the ſaid intended Charter: But the time firſt aſſign'd being too ſhort, a Fortnight more was allow'd; and in this Interval, the Company petitioning for Protections for 1200 Seamen, to be employ'd, as uſual, in the Eaſt-India Trade, the Oppoſing Merchants alſo petition'd for the like Protections for 400, to be employ'd by them in the ſame Trade, which they now underſtood to lie open to all Adventurers; but receiv'd no Anſwer.

Both Parties heard before the Council.

The Day of Hearing was the 17th of Auguſt; and the ſeveral Parties being call'd in, the Council againſt the Company ſet forth, 1. The Unſeaſonableneſs of paſſing a Charter ſo near the Seſſion of Parliament, to whom the Settlement of this Trade had been recommended, by Meſſage from his Majeſty, when they ſat laſt. 2. The Unlawfulneſs of an excluſive Grant. And, 3. The Illegality of ſeveral Powers contain'd in the former Charter, and intended to be reſtor'd in this. The Council for the Company, on the other Hand ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on the Power of the Prerogative in that and the like Caſes, and would admit of neither Precedent or Authority to the contrary. Upon which the Former, by way of Reply, propos'd, That an Iſſue might be ſettled, in which they would readily join, that ſo the Point might be decided at Common Law, the next enſuing Term. But this was over-rul'd; it being urg'd for the Company, That the Matter had been already decided in Weſtminſter-Hall: And all that could be rejoin'd was, That the Judgment referr'd to, was given by thoſe very Judges, who had taken upon them to declare, That the King had a Power to diſpenſe with all Laws; and that their Opinion, in both Caſes, were held of equal Authority.

Upon the whole, however, the Council broke up, without coming to any Reſolution upon the Caſe: And after ſome Days ſpent in Expectation, the aſſociated Merchants renew'd their Petition for Protections; and accompany'd it with another, in which they ſet forth, 1ſt, That they were adviſ'd, that the Charters of the Company having been voided by Act of Parliament, they could not be reſtor'd. 2dly, That they ought not; becauſe they contain'd Clauſes and Powers, repugnant to the Laws of the Land, Magna Charta, and ſeveral other Statutes; under Colour of which, the ſaid Company had greatly oppreſs'd their Majeſties Subjects; and by the Reſtoration thereof, would, for the future, hold themſelves more unqueſtionably authoriſ'd ſo to do. And, 3dly, they pray'd, that the paſſing the ſaid Charter might be ſuſpended, till the common Right of the Subject, to the ſaid Trade, might be determin'd by due Courſe of Law. This ſecond Petition was alſo back'd by two others, viz. one from ſeveral Linen-Drapers, and others trading in Eaſt-India Goods, ſetting forth, That the Trade to thoſe Parts was much impair'd, thro' the Miſmanagement of the Company, and in danger of being utterly loſt: As alſo, that in conſequence of the ſaid Miſmanagement, ſuch was the Scarcity of Callicoes, &c. that the Kingdom was ſupplied with them by Stealth from Holland, at exceſſive dear Rates, to the great Detriment of Trade, and Diminution of the Revenue, &c. and humbly praying, that in order to prevent a Monopoly of the ſaid Trade, in the Hands of thoſe by whom it had been ſo impair'd, the ſaid Charter might not be paſs'd. And the other from the Clothiers, and other Woollen Manufacturers of Glouceſterſhire, in which it was bluntly ſuggeſted, That they, the ſaid Petitioners, finding the Trade from Turkey and the Streights, in a manner wholly obſtructed, by reaſon of which, little or no Cloth was ſold; and that their Stock would not hold out to employ the Poor, who daily cry'd at their Doors for Work, made it their humble Prayer, That a general Liberty might be granted, at this time, to export, freely, woollen Manufactures to the Eaſt-Indies; which Trade would take off yearly ten times the Quantity of Cloth which had been tranſported thither for ſeveral Years paſt.

A. D. 1693-4.

The Merchants petition that the Progreſs of the Charter might be ſuſpended, and are back'd by ſeveral Linen-Drapers, Clothiers, &c.

This Agreement of ſo many conſiderable Bodies of Men, in the ſame Purſuit, ſo far alarm'd the Miniſters, that they thought fit to tranſmit Copies of theſe ſeveral Papers to the Company; as alſo, to require their Anſwer in writing, to the Suggeſtions therein contain'd: And on the next Council-Day, the Secretary to the ſaid Company did preſent a written Anſwer to the Board accordingly; the general Purport of which was, 1. To inſinuate, That ſuch licentious Trading as was contended for, would end in the public Damage, Diſhonour, and Loſs of the Trade itſelf, which they had hitherto maintained and enlarg'd to the Honour of the Nation. 2. That tho' in Strictneſs of Law their Charters ſhould be avoided, her Majeſty was, in ſuch Caſe, her own Chancellor, and, as a Point of natural Equity and Juſtice, might reſtore them; which was ſo much the more reaſonable, becauſe the Money requir'd by the Act was ready for Payment, and would have been paid, if the Exchequer had been open, (which on Lady-Day it never was) and was actually paid a few Days afterwards. 3. That there was nothing illegal, either in the Reſtitution or the Clauſes of the Charter, to be ſo reſtor'd, becauſe, by a particular Clauſe in the ſaid Charter, the Company was to be reſtor'd to nothing, but what they lawfully held and enjoy'd before. 4. In anſwer to the Clothiers Petition, that their not being permitted, by reaſon of their Majeſties Occaſions in the Years 89, 90, to ſend out more than four Ships, was the Reaſon they had not exported ſo large a Quantity of Woollen Goods, as they otherwiſe would have done. That in the two laſt Years they had exported to India the Value of about 100,000*l.* in Cloth and other Goods; and that they purpos'd to ſend out this Year upwards of 100,000*l.* in the like Goods, purſuant to the late (g) Votes of the Houſe of Commons, in caſe they might be allow'd ſufficient Ships for it. 5. That the Scarcity of

I Callicoes,

(g) See Page 411.

A. D. 1693-4. Callicoes, &c. complain'd of, was occasion'd by the Loss of three of their homeward-bound Ships, viz. two wreck'd, and one blown up; and that the said Scarcity would soon be remedied, by two Ships already arved, and five more expected this Year, and nine the next: And, lastly, that as to the Petitions of their Opponents for 400 Men, they conceiv'd them to be design'd to gain Countenance from her Majesty, That the Petitioners might, by her Majesty's Allowance to such a private and licentious Trade as had been desir'd, invade and lessen her Majesty's Royal Prerogative of restoring the Company, &c. and that, therefore, they humbly hop'd no such Allowance would be granted them.

What follow'd on the presenting this written Answer, was an Order of Council, That the Parties concern'd should have a Copy thereof, and that there should be a new Hearing, which was peremptorily fix'd for the 21st of September: Accordingly that Day being come, the associated Merchants deliver'd in a written Reply, in which they asserted, That instead of managing the Trade for the Honour of the Nation, as the Company had insinuated in their own Commendation, they did aver, and were ready to prove, "That their unjust and unwarrantable Actions had been such as tended to the Scandal of our Religion, to the Dishonour of the Crown and the Nation, the Reproach of our Laws, the Oppression of the People, and the Loss of Trade itself, for (r) some of which they and their Agents had been justly censur'd in Parliament." That the said Company, in avoiding a Trial of the Merits of the Case, by due Course of Law, and soliciting a Determination, before her Majesty in Council, where they themselves knew it could not be determin'd, tacitly confess'd a Conviction, That the Law was against them: That the Charter they solicited was not so much a Restoration as a new Creation; and that the labouring the Point with so much earnestness, when a Session was so near at Hand, argued a Purpose in them to take the Settlement of the Trade out of those Hands to which his Majesty had so expressly committed it: That as to their Pretence of Equity, in case of Penalties and Forfeitures, there could be no Equity against the Penalty of an Act of Parliament: That what they averr'd concerning their Intention to pay the Duty on Lady-Day, in case the Exchequer had been open, was utterly false; for it appear'd by several Affidavits, which they were ready to produce, That the Office-Doors were open on the usual Hours; that the Officers were in waiting; that public Business was dispatch'd; and that the Money would have been receiv'd, in case it had been tender'd: That all the Allegations of the Company, drawn from the Rights and Powers of the Prerogative, were of no Force or Validity against express and positive Law: That they claim'd the Benefit of the Law, as their undoubted Right; and that by virtue thereof all her Majesty's Subjects (as they were advis'd) were equally entituled to the Freedom of foreign Trade, and could not, by Colour of any Grant from the Crown, be restrain'd from it. That both the Clause in the new Charter, which restrains the Grant to such Powers as the Company might have lawfully exercis'd in virtue of the old, and what is said in the Answer concerning that Clause, was evasive and equivocal, because the Company were thereby left in possession of all the Powers which they thought lawful; and how they were like to interpret them, might be gathered from what they had formerly done in the Case of the thirteen Persons executed by Martial-Law at St. Helena; which Execution the Parliament had voted a Murder, &c. That the Construction made by the Company of the Merchants Petition, for the 400 Protections, was a very forc'd and unnatural one, since it had not the least Tendency to diminish any Branch of the Prerogative, but only, by Virtue of the Prerogative, to secure 400 Men in the quiet Exercise of their lawful Calling, to the general Advantage of the Kingdom, and the particular Advantage of the Revenue: And that, lastly, they humbly pray'd the Settlement of the Trade might either be left to Parliament, or the Right be determin'd by due Course of Law, before a new Charter was granted; and that they might be favour'd with the Protections desir'd; in consequence of which, an Acquisition would accrue to the Customs of 60,000 l. and one Branch of Commerce would be most seasonably open'd, at a time when, by reason of the War, all others were in a manner wholly obstructed.

The Reply of the Merchants.

A. D. 1693-4.

This Reply was accompany'd with a Paper, which was call'd an Abstract of some few of those numerous Authorities of Common Law, on which the said Reply was founded: And also with another humble Reply, in the Name of the Linen-Drapers, who had petition'd before, tending to invalidate every one of the Company's Allegations: The Clothiers had also prepar'd a Reply on their Behalf, but were induc'd to suppress it; and to supply that Defect, the Merchants presented a Draught from the Custom-House Books, of all the Cloths exported by the Company in the five last Years, which amounted in all but to 1827 Cloths; whereas in the Year 1692, only, 953 Cloths had been exported on board two private Ships; which were three times as many as the Company had exported in three of the said five Years. All this was yet farther enforc'd by another Petition from the Owners and Freighters of the said two Ships, praying that the illegal Clauses, in the former Charters, might be particularly excepted, that so the (r) Alluding to that Vote of the Convention Parliament, which excepted those out of the Act of Indemnity, who had procur'd a Commission to execute Martial Law in the Isle of St. Helena, and had sign'd Instructions for putting the same in Execution.

A. D. 1693-4. the Lives, Liberties and Eſtates of their Factors, Servants, Mariners, and other their Fellow-Subjects, might not be invaded in Places ſo remote, where they could neither defend themſelves againſt the Outrages they were expos'd to, nor obtain a Remedy afterwards; the Wrong-doers being out of the Reach of the ordinary Juſtice of the Kingdom. All, however, proving ineffectual; and no Anſwer being vouchſafed to the Petition for the 400 Seamen, they made a new Effort on that Head, and, by way of Inducement, ſet forth, that they would export more Cloth, and other Engliſh Goods, in this one Year, than the Company had exported in five: That, upon the Return of their Ships, they would furniſh the Government with 500 Tuns of Salt-petre, at three Pounds per Hundred Weight, which was then ſold at eight Pound per Hundred; that the Company was reduc'd to ſo mean a Condition, that they had neither a (z) ſufficient Stock of their own in England, to load the Ships they petition'd for, nor in India to load them back again: And that the Petitioners being in effect depriv'd of their Livelihood, by reaſon of the preſent War, and the many great and heavy Loſſes they had ſuſtain'd in it; as alſo the Eaſt-India Trade, being the moſt profitable, and leaſt hazardous of any, they made it their humble Prayer, that, in order to repair their Loſſes, Protections, for this Year, might be granted for the ſaid Seamen, &c. A. D. 1693-4.

But neither had this Petition any better Succeſs than thoſe preſented before: On the contrary, an Order of Council was iſſued, September 28, to either of the Secretaries, to prepare a Warrant for her Majeſty's Signature, in order to the paſſing the Charter: And tho' the Merchants were heard by their Counſel, upon the Caveats they had enter'd, and,

(z) To prove which they deliver'd in a ſeperate Paper, the Title and Contents of which were as follow:

REASONS humbly offered to your Majeſties Conſideration, whereby it may appear, That the late Eaſt-India Company have neither Stock at Home or Abroad, to carry on that Trade; and that it is in danger to be loſt to this Kingdom, and to fall into the Hands of ſome other Nation.

The late Companies want of Stock at Home is Viſible,

I. By their having ſent out to the Eaſt-Indies, in three whole Years time of their Trade, viz. in 1688, 1689, and 1691, in ſeven Ships, containing about 3000 Tuns, but the Value of 26000 l. as may appear by their Accounts laid before the Houſe of Commons in 1689, and 1691, of which moſt part was Ammunitions and Stores for their War.

II. By their having in England but 3300 l. 8*s.* 8*d.* according to their own Accounts given into Parliament in 1691, including 9920 l. for their Buildings, though they had ſent out ſo little in the preceding three Years, and had had above 10000 Tuns of their Shipping arrived in that time, whereas, in Truth, three times that Sum would not have paid the Debts which they then owed, and make good the other Miſtakes omitted to be inſerted in that Account.

III. By their farming out their Trade to and from the Eaſt-Indies, to be carried on by Foreigners, and others on Permiſſion, on their Ships, and not trading themſelves, when Engliſh Goods were ſo much wanted there, and Eaſt India Goods ſo exceſſive ſcarce and dear here, which it can never be ſuppos'd they would have done, if they had had Effects either at home or abroad, to carry on the Trade themſelves.

IV. By their calling in Fifty per Cent. of their Stock, before they could ſend out the laſt Year's Ships, which was a publick Confeſſion of their own, that they had not Stock ſufficient to carry on their Trade without it.

V. By their having no Money in England to carry on their Trade, notwithſtanding the ſaid fifty Pound per Cent called in, that not being ſufficient to pay what they owed before it was called in.

VI. By their Shipping out in five Years of that Trade, ſo little Cloth, as has in all that time amounted to but about 20000 l. and not near ſo much in all other Goods of the Growth, Product, or Manufacture of England, which ſhews, either that they wanted Money to pay for them, or that they had little Regard to the public Good of the Nation, in the Proſecution of their Trade.

VII. By the engroſſing the Goods (which have come home) by the ruling Members, who ſold them to themſelves, knowing the Company had not a Stock to ſupply the Nation with thoſe Commodities; thereby inhanſing the Prices to ſuch extravagant Rates.

VIII. By their not ſupplying the Nation with Salt Petre, although the Safety of the Kingdom ſo much depends thereon; that Commodity, by reaſon of its Scarceneſs, for want of their importing it, being now ſold at near four times the uſual Price.

Their Want of Stock Abroad is alſo Viſible,

I. By their Factors having ſent home, in a few Years, about 2000 Tuns of their Shipping empty.

II. By their having kept their Ships ſo long in India, when Eaſt-India Goods were ſo much wanted at home. One of the Ships having lately arrived, having been five Years out: And three of thoſe ſent out in 1689, and 1690, not being yet returned; beſides above 1200 Tuns of other Shipping, which they had formerly ſent out, and which they would, as they might, have laded home, if they had not wanted Money there more than Ships.

III. By their being ſo vaſtly indebted at Surat, their chiefeſt Reſidence, that their General, or Preſident and Council there, are confined to the Town, and not permitted to ſtir out of it, unleſs with a Guard to watch them, for fear they ſhould run away without paying what they owe, and making Reſtitution to the Natives for the Damages done them in the War. And although, by their Account given in Parliament in 1691, they pretended to have there about 200,000 l. after all Debts paid, yet they are ſo far from having any Stock at all there, that they are forced to borrow Money to pay for the neceſſary Charges of their Factory; as the Petitioners can prove by Perſons of undoubted Credit, lately came from thence, who arrived here but in Auguſt laſt.

IV. By their ſtarving the Trade, having had none, in two Years, but three Ships, containing not above 1000 Tuns; (though they have ſo many Ships abroad, and that Eaſt-India Goods are ſo much wanted at home) and even theſe three Ships, a great Part laden by Armenians and others, on Permiſſion for private Accounts; whereas in that time the Dutch Eaſt-India Company have had home about 10,000 Tuns of Shipping.

By all which it may plainly appear to your Majeſty, that the late Company have neither Stock at Home nor Abroad, to carry on that Trade; but on the contrary, are vaſtly indebted there, as has been already obſerved to your Majeſty: Notwithſtanding, that by their Accounts given in Parliament in 1691, they pretended that they had 828,860 l. in Quick-Stock in the Eaſt-Indies, after all Debts and Demands were paid and ſatisfied; and that they have not had home from thence near the Value of 100,000 l. ſince that time; and for want of their Stock to manage this Trade, your Majeſty has ſuffered, in a few Years laſt paſt, 300,000 l. in your Cuſtoms, and that Trade is in a manner quite loſt to this Kingdom, and given away to the Dutch; who do not only ſupply themſelves directly from the Eaſt-Indies, with thoſe Goods which they formerly had from England, but do furniſh other Countries, which we were uſed to ſupply; and even the Conſumption of this Kingdom itſelf is now chiefly ſupplied with Eaſt-India Commodities, by ſtealth from Holland. And beſides the Conſiderations above mentioned, ſeveral other Princes and Potentates, viz. the Danes, Portugueze, and Genoeſe, are encouraging and inviting, not only their own, but likewiſe the Subjects of other Princes, and eſpecially your Majeſties, to proſecute this Trade to and from their Dominions, in Shipping of thoſe Countries; which may prove of dangerous Conſequence to this Kingdom, unleſs prevented by permitting the reſt of your Majeſties Subjects to partake of this Trade, from hence, upon equal Terms: For that it will be more advantageous either to embrace the aforeſaid Encouragement, or to come into that Trade, by being concerned in the Dutch Eaſt-India Stock, rather than by building on the rotten Foundation of the late Company, who, as viſible, have not a Stock to carry on that Trade.

But the ill Intentions of the late Company are the more apparent, for that though they themſelves have been able to drive ſo little Trade to the Eaſt-Indies for ſeveral Years paſt, yet they would obſtruct others, your Majeſties Subjects, from trading thither; thereby endeavouring to leſſen your Majeſties Cuſtoms, and to give away this Trade from our own to ſome other Nation.

All which the Petitioners humbly ſubmit to your Majeſties great Wiſdom, and are ready to prove the Particulars thereof, upon any Day to be aſſigned them by your Majeſty for that Purpoſe.

A. D. 1693-4. and, in particular, presented to the Lord-Keeper Sommers, on the 7th of October, a Paper containing such (t) Reasons against passing the Charter as seem to be unanswerable, the said Charter pass'd the Great Seal that very Day, tho' not in so full a manner as the Company expected and desir'd: For knowing well what determin'd Men the opposing Merchants were, and justly apprehending that they would bring the Affair again before the Parliament, Care was taken, by those concern'd, so to limit the Grants contain'd in it, that they should not amount to an absolute Exclusion of all others; and also to provide, that the Company should submit to such Alterations, Restrictions, and Qualifications, as the King should direct before the 29th of September following.

The Charter pass'd.

This Charter was not, however, the only Favour that was shewn to the Company: For having, on the 21st following, apply'd to the Queen, in Council, that a Stop might be put to the Sailing of the Ship Redbridge, mann'd with fifty Seamen, and commanded by one Smith, under a Pretence, that she was bound to East-India, tho' enter'd and clear'd for Alicant, the said Ship, on this bare Surmise, was stopt accordingly, and detain'd, at the Expence of nine Pound a Day to the Owners of her; till the said Owners had made it undeniably plain, that she was really bound, by Charter-Party, for Alicant, and was to return from thence directly to London, in Company with four other Ships. A. D. 1693-4.

But tho' Matters were carry'd with so high a Hand against the Merchants at Court, they came to a Resolution, not only to prosecute their Suit, but to lay a Summary of all that had pass'd, during the Recess, in print, before the Nation; which they did accordingly: And, from the whole, took the Liberty to infer, That such Proceedings, if not prevented, would render all the foreign Trade of England precarious, by being subject to be interrupted by the Caprice or Malice of any one Committee Man of the East-India Company:

Inferences of the Merchants from the whole Proceeding.

That the admitting such a Power in the Crown, to restrain foreign Trade from some Subjects, and to grant it to others, exclusive of the rest, would be of dangerous Consequence

---

(t) Viz. I. They humbly conceive your Lordship to be a Judicial Officer, indifferent between the King and his People, and a Check which the Law has appointed over all Grants from the Crown, that none may pass the Great Seal which are either prejudicial to the Crown, or to the just Rights and Liberties of the People.

II. They humbly apprehend no Order can warrant the passing any Charter containing any Grants that are in themselves illegal.

III. That the Charter now before your Lordship, is a Restitution of several Grants of the sole Trade to the East Indies to a few Persons, excluding all the rest of their Majesties Subjects, which Exclusion, they conceive, is contrary to the Common Law of this Land, the Authorities whereof are too voluminous to be inserted here, and likewise contrary to divers Statutes, some of which are particularly express in the Paper annexed, of which they pray your Lordship's Consideration.

IV. That if the King can restrain some of his Subjects from trading, and license others, it may be a Precedent for any of the King's Successors to set what Price they please upon such Licences; by which Means they will never need the Aid of Parliaments to supply them with Money, the Consequence whereof may hereafter be very dangerous to the Kingdom.

V. That the former Charters, which are to be restored and confirmed by this Grant, now before your Lordship, contain divers other Illegal Powers:—As the Power of executing Martial Law, of imprisoning the Persons, and confiscating the Estates of their Majesties Subjects, &c. some of which were lately acknowledged to be illegal, even by their Majesties Counsel at Law.

VI. The said Charter declares the late Company to have been of a long time a Corporation, to the Honour and Welfare of the Nation, which may be interpreted a Justification of the Illegalities which they have acted, and a Vindication of them in that, for which they have been publicly censured in Parliament; and if there can be any Reason to restore the late Company, without doubt there can be none to commend them.

VII. That the restoring the said Charters, wherein such Illegal Powers are granted, may occasion the Loss of the Lives of their Majesties Subjects, which can neither be restored nor repaired.

VIII. That the Execution of the said Powers, contained in their former Charters, being in Places so remote, the Aggressors are out of the Reach of the ordinary Justice of the Kingdom, and the Parties aggrieved left without Remedy, or at least unable to contend with a joint Stock, so as to procure any legal Satisfaction for the Injury done them.

IX. They further represent to your Lordship, that some of the concerned in the said Caveat, have Factors, Servants and Mariners, as well as considerable Estates in India; and the restoring the former Charters may expose not only them but all others, who may go into those Parts on their lawful Occasions, to the arbitrary Powers contained in the old Charters, for that no Provision is made in this new one to secure them; and the Company may be encouraged by this Grant to execute the said unlawful Powers, as they have formerly done.

X. That the industrious Application of the Company to get this Charter pass'd so near the Session of Parliament, where this Matter had been so long depending, can be accounted nothing but a Design in them to obstruct the Settlement of that Trade by the Parliament, to whom the King has expressly referred it, by his Message sent to the House of Commons the last Session.

XI. That the Copy of the said Charter, since it has been altered, hath been denied, whereby they are debarred from the Opportunity of making such just Exceptions, as otherwise they might or ought to do, in a Matter of so great Consequence.

XII. That in the granting this Charter, which restores the sole Trade of the East Indies to the late Company, will be, in effect, the giving away that Trade to the Dutch, who have already, in a great Measure, driven us out of it, and furnish most other Countries, as well as this, with East-India Goods, the late Company having neither a sufficient Stock or Credit to carry on that Trade.

And notwithstanding the Pretence made as to the seeming Limitation, contained in the desired Charter, we humbly beg Leave to represent to your Lordship, that all the Powers which are contained in their former Charters, are as fully and absolutely restored and confirmed, as ever they were granted; and cannot otherwise be understood by those to whom the Grant was intended, who having formerly executed them as if they had been lawful, will, by this Grant, be encouraged to do the like; it being so far from an Intimation of the Unlawfulness of any of those Powers, that it is rather an Indication that they are all lawful; for it cannot be presumed that any thing which is otherwise, should pass with so great Solemnity under the Royal Authority, and through the Hands of the great Officers of the Kingdom, who have examined and approved the same, after so long a Deliberation: But it may rather be concluded, if any of the said Powers had been unlawful, they would have been particularly distinguished, and excepted out of the said Grant; for that by the general granting and confirming of their former Charters, and the Powers therein contained, without any particular Distinction, and especially (as the Charter expresses it) as fully as if the said Powers and Charters were particularly recited; all the Powers in their said former Charters cannot but be supposed to be restored and confirmed, whereby the Lives, Liberties, and Estates of the Subjects of England, will be again exposed to the same unjust Violence and Oppression which they have formerly suffered from the late Company, by colour of those Powers contained in the said former Charters, which are now intended to be restored and confirmed.

All which the concerned in the Caveat before your Lordship, do humbly offer, in behalf of themselves and the rest of their fellow Subjects, as their Reasons against the passing the now desired Charter to the late East-India Company; and do humbly claim the Benefit of the Common Law and the said Statutes, and all other Statutes and Customs of this Realm, for the securing to the Subject the Liberty of foreign Trade (as their undoubted Right.)

A.D. 1693-4. sequence to this Kingdom; as having a direct Tendency to incline future Kings to farm out all Trade, and so to raise Money without the Aid of a Parliament: And that the asserting the Right of the Subject was become the more requisite, in as much as the omitting it so long, had given way to a Pretence of Prescription, which had been urged as an Argument for the Power of the Crown to restrain this Trade.

That it plainly appear'd the Crown had not the Power of restraining foreign Trade to some, and excluding others, without an Act of Parliament, from the following Considerations, viz.

1. By the confirming the Hudson's-Bay Company by Act of Parliament, since their Majesties Accession to the Crown, which was a clear Demonstration of the Insufficiency of any Charter to exclude the Subject of England from foreign Trade, without an Act of Parliament; as also by the Petition of the East-India Company to the House of Commons, for the like Establishment; whereby they themselves admitted, That the Crown could not exclude from that Trade without an Act of Parliament.

2. By the several Judgments which had been given at Westminster-Hall, since their Majesties happy Accession to the Crown, against the stopping Ships bound to the East-Indies, and against the seizing of Ships and Goods, by colour of such excluding Charters, for trading to the East-Indies and Guinea, within the Limits of them; and which thereby declar'd it lawful for the Subjects of England to trade into the East-Indies and Guinea, notwithstanding those Charters, and without any particular Licence from the King for so doing.

3. By his Majesty's Message, sent the House of Commons the last Session, in answer to their Address of the former Session, for dissolving the late Company, wherein it is declar'd, That he could not settle it by his own Authority alone; and that the Concurrence of the Parliament was necessary to make a complete and useful Settlement of this Trade.

And, lastly, they intimated, That a short Bill for the declaring and asserting the Right of the Subject, to the Freedom of foreign Trade, might be past speedily, without Obstruction to the other public Affairs, which would be a means to facilitate the Establishment of a new Company, for the carrying on this Trade, by a new national Joint-Stock, to be rais'd by new Subscriptions, (if the Wisdom of Parliament should think that the best Method) for the future carrying on of this Trade.

This Piece was call'd, A Journal of several remarkable Passages, &c. relating to the East-India Trade: And the Company, on the Credit of their Charter, having proceeded to take in Subscriptions, according to the Powers contain'd therein, to the Amount of 744,000*l.* the next Step taken by their Adversaries, was to prefer a Petition to the House of Commons, founded on the several Facts, Authorities, and Clames, already recited; and praying, That, in consideration thereof, the Trade to the East-Indies might be settled by Authority of Parliament. That their Pretensions might also be more favourably heard by the House; and that they might so far, at least, be upon an equal Footing with the Company, they made diligent court to the new Ministers, and left no Expedient untry'd to induce some of the most popular Members to appear in their Behalf. The Company, on the other Hand, having already establish'd so good an Interest at Court, were not content with a bare Defence of the Charter they had obtain'd, but stickled hard for a parliamentary Confirmation: But here they found the Current turning against them: The Friends they had made were principally of the Tory Faction; and their Influence was in the Wane: And the Commons, by the general Course of their Conduct, had shewn, that they were for siding with which ever Party was uppermost: On the other Hand, however, it was thought reasonable, even by the new Ministers, that some Tenderness should be shewn to the old; or, at least, that the Affair should be kept in suspence, till they also had found their Account in it.

A.D. 1693-4. They petition the House of Commons.

The Company do the same.

Under this doubtful Aspect it was that the Petition of the Merchants was taken into Consideration: Each Party flatter'd themselves that they had the Advantage of the other, and neither apprehended that the great Aim of All was to make Properties of both. But after the Allegations of the Petition had been over and over again debated, and after the (a) Charters granted to the Company; together with the Book of their new Subscriptions, the State of their Stock, and whatsoever else had any relation to the Merits of the Cause, had been examin'd and re-examin'd, the Issue of all was, That the Trade was, in effect, laid open, in Virtue of the following Resolution, That all the Subjects of England had an equal Right to trade to the East-Indies, unless prohibited by Act of Parliament: But no Censure was pass'd either on the said Charters, or the Manner of obtaining them; nor was any Project adopted for regulating the Trade, by Authority of Parliament, for the future.

Vote on the Issue.

Having thus prepar'd the Way for the many extraordinary Things which broke out during the next Session, concerning this mercantile Job, we are now, in the next Place, to treat of another parliamentary Process; which, not only created very warm and angry Debates within Doors, but which was made Use of as a Firebrand without. This was a general Naturalization Bill, for all foreign Protestants; which took its Rise in the House of Commons, and was espoused by different Persons, from a Diversity of Considerations. Men of abstracted Notions, for Instance, were for it, because (a) Which were two, namely, that of October 7, above treated of, and a Charter of Regulations, dated November 17.

A. D. 1693-4. because they placed the Root of national Power in a Plentitude of Inhabitants; because they saw we had vast Quantities of Land, which lay unemployed; because they saw we were fond of making new Settlements, without considering whether we could afford to part with the Number of Inhabitants which they cost us; and, because they saw, that the unnatural waste of Lives in Wars and Voyages by Sea and Land, could not be supply'd in the natural Way. Those again, who confin'd their Considerations to the present State of Europe, were for it, because they thought the Ravages committed by the French in Germany, and the Persecutions which they had let loose against the Hugonots in their own Dominions, had created a Disposition in numberless Families, to transplant themselves to a Country, where Property was secure, and Conscience free; and, because they believed that those Families would also transplant their Wealth along with them, which would be a seasonable Supply to the annual Consumption of our own. There were yet Others who contended for it, partly for Commercial, partly for Factious, and partly for Court-Considerations. The King, they knew, had not only plac'd his Affection on his Dutch Followers, but was inclined to rely on any Foreigners, rather than his own Subjects. Those of the Church of England-Persuasion, they also knew, by far outnumber'd all the Sectaries of all Sorts; and as it was become one of the favourite political Points, to bring the two Scales somewhat nearer a Balance, they could discern no Way so short or so effectual as this, to bring it about. And lastly, they had so far Experience on their Side, that those who had already taken Refuge here, had over-paid the Community for the Protection they had found, by introducing several new Manufactures amongst us; and by helping to lower the Price of Labour, and Industry, than which scarce any Thing was of more Consequence to our Foreign Markets; more especially at that Time, when Trade was more oppress'd with Taxes, and more expos'd to the Hazards and Mischiefs of War, than ever it had been known before.

But if all these Considerations contributed to form the Party which appear'd for the Bill, it is easy to conceive, that all of them were not acknowledg'd in the Course of the Debates which it gave Rise to; on the Contrary, none but the plausible were brought forward on one Side; and none but those which had a Tendency to create Jealousies, and scatter Terrors thro' the People, were allow'd to have any Weight on the other. Thus, according to the former, nothing was intended by the Bill, but to replenish the exhausted Veins of the Kingdom: And according to the latter, the only Purpose that was to be serv'd by it, was, to complete the Transformation of the Body-politic, by fitting it with foreign Arms, as it was already fitted with a foreign Head. A. D. 1693-4.

It is certain, that the Dispute was not only put on this Footing, but pressed to an indecent Length on the Side of the Malcontents: In particular, Sir John Knight the Younger, as he was called, to distinguish him from another Sir John Knight, and who is characteris'd by Mr. North, as a Gentleman of as eminent Integrity and Loyalty, as the City of Bristol, the Place he repretented, was ever honoured with, distinguished himself on the Occasion, in a set Speech, which both for Matter and Manner, partook of all the Malignity which could recommend either it or him to the Party he belong'd to; but which, in Truth, partook more of Invective than Argument, and abounded more with inflammatory Presumptions and Surmises, than solid Facts. He took occasion, in his Out-set, to refer to an Article in the London-Gazette, giving an Account of several Ships, laden with Corn, for France, which had been lately cast away; and to insinuate, that the (w) stolen Exports from England of that kind, were rather for the Relief of the Dutch than of the French: He said, that the Advocates for the Bill were ready to part with our All to Strangers, in one lumping Vote. He wished that those Persons might meet with a rigorous and exemplary Punishment from their enrag'd and ruin'd Countrymen; and he remonstrated, That if we wanted Purchasers for our Lands, it was owing to the Oppressions of the Times; that an Abatement of Taxes would either remove the Necessities of those who wanted to sell, or enable better Managers among ourselves to buy; That to admit Foreigners into all the Secrets and Privileges of our Trade, would only enable them to grow wealthy at our Expence; and that when they had so made their Fortunes, they would transfer them to, and enjoy them in, the Countries where they were born; That as to the reducing the Price of Labour, it was not to be thought of, while so many Thousands of our Manufacturers were starving for want of Employment; and while the Price of Provisions was so high, that even those few who had Employment, with all their Industry, could scarce supply their Families with Bread; that it would be more becoming a House of Commons to think of some Expedient to find work for their own Poor, and that the Markets might be furnish'd with Necessaries at moderate Rates (which he thought might be effected by taking off the Prohibition of

(w) A Reward of 200*l.* had, in October, been offer'd, by Proclamation, for every Discovery that should be made of every such Exportation: And it was, at the same time, declared, That all Persons so offending, should be punish'd with the utmost Rigour of the Law.

A.D. 1693-4. of (x) Irish Cattle and Corn) than to appear so solicitous to increase their present Misery, by letting in a Tide of hungry Foreigners upon them; that the Surrenderers of Charters who had been so severely branded in the late Reign, were but slight Offenders in Comparison with Those, who were for resigning the great Charter of every Englishman's Birthright; that if the Bill should pass, we might expect the like Visitation of Frogs, which had befallen the Egyptians of old; that, if a Stranger, as Joseph was, should be set at the Head of our Affairs, our Corn, Money, Cattle, Land, Bodies, and Goods, would in Process of time, become the Property of Pharaoh: And that, upon the whole, his Motion was, That the Bill might first be kick'd out of the House; and, then, that the Foreigners might be kick'd out of the Kingdom.

In short, as no Speech was ever, perhaps, better calculated to enflame the Mob than this, the Tory-Malcontents not only took care to have it printed, and dispersed throughout the Kingdom, but had the Pleasure to see the Train take effect, even beyond their Expectation: A Notion immediately and universally obtain'd among the Vulgar, that if the Bill took place, all Offices would be conferr'd on Dutchmen: That from thenceforward they would become what the Lord-Danes were formerly, and prescribe what Mode of Religion and Government they pleas'd, &c. And as to Sir John Knight, he was discours'd of as a Saviour, and in a manner ador'd, for having made so noble a Stand in Behalf of his Country. This exceedingly piqu'd the contrary Party, more especially the Courtiers; who, with their usual Officiousness, did not fail to do the Drudgery of the Jacobites, by applying what had been said of Pharaoh and Joseph, to the King and the Earl of Portland; and to make a Merit of their Endeavours of setting a Mark on the Offender: For the Print being complain'd of in the House, and the Hainousness of it sufficiently aggravated, Sir John was call'd upon, with such a Tempest of Rage and Clamour, as very clearly shew'd, that either he or it were to be sacrific'd: And not being altogether so devoted to his Party, as to suffer Expulsion and Imprisonment in the Tower, which he had been menac'd with, for their Sakes, he chose to disown the Speech; which was thereupon order'd to be burnt by the Hands of the Common Hangman, and it was burnt accordingly.

Complain'd of in the House.

A.D. 1693-4. and order'd to be burnt by the Hands of the Common Hangman.

But so little Credit had the House with the People at this Crisis, that this Censure of theirs had all the Effect of a Recommendation: The Speech, whether genuine or not, was more regarded, and the Cry against the Bill became louder than ever: In vain the Scribes of the Court-Party were employ'd to justify the one, and explode the other: The Torrent continued to rage as violently as before; and, for the present, it was thought advisable to suffer the Bill to be carry'd away by it.

We have, indeed, but few Instances of the same relenting Nature: For it is, in general, observable, that the longer the Practice, the more harden'd the Prostitute: And that if Fear did not operate much, Shame never operated at all.

Ever since Ireland had been reduc'd, every Gale that blew from thence, had been freighted with the Groans of the miserable Inhabitants, under the Pressures of that very Government, which the Protestant-Part of them had so indefatigably labour'd, and so desperately fought, to establish. The Administration of Coningsby and Porter had been render'd particularly odious, by a Series of such Frauds and Oppressions as a Bashaw would have been strangled for: The Public, as we have seen, had the Particulars before them: The Irish Gentlemen, who, in the last Session, made their Appeal to Parliament against the Administration of Lord Sydney, in that Kingdom, did not forget, on that Occasion, to recapitulate them all; and even the two Houses had gone so far as to ground a Remonstrance to the Throne upon that Appeal, and the Evidence that was produc'd in support of it: But notwithstanding all this, and that the King, in his Answer to that Remonstrance, had given his Royal Word, That what was amiss should be remedy'd, Coningsby and Porter found such Favour at Court, that a Pardon was order'd to pass, the Seals. And when the Earl of Bellamont, and James Hamilton, Esq; petition'd her Majesty, that a Stop might be put to it, till the said Petitioners, and many others of their Majesties Irish Subjects, had produc'd their Proofs against them, the Orders of Proceeding at the Council-Board in relation to Coningsby's and Porter's Pardon.

(x) The same thing is also touch'd upon in the following Passage, which is, on many Accounts, so very remarkable, that it ought to make a Part of the History of these Times

"We have scarcely had one Gazette these three Months, in which the Scarcity of Bread, and the Apprehension of a Famine in France, hath not been aggravated; while it is certainly known, that at Paris it is cheaper than at London; and yet we find no such provident Care as the French King takes, to have it sold at cheaper Rates, by encouraging Importations from Ireland, where Wheat is now sold for two Shillings a Bushel, which here is ten or twelve Shillings. And when Sweden, Dant. and Hamburghers bring Corn, in hopes of a good Market, we publish them fein'd as Prize, being design'd for France. They tell us a wild Story, of the Troops drawn from Piedmont into Dauphine, to prevent the Insurrections of the People for want of Bread; as if the quartering of such numerous Troops were like to encrease that Grain; or that the French King should bring his Troops into barren Provinces, which were the ready way to make them join in the Insurrection. But we never touch upon the actual Insurrections at Worcester, Gloucester, Hereford, Stafford, Bath, Northampton, Sudbury, and Colchester, and other Places, to prevent the buying up their Corn, to be transported to France, as some maliciously gave out, when it was well known it was for Holland. But the Charity of the new Bishop (Dr. Patrick) of E——'s Wife is remarkable; who, when a Lady was condoling the Condition of the Poor here, by reason of the Dearness of Bread, and all Eatables, replied, But God be thanked there is a greater Scarcity in France.

"It were an easy matter to draw up a Book of the excessive Rates of all Things for the Belly and Back, which are now paid, in proportion to what they were before the Abdication; because they are daily experienced by every House keeper, to the necessary pinching of themselves and their Families. That Loaf of Wheat Bread, which was then sold for Three-pence farthing, is now Nine-pence farthing; and so proportionable, or at least double in other Food. That Silk which was sold then by Retail at Thirteen Shillings the Pound, now at Thirty Shillings. The Muslins, and all East-India Commodities, three times the Price." Price of Abdication, p. 9.

A. D. 1693-4. of Council which were made upon it, seemed rather calculated to screen them from Justice, than to put them within its Reach: For tho' the Parties accus'd affected to join Issue with their Accusers, and presented a like Petition to her Majesty, they did not refer the Merits of the Cause either to the Decision of the Laws, or the Sentence of Parliament, but to the Council-Board; where they knew their Peace was already made. And because the Prosecutors, for that Reason, did not chuse to abide by that award, the two Petitions were not only discharg'd by order of Council, but, by the same Authority, a brief Account of the whole Transaction was No. 2898. made public in the Gazette, under such a Gloss, as if the said accus'd Parties had, of their own Accord, wav'd the Privilege of a Pardon, and defy'd the utmost Malice of their Prosecutors.

And here, if the Latter had consider'd as they ought, how nearly the Complexion of the great Council resembled that of the Less, they would, indeed, have dropt their Suit: But, being willing to persuade themselves, that the national Inquest was not so far debauch'd, but that they would have found a Bill against any Man, on clear and full Evidence, and, perhaps, stimulated by Passions and Interests of their own, they resolv'd to bring the Cause before the House of Commons: And, accordingly, the Earl, being himself a Member, as well as the two Defendants, presented several Articles of Impeachment against each of them; of which those that regarded Coningsby were, in Substance, as follows:

Lord Bellomont impeaches them in the House of Commons.

1. "That the said Lord Coningsby had traitorously abus'd the Power and Authority of his Government, and exercis'd the same tyrannically, by discouraging and terrifying the Militia, and framing and imposing on them a new, arbitrary, and illegal Oath, contrary to the King's Instructions, &c. And ordering the Governors of Counties to subject the said Militia to Martial Laws, contrary to the known Laws of the Kingdom.

2. That the said Lord Coningsby did traitorously, &c. exact and force free Quarters for the Army; and did also, by Force of Arms, levy Money on the Protestant Subjects, &c.

3. That the said Lord caus'd a great Scarcity of Provision, in the Army before Limerick, by obliging the Sutlers to take out Licences, and by laying Taxes on Beer and other Provisions sent to the Camp.

4. That the said Lord, assuming to himself a tyrannical and arbitrary Power over the Lives, as well as the Properties of the People, did, in Council, by Word of Mouth, order one Gafney to be hang'd without Trial, the Courts of Justice being then open, &c. and the said Gafney was immediately executed, according to the said verbal Order.

5. That the said Lord, by himself or his Agent, did traitorously carry on a Trade with the Subjects of the French King.

6. That the said Lord did embezzle vast Quantities of their Majesties Stores and forfeited Estates, both real and personal.

7. And that the said Lord, during his A. D. 1693-4. whole Government, did favour and support the Papists in their Robberies, and other Outrages, &c."

Those against Porter were much of the same Nature: A Day of Hearing was appointed: The Earl produced his Vouchers in support of every one of them; and, as far as can be gather'd from the Votes of the House, made every one of them good: The imposing the Oath in the first Article, was pronounc'd to be absolutely illegal: That which contain'd the infamous Story of Gafney, could neither be deny'd or extenuated: The free Quarterings, the Exactions of Money, the Impositions of Licences, were equally notorious. It could not be said, that any of the other Allegations were either groundless or frivolous; and yet, upon the whole, the House proceeded to declare, That, considering the State of Affairs in Ireland at that time, they did not think fit to ground an Impeachment upon them. The House do not think fit to receive them.

Nor was this all that was remarkable in the Case: For on the same Principle which had operated so favorably for Coningsby and Porter, it was resolved to make an Example of Bellomont; that is to say, by depriving him of his Place: This is hinted at in the Hush-Money-Paper, formerly quoted in these Words, "When I hear he (the King) sends his Commands to some Lords, and Bribes to others, and turns out of his Place the gallant Lord Bellomont, merely for giving his Vote in the House of Commons, according to his Conscience, &c. it is time to look about us." But one of our Histo- Old Mixon. rians, who also cites this Passage, is expres, That it was for these vexatious Prosecutions; not voting according to Conscience, that he was turn'd out.

But if the Commons were not over rigid in prosecuting the Mal-versation of Ministers, it seems they gave no Quarter in Cases of Impiety: For Complaint having been made of a certain Socinian Pamphlet, call'd, A Dialogue concerning the Deity; or a brief but clear Confutation of the Doctrine of the Trinity, which had been sent under Cover to several Members of Parliament, so much their Zeal was enflam'd, that they ordered it to be burnt by the common Hangman; and also, that Enquiry should be made after the Author, Printer, and Publisher, to the end that they might be punish'd according to Law. A Socinian Pamphlet ordered to be burnt by the Hangman.

And now having dispatch'd the most ma- 1694. terial Transactions of the Session, (for as to the great Cause of the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk in the House of Lords, in relation to a Divorce, on Proof of Adultery, we shall leave it in the Hands of the Civilians and Divines, to whom it more properly belongs) all that need be added, to prepare us for the Close, may be comprehended in the following Particulars, namely, 1. That in the Act for taking and stating the public Accounts, (which, even in these corrupt Times, was admitted, not only as a matter of Course, but as what the Public had so clear a Right to, that no plausible thing could be alledg'd againſt it) a Proviſo was inſerted, by which the Commiſſioners were required to ſummon the Commiſſioners of the Tranſport-Ships for the War of Ireland; as alſo all other Contractors for the ſame, together with the Owners and Proprietors of the ſaid Ships, and to ſtate the Accompt, and adjuſt the Debt, againſt the next Seſſion of Parliament. 2. That, in order to encourage the building good and defenſible Ships, a ſhort Act was prepar'd, by which it was provided, That all ſuch Perſons as, within the Space of ten Years, ſhould build, or cauſe to be built, Three-deck'd Ships, of not leſs than 450 Tuns Burden, ſhould, for the firſt three Voyages, have and receive, to their own proper Uſe and Benefit, one Tenth Part of the Cuſtoms, accruing to their Majeſties, for ſuch Goods and Merchandizes as ſhould be exported, or imported therein. And, laſtly, that for the better Diſcipline of the Royal Navy, it was provided, by another Act, that all Offences againſt the Act for the regulating and better Government of his Majeſty's Navy, &c. might be proſecuted, try'd, and determin'd in the King's-Bench, or under a Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer: All which, together with the Bank, Stamp, and Hackney-Coach Acts, as alſo the uſual Militia Act, and an Act to enable his Majeſty to make Grants, Leaſes, &c. in the Duchy of Cornwall, receiv'd the Royal Aſſent on the laſt Day of the Seſſion, on which Occaſion his Majeſty was pleas'd to expreſs himſelf in the following laconic manner:

An Act to encourage Ship building.

Another for the better Diſcipline of the Navy.

King's Speech at the Cloſe of the Seſſion.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Proofs you have given of your Affection to me, and the Zeal you have expreſs'd for the Government, oblige me to return you Thanks before I put an End to this Seſſion; and, in particular, to thank you, Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons, for the large Supplies you have provided to carry on the War.

I will endeavour to do my Part; and it is from the Bleſſing of God that we muſt all expect ſuch Succeſs as may anſwer our Deſires.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Poſture of Affairs making it neceſſary for me to be abſent, for ſome time, out of this Kingdom, I recommend it to you, that, in your ſeveral Stations, you be careful to preſerve the public Peace."

And then the Lord-Keeper, by his Majeſty's Command, prorogu'd the Parliament to the 18th of September following.

As at the End of a Campaign Men of diſtinguiſh'd Merit and Service, (where the rewarding Service and Merit is conſider'd as the Corner-Stone of good Diſcipline) are uſually rewarded according to the Share of Danger and Honour they have had in it; ſo at the End of the Seſſion it began now to be the Uſage of the Court, to ſcatter their Favours amongſt thoſe who had gone the greateſt Lengths to deſerve them. But we are not only to take Notice of the general Diſtribution on that Occaſion, but alſo of ſuch Boons and Graces as were dropt by the way.

A.D. 1694. Honours and Preferments.

Thus on the Death of Lord Levelace, one of the foremoſt Adventurers for the Revolution, we find the Earl of Abingdon, who had no ſuch Merit to plead, appointed to ſucceed him, as Lord-Chief Juſtice in Eyre, on this Side Trent; and the Duke of St. Albans, after ſome Demur, as Captain of the Band of Penſioners. We alſo find the Offices held by the late Duke of Schomberg, divided between an Engliſh and a French Favourite; for Lord Sydney was made Maſter of the Ordnance, and Ruvigny, Viſcount Galway, Commander in Chief of his Majeſty's Forces in Piedmont; as, alſo, Envoy Extraordinary to his Royal Highneſs of Savoy. Lord Charles Butler, Brother to the Duke of Ormond, was created Lord Butler, of Weſton, in England, and Earl of Arran, in Ireland; Peregrine Bertie, Eſq; was made Vice-Chamberlain to the King, in the Room of Sir John Lowther, of Lowther, who, according to the Gazette, had his Majeſty's Leave to reſign. On the 4th of March the Earl of Shrewſbury, who, it ſeems, was, by this time, convinc'd, That all Cauſe of Oppoſition was remov'd; and that his Majeſty might be ſerv'd on his own Terms, with a ſafe Conſcience, was put in Poſſeſſion, once more, of the Secretary's Office: On the laſt Day of the Seſſion he was, moreover, honour'd with the Garter which had been worn by the Duke of Hamilton, ſo often mention'd in the Courſe of this Work, (and of whoſe Death, at Edinburgh, Advice had been juſt receiv'd) and with the high Title of Duke. On the ſame Day, likewiſe, the Earl of Mulgrave was reconcil'd to the Meaſures of the Court, by the joint Conſideration of being created Marquis of Normanby, and receiving an annual Penſion of 3000 l. which was beſtow'd on him to make him ſome Amends, ſays one, for the Place of Lord-Chamberlain, which he had enjoy'd in the former Reign. Henry Herbert, Eſq; was, at the ſame time, ennobled by the Stile and Title of Baron Herbert, of Cherbury. The Friends and Partizans of Mr. Ruſſel had the Satisfaction of ſeeing him advanc'd to the Head of the Admiralty-Board, in the Room of Lord Falkland: And Sir George Rook, and Sir John Houblon, were appointed Commiſſioners, in the Room of the two obnoxious Admirals, Killegrew and Delaval.

Boyer.

And here it was reaſonable to think the reigning Party had either ſet a Bound to their Demands, or the King to his Conceſſions: For that very Day his Majeſty ſet out for Holland; but the Wind proving contrary, he was forc'd to return in the Evening to Kenſington; and on the 30th following, was farther induc'd, to create the Earl of Bedford, Duke of Bedford; the Earl of Devonſhire, Duke of Devonſhire; the Earl of Clare, Duke of Newcaſtle; and the Lord-Viſcount Newport, Treaſurer of the Houſhold, to be earl of Bradford: As, alſo, to prefer Mr. Montagu to be Chancellor and Under-Treaſurer of the Exchequer; and Sir William Trumbal, and John Smith, Eſq; to be Commiſſioners of the Treaſury, in the Room of Mr. Hampden, and Sir Edward Seymour.

A. D. 1694. Seymour. But then, that the Tories might not be without Hope, he not only continued the Marquis of Carmarthen at the Head of the Council-Board, but gratified him with the Title of Duke of Leeds: And he directed the Marquis of Normanby, and the Lord Viſcount Durfley, to be ſworn of his Privy-Council.

This laſt Tranſaction bears date the 3d of May: The ſame Evening his Majeſty ſet out again for Graveſend; but the Winds proving again unfavourable, proceeded on to Canterbury, and from thence to Margate, where he embark'd on the 7th: And by an Article dated from White-Hall, May the 8th, we are yet farther told, That their Majeſties had been graciouſly pleas'd to create the Lord Viſcount Sydney, Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, and Earl of Rumney. Laſtly, by another of the 10th it appears, that, in Virtue of Her Majeſty's Command, the Earl of Stamford, and Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, were ſummon'd to the Council-Board, and had taken their Places accordingly.

Thus it may be ſaid, that all the great Offices of the Crown were either in the Hands of Whigs, or of ſuch Tories as were pliant enough to ſerve under them, merely for the Profits and Perquiſites of their ſeveral Offices.

Jacobite Account of the Cabinet.

But to be in Place, and to be in Power, are very different Things, tho' they are vulgarly underſtood to be the ſame: And this was ſo far from being a Secret in this Reign, that in a Pamphlet, which was writ expreſly to expoſe it, we find it very confidently affirm'd, not only, that the Secret of our Negotiations with foreign Courts was entruſted to the Dutch Miniſters reſiding there, not our own, but alſo, (y) that the Miniſters, ſuppos'd to be at the Head of our Affairs at Home, were no otherwiſe advis'd with, than to carry pre-concerted Meaſures into Execution: That the King, the Earl of Portland, and the Earl of Sunderland, made up the whole Cabinet: That even the Secretaries of State were no better than little ſervile Commis: And that Lord Shrewſbury himſelf, who had once reſign'd on this very Account, and who had been lur'd back to Court by an high Title, a Blue Ribbon, and certain inſidious Promiſes, of being more conſider'd for the time to come, found himſelf as much a Cypher as before.

It may now, perhaps, be expected, that we ſhould accompany his Majeſty to Holland, and proceed immediately to the opening of the Campaign: But tho' the Opportunity be inviting, we muſt not embrace it, A. D 1694. till we have clear'd certain other Tranſactions, which ſtill lie in our way.

And, firſt, tho' little or nothing need, as yet, be ſaid concerning Ireland, which was under the Dominion of the Lords-Juſtices, Capel, Wych, and Duncomb, it is neceſſary to ſay a Word or two concerning Scotland.

Affairs of Scotland.

It is true, no material Alteration had been made in the Regency there; but then that Regency had made no Progreſs in conciliating the Affections of the People. The ſame Correſpondence was ſtill carry'd on between the Malcontents and the Court of St. Germains: A Party of the Latter ſtill kept Poſſeſſion of the Baſi, an inacceſſible Rock, ſurrounded with the Sea: And Sir James Montgomery, who was then Agent of the Party in England, and who, from time to time, made it his Buſineſs to keep up their Spirits, by expoſing the Errors and Corruptions of the Government, had not only found Means to make his Eſcape out of Cuſtody, but to elude all the Re-ſearches that were made after him, tho' back'd by a Proclamation, and the Offer of a 500*l.* Reward.

But theſe were Conſiderations of ſmall Importance: There was ſtill an Anti-Court Faction in the Parliament, which the Government Eſtabliſhments and Revenue of Scotland were not large enough to gratify: Theſe waited for a Seſſion with the utmoſt Impatience; as making no doubt, but that out of the Glenco-Affair, and ſuch other Cauſes of Complaint as had been adminiſter'd by thoſe in Power, they ſhould be able to trouble the Waters enough, to anſwer all the Purpoſes they had to ſerve. The Government, on the other Hand, who wanted to draw Scotland into a larger Share of the War as well as England; as, alſo, to find Ways and Means to defray the Expence of it, were well enough inclin'd to gratify them with a Seſſion, and, probably, ſomething farther, if any Security could have been given, that the Current of it ſhould have flow'd no otherwiſe than as they directed. It alſo appears, that they had even conceiv'd ſome Hopes of carrying their Point: For mention is made in the Gazette, of a Purpoſe to appoint the Duke of Hamilton Commiſſioner; and the Parliament having been adjourn'd to the 9th of January, a Proclamation was ſet forth, towards the End of December, directing, That it ſhould be farther adjourn'd to the 15th of March; when all the Members were requir'd to give their Attendance in the uſual way, and under the uſual Certifications.

(y) The very Words of the ſaid Pamphlet are as follow: "Nor is it matter of Wonder or Surprize, that he treats thoſe Engliſh with Diſdain, as well as Reſervedneſs, whom he pretends to employ under public Characters Abroad; ſeeing the Miniſters, who are ſuppos'd to be at the Head of Affairs at Home, and who are believed to be admitted into all the Secrets of the Government, and are made acquainted with very little, previous to its coming to be concluded; but then they, whom he did not think worthy to be his Counſellors, tho' they bear the Name, are call'd upon, and ſet at work, as his Tools, to ſee that perform'd which only himſelf, and his Minion Bentinck, and may be one certain Perſon more, who is in Credit with him, for having formerly betray'd unto him both his Maſter and the Kingdom, had debated and reſolv'd upon. Yea, thoſe whom he calls his Principal Secretaries of State, ſignify no more, nor make any better Figure in the moſt important and weighty Matters, than that of little and ſervile Commis; which one of theſe ſo reſented heretofore, that he ſurrender'd his Poſt, and withdrew from Buſineſs; but being tempted with the Profits, Salaries, and Perquiſites of the Place, and allur'd by a lofty Title, and a Blue Ribbon, and likewiſe flatter'd with the Hopes that were given him of being otherwiſe, and more honorably dealt with for the future, he hath re aſſum'd it again, but meets with the ſame Reaſons, and has the ſame Cauſe given him of abandoning it afreſh, as he pretended to have for deſerting it before. Brief Account of ſome of the Dutch Encroachments, p. 20.

A. D. 1694. cations. But in this Interval it being found, for the preſent, impracticable to reconcile the Paſſions on one Hand, to the Intereſts on the other, State Expedients were ſubſtituted in the Place of Parliamentary ones: For, two or three Days before that Adjournment expir'd, the Seſſion was farther adjourn'd to the 15th of June; and two other Proclamations were iſſued, tending to gratify the Court, on one Hand, with the Augmentation deſir'd, and, at the ſame time, to ſecure it from every ill Conſequence on the other. By the firſt, in Virtue of the Sixth Act of the fourth Seſſion of the Parliament then in being, (which provided, that, for the further Security of the Proteſtant Religion, and their Majeſties Government, during the preſent Exigence, no Nonjuror ſhould keep any Horſe, worth above 100 Marks Scots, or any ſort of Arms, except a walking Sword, on the Penalty of forfeiting 1000 Marks) the Lords of the Privy-Council were authoris'd to take ſuch effectual Methods to diſarm ſuch Perſons, and ſeize their Horſes, as they ſhould judge neceſſary: And all Perſons, without Exception, were requir'd, either to take the Oaths, or deliver up their Arms and Horſes, under the ſaid Penalty: And by the ſecond, all Heretors, and others, requir'd by the Seventh Act of the ſame Seſſion, to furniſh Men towards the new Levy, appointed by the ſaid Act, were commanded to prepare their ſaid Levies, and to deliver them up to ſuch Officers, and at ſuch Places, as ſhould be appointed by the Privy-Council.

State Expedients ſubſtituted inſtead of parliamentary ones.

7000 Men embark'd from Leith for Flanders.

The Number of theſe Levies amounted to about 3000 Men; and with ſuch Rigour and Expedition were they rais'd, that tho' the firſt Notice of this Meaſure was not given till the 23d of December, and the two latter Proclamations were not iſſued till the 14th of March, by the 22d of April they were not only completed, but actually embark'd, together with five Regiments of Foot; making in all near 7000 Men; and on the laſt Day of the Month they ſet Sail for Flanders, under the Convoy of the Greenwich, Dartmouth, African and Smyrna-Factor Men of War.

The Surrender of the Baſs.

It happen'd, alſo, in this Interval, that by a Series of lucky Incidents, the Government got Poſſeſſion of the Baſs. The Number of Deſperadoes who held that Poſt, were thirty-two: It had been made Treaſon to furniſh them with any Proviſions, or hold any Correſpondence with them: They were in Want of all Things, and had but one way to ſupply themſelves, which was, by manning out their Boat, and riffing ſuch Veſſels as fell within their Reach. One Day ſeeing a ſmall Bark, with a Freight of Corn, ſailing from Dunbar, they ſent out eighteen of their Garriſon to ſeize and bring her in, who ſeiz'd her accordingly; but inſtead of bringing her in, were forc'd, by a Storm, into Dundee, where they all leap'd aſhore, and made the beſt Shift they could to eſcape: Three of them, however, were taken, try'd, and condemn'd to be executed; as were alſo two others, who had been convicted of furniſhing the ſaid Garriſon with Proviſions. But ſo many Days Reſpite were allow'd them, that thoſe of the Baſs had Notice of it; and, as well to preſerve the Lives of their Comrades, as to put an End to their own Miſery, made an Offer to capitulate, which the Lords of the Council were pleas'd to accept; and upon the 21ſt of April it was ſurrender'd upon Articles; by which a Pardon were not only granted to the ſixteen who ſurrender'd it, but to all the reſt, as well thoſe under Sentence of Death, as thoſe not taken; and the ſaid ſixteen were permitted to depart in Peace, with their Baggage and Swords. A. D. 1694.

And now, by way of Introduction to the great Buſineſs of the Campaign, it is neceſſary, firſt, to make the beſt Uſe we can of two Paſſages in Burnet's Hiſtory of his own Times; and then to diſcourſe of another Occurrence which he has not thought fit to mention at all: The firſt is conceiv'd in theſe Words: "We were, at this time, alarm'd with a Negotiation, that the Court of France was ſetting on Foot at Madrid: They offer'd to reſtore to the Crown of Spain all that had been taken from it, ſince the Peace of Munſter, on condition that the Duke of Anjou ſhall be declar'd the Heir of that Crown,, in Default of Iſſue by the King: The Grandees of Spain, who are bred up to a Diſregard and Contempt of all the World beſides themſelves, were inclinable to entertain this Propoſition; tho' they ſaw that by ſo doing, they muſt loſe the Houſe of Auſtria, the Elector of Bavaria, and many of their other Allies. But the King himſelf, weak as he was, ſtood firm and intractable; and ſeemed to be as much ſet on watching their Conduct, as a Man of his low Genius could poſſibly be. He reſolv'd to adhere to the Alliance, and to carry on the War; tho' he could do little more than barely reſolve on it. The Spaniards thought of nothing but their Intrigues at Madrid; and for the Management of the War, and all their Affairs, they left the Care of that to their Stars, and to their Allies."

Conduct of Spain with regard to the French Offers of Peace.

It is ſo much the more to be lamented, that the Biſhop has not ſpecified the Authority from whence he has deriv'd this extraordinary Article; becauſe the Accounts given by other Authors, of the French Negotiations at the Court of his Catholic Majeſty, give no Countenance to any Part of it. According to them, the ſaid Negotiations were conducted by the Pope's Nuncio; and the Propoſals he made were conformable to thoſe which had been made by the Kings of Sweden and Denmark, to the other Confederates, That the Anſwer given by his Catholic Majeſty was to this Effect, That none of the Powers at War were more deſirous of a firm and ſolid Peace than himſelf: That he would not fail to appriſe them, by his Miniſters, of the Advances his Holineſs had made, and the Zeal he had diſcover'd for accompliſhing ſo good a Work: But that he could not liſten to any Negotiation of that kind, without the Participation of his Allies; nor perſuade

A. D. 1694. himself, that France was sincere, even in the Offers she made. It is, moreover, added, That, growing apprehensive that the States-General might be dazzled by the Concern which seem'd to be shewn for their Interest therein, he dispatch'd a Letter to their Lordships, which was dated January 23, signifying, That he look'd upon the said Offers as no other than a Snare for the Allies: That he made no doubt but their Lordships consider'd them in the same Light: That with regard to that Part of them which related to himself, he could not help being surpriz'd beyond Measure, that his Most Christian Majesty should interfere in the Succession of his Dominions, or to dispose of any Part of the Spanish Monarchy: That how highly soever the Duke of Bavaria stood in his Opinion, he could not hear of any Project to alienate the Netherlands in his Favour, without the most sensible Displeasure: That he hop'd their Lordships, instead of being mov'd by these insidious Offers, would redouble their Efforts to carve out a Peace for themselves: That, for his Part, he would co-operate with all the Power which God had put into his Hands; and that if it should so happen that the Allies should give way to an Accommodation, on such ignominous Terms, he would persist, singly, in carrying on the War, tho' to the Hazard of his Crown and Life, rather than submit to them.

The Bishop's second Passage runs thus: "Prince Lewis of Baden came this Winter to concert Measures with the King: He stay'd above two Months in England, and was treated with very singular Respects, and at a great Expence."

The Prince of Baden in England.

Now it is also to be wish'd, that his Lordship, who, long before this, had devoted so great a Part of his Attention to the political Occurrences of his Time, and so piously resolv'd to do his very best, for the Information of Posterity, had not hurried with altogether so much Celerity over this Ground. The Prince of Baden's Commission, it may be presum'd, was of very great Importance; and some farther Explanation of it, might, perhaps, have accounted for many other mysterious Passages: Or if, as some have asserted, the Secret was so inviolably kept, that it was never imparted to any but the King himself; the honest Acknowledgment of that Truth, would, in some Respects, have pass'd for Information.

And as to the Occurrence which his Lordship has not thought fit to mention at all, it was, in substance, as follows:

Swedish and Danish Ships bound to France seiz'd by the English and Dutch.

The Danes and Swedes, taking Advantage of their Neutrality, had not only carried on a very great Commerce during the War, but had been the Purveyors of France for naval Stores, Corn, and, in general, whatever else it was in their Power to supply them with. As long as there was any Hopes of bringing them into the Confederacy, this had been conniv'd at by the Maritime Powers: But as soon as the two Courts took upon them to be importunate for the Conclusion of a Peace, and to act, upon all Occasions, as the Advocates, if not Partizans of France, it was resolv'd to make them sensible, that they could not lean to one Party, without incurring the Resentment of the other: Accordingly, as if it was by Consent, the Commanders of the English and Dutch Men of War, and Privateers, had Orders to stop, visit, and seize all Danish or Swedish Ships, that were either bound to the French Ports, or laden with such Commodities as seem'd to be provided for a French Market; which Orders were very exactly obey'd; and several Ships, of both Nations, were actually taken, tho' not condemn'd; because the Experiment had been made only by way of Warning, not with any purpose to bring on a Rupture. A. D. 1694.

Whether by Accident or Design, it is hard to say, the Danes were the greatest Sufferers, and the Dutch the greatest Aggressors. According to the Dutch Writers, however, the Danes drew this Mischief on themselves, by re-asserting their old Pretensions to certain Duties from every Ship which enter'd the Sound, and obliging some of the Dutch Ships to pay it: And to render this the more plausible, they tell us, That the King of Denmark, having caus'd certain Dutch Ships to be seiz'd, and carried into the Road of Copenhagen, their High Mightinesses did, in their turn, cause a Seizure to be made, on the 12th of February, of thirty-four Danish Ships, then lying in their Ports. But in the London-Gazette, there is an Article from Amsterdam, dated December 30, which says, That his Danish Majesty had caus'd sixteen Dutch Ships bound home from Dantzick and Koningsberg, to be stopt, by way of Reprizal, for the Danish Ships which had been taken by the Dutch Men of War and Privateers: And our own Advices from Deal and Dover, in the same Paper, at the same Period of Time, manifest, that the Practice of England and Holland was alike.

Suite de l'Hist. de Hollande, Tom. II.

Contest between Denmark and Holland on that Account.

No. 2936.

It does not, however, appear, that the Swedes proceeded to make any Reprizals, or even to demand Satisfaction of either Nation; which is so much the more extraordinary, in as much as the Ships of that Nation, taken by us, were said to be under the Convoy of two Swedish Men of War: And what is still more extraordinary, his Majesty of Sweden was one of the Powers that interpos'd, with their good Offices, to make up the Breach between the Danes and the Dutch: And tho' the Broil lasted for some time, and was maintain'd with great Heat on both Sides, it was, at last, compos'd under the Mediation of his Britannic Majesty.

Gaz. No. 2938.

There was yet another Incident which is mention'd by almost all the Writers of these Times; namely, the Death of the Prince-Bishop of Liege. He was, as we have seen, strongly attach'd to the Confederates; and, not without Reason, great Apprehensions were entertain'd of the Intrigues of France, with regard to the Course and Issue of a new Election: For no sooner had the News reach'd Versailles, than the Cardinal de Bouillon was directed to attend that Proceeding, full freighted with all the Powers, Promises,

Death of the Prince of Liege.

A. D. 1694. and other Requisites that could possibly give an additional Weight to his Negotiations: He was of the Chapter, and Provost of the Cathedral Church of St. Lambert; but tho' in a Capacity to be elected, was not in a Capacity to give his own Voice in the Election; because he had not been present at the last great Chapter of St. Giles, to which he was oblig'd, by the Laws and Statutes of the Chapter. The Competitors were many, but the two principal were the Elector of Cologne, Brother to the Duke of Bavaria, and the Grand Master of the Teutonic Order, who was Brother to the Elector Palatine, and Brother-in-Law to the Emperor; whence it follow'd, that being Princes of the same Faction, the Powers of which it was compos'd, were at a Loss to declare for either, for fear of disobliging the other.

Cardinal Bouillon dispatch'd thither as an Agent of France.

As to the Cardinal, whatsoever his Intentions were, he did not declare them: For having repair'd to Huy, and being refus'd the Passes he had requir'd, in order to be present at the Election, under the Pretence above specified, of his being disqualified to vote, he contented himself with assailing the Out-works, before he attempted to carry the Place: He communicated a Declaration of the Most Christian King's, dated March 15, importing, That in case the Princes of the Confederacy would withdraw their Forces from the City, Citadel, and Fortifications of Liege, to the End that all Persons indifferently might have free Access, and be in a Condition to vote freely, his Majesty would grant a full Neutrality to the City and Diocese, till the first of May; and also all manner of safe Conducts, Passes, &c. to those concern'd, during the said Term. He plied the Chapter with Expostulations on the Hardships impos'd on him: He desired Leave to plead his own Cause before the Chapter; or that a Committee might be delegated to give him a Meeting at Huy. And while he was thus employ'd on one Hand, and in feasting and distributing Alms on the other, as if he had a mind to out-riot Lucullus, and make Charity herself a Bankrupt, all the French Agents at Rome incessantly importun'd the Pope to interpose in his Behalf; or, at least, to postpone the Day of Election: But his Holiness, it seems, affecting to observe a perfect Neutrality, refus'd to have any Concern in the Broil: And the Cardinal finding that an unalterable Resolution had been taken to keep the Gates for ever shut against him, had recourse to a solemn Protestation against all that should be transacted in the Chapter, during his Absence; accompany'd with an Appeal to the Holy See; which some of his Creatures had the Courage to fix up in several Parts of the City; tho' they were soon taken down by order of the Capitulars.

He is refus'd Admittance.

and protests against all Proceedings in his Absence.

And this Opposition to the Cardinal, was the only Point in which they were unanimous: For tho' they persisted equally, in proceeding to Election, without any Regard either to his Clames or Resentments, in the Prosecution of their several Interests, they were as much divided, and as much interested, as if they had no third Party to oppose. A. D. 1694.

The Day of Election was the 20th of April: The Number of Canons was forty-six; and the first Point in dispute was, for the Nomination of the returning Officer, which was carry'd by the Elector of Cologne, by twenty-four Voices against twenty-two.

And now as the Issue of the Election was known, by the Issue of this previous Question, the grand Master's Party saw they had nothing for it, but to raise some Point of Dispute, that should either leave the Matter in suspence, or furnish them with a Pretence to secede, in case the Majority should resolve to make the most of their present Advantage.

Accordingly, when the Brief of Eligibility, granted by the late Pope to the Elector, came to be read, they maintain'd it to be null; and being out-voted as before, left the Chapter, under the Umbrage of a Protest, against all that should be done without their Participation; which was so little regarded by their Opponents, that they proceeded immediately to Election; and having voted unanimously for the Elector, caus'd him to be proclaim'd Bishop and Prince of Liege; carry'd him, in Triumph, to the Palace, where a magnificent Feast was in readiness for their Entertainment: And the Noise of Bells, great Guns, and the Forms of Acknowledgement and Congratulation took up the rest of the Day.

The Elector of Cologne chosen.

On the Morrow, however, the Seceders return'd to the Chapter-house, in order to proceed to a Re-Election; and being prevented by the Attendance of the same Party who had ousted them before, repair'd to the Dean's, where they also elected a Prince of their own; namely, the Grand Master; and would have celebrated their Choice in the same manner as their Opposers had done, if the Latter had not prevented them.

and also the Grand-Master.

In few Words, the two Parties again met in the Chapter-House; and the Minority contending for the Validity of the second Election, the Majority pronounc'd it to be null; and set forth an Ordinance, forbidding the Inhabitants of the City and Diocese, to acknowledge any other for Bishop and Prince, but the Archbishop of Cologne. This, however, did not put an End to the Dispute: The Grand-Master persisted in his Clame; Couriers were dispatch'd, by both Parties, to the Pope, the Emperor, and, in general, to every Prince and Power that could be serviceable to either: The Cardinal de Bouillon redoubled his Protests; and till some Temperament could be found, the Administration was, by common Consent, left in the Hands of the Capitulars; that is to say, three of each Party.

But while such was the uneasy State of Things, the Grand-Master died of a Malignant Disease, which was then prevalent in Liege, and which had carried off several Persons: And this sudden Removal of one Competitor, shorten'd the Dispute, and made it so much the more easy for the other who dies.

A. D. 1694. to get Poſſeſſion of the Power, as well as the Title.

All this while, that the Deſigns of France, upon the Principality of Liege, by the means of the Cardinal, were fruſtrated; and were ſtill like to be fruſtrated, which ever Party prevail'd, afforded great matter of Triumph to the Confederates; and in the Engliſh, Dutch, and German Gazettes was ſet forth accordingly; as was alſo the miſerable State of France; the Scarcity of every kind of Grain and Forage; the Diſcontents and Mutinies it caus'd; the Failure of Specie, which began to be felt in their moſt conſiderable Towns, and which had long been felt every where elſe; the frequent Bankruptcies it occaſion'd; the arbitrary Methods taken to ſupply it; and the general Backwardneſs and Deficiency of all their Preparations for opening the Campaign.

France reſolves to act on the Defenſive this Campaign.

The Truth of the Matter, indeed, was, that France, tho' victorious, had her full Share of Preſſures and Calamities at this Criſis. King Lewis, and his Miniſtry, had exerted themſelves in a very extraordinary Manner, and made very free with the Property and Blood of the Subject, at the Entrance, and during the firſt Years of the War, in hope to reduce the Confederates to ſuch a Condition, as ſhould oblige them to give over the Experiment; and be glad to accept of ſuch a Peace as they ſhould think fit to preſcribe. But when they obſerv'd their very Succeſſes had operated a quite contrary way, that the ſaid Confederates, inſtead of ſinking under their Misfortunes, or catching at the Offers which they had thrown out, made Proviſion to redouble their Efforts, and carry on the War at a far greater Expence, and with abundantly more Vigour than before, they made a ſuitable Change in their Syſtem: They try'd ſuch Practices on the Court of Turin, as they had very good Reaſon to believe would not fail to have their Effect: They made a proper Diſpoſition to cover their Frontiers every where: And they reſolv'd to make their Impreſſion, where they knew the Enemy was weakeſt.

Except on the Side of Spain.

This was on the Side of Spain; and it was not only reſolv'd to furniſh M. de Noialles with a ſufficient Force, and all the other Requiſites, to open the Campaign both early and effectually, but, alſo, to countenance his Efforts with the whole naval Force of France; in order to which, all the proper Meaſures were taken, ſo to expedite the Preparations, both at Breſt and Toulon, that the two Squadrons might both join and enter upon Action, before the Fleets of the Maritime Powers ſhould be in a Condition to hinder it.

On the other Hand, it was natural to expect, that the fatal Experience of the paſs'd Year, ſhould have induc'd the Maritime Powers to make uſe of every Ray of Intelligence, and to put in Practice every Meaſure which had a Tendency to prevent this Junction: Both the Secretary's Office and the Admiralty were now under the Direction of Whigs: Mr. Ruſſel was again at the Head of the Fleet; and a total Difference of Behaviour, under this Adminiſtration, ſeem'd to be a ſort of Debt to the Public, in conſequence of the Clamours which had been rais'd againſt the laſt.

A. D. 1694.

Naval Preparations at Breſt and Toulon.

Every body knew, that unleſs the Allies were firſt at Sea, the Breſt Squadron, if ſo diſpos'd, would give them the Slip: Every body alſo knew, that in caſe it fell in with either of the Squadrons, under Wheeler, Hopſon, or Nevil, the Advantage would be wholly on the French Side: In an Article from Paris, dated February 19, N. S. and publiſh'd in the London-Gazette of February 26, O. S. it is ſaid, The Count d'Eſtrée was preparing for his Return to Toulon, to command the Ships that were fitting out there. In another, dated March 9, it is ſaid, He was gone; and that the Marſhal de Tourville would ſet out ſhortly for Breſt. In a third, dated the 15th, it is ſaid, He, the ſaid Marſhal, had taken his Leave of the King. In a fourth, dated the 20th, it is ſaid, He was gone, and that M. d'Eſtrée was arriv'd at Toulon. In a fifth, dated April 5, it is ſaid, A great Reinforcement had been ſent to the Army in Catalonia: As alſo, that it was ſuppos'd they had a Deſign upon Barcelona; and that Letters from Breſt gave Account of the fitting out twenty Men of War at that Port. In a ſixth, dated the 16th, that M. de Tourville was gone from Breſt, to haſten the Ships which were equipping in other Ports; and that the Toulon Squadron would be ready to Sail in a ſhort time. In a ſeventh, dated the 19th, that the ſaid Marſhal was gone Poſt from Breſt to Toulon, (which was, in Truth, the very Expedition of the 9th, mention'd above) and that the Squadron fitting out at the laſt of thoſe Places was to ſail forthwith. In an eighth, dated the 26th, That M. de Noialles departed, on the 24th, for Catalonia; and that it was ſtill given out, the Deſign was to beſiege Barcelona by Sea and Land: And, Burcher. laſtly, as the ſame fatal Experience of the former Year had ſhewn, that all the Advices from Paris, inſerted in our own Gazette, were founded on Matters of Fact; ſo London Gazette. theſe were, in like manner, more than verified, by the actual ſailing of the French Fleet out of Breſt, on the 15th of April, N. S. And ſo narrowly did Admiral Nevil, with his ſhatter'd Ships, eſcape the falling into their Hands, that he had ſcarce got round from Gibraltar to Cadiz, as formerly recited, before they paſs'd by the laſt of thoſe Ports, and made their Entrance into the Streights.

But notwithſtanding all this, the Event ſhewed, that either we had the ſame Defect of Intelligence, which had been complain'd of the Year before, or the ſame Backwardneſs to make a right Uſe of it: For Admiral Ruſſel did not arrive at Portſmouth till the 27th of April at Night, which was two Days after the Breſt Squadron was at Sea: And when he did arrive, his Conduct was ſuch, as, at this Diſtance of Time, and, perhaps, for want of ſufficient Lights, is ſcarce to be accounted for.

Admiral Ruſſel hoiſts his Flag at Portſmouth.

The

A. D. 1694. The Services expected from him were of a complicated Nature: The Breſt Squadron was to be attended to; the Ports of Spain, on the Mediterranean Side, were to be protected; and a Deſign upon Breſt, which is aſcrib'd by Biſhop Burnet to General Talmaſh, was alſo to be carry'd into Execution.

When the Admiral came to Portſmouth, Burchet bears Witneſs, that the whole Fleet lay at St. Helens; and that the Land-Forces to be employ'd in this Expedition, were on their March towards that Place: In order, therefore, to fulfil the whole of his Charge, it might have been not unreaſonably expected, that he ſhould have choſe to wait for the coming up of the Forces, and having embark'd them, ſhould have proceeded with the whole Fleet to Breſt: But inſtead of doing ſo, on the 3d of May he gave Orders to Sir Cloudſley Shovel, to remain at St. Helens with three Firſt Rates, nine Seconds, thirteen Thirds, ſeven Fourths, four Fifths, and three Sixths, with ſeveral Tenders; as alſo, to adviſe with Talmaſh concerning the Diſtribution of the Forces, which were about 6000, to be ſhipt on board them; and with the reſt of the Fleet ſet Sail towards the Soundings, for Intelligence of the French Fleet.

He ſets Sail with Part of the Fleet to the Soundings.

London Gazette, No. 2972. It was on the 5th that he ſet Sail; on the 9th he reach'd his Station; and falling in with a Swediſh Ship, which had left Breſt three Days before, he receiv'd the Information mention'd above, that the French Fleet had ſail'd from thence on the (x) 25th of April, O. S. As alſo, that a Fleet of French Merchant Men, under the Convoy of one or two Ships of War, lay then at Anchor in Bertheaume Bay.

And now, as it was no Secret at White-Hall, that the Deſtination of the Breſt Squadron was to the Mediterranean, in order to join that of Toulon, and co operate with M. de Noiailles in reducing Barcelona; and as it had been preconcerted between the Engliſh and Spaniſh Courts, that the main Body of the united Fleet ſhould follow them; it might alſo have been expected, that Mr. Ruſſel would have made the beſt of his way to Cadiz, to join Admiral Nevil, and ſuch of the Ships of both Nations as had taken Shelter there; and with that Reinforcement, to have gone immediately in queſt of the Enemy. But whether he was reſtrain'd by his Inſtructions, or whether he did not think that Nevil's Force, added to his own, together with the Spaniſh Armada, if in a Condition to put to Sea, would be a Strength ſufficient to encounter the two French Squadrons, he contented himſelf with ordering two Men of War, and a Fire-Ship, to deſtroy the Merchant-Men in Bertheaume-Bay; and thirty-eight out of fifty-five having been deſtroy'd accordingly, return'd to St. Helens.

and returns to St. Helens.

It was the 23d when he recover'd that Port; ſo that eighteen Days were employ'd in this Excurſion; and in ſix Days more the whole Fleet was ſo completely provided, that nothing was wanting but a favourable Wind, which ſpringing up the next Day, they ſet Sail, and by Noon were out of Sight: And yet Biſhop Burnet has been pleas'd to account for this Interval in theſe Words: "The Preparations were not quite ready by the Day that was ſettled; and when all was ready, they were ſtopt by a Weſterly Wind for ſome time; ſo that they came thither a Month later than was intended." It is true, he alſo drops a Hint, that a Deſign of the ſame Nature with this of Talmaſh's, had been propos'd to Lord Nottingham; and that his Lordſhip, among other Things, had accus'd Ruſſel of neglecting it, when it was imparted to him, by certain Perſons who came from Breſt: And the Light which breaks in upon us from this Circumſtance, makes ſome Amends for the Obſcurity in which he has involv'd the former. A. D. 1694.

That Part of the Fleet, deſtin'd for the Attempt on Breſt, conſiſted of three Firſt Rates, four Second Rates, twelve Third Rates, one Fourth Rate, two Fifth Rates, ten Fire-Ships, and three Hoſpitals; beſides Bombs, Tenders, &c. which was the Engliſh Proportion; and nineteen Dutch of the Line of Battle, and four Fire-Ships: Thus, at leaſt, the Strength of the Squadron is ſtated by Burchet; but according to the Sea-Journal, ſet forth in the Name of the Marquis of Carmarthen, who ſerv'd as Rear-Admiral of the Blue in this Expedition, it conſiſted but of eighteen Engliſh, and eleven Dutch Ships of the Line of Battle; in all twenty-nine. The chief Command was given to Lord Berkley; and his Lordſhip's Inſtructions were, To act in general as ſhould be agreed in a Council of War, compos'd of the principal Sea and Land Officers: To call ſuch a Council before they arriv'd at Breſt, in order to adjuſt the Manner of making the ſaid Attempt: To uſe his beſt Endeavours to aſſiſt and protect the Forces, both in landing and re-embarking them; and in caſe it ſhould be found neceſſary, to detach ſuch a Number of Seamen, to co-operate with them, as the general Officers ſhould require of him, conſiſtent with the Safety of the Ships. His Lordſhip had it alſo in Charge, when all had been done, which could be done, at Breſt, to adviſe, with a Council of War, what farther Services might be perform'd againſt any other of the French Ports; and when, by the ſame Authority, it ſhould be reſolv'd, That no ſuch farther Service could be done, either by Sea or Land, he was to ſhip the Forces again, and to repair to Torbay or Spithead, where he was to remain till he ſhould receive freſh Orders, either from the King or the Lords of the Admiralty.

A Squadron appointed to make an Attempt on Breſt.

(x) According to the Suite de l'Hiſtoire de Hollande, they did not ſail till the 7th of May, N. S. which alſo agrees with a vague Article from Paris, in the London-Gazette, dated May 14. But then there is ſuch a Concurrence of Evidence, in confirmation of the Intelligence given by the Swede, as puts the Matter out of Diſpute: And, indeed, how was it poſſible that a Fleet ſhould ſail from Breſt on the 7th, and be ſeen off of Gibraltar on the 4th, as it actually was?

A. D. 1694. ralty: And, laſtly, it was reſolv'd at a general Council of War, held on board the Admiral's Ship, May 31, That Lord Berkley, with his Squadron, ſhould make the beſt of his way to Camaret-Bay: That the Forces ſhould be landed there forthwith: That the Men of War ſhould continue at Anchor, till they receiv'd Advice from General Talmaſh of the Diſpoſition of the Enemy: And it being not proper to come to any poſitive Reſolution, at what time the Fleet ſhould go into Breſt Water, that the ſaid Matter ſhould be left to Conſideration, when they were actually in the Bay.

The two Fleets ſeperate. The two Fleets continued together after this, till the 5th of June, ſays the Journal above quoted, till the 6th, ſays Burchet; when the Admiral, with his Diviſion, paſs'd on to the Streights, and Lord Berkley bore down for Camaret-Bay.

On the Morrow a Council of War, conſiſting of the Flag and (a) Field Officers, was held, as directed above, to adjuſt the Manner of the Deſcent: And the Journal aſſerts, That Lord Cutts gave it as his Opinion, That fifty Grenadiers ſhould be landed firſt, to diſcover the Poſture and Countenance of the Enemy: That in caſe they found them ſtrongly entrench'd, and ſupported by regular Troops, it would not be adviſable to attack them: That this Forlorn ſhould be ſuſtain'd by the reſt of the Grenadiers, who were about 550 more; and Theſe again by the reſt of the Forces: That in caſe it ſhould be thought expedient to puſh the Enterpriſe, the Regularity of the Attack might render it the eaſier: That this Opinion was approv'd, and receiv'd by all without Exception: That it was agreed the Grenadiers ſhould be embark'd on board the Well-Boats, which were provided on purpoſe for the Deſcent: That Lord Cutts offer'd his Service to head them, which was alſo accepted. That they came to Anchor between Camaret and Bertheaume-Bays, (which lye on each Side the Entrance of Breſt-Water) on the 7th, about Seven o'Clock in the Evening; having been ſaluted in their Approach, by the Enemies Bombs from ſeveral Poſts, tho' without receiving any Damage: That the Marquis of Carmarthen, the Lord Cutts, and ſeveral other Officers, together with two noble Voluntiers, the Lord Mohun, and Mr. Wharton, apply'd to the Admiral for Leave to go aboard the Marquis's (b) Galley, and look into Camaret-Bay: That having obtain'd it, they ſail'd under the Fort, in the Midſt of all the Fire it could make; and having taken their Survey, reported, at their Return, how advantageouſly it was ſituated to cover the Landing Places: That upon this, the Monk, of ſixty Guns, and a Dutch Ship of the ſame Force, were order'd to batter the Caſtle in the Morning: That the Marquis remonſtrating to Lord Berkley, That ſo ſmall a Force was not ſufficient for ſo dangerous a Service; and ſuggeſting, That it would be more adviſeable to ſend ſuch a Number of Ships as might not only cover the Boats from the Caſtle, but alſo protect the Soldiers in landing, againſt ſuch an unexpected Proviſion of Lines, Entrenchments, and Batteries, as they would find themſelves on all Sides ſurrounded with, his Lordſhip was pleas'd to reply, That he would be directed in it by a Council of War: That on the 8th, at Day-Break, he order'd a Signal to be made accordingly, but without immediate effect, becauſe of a thick Fog, which continu'd till between ſix and ſeven o'Clock. That when the Fog broke up, the Enemy diſcover'd the ſaid Signal, as alſo another for embarking the Soldiers; and took the Advantage to line their Entrenchments, and draw up Fourteen Squadrons of Horſe in a Body, ready to be diſpos'd of, as Need ſhould require. That when the Council of War was, at length, aſſembled, the Marquis's Advice was ſo far adopted, that three Engliſh and three Dutch Frigates were added to the two nominated the Evening before. That the Marquis's Offer to command theſe Ships himſelf having been accepted, he farther deſir'd, that ſome able Land-Officer might be ſent in with him, to reconnoitre the Shore, and the Works which cover'd it, in order to make a Report to the General of the Difficulties of the Attempt, before it was made, which was alſo comply'd with: And that in all other Matters, except the Addition of a Signal for the Ships, Boats, &c. to come off, this Council of War agreed in their Reſolutions with that of the 6th.

Lord Berkley anchors before Breſt.

A. D. 1694.

And yet Biſhop Burnet takes the Liberty to ſay, That when our Fleet was come near enough to the Coaſt to ſee the Preparations which were taken to defend it, the Council of Officers were all againſt making the Attempt; and that Talmaſh had ſet his Heart ſo much upon it, that he could not be diverted from it. "He, the General, continues our Hiſtorian, fancied the Men they ſaw were only a Rabble, brought together to make a Shew; tho' it appear'd very evidently, that there were regular Bodies among them; and that their Numbers were double to his." Whence we are to infer, that the Commander in Chief, whom he ſoon after calls a good Officer, was the only Man who could derive no Information from what his own Eyes beheld; which is utterly inconceiveable, as well as irreconcilable with all the Accounts which are extant of this Undertaking. Vol. II. p. 130.

According to the Marquis's Journal, many of the Well-Boats, &c. in which the Soldiers were embark'd, came under Lord Berkley's Stern, before the Council of War broke up; and yet by reaſon of the Fog, and the Calm which accompany'd it, they were three or four Hours later than was deſign'd: His

(b) A Veſſel of his own, call'd after his own Name, the Peregrine, famous for her Sailing; afterwards purchas'd by the Crown, and converted into a Yacht.

A. D. 1694. His Lordſhip, the Admiral had alſo ordered the two Men of War firſt mentioned, to cannonade the Fort, before the other ſix could come up, and of theſe ſix Ships, two carried but thirty Guns; two others thirty two Guns each; one forty four, and one, the Greenwich fifty-four; which laſt thro' the Intelligence or Cowardice of her Commander, or both, theſe are the Marquis's own Words, never came up to her Station the whole Day.

Six ſmall Ships appointed to batter the Fort.

Thoſe who underſtand theſe Adventures beſt, can beſt decide whether Ships of ſuch ſmall Force, were the fitteſt to be ſent upon ſuch a Service; whether the Method follow'd by the Marquis of piloting them into the Bay, ſeverally, by which they were ſeverally expoſed to the Shot of the Fort, which at one Return took them in poop, and rak'd them fore and aft, was the moſt rational that could have been devis'd; and whether if the whole fleet (in which were three Ships of a hundred Guns, ſeven of ninety and ninety four, and three of eighty, eighty-ſix and eighty-eight) had been ſuffered to venture in at once, the Affair might not have been accompliſhed.

The Marquis does indeed ſuggeſt, That after they had paſs'd the Fort, and were ſhot pretty well into the Bay, they were ſurpriz'd with the Fire of two Batteries, which they had not perceiv'd before, and of one Redoubt: But then he adds, that the latter mounted but five or ſix Guns, of a ſmall Bore, and the former but twelve Guns in all. And again; That, notwithſtanding all the Efforts of the Enemy, he made a Shift ſo to poſt his Ships, that they gave great Succour to our Land Forces, and great Annoyance to the Enemy: That tho' his Men were bad Gunners, and the Walls of the Fort too thick to be hurt by their Shot, he ſaw the Enemy driven twice from their Guns, and their Officers as often driving them back.

Beſides, tho' his Lordſhip repreſents the whole Bay as ſurrounded with Entrenchments, flank'd on the Right and Left, with Redoubts of Earth, covered with Cannon; thoſe Entrenchments as crouded with Horſe and Foot; and the whole Diſpoſition to be ſuch, as in his poor Judgment, double the Number of their Forces could not have broke thro', it is not eaſy to imagine how any occaſional Works, tho' form'd, as they were by the great Mr. Vauban himſelf, could have withſtood the Fire of ſuch a Fleet: And as to the Number of the Defendants, we find it ſumm'd up, in that Commander's own Letter to the King, at 4000 regular Troops, one Regiment of Dragoons, 3000 Gentlemen-Volunteers, and 1400 Bombardiers.

It is alſo not a little extraordinary, if the Difficulties attending this Service were really ſo inſurmountable, as they have been repreſented, That the Report of the Land Officer who accompanied the Marquis into the Bay, and who was ſent back as ſoon as the Ships came to Anchor, did not induce the General to give over the Enterprize: And A. D. 1694. it is yet more extraordinary, if the latter proceeded to land his Men without waiting for that Report. Which was the Caſe, it is now impoſſible to determine; for the Marquis leaves this Circumſtance wholly in the Dark, and we know of no other Detail to ſupply the Defects of this.

As to the Event, it is recited by the Marquis in theſe Words, "I thought our Land Forces moved towards the Shore in great Diſorder; and how it happened I know not, but Lieutenant-General Talmaſh, with a ſmall Number of Well-Boats, in a kind of a confuſed Manner, went on Shore under a little Rock on the South-ſide of the ſmall Bay, where they landed: And I ſaw no Proſecution of that regular Way of Landing, which my Lord Cutts propoſed, and was before agreed on; but, having a great deal on my Hands, and ſo little Aſſiſtance, that I was forced generally to go on my own Meſſages, I am able to give but little Account of that was done cloſe by the Shore: Only that when I ſaw the Boats and ſmall Veſſels, in which our Land Forces were embarked, had made their Retreat from thence (except ſuch as ſtuck (c) faſt, in which a great many Men were kill'd, and out of which others were taken Priſoners, and ſome jump'd into the Water, endeavouring that Way to make their Eſcape) I went with my Twenty-Oar'd Boat pretty cloſe to the Shore, in hopes to ſave ſome, and had the good Fortune to take up ſeveral before they were drown'd. At the ſame Time, I had the Opportunity to take Notice of the Diſpoſition of that little Bay; the Enemy juſt then making a running Fire round all their Trenches, and from every Battery they had raiſed on this Occaſion."

The Troops land in a diſorderly Manner.

and are repulſed.

His Lordſhip then proceeds to deſcribe the little Bay, where this wretched Attempt was made; ſays, it was about 300 Yards in Front, and naturally eaſy of Acceſs: But now flank'd to the Right and Left, with Cannon and Entrenchments, within half Muſket-Shot of the Water: And then recounts the Difficulties he had to ſtruggle with, and the Dangers he had to ſuſtain in bringing off the Ships: For, thoſe having been all this while expoſed to the ſeveral Batteries on Shore, almoſt all their Rigging cut to pieces, and moſt of their Maſts and Yards diſabled, he was forced to go in Perſon after the Boats, which were carrying off the Forces, and oblige ſuch of them as he could reach, by Force, to take the Ships in tow, and row them out of the Bay: But ſo hot was the Service, ſo much were the poor Fellows expoſed, and ſo many of them were kill'd on all Sides, that they ſometimes quitted their Oars, and ran their Boats for Shelter under the Side of the Ship; inſomuch that the Marquis himſelf found it neceſſary not only to employ his own Boat in the ſame Service, but to leap into her himſelf:

Difficulties and Dangers of bringing off the Ships.

(c) The Tide was out.

A. D. 1694. himself: Nor was even this sufficient to keep them in heart; for one Boat having been shot thro', and another sunk downright, the Pannic took Place again, and he was forced to fire among them himself, that so one Danger might efface the Dread of another. It must indeed be allowed to his Honour, that no Man ever distinguish'd himself more than he did on this Occasion; and if he was able to bring off six of the seven Ships that bore the Brunt of that terrible Day, and which had not Mettle enough to silence any one of the Batteries that played upon them, it may again be ask'd, What would have become of those Batteries if the 100 Gun Ships had been brought to bear against them?

One Dutch Frigate lost. The Ship that was lost was a Dutch Frigate of thirty Guns call'd the Wesel; she had twelve Foot Water in her Hold, and was sinking, when the Marquis was making another Trip with his Boats to tow her off: For so unluckily had she been stationed, that out of half a Company of Land Forces, which had been accidentally left on board her, only the Ensign, a Drummer, and one Man more were left alive: Nor had her own Crew escap'd much better: For her Captain and all his Officers were kill'd, and two small Boats contain'd all the Survivors.

General Talmash wounded. In the Retreat from Shore, General Talmash himself had received a Wound in the Thigh, which being thought dangerous, he had been carry'd on board the Dreadnought, which was the Ship he had sail'd in from England: And hither, in complement to him on this melancholy Occasion, repair'd the Lord Berkley, and all the other Flag and Field-Officers, to consider what was most advisable to be done, in Conformity to their Instructions, and in consequence of the Shock they had sustain'd.

But, before we pass on to the Result, which the Marquis has given us Word for Word, it may not be improper to speak of the Loss. In the Gazette it is stinted to about 300 killed and wounded: Burchet acknowledges 600 of the Land Forces killed; which at first Sight seems to imply, that the Forlorn of Grenadiers, consisting of that Number, were cut off; but according to the Gazette, and other Accounts, not above 3 or 400 were landed; and the chief Misery of the Action arose from the Impossibility of disembarking the Soldiers fast enough; in consequence of which, not only those which were disembark'd, but those which lay off Shore in the Boats, were equally exposed to the Fire of the whole Curve they were surrounded with. The Marquis does not take upon him to be acquainted with the Loss sustain'd by the Land Forces, and only says, that it was reported, that the killed, wounded and taken were about 700: But then he is express, that the Loss on board the seven Ships amounted to about 400; whereas Burchet reduces it to 112 killed and wounded; and as to the French, the modestest of them, will not be satisfied, unless we admit, that the Attempt cost near 1000 Land Men; and the rest swell the Account to double that Number.

Different Accounts of the Loss.

A. D. 1694.

But whether the Loss was more or less it served to discourage the Council of War from making any new Attempt: It was observ'd, that the Enemy was entrench'd at every Place where a Landing could have been made; and it seems to have been admitted, that it was impossible to dislodge them: Insomuch that, after a long Consultation, the Question stated on the Issue, was not whether the Attack might be renew'd by any other Method, or at any other Place? But in what other Service the Fleet and Land Forces might be employed? With Regard to the latter, Talmash was ask'd whether he had Power to make an Attempt on any other Port? And having reply'd in the negative, he proposed in his Turn, That a Squadron of small Frigates, together with the Bomb-Vessels, might be sent into Brest, to bombard the Place. But this was over-rul'd by the Sea-Officers, for these Reasons: "1. Because they could not go in without a Westerly Wind, which was then Easterly; nor get out without an Easterly Wind; so that the whole Fleet would be oblig'd to wait for their Return, were it ever so long: 2. Because not knowing what Forces the Enemy might have in Brest, it might be sending them into the Enemy's Hands: And 3. because one of the Frigates requir'd, was already lost; and most of the rest for the present render'd unserviceable.

The Batteries proof over.

Thus the Sea-Officers suggesting, that nothing farther could be undertaken there, and the Land-officers having no Orders to act any where else, all that remain'd, was to return to Spithead, agreeable to the third Instruction, which Lord Berkley had receiv'd from the Admiral.

And now, in order to close on this Head, it remains to be observ'd, 1. That the Writers of our Nation, who treat of this Expedition, on the one Hand pronounce, That the King's Measures were betray'd in it; on the other, That Talmash was sacrific'd: And 2. That these Expressions have a very different Meaning; though, for Want of a thorough Insight into the Party History of those Times, they are generally taken for convertible Terms, and us'd accordingly.

Remarks on the whole Affair.

Those who say the King's Measures were betray'd would have us understand, That the Court of France was appriz'd from hence of the Design; and had thereby Time enough given them, to make such a Provision for their Defence, as we had not Strength enough to force: And Burchet makes no Difficulty to insinuate, That they had that Intelligence from their own Refugees, who were employed in the Expedition. But 'tis well known that no Troops in the King's Pay, behaved with more Bravery and Resolution against the French than those Refugees did, and some of them actually accompany'd Talmash in the Attempt, and were killed on the Beach. Besides, Burnet gravely makes a Doubt, whether the Secret was betray'd or not, tho' he had just before suggested, that the hiring of Transport-Ships discovered it:

And

And Boyer is peremptory, that it was the Town-Talk of London ſome Months before it was put in Execution.

On the other Hand, thoſe who maintain, that Talmaſh was ſacrific'd, inſinuate, 1. That he was perſonally diſagreeable to the King, becauſe he ſtood upon his Rank, and would never make the ſmalleſt Conceſſion to any of the Dutch Favourites; which gave occaſion to Burnet to ſay, That he was much too apt to be diſcontented, and to turn mutinous; and therefore, that he was, upon the whole, one of thoſe dangerous Men who were capable of doing as much Miſchief as good Service. And, 2. That his Majeſty could not be brought to think, that the making War on the Maritime Provinces of France, any way contributed to his favourite Scheme of making a Figure at the Head of the Confederate Army in Flanders. But unleſs we had ſuch Vouchers as were ſufficient to warrant theſe Inſinuations, it would be as unjuſt as indecent to lay any Streſs upon them.

Indeed, whoever reflects upon what has been already cited from Burnet, namely, That Lord Nottingham had made it a Part of his Charge againſt Ruſſel, that he had neglected a Deſign of the ſame Nature, when formerly imparted to him; and upon the Succeſſive Ferments which the Conduct of our naval Affairs had occaſion'd from Year to Year, will poſſibly ſee Cauſe to conclude, That the Latter was no Well-Wiſher to its Succeſs: And it is impoſſible not to impute ſome Part of the Miſcarriage to the firſt Reſolution of the Council of War, before the Seperation of the Fleets; which directed, in effect, That the Troops ſhould be put on Shore, without the Aſſiſtance of any of the Ships to cover them: And that the ſaid Ships ſhould continue at Anchor, until Talmaſh ſent Advice of the Difficulties he had to conquer.

Again; it is obvious enough, that the Scope of the Marquis's Journal, (which does not ſeem to have been made public as a mere Matter of Curioſity) and alſo of the Biſhop's Narrative, have a Tendency to make the General anſwerable for all: And, laſtly, whereas that Prelate is pleas'd to ſurmiſe, that the ſole Object of the Expedition was to reduce that Point of Camaret-Bay, which commands the Entrance into Breſt; and that the 6000 Men he had been furniſh'd with, was a ſufficient Force for that Purpoſe, the ſecond Reſolution of the Council of War, juſt cited, which leaves the time of the Squadron's entering into Breſt-Water to be ſettled, when they ſhould arrive in Camaret-Bay, is alone ſufficient to confute him: And how ill he, Talmaſh, was furniſh'd to make an Attempt upon Breſt, may not only be gather'd from his Misfortune in Camaret, but alſo from the Sketch which is left us of Mr. Vauban's Preparations to receive him there; namely, That he had caus'd a new Battery of ſixteen Pieces of Cannon, and eight Mortars, to be rais'd on that Baſtion of the City near the Caſtle; and a Second on Long Iſland, of ſix Pieces of Cannon, carrying ſixty-four Pound Ball each, and ſix Mortars: That he had cover'd eight large Rafts with Mortars; and, in general, that he had diſpos'd of ninety Mortars, and three hundred Pieces of Cannon, to the beſt Advantage. A. D. 1694.

But what Cenſures ſoever were paſs'd on this Undertaking, or what Controverſies ſoever it gave Riſe to, the General did not ſurvive it long enough to take any Part in them; nor does it appear that he left any Friend behind him, who was over-anxious for his Fame. He died at Plymouth, June 12, where he had been landed by the Dreadnought the Day before; with ſome Expreſſions in his Mouth, which ſeem'd to argue, that he was more concern'd for the ill Succeſs of the Action, than the Loſs of his Life. Death of Talmaſh.

As the Deſign upon Breſt had given the French a ſenſible Alarm, ſo neither could they conceal the Satisfaction which they took in the Defeat of it: And, what added to the Pride and Pleaſure which they expreſs'd on the Occaſion, a few Days after, the famous Adventurer de Bart, (who had undertaken, with a Squadron of Eight clean, light Ships, to lay the Commerce of the Maritime Powers under Contribution, in Contempt of all the Ships they could put to Sea) fell in with as many Dutch Men of War, under the Command of a Rear-Admiral, who had juſt made Prize of a Fleet of Daniſh and Swediſh Merchant-Ships, laden with Corn and naval Stores for France; and after a ſmart Engagement, took the ſaid Admiral and two more, put the reſt to flight, reſcu'd the Merchant-Men, and carry'd both them and the Prizes ſafe into Dunkirk. Eight Dutch Men of War beat by eight French Privateers.

But then that this Felicity of theirs might not be without a due Proportion of Alloy, no ſooner was Lord Berkley, and his Squadron, return'd to St. Helens; than he receiv'd Orders from the Queen to refit as faſt as poſſible; and with as many of the Land-Forces as ſhould be held requiſite, to ſtretch over to the Coaſt of France, and not only to annoy the Enemy with the Bomb-Veſſels, but by landing in the Country, and committing every other kind of Hoſtility, that was juſtifiable by the Laws of Arms. Orders given to Lord Berkley to annoy the Coaſt of France.

Accordingly, having taken four Regiments on board, which were thought ſufficient for this Service, and added ſome Frigates to the Fleet, for the better ſuſtaining the Bomb-Veſſels, his Lordſhip ſet Sail on the 29th of June for Diep, but was prevented, by bad Weather, from putting his Orders in Execution, till the 12th of July; when Captain Bembo undertook the Bombardment of that Place, and perform'd it ſo effectually, that it was in a manner reduc'd to Aſhes. Diep bombarded.

The next Viſit they paid was to Havre-de-Grace, which they treated in the ſame manner, but not with altogether the ſame Succeſs: For the Enemy had, by way of Precaution, ſunk ſix Ships in the Mouth of the Harbour, which hinder'd the Approach of the Frigates; and had rais'd ſeveral Batteries on the Shore: However, the Bomb-Veſſels were ſent in as near as poſſible, under the Cover of the Boats, which were fill'd with Seamen and Soldiers; and and Havre-de-Grace.

A.D. 1694. the Storm was continued for several Days together; during which time the Town took Fire in several Places, and several of the Enemies Ships were destroy'd: But no Attempt was made, either here or at Diep, to make a Descent; tho' it is said, that such was the Terror which had taken hold of both Inhabitant and Soldiers, that neither of them were capable of making any considerable Defence.

On the 21st they set Sail again; and proceeding along Shore towards La Hogue and Cherbourgh, alarm'd the whole Coast, which was visible by the firing their Beacons, the Discharge of their Signal Guns, and all those other precipitate Motions which proclame Danger at Hand, and a Necessity of making Head against it.

But this coasting Project was mere Matter of Parade and Terror only: Our Ammunition was exhausted; many of our Ships were disabled, and the Weather rather too boistrous for such crazy Bottoms: When, therefore, they had sufficiently gratify'd themselves with the Pannic of the French, they all at once stretch'd over to our own Coast, and on the 26th came to an Anchor at St. Helens; where we shall leave them for the present, in order to keep Pace with the main Branch of our Sea-Service in the Mediterranean; which was so connected with the Progress of the War in Catalonia, that we are under a Necessity to make the one serve as an Introduction to the other.

The Campaign in Catalonia open'd with a Battle.

In one of the Paris Articles in our Gazette, it was said, as it may be remember'd, That the Marshal, Duke de Noailles, had set out for Catalonia on the 24th of May: But that Advice was so far behind the Fact, that we find him much sooner at the Head of his Army; and not only making all the necessary Dispositions for an early and vigorous Campaign, but actually on his March towards the River Ter, on the Banks of which the Spanish Army was posted, under the Command of the Vice-Roy of Catalonia, with a Resolution to dispute the Passage: For that River being broad and deep, the Bottom full of Quick-Sands, the Fords few, and the Spaniards entrench'd over-against every one of them, it was presum'd by his Excellency, that tho' his Army did not exceed 16000 Horse and Foot, and that of the French amounted to 28000, he should be able to make it good.

On the 26th, in the Afternoon, the Marshal and his Army came up; and having made himself perfectly acquainted with all the Fords, found that the broadest and fasest of them all was the worst guarded: In order, therefore, that the Vice-Roy might not have any time to recover this Oversight, before he had made his own Use of it, he amus'd them with a Cannonading, while his Army again put themselves in motion; and having march'd from ten o'Clock till Day-break, presented themselves in Battle Array, at the Ford Side; and under the Cover of their Artillery, which far surpass'd that of the Spaniards, and was much better serv'd, order'd some of his best Corps to throw themselves into the Water; which they did with A.D. 1694. so much Intrepidity, and having gain'd the other Side, attack'd the Entrenchments with so much Vigour, that tho' the Spaniards, for half an Hour, maintain'd a very brisk Fire, they were driven from their Posts, which were immediately occupied by the Assailants; and the Latter being every Moment reinforc'd by fresh Parties, the Action, by degrees, grew general: And then it was that the Spaniards, finding themselves over-power'd, gave way on every Side; their Infantry first, and afterwards their Cavalry: But then it is mention'd, to the peculiar Honour of the Latter, that they rallied several times, and as often return'd to their Charge, with a great deal of Bravery; by which means the Former made a Shift to recover the neighbouring Eminencies, tho' not without considerable Loss. The Marshal, in his Letter to the King his Master, asserts, that he pursued the Enemy for four French Leagues together: That he had taken all their Ammunition and Baggage even to the Vice-Roy's Tent, and Papers; sixteen Colours, and about 1200 Prisoners, among whom were some of Quality: And in his Most Christian Majesty's own Letter to the Archbishop of Paris, directing a solemn Te Deum to be celebrated on this Occasion, he was pleas'd to recapitulate all these Circumstances with these splendid Additions, That the Loss of the Enemy amounted to 5 or 6000, kill'd or taken Prisoners: That never was Victory more complete; and that he had Reason to think, that so prosperous a Beginning portended him a Train of the like Prosperities, not only in Catalonia, but also in other Places.

in which the Spaniards were worsted.

Indeed, it was not easy to say more of this Victory than the immediate Fruits of it made good. For the Marshal, having allow'd one Day of Refreshment to his Army, on the 29th caus'd a large Body of Horse to invest Palamos; on the 30th he follow'd with the Infantry; and the same Day began to make the necessary Dispositions for opening the Siege in form On the 31st the two Squadrons of Brest and Toulon came before the Place: They had join'd in the Bay of Roses on the very Day the Battle was fought; and the Former, in its Passage from the Streights, had fallen in with four Spanish Men of War, which were returning from Barcelona, and had forc'd them on Shore; where two were burnt by their own Officers, and the other two by the French.

Four Spanish Men of War burnt by the French.

Thus Palamos was invested both by Sea and Land; and the Army having been supply'd with battering Cannon, Mortars, &c. from on board the Fleet, the Trenches were open'd on the 2d of June: And tho', on the 3d, the Besieg'd made a vigorous and successful Sally, by the 6th, a sufficient Breach was made; and it was resolv'd to storm the Place the next Morning; which was done accordingly, with so much Rage and Fury, that they put all they met to the Sword, without Distinction of Age and Sex, pillag'd the Houses, and committed all manner of Outrages; not, indeed, by the Direction, Palamos taken by Storm.

A. D. 1694. rection, or with the Approbation of their General; for it was by his Interposition that a Stop was, at last, put to their Excesses; and all his Authority was but barely sufficient to obtain it: And such a Savage Spirit of Resentment did the News of this Event excite in Saragossa, that the Mob of that City fell upon the French, who resided there, and, by way of Reprizal, massacred a great Number of them, set fire to some of their Houses, and plunder'd all, in Defiance of all that the Magistrates could do to restrain them: Nor was the Tumult compos'd at last, but by the Execution of the Ringleaders.

The Castle of Palamos held out some Days longer; but being equally press'd by Land and Sea, and having no Prospect of Relief, surrender'd at last at discretion.

Having succeeded thus far, and allow'd his Army to repose themselves for a few Days, the Marshal's next Exterprize was to reduce Gironne, upon the River Ter, a City that was pretty well fortified; and which had, besides, the Advantage of lying under the Cover of three Forts, which stood at some Distance from each other, on the rising Grounds adjoining to it.

On the 19th the Army came before it; on the 22d the Spaniards abandon'd one of their Forts; on the 27th another; and on the 29th, seeing all the Preparations made for a Storm, and dreading the like Fate which had befel Palamos, surrendered on the following Conditions, That the Garrison should march out with their Arms and Baggage, but without Cannon, and be conducted to Arragon. That the Cavalry should quit their Horses, and march with the Foot; and that they should leave all their Ammunition and Provisions behind them.

Gironne capitulates,

Two Cities having been thus happily carry'd, the Marshal, with the same Vigour, proceeded on to a third, but less considerable one, call'd Ostalric; and having reduc'd it, almost as soon as he came before it, would have push'd on to Castel-Folletto, in order to clear his way to Barcelona, if his Army had been in a Condition to have acted up to the Ardour of their General: But the Fatigues they had already undergone, the excessive Heats they were expos'd to, and the Diseases which began to rage, both among the Men and the Horses, rendering it impossible for them to keep Pace in their Endeavours with his Purposes, he employ'd some time in strengthening Ostalric with some additional Works; and having been invested with the Title of Vice-Roy of Catalonia, by his Most Christian Majesty, and receiv'd in that Capacity at Gironne, about the Beginning of August, he distributed his Army into Quarters of Refreshment, along the River Terdore, and took Post himself at Blanes, a little pleasant Town by the Sea Side, from whence he had a distant Prospect of Barcelona.

and Ostalric.

A good Part of this time, however, both the Court and the Kingdom of Spain were under inexpressible Uneasiness: Their Army, such as it was, was considerably diminish'd; the Enemy had laid a great Part of Catalonia under Contribution; and their Fleet was, as yet, absolute Lords of the Mediterranean: In this Exigence all the Consolation they could derive, was from the Advices they had receiv'd, that Admiral Russel, at the Head of the united Fleet, was actually making the best of his way to their Deliverance; and even this was miserably damp'd by every Reflection which arose of the cross Accidents that Expeditions by Sea were liable to: At length, however, the joyful News arriv'd at Madrid, that on the 8th of July, N. S. a Frigate had brought Orders to Admiral Nevil, at Cadiz, to join the said Fleet off of Cape Spartel, with all the English Men of War then lying in that Harbour; and that the next Morning the said Admiral had set Sail accordingly; as had also the two Dutch Vice-Admirals, Callenberg and Evertzon, with the Ships under their Command, together with the Spanish Armada, consisting of ten Men of War: And it is said, that so highly was his Catholic Majesty transported upon this Occasion, that he sent a Jewel to Russel valued at 80,000 Crowns, and another of 12,000 to the Commander in Chief of the Dutch.

A.D. 1694. The whole Kingdom alarm'd.

The united Fleet arrives off of Cadiz. London-Gazette, No. 2994.

State of Europe, Vol. V. P. 307.

Between the 10th and 11th, the English and Dutch Ships from Cadiz join'd the main Fleet, which then consisted of sixty-three Ships of the Line; after which a Council of War having been held, it was resolv'd to proceed to Barcelona, in quest of the Enemy: And an Express was dispatch'd to Mr. (d) Stanhope, the English Envoy at Madrid, with an Account of this Resolution, and the Hopes which the Admiral had entertain'd of arriving there time enough to cover the Coast from any farther Insult. Burchet.

Meeting, however, with a strong Levant Wind, it was the 15th before they could pass the Streights, and the 23d before they reach'd Carthagene, where they learn'd, that M. de Tourville, instead of coming before Barcelona with his Fleet, on receiving Intelligence that they had pass'd the Streights, and were making for that Port, had retir'd, in all haste, to the Isles of the Hieres, off of Toulon, by express Order from the King his Master: Upon which it was soon after resolv'd, at a Council of War, to put into Altea-Bay, for a Supply of Water: And from hence it may be suppos'd it was, that he dated the Dispatch, or rather Remonstrance, which follows, as it is given in Abstract by Mr. Burchet, who serv'd in this Expedition as Secretary to Mr. Russel, and which, it is remarkable, was address'd to M. Schonenbergh, the Dutch Minister at Madrid, and not to Mr. Stanhope.

and past the Streights.

The Subject of it was, a State of his Catholic Majesty's Ports and naval Affairs: With regard (d) A Branch of the Chesterfield Family; and, as I learn from a valuable M. S. which I have been lately favour'd with, (and which contains a Sketch of the Lives and Characters of 198 Persons, eminent in the State, during the Reigns of K. William and Q. Anne,) a Gentleman every way qualified to serve in that Capacity, except that he had the Misfortune to be an Englishman; for which Reason Minheer Schonenbergh, the Dutch Minister there, was more confided in than he.

regard to the Latter, he represented, That out of the ten Spanish Ships which had join'd him, but four were of sufficient Strength to be admitted into the Line of Battle: That the rest were of small Force, and all so rotten, that they would hardly bear the firing of their own Guns: That as to the Former, they were so utterly unprovided, both as to Men and all other warlike Preparations, that in case any of the Enemy's Ships were only to cannonade either Malaga or Alicant, it was reasonable to fear they would be instantly abandon'd. That he had also his Doubts, whether the Residue of Catalonia would be able to resist the Enemy, after the Fleet had quitted those Coasts; the French Army consisting of 25,000 well disciplin'd Men, completely supply'd with all Necessaries, and the Spaniards but of 9000, who were also destitute of Tents, and all other requisites for a Camp: That in case they were once Masters of Barcelona, it was to be apprehended they would fall upon Minorca, which, in its present Circumstances, could not hold out two Days against 2000 Men: That, therefore, it was incumbent on the Vice-Roy to make some brisk Effort, while the Fleet was at hand to co-operate with him: And, finally, that he should be oblig'd to return very speedily, the Dutch not having Provisions enough to last longer than the next Month.

He receives a Proposal from Lord Galway for the Fleet to winter in the Mediterranean, which he declines.

This was dated the 25th of July, O. S. or August 4, N. S. And Burchet adds, that, at the same time, the Admiral receiv'd a Dispatch from Lord Galway, who commanded the King's Forces in Piedmont, containing a Proposal for the Fleet's wintering in the Mediterranean; but whether in his own Name only, or the Duke of Savoy's, or of the Allies in general, or to answer what Ends, the Secretary has not thought fit to explane: On the contrary, as if he was still under the Admiral's Command, and was to consider only what was for his Service, he adds nothing more on this Head but an Abstract of his Answer, which was to this Effect, That he, the Admiral, could by no means think it advisable to comply with it, for these Reasons, Because there was no Port in that Sea fit to receive and protect them but Mahon, which was unfit, because wholly destitute of Provisions: Because Naples was without Defence, (and yet we remember, that even the Spanish Fleet found means of defending itself there) and Messina was not large enough to receive them: But more especially, because the French might have render'd themselves too strong, by the Spring, for all the Force that could, in these Seas, have been brought against them.

State of the War in Piedmont.

And now, in order to trace the Connection between the Service in Spain, and that of Piedmont, as well as the very imperfect Intelligence before us will give Leave, it may be expedient to make a Transition to the State of the War on that Side.

Whether it is true or not, that the bloody Battle of Landen was fought, purposely to convince the several Powers of the Confederacy, that they ought to bring a greater Force into the Field against France, and to act with more Vigour and Unanimity, if they hop'd to act with more Success; we have seen, that the Maritime Powers did accordingly exert themselves in an extraordinary Manner, both by Sea and Land, in hope the Experiment would answer: And it might have been expected, from the Outside of Things, That his Royal Highness of Savoy, would have thought himself oblig'd to have acted with the same Spirit; or if not, that the Courts of Vienna, Madrid, and London, with whom he was colleagu'd, would have been so forward with their own Preparations for an early Campaign, as should have left him without the least Pretence of an Excuse, to cover his own Tardiness or Perfidy. It was known, at the two Former of those Courts, that the more M. Catinat was press'd on that Side, the less was to be apprehended on the Rhine from M. de Lorges, and in Catalonia from M. de Noailles; and at the Latter, that if any one Province of the War was neglected, it would affect the Operation of the whole. It was, no doubt, on this Principle, that Lord Galway had set out for Turin so early as the 6th of December; and tho' he did not arrive there till the 22d of March, O. S. we must suppose, that the Length of time employ'd in his Journey, was owing to the Commissions he had to execute by the way: For it was in this Interval, that a Convention was executed with the Court of Berlin for three Regiments of Brandenburghs, of 1000 Men each, to pass into the Service of the Duke of Savoy; and we can scarce suppose, that any Negotiation of such a Nature, could be transacted there, without the Intervention of the King of Great-Britain: And it is further observable, that the Number of this Corps, quadrates exactly with the Number said to be raising by his Electoral Highness of Brandenburgh, in the Account of the Proportions of Forces, furnish'd by the several Powers of the Confederacy, which had, the last Session, been laid before the House of Commons.

A. D. 1694.

In this very Interval, it had been given out in our own Gazettes, not without a good deal of Ostentation, That the Duke of Savoy had rejected all the Offers of France; and that M. Catinat, before he quitted the Neighbourhood of Turin, had set fire to the Venerie, a fine hunting Seat belonging to his Royal Highness; as if such an Act of Outrage had arose from the Despair of an Accommodation: And scarce a Post arriv'd, without some Advice of the Conferences held by the Duke with the Marquis de Leganez, and Count Caprara; and of the Measures taken upon the Issue for recruiting their several Corps, and making such Dispositions of every Sort, as should enable them to enter upon Action with the very first of the Season.

But, as usual, the Expectation rais'd by these Artifices, was miserably defeated; and tho' it was known all Europe over, that the French intended to lye on the Defensive on that Side, and had sent a large Detachment

A. D. 1694. tachment of their beſt Troops, to reinforce M. de Noailles, not only the Spring came on, but the Summer too, before it appear'd that even any Plan of Action had been form'd. General Caprara, who had render'd himſelf ſo odious to the Princes of Italy, by an officious Obedience to the Commands he had receiv'd from the Imperial Court, in relation to Winter Quarters, was recall'd, not on that Account, but to take upon him the chief Command in Hungary, in the Room of the Duke of Croy; and Prince Eugene of Savoy, who was appointed to command the Imperial Troops in his Place, did not arrive at Turin till the 29th of June, N. S. It was the Middle of July before the Troops of the ſeveral Nations were drawn together; and after it had been oſtentatiouſly given out, that they would again break into Provence, and co-operate with the united Fleet, in reducing the Maritime Towns of that Province; all that follow'd, was, certain Marches and counter Marches, for the Sake of conſuming the Forage, certain Skirmiſhes between the Vaudois and the French, and the forming the Blockade of Caſal: So that, upon the whole Matter, however eaſy it may be to account for Burchet's mention of Lord Galway's Requeſt to Admiral Ruſſel, That the Fleet might winter in the Mediterranean, it is ſcarce poſſible to account for his Lordſhip's making that Requeſt; not only becauſe of the Inactivity of the Army in which he commanded, during the whole Interval, when the Countenance of that Fleet might really have facilitated their Deſigns, but becauſe of the Reception given to a Propoſal of the Admiral's, which we ſhall diſcourſe of in its Place.

It was, indeed, by this time, growing into a Cuſtom, for every Power in the Confederacy to transfer their Wants to England; and our Writers, inſtead of diſcovering any Reſentment on the Occaſion, ſeem to glory in the Efforts we made to ſupply them all.

Extravagant Demands of the Spaniards to Admiral Ruſſel.

Thus we find, that the Spaniards, far from being ſatisfy'd with the Succours which they had receiv'd, by the Arrival of the Fleet in the Mediterranean, proceeded to demand, That either the Admiral ſhould furniſh them with 8 or 10,000 Soldiers from on board the Ships, to enable them to force the Enemy to a Battle; or that he ſhould go in queſt of the French Fleet, and endeavour to deſtroy them in their Ports: And when it was made appear, That both theſe Demands were extravagant alike; that the Fortifications of Toulon were not to be forc'd; that there were no Soldiers on board the Fleet; and that all the Admiral could do, was to aſſiſt in recovering any of the Places on the Sea-Coaſt, out of the Hands of the French; the Anſwer was, That unleſs the Army could be reinforc'd from the Fleet, no ſuch Attempt could be made. This Anſwer was alſo accompany'd with a new Propoſal, That the Fleet would endeavour to make a Deſcent on the Coaſt of France; and that, in ſuch Caſe, a ſufficient Body of Infantry ſhould be ſupply'd from the Army. But neither did this appear more reaſonable to the Admiral than the two Former. He ſaid, A. D. 1694. The Fleet was provided for an Engagement at Sea, but not for an Invaſion on Shore. And yet, what was pretty near the ſame thing, he undertook to convoy a Body of Soldiers in the Fleet and Gallies to Palamos; and to aſſiſt in carrying the Place by Surprize, or Storm, or both, as Opportunity ſhould offer. But this the Vice-Roy of Catalonia, with whom this Parly was held, declin'd; becauſe the Forces of the King, his Maſter, were ſo much inferior to the Enemy, and becauſe there was ſo little Proſpect of their being augmented: And all that he requir'd was to know, How long the Fleet could conveniently ſtay on the Coaſt? To which the Admiral reply'd, That on his, the Vice-Roy's, firſt Repreſentation of the State of Catalonia, Care had been taken to furniſh the Ships of the States-General with fourteen Days Proviſions from the Engliſh, for the Sake of ſtaying on the Coaſt as long as poſſible: But that a general Want beginning to appear, and many Inconveniencies being to be apprehended, in caſe the Winds ſhould ſet in Weſterly, it would be abſolutely neceſſary to retire towards the Streights. He alſo diſpatch'd a Letter, about the ſame time, to his Catholic Majeſty, ſetting forth his Concern, That he could be of no farther Service, than merely to protect the Coaſt, as long as he remain'd upon it; as alſo, the Neceſſity he was under of leaving it forthwith; and remonſtrating, that unleſs Care was immediately taken to put Catalonia into a better Poſture of Defence, it would be almoſt impoſſible to preſerve it many Weeks under his Subjection; and that the Kingdom of Valencia, as well as the Sea-Port Towns, were in no better Condition.

The Admiral's Remonſtrance to the King of Spain concerning the Danger of Catalonia.

The Vice-Roy had alſo the like Apprehenſions; or, at leaſt, that when the French ſhould be appriz'd of the Departure of the Fleet, they would renew their Deſign upon Barcelona: In order, therefore, to conceal the Truth as long as poſſible, and thereby to retard their Meaſures, till it ſhould be too late to put them in Execution, when the Fleet ſet ſail from that Port, it was reſolv'd to ſhape their Courſe to the Eaſtward, as if they were bound on ſome Expedition in thoſe Seas; and, in the Night, to tack about and ſtand for the Streights, which was done accordingly.

The Day they ſail'd was the 16th of Auguſt; and tho', as Appearances then lay, it could only be ſaid, that they had reſcriev'd, not ſav'd the Spaniſh Coaſt; the Admiral took care to ſignify, by Letter, to the Dey of Algiers, That notwithſtanding the Suggeſtions of France, that the King his Maſter could not ſpare a ſufficient Number of Ships ſo far from home, he had ſent ſuch a Force into thoſe Seas, as M. de Tourville had not thought fit to face; but on the contrary, had retir'd from, and taken Refuge in Toulon.

He ſets Sail from Barcelona on his Return.

The French, however, had no ſooner receiv'd Advice of his Departure from Barcelona, than they ſent out ſeveral light Fri-

A. D. 1694. gates for Intelligence of his Courſe; and, in the mean while, made ready their Fleet to proſecute the Enterprize, which his Arrival had interrupted before, as ſoon as it ſhould be known that he had repaſs'd the Streights.

Receives contrary Orders. But if this was really their Purpoſe, they met with a new Diſappointment: For when the Admiral had reach'd Malaga, he receiv'd Orders (contrary to his Expectation, as we are told) from his Majeſty, under his Royal Signet and Sign Manual, dated Auguſt the 9th, to continue in thoſe Seas, and to winter at Cadiz, for the more effectual preventing the Deſigns of the French upon Catalonia; upon which it was reſolv'd to repair, forthwith, to Alicant again: And whereas it muſt neceſſarily recur to every Man's Reflection, that theſe Orders, unleſs accompany'd with a Supply of Proviſions, would not remove the Neceſſity which had before oblig'd the Admiral to leave Barcelona expos'd to the Attempts of the Enemy; we find it farther ſuggeſted, That ſuch a Supply was actually arriv'd at Cadiz for the Engliſh, and at Alicant for the Dutch: And that the Admiral had already taken proper Meaſures for procuring a ſufficient Quantity on his own Credit, to ſerve the Fleet till their Return to Cadiz; which was not to be till ſome time in October, unleſs he ſhould receive certain Information, That the French had diſarm'd their Ships.

Barchet.

Returns to Alicant.

From Alicant he ſent Diſpatches to the Vice-Roy of Catalonia, with Advice of the new Inſtructions he had receiv'd; others to Mr. Stanhope, at Madrid, to procure the neceſſary Orders for clearing the Puntals for the Reception of the Fleet at their Return; and others to England, for a farther Supply of Proviſions, and of Men: He alſo order'd Rear-Admiral Nevil, with ten Ships, to cruiſe between the Iſle of Formentera and the Coaſt of Barbary: And being ſoon after oblig'd to go on Shore, on account of his being ſeiz'd with a Fever and Bloody-Flux, he gave the Command of the Fleet to Vice-Admiral Aylmer, with Orders to join Nevil, and to take ſuch Meaſures to annoy the Enemy, as ſhould be reſolv'd on at a Council of War; under this Reſtriction, That if he did not fall in with the Enemy in ſix Days, or receive authentic Intelligence, that they had quitted Toulon, he was to return to Alicant: Neither of which happening, he did return accordingly on the 10th of September.

Falls ill, and transfers the Command to Admiral Aylmer.

Still the Admiral continuing indiſpos'd, and it being part of his Majeſty's Inſtructions, That he ſhould take the moſt effectual Meaſures in his Power to prevent the Enemy from paſſing the Streights, he directed a Council of War to take this Matter into Conſideration: And that no Intelligence of their Motions might be wanting, he directed the Engliſh Conſul at Majorca, to keep a Veſſel continually plying between that Iſland and Toulon: He alſo ſtation'd one Frigate at Oran, and another at Tetuan, that they might not give him the Slip, by keeping cloſe within the Barbary Shore: But then we are farther told, tho' in a very perplex'd Manner, by Burchet, That, in caſe they had endeavour'd to paſs the Streights, they might have ſucceeded in it, notwithſtanding all the Precautions the Admiral could take: He ſays, the French Ships were ſound and clean, ours foul, and in no Condition to bear the rough Weather they were ſure to meet: They were in no want of Proviſions; we were furniſh'd only from Hand to Mouth: And, laſtly, it may be preſum'd, they had their full Compliment of Hands; whereas the Engliſh and Dutch had loſt very near 3000. A. D. 1694.

It is true, our Author grounds what he ſays, concerning the Enemy's paſſing the Streights, on a Suppoſition of our Fleets being, at the ſame time, at Cadiz: But then, if this Diſparity of Circumſtance could not operate in favour of the Enemy, unleſs our Fleet was ſtation'd at Cadiz, it will appear ſomewhat ſtrange, that the Admiral ſhould make it his Choice to winter there. And it is not only certain that he did ſo, but that he did ſo againſt the Inſtances of the Spaniſh Court, who preſs'd him to winter at Mahon: Indeed, in his Anſwer to thoſe Inſtances, he alledges, That the Iſland of Minorca was deſtitute of all Neceſſaries for a Fleet; and that the French would have ſo much the more Sea-Room to make prize of ſuch as ſhould be ſent from England. But ſurely, the more Care was taken to embay the far greater Part of the French Naval Force in the Mediterranean, the more eaſy it would have been to protect our Navigation againſt the reſt: And, upon the whole, perhaps, we ought to conclude, that the Admiral, notwithſtanding the Inſinuation of his Secretary, was convinc'd, That he could guard the Iſſue of the Streights, as well on this Side as the other.

The Fleet returns to Cadiz.

However this may be, it is certain that he arriv'd at Cadiz on the 8th of October; that after a Fortnight had been employ'd in taking in Proviſions, it muſt be ſuppos'd, a Council of War was held, in order to conſider how the Fleet might beſt be poſted to anſwer that End: That upon the Iſſue, it was agreed to repair off of Cape Spartel, as ſoon as the Wind ſhould come up Eaſterly; that in the mean time ſeveral Ships were ſent out ſeveral ways for Intelligence; and that, upon the whole, the Weather growing very turbulent, the Catalonians being rid of their Apprehenſions, and no Advices having been receiv'd of the French Fleet, it was reſolv'd, on the 8th of November, to proceed to the cleaning, repairing, and refitting the Ships, with all poſſible Diligence; but, withal, in ſo gradual a manner, that there ſhould be always a ſufficient Force in ſailing order, both to prevent a Surprize, and to follow the Enemy, in caſe the Cruizers ſhould bring any News of their being within Reach.

But tho' the Marſhal de Noailles, by reaſon of the Sickneſs which had affail'd his Army, and for want of the Aſſiſtance of the Fleet, could not proſecute the Orders he had receiv'd, in relation to Barcelona, he did not continue all this while in a State of Caſtel Folletto reduc'd by M. de Noailles.

A.D. 1694. Inactivity; on the contrary, when the Heats were abated, and his Forces in part recovered, he ſat down before Caſtel Folletto, which was ſituated on a Mountain, ſuppos'd to be inacceſſible, except on one Side; and took his Meaſures ſo well, that in three Days he carry'd the Place.

Nor were the Spaniards themſelves wholly idle: For while the Marſhal was taken up with this Enterprize, they made an Effort to recover Oſtalric, and ſo far ſucceeded in it, that the Garriſon capitulated, and Hoſtages were exchang'd: But the Beſiegers inſiſting, That the Miquelets, who had aſſiſted in defending the Place, ſhould be made Priſoners of War; and the Governor refuſing to agree to it, M. de Noailles had time to come up with his Forces, and to raiſe the Siege, which put an End to the Campaign on both Sides.

He obliges the Spaniards to raiſe the Siege of Oſtalric.

It is now proper to attend the Courſe of the War in Germany, or rather to clear our way, by touching on thoſe preparatory Meaſures, which we are to ſuppoſe were the Reſult of the Concert, form'd by King William and the Prince of Baden, during the Winter in London.

Courſe of the War in Germany.

And, firſt, it is neceſſary to obſerve, that his Highneſs did not repair to Vienna, on his Return, as was expected, but to Frankfort, Guntſburgh, Studgart, and, in general, to every other Place where his Preſence was neceſſary, either to forward the Reſolutions of the Circles, to quicken the Preparations of the Imperial Commiſſaries, or to have ſuch a Body of Forces ready to take the Field, as might be able to prevent the uſual Depredations of the Enemy, at the Opening of every Campaign: For the ſame End, he alſo caus'd the Caſtle of Heydelburgh to be once more put in a Condition of holding out againſt any ſudden Attack, and to be furniſh'd with a ſufficient Garriſon; and wherever there was any conſiderable Paſs, he poſted a ſuitable Corps, to ſecure it againſt the Enterprizes of the Enemy.

The Place he had appointed for the Rendezvous of the Allies, was in the Neighbourhood of Hailbron; and ſo far had his Efforts ſucceeded, that by the Beginning of May, upwards of 20,000 Men, conſiſting of Imperialiſts, Swabians, and Franconians, enter'd into the Camp, which he had prepar'd for their Reception.

But we are not to ſuppoſe, that the Plan tranſmitted from Vienna to London, and the Concert form'd upon it, regarded preventive Meaſures only: On the contrary, we find an Intimation, that it was propos'd to open the Campaign offenſively, with an Army of 60,000 Men; and it may be reaſonably ſuppos'd, that no Endeavours were wanting, at the ſeveral Courts of Germany, to make that Propoſal good: With that of Saxony, in particular, a Negotiation of great Weight had been long depending: For tho' in the Liſt of the Confederate Troops, laid before the Houſe of Commons, the Quota of his Electoral Highneſs was ſet down at 12000, with a Supplement of 2000 more, ſaid to be raiſing, the Seaſon was far advanc'd before it was poſitively knowns that A.D. 1695. thoſe Troops could be depended upon: The Elector inſiſted on the Enlargement of General Schoening, and alſo on a Subſidy for himſelf: To move the Court of Vienna on the firſt of thoſe Points, was no very eaſy matter; and it was ſcarce in their Power to comply with the Second: The Treaty met alſo with ſome little Interruption, by the Death of that Prince, of the Small-Pox, in the Flower of his Age; but was, at length, perfected by his Brother and Succeſſor: His Imperial Majeſty conſenting to the Releaſe of Schoening, on condition that he ſhould not be employ'd in any civil Employment during one Year, nor in any military Employment during his Life, unleſs with the Emperor's Leave: And the Subſidy being fix'd at 400,000 Florins a Year, on condition that his Electoral Highneſs furniſh'd 12000 Men yearly, for the Service on the Upper Rhine, of which one Moiety were to winter on the Frontier, in ſuch Quarters as ſhould be aſſign'd them.

In the Beginning of June this Negotiation was finiſh'd; and no ſooner had the Marſhal de Lorges, who had aſſembled his Forces at Neuſtadt, receiv'd Intelligence of it, than he broke up his Camp, and on the 10th and 11th paſs'd the Rhine at Philipſburgh, with a Deſign to force the Allies to a Battle, before the Saxons could join them, or, by a precipitate Retreat, to leave Hailbron, Heydelburgh, and the whole Frontier, once more at his Mercy. The French paſs the Rhine at Philipſburgh.

On the other Hand, the Prince of Baden, having been inform'd of this Motion, repair'd immediately to the Camp; and having call'd in all his Parties, and diſpatch'd ſeveral Expreſſes to the Saxons, Heſſians, &c. to quicken their March, that he might be in a Condition to give the Enemy a proper Reception, and thereby prevent the Miſchiefs which might otherwiſe befall the Empire, advanc'd the ſame Day, viz. the 11th, N. S. to Eppingen, where he propos'd to remain, in caſe the Enemy would give him Leave, till the Reinforcements he expected came up: But that they would ſpare him ſo long, was what he had little Reaſon to expect: The Heſſians were ſtill diſpers'd in their Quarters between Mentz and Frankfort: The Troops of Munſter and Paderborne were ſeveral Days March behind them; half the Saxons had not, as yet, taken the Field; and thoſe which had, tho' furniſh'd with the neceſſary Orders, could not reach him in ſeveral Days.

In this diſagreeable Situation the Prince receiv'd Intelligence, on the 15th, that the Enemy were in motion towards him, which was confirm'd by other Advices the next Day; and having call'd a Council of War, reſolv'd, upon the Iſſue, to decamp, and advance to meet them in order of Battle: Accordingly, on the 17th, this Meaſure was put in Execution: The Tents were ſtruck, the Army was diſpos'd in three Columns, and M. de Lorges, who conſider'd this Motion as the Effect of a deſperate Temerity, took all the Meaſures which ſeem'd to argue, that he thought an Action unavoidable: But The Prince of Baden by a Feint ſecures a ſtrong Paſs.

A. D. 1694. no ſooner had the Confederates taken Poſſeſſion of a ſtrong Paſs near Sintzheim, than they began to entrench themſelves on that Side, which lay moſt open to the Enemy; whence it became apparent, That the menacing Advance they had made, was but a Feint, to enable them to withſtand the Efforts of a ſuperior Enemy.

According to the general Plan of the French Court, for the Operations of the Year, the Marſhal was not to expoſe his Army: Inſtead, therefore, of endeavouring to force this Poſt, he firſt halted at Langenbruck, and then proceeded on to Viſeloch; from whence he ſent out ſeveral Detachments to take in Ladenburgh, and ſeveral little Forts on the Necker; as alſo to lay waſte the adjacent Country: And this he did in hopes to draw the Prince of Baden from the advantageous Ground he poſſeſs'd: But in this alſo he was diſappointed: For his Highneſs contented himſelf with ſending out his Irregulars to harraſs thoſe Detachments, and kept his Poſt till the 24th, when the firſt Column of the Saxons, conſiſting of about 6000, being within a few Hours March of his Camp, at Break of Day he broke up to meet them, and proceeded on towards Viſeloch, with a Deſign to fall upon the Enemy, before they could make a proper Diſpoſition to receive him: It ſo happen'd, however, that by reaſon of the many Defiles his Army had to paſs, he could not reach that Place till Evening; by which time the Marſhal, being appriz'd of his Approach, and fearing that his Purpoſe was, to cut off his Communication with the Rhine, gave Order for decamping at Midnight; which was done accordingly, with ſo much Haſte and Precipitation, that they ſcarce gave themſelves time to recall their Parties.

and being join'd by a Part of the Saxons, endeavours to ſurprize the Enemy.

who retire at Midnight.

The next Day his Highneſs ſent out ſeveral Parties for Intelligence, and ſeveral ſharp Skirmiſhes enſued: But tho' he was inform'd that the Marſhal had taken Poſt at Ruth, and had ſent his heavy Baggage towards Philipſburgh, he did not continue his March from Viſeloch to Gonſbergh, near Manheim, till the 29th; and that very Day the French repaſs'd the Rhine, and encamp'd between Worms and Spires.

Thus the Aſpect of the Campaign was wholly chang'd: The Communication was now entirely open between the Prince and the Troops of Heſſe, Munſter, Brandenburgh, and Newburgh, who were encamp'd near Gernſheim: Orders were given for throwing a Bridge over the Rhine, near Manheim: A Project was entertain'd of refortifying that City, and nothing was talk'd of among the Confederates but paſſing the River, and either forcing the Enemy to a Battle, or undertaking a Siege: But all this while, ſuch was the Diſunion of Councils among the Confederates, that either no Reſolution was taken, or if taken carry'd into Effect: Thus after the new Works had been actually proſecuted for ſome time at Manheim, they were given over; and no Attempt, or even Motion, was made worth remembring, till towards the Middle of September: It is true, A. D. 1694. the Reſidue of the Saxons did not come up till the 18th of Auguſt, and the Day before Prince Lewis remov'd from the Ground, which he had ſo long occupy'd, between Heydelburgh and Philipſburgh, in order to facilitate that Junction: But then he halted again at Kretzengen, near Dourlach, and continued there above a Fortnight longer; and when the Army was again put in Motion, it was reaſonable to doubt, whether it was with the Concurrence of the Saxons: For on the 12th of September they quitted the Camp, and march'd towards Hailbron, under a Pretence of covering the Magazine they had at that Place, while the reſt of the Forces drew off towards the Rhine, and made the neceſſary Diſpoſitions for paſſing that River. But whether this Motion of the Saxons was the Effect of this Diſcontent, or only a Feint, as ſome gave out, a Bridge of Boats was that Night thrown over part of the Rhine, to a little Iſland in the Midſt of it, where the heavy Baggage was diſpos'd under a Guard of 2000 Grenadiers; the next Morning the Margrave of Dourlach, with one Column of the Army, paſs'd over, in the Neighbourhood of Hagenbach; and another Bridge having been completed by the 15th, the Prince follow'd with the reſt. This great Enterprize having ſucceeded thus fortunately, his Highneſs immediately gave Notice of it to the Saxons, and the Landgrave of Heſſe, the Former of whom he requir'd to rejoin him, and the Latter to paſs the Rhine forthwith at Mentz, in order to make one great Effort with all their Forces: That ſome inſtant Advantages might alſo be deriv'd from the Surprize of the French, he advanc'd the next Day to Hagenbach, and having taken in ſeveral Poſts, which they had abandon'd, ſent out his Parties on all Sides, to lay the Country under Contribution, which was performed without Mercy.

The Imperialiſts paſs the Rhine, and levy Contributions.

This, however, was all that was done between the 15th and the 22d, when, and not before, the Saxons came up and paſs'd the River; but ſtill with a due Regard to their own Preſervation; for tho' the Horſe did actually join the Army, the Foot did not leave the River Side: The Enemy, indeed, were by this time in full March towards them: For Marſhal de Lorges had come to a Reſolution to give them Battle at all Hazards, in order to reſcue Lower Alſace out of their Hands; and was, moreover, ſo confident of Succeſs, that he had directed the Governors of Fort Lewis and Straſburgh to endeavour to break their Bridges, by driving great Rafts of Timber down the Stream upon them, and alſo by large Boats fill'd with Combuſtibles, after the manner of Fire-Ships, in order to prevent their Retreat: On the ſame Day that the Saxons came up, the Van of the French fell in with that of the Imperialiſts: About Noon Advice was receiv'd, That the whole Body of their Cavalry was advancing on the Spur; and towards the Evening, That their Foot was following with all the Expedition they could make. As theſe ſeveral Circumſtances ſufficiently ciently shew'd the Marshal's Purpose, Prince Lewis call'd a Council of War, at which it was resolv'd to avoid an Action, if possible, and to repass the Rhine immediately, which the heavy Rains that had fallen, and the sudden Swell of the River, furnish'd them a plausible Pretence to excuse: Accordingly about Midnight this Measure was follow'd with the utmost Caution and Circumspection; all the Approaches to their Camp, which lay thro' the Wood of Hagenbach, having been first render'd in a manner impassable, by the Fall of great Trees across each other; and certain Battalions of Grenadiers having been posted in proper Places, as well to defend those Approaches as to bring up the Rear: And it was owing, in some degree, to their Bravery, that this Project of passing the Rhine so late in the Year, had not been fatal to the Undertakers: For it is confess'd in our own Gazettes, that some Squadrons of the Enemy's Dragoons did actually attempt to force these Passes; but finding themselves vigorously attack'd in Flank, and the Marshal, with the Residue of the Horse, being too far behind to sustain them, were glad to desist, and leave the Defendants at leisure to re-join the Army, which, by this time, had recover'd the Island in the Midst of the Rhine, where the Baggage had been left: And when the last Corps had done the same, they did not forget to break down the Bridges behind them, that the Enemy might not have the same Convenience to follow them.

A. D. 1691. But on the Approach of the Enemy repass it again.

The next Day, viz. the 24th, they also pass'd the other Branch of the Rhine, and took Post at Dachland, to sum up the Profit and Loss of the Adventure; which has nevertheless been so variously represented, that no true Judgment can be form'd concerning it. On the Imperial Side it was said, That they had destroy'd vast Quantities of Forage: That they had brought off 14000 Head of Cattle: That the Contributions they actually levy'd, amounted to 1,000,000 of Florins, and that they had taken Hostages for 3,000,000 more. On the other Hand, the French gave out, That the Prince lost above 2000 Men in the several Rencounters which his Parties had with theirs: That he left above 6000 Irregulars behind him, which he had not time to recal, and which were soon after taken Prisoners in the Mountains: And that, supposing the Prize he made, and the Waste he committed to answer his own Representations, it did not answer a Tenth Part of the Risque which he had incurr'd. For, not to insist on what he had to apprehend from the Marshal, he had scarce taken up his Boats, before the River rose so high with the Freshes which came down, that all the Island, and a great Part of the Camp, which he had occupy'd near Hagenbach, was cover'd.

Then, as to the Landgrave of Hesse, and the Troops under his Command, he did not pass the Rhine till the 24th; and after a March or two, having receiv'd Advice of what had happen'd, he measur'd back the same Ground, and repass'd the Rhine at Metz, on the 2d of September: Soon after which both Armies went into their Winter-Quarters.

A. D. 1691. Both Armies pass into Winter Quarters.

It is now to be observ'd, That tho' the Endeavours of the English and Dutch Ministers to effectuate an Accommodation between the German and Ottoman Empires, were still (e) defeated by M. Chateaumeuf, the Minister of France, and his Partizans, the military Preparations of the Port did not answer the Impatience of their Most Christian Allies. Both the Divan and the Seraglio were still divided into Factions, the Mufti being at the Head of those who were for continuing the War, and the favourite Sultaness of those who were for a Peace: In March the Grand Vizier was depos'd; and the new one, for some time, appear'd irresolute which Party to embrace; and when he was, at last, prevail'd upon to close with the Former, he found it altogether impossible to take the Field so early as was requir'd of him, with a Force superior to that of the Germans. About the Middle of May, indeed, a Party of Turks made two several Attempts to storm the Fortress of Titul, on the Danube, a Place of great Importance, because the Masters of it were also Masters of the Communication between Transylvania and Lower Hungary; but they were both times repuls'd with considerable Loss: They also undertook to throw in a Supply of Provisions into Giula and Temeswaer, and succeeded in it, tho' not without some Loss: For the Imperialists fell on each of those Parties on their Return, and of the Latter kill'd many hundreds.

A new Grand Vizier.

Opening of the Campaign in Hungary.

It was not, however, till the 16th of August that the Grand Vizier arriv'd at Belgrade, in order to open the Campaign; and part of the Tartars, which were to form his Army, were not come up: But, on the other Hand, the Imperialists, even then, were in no Condition to face him. It was the 30th before Caprara set out from Vienna, and the 5th of September before he reach'd the Army; which, on the News of the Vizier's Approach, had been hastily drawn together in the Neighbourhood of Peter-Waraden; many of the Corps of which it was form'd were defective; many others were still upon their March; and if all had been present, all had been too few to act offensively against the Enemy. This appear'd so plainly to the General, when he took a Review of them on the 6th, that he sent Orders of Revocation to all the Parties, of all Kinds, which had been detach'd from it; as also, an Express to General Veterani, who had the chief Command in Transylvania, requiring him to take such Measures as were necessary to secure the Passes;

A. D. 1691.

(e) Hemskirk, the Dutch Minister, thro' whose Hands the Negotiation had principally pass'd, having been recall'd, and being on his Journey home, was stopt at Belgrade, in May, and detain'd there till the End of the Campaign.

A. D. 1694. Paſſes; and with the main Body of his Forces to advance towards the two Armies: And, laſtly, he thought it convenient not only to maintain his Poſt, but to entrench and fortify it with all the Skill he was maſter of.

The Grand Vizier paſſes the Save, The Vizier, in the mean while, paſs'd the Saave; and if he had us'd a little more Expedition in his March, had probably given a fatal Turn to the Courſe of the War on that Side: But either his Intelligence was ſo bad, or his Conduct ſo weak, that he did not come in ſight of the Imperialiſts till the 9th: And then he made his Approaches more like a Man who fear'd to be defeated himſelf, than one who had any Purpoſe to defeat his Enemy.

The Imperialiſts had the Danube behind or rather in the Midſt of them: For their Foot lay on that Side next the Vizier, and their Horſe, together with certain ſtrong Parties of Radzieus, Huſſars, &c. on the other; and both were connected by the Means of a Bridge of Boats. To deſtroy this Bridge, therefore, was the firſt Object the Vizier had in view; and he made all the Efforts in his Power, both by his Fleet on the River, and his Cannon on Shore, to effect it, tho' in vain: The Imperialiſts had alſo their Fleet as well as the Turks; and not only defended their Bridge like Men who knew the Importance of it, but threw over a Second, for fear any Accident ſhould befal the Former.

attacks the Imperialiſts in their Camp, During the ſame Interval alſo, the Vizier carry'd on his Approaches under the Cover of 500 Pieces of Cannon: But if he made any Progreſs, he made it ſo ſlowly, that the Brandenburgh Auxiliaries, and certain Imperial Regiments of Horſe, amounting in all to about 8000, had time to reach the Camp, and ſhare in the Honour of defending it.

Still, however, the Vizier perſever'd in his Enterprize; and having made himſelf Maſter of the little Iſland of Ozorowitz, near Peter-Waraden, and above the Bridges, by the Means of Boats which had been carry'd upon Waggons by Land, and then put into the Water, the Imperialiſts began to be in pain for the Navigation of the River, which from thence might have been greatly annoy'd by the Enemy, and without the Benefit of which, it was impoſſible for them to ſubſiſt.

But before the Enemy could make any ſignal uſe of this Acquiſition, or the Imperialiſts any Attempt to recover it, ſuch Abundance of Rain fell, ſuch Feuds aroſe between the Vizier and the Cham of the Tartars, on account of the Hardſhips the Latter had been expos'd to, and the Loſſes they had ſuſtain'd, and to ſuch a Condition was the whole Ottoman Army reduc'd, by the Inclemencies of the Seaſon, Sickneſs, Fatigue, &c. that the Vizier came to a Reſolution to diſmount his Batteries, recall his Parties, and decamp, which was perform'd accordingly on the 11ſt of October at Night, to the infinite Joy of the Imperialiſts, who had every Day expected a general Aſſault on their Camp, and who had ſuffer'd ſo much on their Side, that they compounded for a Deliverance, without thinking of a Purſuit.

and is oblig'd to retire.

Both Armies immediately after this, diſtributed themſelves into Quarters of Refreſhment, and the Vizier return'd to Adrianople, infinitely mortify'd at the Diſappointment he had met with. A. D. 1694.

The Struggle of the Campaign was, however, prolong'd to the very End of the Year: On the one Side the Turks made a new Attempt on Titul, but were again repuls'd; and on the other, the Imperialiſts diſpos'd their Parties ſo advantageouſly, to cut off the Intercourſe of the Enemy with Giula, that the Garriſon being reduc'd to the laſt Extremities, were oblig'd to capitulate for the Surrender of the Place; and did ſurrender it accordingly, as ſoon as the Emperor had ratify'd the Conditions.

Poland was ſtill a Party in the War; and her Province was to hold the Tartars in cheque, or, at leaſt, to create ſuch a Diverſion on that Side, that they might not be able to aſſiſt the Ottomans with their whole Force in Hungary. Thro' the Intrigues of France, in the Court, Senate, and Diet of Poland, and the Miſunderſtandings which had ariſen between his Poliſh Majeſty and the Court of Vienna, this Diverſion had hitherto prov'd a very faint one: And yet faint as it was, no Endeavours were wanting to put an End to it, by the means of a ſeperate Peace: When the Tartar Envoy return'd home for new Inſtructions, towards the Cloſe of the laſt Year, the French Miniſter at Warſaw undertook the Negotiation in his Place, and offer'd the Ukrain, part of Moldavia, and even Caminiec into the Bargain: But whether he offer'd more than he could make good, or whether his Poliſh Majeſty inſiſted on more than was offer'd, the Treaty hung in ſuſpence, and a Diet was call'd to deliberate on the moſt effectual Methods to continue the War.

The Diet of Poland breaks up as ſoon as aſſembled. It now became the Buſineſs of that Miniſter to fruſtrate the Diet; and accordingly his Poliſh Majeſty being diſabled, by Sickneſs, to preſide in it in Perſon, the Deputies of Lithuania were prevail'd upon to make uſe of that Pretext, to declare, That by the Conſtitutions of the Kingdom, they could not enter upon any Buſineſs, unleſs the King was preſent; to enter their Proteſt againſt all that ſhould be done at that Meeting in their Abſence; and to break up the Diet, by withdrawing as ſoon as they had made this Declaration.

The Grandees for a ſeperate Peace. To remedy this Misfortune, an Aſſembly of the Grandees and Senators was held at Zolkiew, in the Preſence of his Poliſh Majeſty; but without the deſir'd Effect: The ſame Spirit which had prevail'd in the Diet, prevail'd alſo on this Occaſion. The Expediency of accepting a ſeperate Peace was not only urg'd, but even the Neceſſity; ſeeing it was plain, that in the preſent Circumſtance of Things, the Crown-Army was ſcarce in a Condition to act even on the Defenſive: And that while the Nobles continued to think ſo unfavourably of the War, it was not to be expected, that a Diet would ever be induc'd to ſupport a Meaſure, they could not be induc'd to approve.

A. D. 1694. The Reſult of theſe Conferences, like that of other public Aſſemblies, was ſoon known all over Europe: But in the Gazettes of the Confederates, it was nevertheleſs aſſerted, That his Poliſh Majeſty continued unalterably firm, to accept of no Peace, except in Conjunction with the Allies: And before he had time to waver, an Envoy extraordinary arriv'd at his Court, from the Elector of Bavaria, with a Commiſſion to ſollicit his Daughter in Marriage; which prov'd ſo agreeable to him, that, notwithſtanding all the Inſtances, and all the Intrigues of the French Miniſter, he embrac'd the Propoſal; and, in conſequence of it, was once more eſteem'd a faſt Friend to that which was call'd the Common-Cauſe.

A Marriage negotiated between the E. of Bavaria and a Princeſs of Poland.

It is alſo certain, that the Marriage Articles were no ſooner adjuſted, than the Crown-Army had orders to repair to their Rendezvous, on the Frontiers of Podolia: A ſtrong Reinforcement was ſent to that Body of Troops which was poſted in the Neighbourhood of Caminiec: Such Applications were made to the Coſſacks, as drew them into an Engagement to make a Diverſion, by invading the Crimea: And ſuch a Diſpoſition appear'd in the Court at laſt, as ſeem'd to argue, that his Poliſh Majeſty was reſolv'd to co-operate with his Allies, as far as the Repugnance of his Grandees would give him Leave.

Caminiec reliev'd by the Tartars.

But while theſe Meaſures were yet in Agitation, a Body of 20,000 Tartar Horſe, moſt of them with a Sack of Corn mounted behind them, and having 700 Waggons under their Convoy, paſs'd thro' Valachia to Caminiec, where they depoſited their Charge for the Relief of the Garriſon: After which they advanc'd to Pomerzany, within twelve Leagues of Lemberg, and meeting with little or no Reſiſtance, laid all waſte behind them.

This Inſult, however, ſerv'd to quicken the Motions of the Poles: The Crown-General drew together about 16000 Horſe and Foot: And the Coſſacks about the ſame time falling into the Crimea, the Enemy thought fit to withdraw.

Another Attempt of the like Nature acceſſion an Affair.

A dead Calm enſued, which laſted till the Beginning of October, when a Body of Turks, of whom 1000 were Janiſaries, and 30,000 Tartars, undertook to throw yet another Convoy into Caminiec, and alſo to change the Garriſon; of which the Crown-General, Jabliauwſki, having receiv'd Advice, he advanc'd, on the 5th, from his Camp at Kudrine, towards the Neiſter, with all his Horſe and Dragoons, the beſt of his Foot, and eighteen Field-Pieces, and was join'd by the Lithuanians, with twelve Field-Pieces more, by the way. On the 6th a Detachment ſwam over the River; and having poſted themſelves on the other Side, maintain'd their Ground, againſt a ſtrong Party of the Enemy, till the reſt of the Army had alſo paſs'd over at the Fords; upon which the ſaid Party retir'd to their main Body, and were follow'd by the Poles; as ſoon as they had form'd themſelves in order of Battle: An obſtinate Engagement enſued; which, according to the Account ſent from Warſaw, laſted eight Hours; according to other Accounts, five, with various Succeſs: At laſt, however, the Turks and Tartars were put to flight; ſeveral thouſands of them were kill'd upon the Spot; Numbers were made Priſoners; 4000 Waggons, laden with Rice, Oil, and other Proviſions, Arms, Ammunition, Cloaths, Money, and all manner of Neceſſaries, were taken; and had not the Night prevented a Purſuit, it is added, the Slaughter would have been much greater. A. D. 1694.

In which the Turks and Tartars are worſted.

This Victory was follow'd by an Inroad of the Coſſacks into the Country of Budziack, and another into that of the Coſſacks, who had ſome Years before revolted from Poland, and put themſelves under the Protection of the Port: In both theſe Expeditions the Invaders met with little or no Reſiſtance; all the ſerviceable Men having been forc'd from their Habitations, either to guard the Convoy to Caminiec, or to attend the Cham into Hungary: And as their Buſineſs was Plunder, at their Return, they carried off all that was valuable and moveable.

The Court of Poland alſo flatter'd themſelves, that the Surrender of Caminiec would have been the Fruits of theſe Succeſſes: But we ſhall find by the Sequel, that the Enemy were ſtill in a better Condition to preſerve that Place, than the Poles to render themſelves Maſters of it; and that in gaining his Poliſh Majeſty, the Allies had gain'd but half the Strength of the Poliſh Republic.—But it is now time to beſtow a Section on the Conduct of the Venetians.

Moroſini, the Doge, who had commanded the Forces of the Republic the preceding Year, had not only employ'd part of the Winter in fortifying the Iſthmus of Corinth, and in taking ſuch other Meaſures as were neceſſary to ſecure the Morea from the Irruptions of the Enemy, but, having receiv'd Advice, that the great Effort of the next Campain, was to be made in Hungary, requir'd the Senate to ſend ſuch Reinforcements, as ſhould enable him to make ſome Acquiſition worthy their Arms: But while the Senate were deliberating on his Requeſt, News arriv'd of his Death; accompany'd with a Letter which he had dictated and ſign'd ſome Hours before, ſignifying the Conſolation he felt in his laſt Moments from the Reflection, That they were ſpent in the Service of the Republic; as alſo recommending Signior Antonio Zeno, Proveditor-General in the Morea, as the fitteſt Perſon to ſucceed him, in his Capacity of Captain-General: And ſo great a Deference did the Senate ſhew to his Opinion, that the ſame Evening they conſtituted Zeno Captain-General accordingly. Signior Silveſtro Valieri, Procurator of St. Mark, was elected Doge in his ſtead; the Count de Steinau, a German, was appointed to command the Land-Forces; and the Courſe of public Affairs not only proceeded in the ſame Channel, but rather with a quicker Motion than before: For the Grand Signior had prohibited the Venetian Merchant-Ships from entering his Ports, under any Flag, or any Pretence whatſoever, Moroſini, Doge of Venice, dies.

Zeno made Captain General in his room.

A.D. 1694. on Pain of being made Prize, and the Mariners Slaves; and had also order'd all such as resided in his Dominions, to quit them in two Months, on the like Penalty.

This had touch'd the Republic to the Quick; and as, if in Resentment of it, the Reinforcements requir'd by the deceas'd Doge, were forwarded with all possible Diligence: On the 28th of April, the first great Convoy, with Recruits, Money, Provisions, &c. set Sail for the Levant. On the 10th of June, General Steinau, with another yet greater, took the same Course: And while the new General Zeno, waited their Arrival at Napoli-di-Romana, Signior Delfino, Proveditor General for the State in Dalmatia, with an Army of 12000 Foot, and 4000 Horse, all regular Troops, and the Militia of the Country, form'd a Design of reducing Cyclut, upon the River Naranta, a Place of considerable Importance, because it open'd a Passage into Albania, Bosnia, and Erzegovinia; and also because of the Salt-Pits in the Neighbourhood of it, which yielded a considerable Revenue annually to the Turks.

Cyclut reduc'd by the Venetians.

On the 15th of June he came before the Place, and in a few Days made himself Master of it, together with the Forts, and other advanc'd Posts in the Neighbourhood.

The whole Process cost him but twenty Men; and yet instead of proceeding, as was expected, to lay the adjacent Countries under Contribution, or to disperse the Parties of the Enemy, which had shewn themselves during the Siege, he apply'd himself only to secure the Acquisition he had made; and having made the Provisions he thought necessary for that Purpose, as also left a sufficient Garrison for its Defence, he return'd with his Army to Spalato.

The Turks endeavour to recover it.

But scarce had his Troops re-enter'd their old Cantonments, before the Bashaws of the three Provinces above-mention'd, collected all their Forces, and undertook to recover the Place: It was the 22d of July when they sat down before it; and if mere undirected Courage had been the only Requisite in Sieges, they had carry'd it: But all they effected by their Courage, was ruin'd by their Inexperience: Not having completed their Investiture, the Besieg'd found means to obtain a Reinforcement of between 5 and 600 Men: Having made good their Approaches to the Counter-Scarp, they were repuls'd for want of Skill to make a Lodgment: Before they had time to recover the Advantage they had lost, they were driven from several of their Works, by a Sally from the Town: And hearing, at the same time, that General Delfino was advancing with his Army to raise the Siege, they decamp'd in Disorder, and repair'd the Naranta, leaving behind them many of their Sick and wounded, and a good Quantity of Provisions.

in vain.

Signior Delfino continued his March notwithstanding; and, upon his Arrival the second time, not only order'd the Works, which had been damag'd during the Siege, to be repair'd and strengthen'd, but sent out a strong Party to make an Incursion into the Enemy's Country, reduc'd the strong Fortress of Cobluck, seated on a Rock, after a Siege of nine Days; and by his Success in all these several Expeditions, encourag'd great Numbers of Greek Families to revolt from the Turks, and to throw themselves under the Protection of the Republic. A.D. 1694.

In this Interval, General Steinau having reach'd Napoli-di-Romana with the second Convoy, and the Pope's Gallies, together with those of Malta, having join'd the Fleet of the Republic, in the Road of that Place, on the 3d of August, the Signal was immediately given for Sailing; and the whole Fleet, having on board 12000 Land-Forces, set Sail accordingly. On what Expedition they were bound, was kept a profound Secret; but the Course they steer'd was for the Archipelago: At the Entrance of that Sea they encounter'd a violent Storm, which damag'd several of the Ships, and dispers'd most of them: But Andros having been assign'd for the Place of Rendezvous, in case of such a Misfortune, all of them had the good Fortune to re-assemble there; and in about three Weeks time, were again put into sailing Order.

On the 5th of September the Captain-General, having summon'd a Council of War, communicated to them the Advice he had receiv'd, that the Turkish Fleet had landed 2000 Men at Tenedos, and was return'd towards the Dardanels, and propos'd to make an Attempt on the Island of Scio: His Proposal was approv'd: On the 7th they set Sail: The same Day they came in Sight of the Island; and the necessary Dispositions having been made for landing the Forces, on the next, they were landed accordingly, under the Cover of all the great Guns of the Fleet, which were so well directed, that they oblig'd the Enemy to retire within their Fortifications. The 9th was employ'd in landing the Artillery, and raising a Battery of four Pieces of Cannon, and four Mortars; and in the four following Days, the Besiegers having reduc'd a Fort which covered the Harbour, as also the Arsenal, and sprung one Mine, which only serv'd to destroy 200 of their own Troops, the Bashaw and his Garrison were so intimidated, that they surrender'd the Island at the first Summons, on condition, That they should be transported to Smyrna; That all the Christians, Jews, Moors, Renegadoes, and Slaves of all sorts should be left in the Island; and that all the Artillery and Magazines should be yielded to the Conquerors

Scio surrender'd to the Venetians.

The Garrison consisted of 4000 Men; they had 230 pieces of Cannon on their Ramparts; the next day after they had evacuated the Place, the Ottoman Fleet came in Sight, consisting of 20 men of war, 6 Sultans, 17 Gallies, and 10 Galliots; and if they had defended themselves, as they ought, the Turkish Admiral might either have brav'd the Venetian Fleet; or the Siege must have been suspended to enable Signior Zeno to chastise the Ottomans: But when the Captain-Bashaw was informed that the Fate of the Island was decided, and

A.D. 1694. and that the Venetians were embarking the greateſt Part of their Forces, in order to give him Battle, he tack'd about, and ſtood for the (f) Dardanels, with all the Sail he could ſpread.

The Importance of this Acquiſition now became one of the favourite Topics at all the Courts of the Confederacy: It was ſaid to be one of the moſt conſiderable Iſlands in the Archipelago: To be fruitful in Corn, Wine, Figs, and other excellent Fruits; To have afforded a very conſiderable Revenue to the Grand Signior: And which was of more Importance than all, To be ſo ſituated, as to enable the Venetians to cut off or at leaſt greatly interrupt the Communication between Conſtantinople and Ægypt, and all the maritime Provinces of the Turkiſh Dominions on that ſide. General Zeno was made a Knight of St. Mark by the Senate, in Honour of this Exploit. Count Steinau was preſented with a Sword ſet with Diamonds to the Value of 3000 Ducats; all the Commanders of the Auxiliaries were complemented and rewarded for their ſeveral Shares in the Service; and laſtly the Imperial Count aſſiſted at a ſolemn Te Deum on the Occaſion, as a Joint Sharer in the Succeſſes of her Allies.

We muſt not, however ſuppoſe, that the Turks were wanting in their Endeavours to make ſuitable Repriſals during the Abſence of General Zeno. On the contrary, he had ſcarce ſet ſail from Napoli-di-Romania, before the Seraſquier of Negropont, having drawn together a Body of 3000 Horſe and 7000 Foot, march'd towards the Iſthmus of Corinth, in order to force that Paſs; and finding the Enterpriſe, for want of Cannon, above his Strength, made an Invaſion into the Morea, as far as Argos; but rather in queſt of Fortune, than with any determin'd Purpoſe: For the Country was already deſerted and laid waſte to his Hands: And when the Venetian Commanders in thoſe Parts having been reinforced with the Garriſons of Zant, Corfu, and Cephalonica, which had fail'd from theſe Iſlands to their Aſſiſtance, advanc'd to meet him, he retired in all Haſte towards Thebes; where he had ſoon after the Mortification to hear, That thoſe Garriſons in their return, had reduced and demoliſh'd the Caſtle of Archangelo, ſituated between Patraſſo and Lepanto, and forced the Enemy to abandon another Caſtle call'd Salone.

The Turks make an Irruption into the Morea.

Laſtly, the Bathaws of the ſeveral Provinces, bordering upon Cyclut, once more collected together a Body of 16000 Horſe and Foot, and 6000 Pioneers, and made a new Attempt to reduce that Place; but with no better Succeſs than before: From the 17th of October to the 6th of November they nevertheleſs purſued their Point; but then, finding they had made no material Progreſs, and that their Troops were ſo weaken'd and diſcourag'd, that they were not in a Condition to withſtand General Delfino, who was coming to the Relief of the Place; they diſmounted their Batteries, and retreated with ſo much Precipitation that they left a good Quantity of Proviſion, and Part of their Baggage behind them: Nor was this the worſt that befel them, for when the Venetians were appriz'd of this Event, they ſent out ſeveral Parties to plunder the Country, which was now left without Protection; and with thoſe and the like petty Adventures ended the Campaign.(g) A.D. 1694. In Valo.

Having thus taken a View of theſe remote and leſs intereſting Provinces of the War, we are now to beſtow a ſuitable Attention on the more important and alarming Scene that ſtill remains to be opened in Flanders; in which the greateſt Armies, and the moſt illuſtrious Leaders were employ'd; and on which the Cataſtrophe of the whole in a great meaſure depended.

The extraordinary Efforts of the Maritime Powers to make an extraordinary Figure in it, we are already acquainted with; and as we have alſo ſeen, that France, exhauſted and enfeebled, as ſhe was ſaid to be, was almoſt every where able to face her Enemies upon equal Terms, we are not to conceive, that ſhe would fail to make a ſufficient Reſerve of Power, to cover her Frontier, where it was moſt like to be endanger'd.

May the 7*th* or 17*th* N. S. his Majeſty ſet ſail from Margate under the Convoy of eight Dutch Men of War, and the next Day, at Noon the Wind failing, when he was ſix Leagues from Land, went into a Man of War's Boat, and caus'd himſelf to be row'd the reſt of the Way: On the 19th he took his Place in the Aſſembly of the States, made them a ſhort Speech, and receiv'd the Compliments in return as uſual: On the 21ſt he retired to Loo: On the 31ſt he removed to Breda, and on June the 3d to Bertherme-Abbey, near Louvain, which was the Place appointed for the Rendezvous of the Army, and where he was met by the Electors of Bavaria and Cologne. Till then the Duke of Holſtein-Ploen had commanded in chief, and only twenty-five Regiments of Foot had taken the Field: But in four Days more their Number was encreaſed to fifty eight, by the Arrival of five from King William arrives in Holland. and aſſembles his Army.

(f) In the State of Europe for October 1694 it is ſaid, the Gallies and Galliots only ſtood for the Dardanels, and that the Captain Bathaw, with the Men of War, &c. ran into Smyrna; with this notable Addition, That General Zeno followed them, and would have burnt them in the Port, as alſo bombarded the Place itſelf if the Engliſh and Dutch Conſuls had not prevailed with him to deſiſt, in compliment to the Warehouſes of the two Nations. But even our own Gazette does not give the leaſt Authority to this improbable Story.

(g) Before we turn our Backs on Italy for this Year, Notice ought to be taken, that in the Beginning of April Mount Veſuvius, having threatned an Irruption, by frequent ſubterraneous Thunders, accompanied with intermixt Diſcharges of Flame and Smoke, at length threw out ſeveral Torrents of liquid Fire, which ran down the Sides of the Mountains with incredible Noiſe and Fury, and continued running for many Days together: And that moſt of the Cities in the Kingdom of Naples, were ſoon after viſited by an Earthquake, which overturn'd numbers of Houſes, Towers and Churches, and bury'd ſome thouſands of People under the Ruins of them

A. D. 1694. from Louvain, and twenty eight, moſtly Engliſh and Scots, from the ſeveral Garriſons of Flanders, under the Command of the Duke of Wirtemberg and Sir Henry Belaſis. Upon the 13th, the Army took Poſt at Hertogendale, about eight Miles from Louvain, and the next Day was reinforced by twelve Battalions from Liege and Maeſtricht, and nine Battalions more of Engliſh and Scots, commanded by Sir David Collier: The Dutch Artillery was already in the Camp; the Engliſh came up on the 16th, under the Command of two Regiments of Foot: The Britiſh Light Horſe and Dragoons enter'd the Camp about the ſame time; but after having been review'd, were canton'd, with the reſt of the Cavalry, in the neighbouring Villages, for the ſake of Forage: And from all theſe Preparatives, which had a Face of Enterprize in the Gazettes, it became the general Belief, that his Majeſty would have employ'd the Superiority he had now at laſt acquir'd, in opening the Campaign with ſome Maſter-Stroke, which ſhould have convinc'd the Univerſe, That in undertaking to reduce the exorbitant Power of France, he had not exceeded his Abilities.

It is certain the French Miniſtry were never ſo apprehenſive of the Event of any Campaign as this: They knew the Preſence of the King their Maſter might be of uſe to animate his Troops; but they were loth he ſhould expoſe himſelf either to the Danger or Diſgrace of ſo doubtful an Experiment: And on the whole Matter it was reſolv'd, that the only proper Medium to be made uſe of, was to depute the Dauphin in his Place.

The Dauphin and M. de Luxemburgh appointed to command againſt him.

To the Dauphin, therefore, this critical Truſt was transferr'd; but under a prudential Reſtriction of being adviſ'd, in all Things, by the Marſhal Duke of Luxemburgh, who had the Honour to command under him, and to whoſe Experience, Capacity, and Reputation, all imaginable Deference was due. Whence it follow'd, happily enough for the Army, That they were not like to be offer'd up by whole Hecatombs at once, for the Sake of gratifying any ſavage Frolic that his Royal Highneſs might think fit to amuſe himſelf with; and as happily for the General, that no body could heſitate in their Obedience to any Command, how difficult or deſperate ſoever, which had ſo high a Sanction: But then it follow'd alſo, on the other Hand, That when Generals were ſo unequally yok'd, the Honour of every great Exploit would be aſcrib'd to the one, and the Blame of every Miſcarriage to the other.

The Place of Rendezvous for the Army, under their immediate Command, was between Mons and Maubeuge; and when we conſider, that the Marſhal arriv'd at the laſt of thoſe Places on the Day King William arriv'd at Breda, that he had conſequently three Days the Start of his Majeſty in aſſembling his Forces, that the Dauphin himſelf join'd the Army on the 3d of June; and that in paſſing the Sambre, and encamping at Fleurus, and thereby occupying the Ground of the Confederates, (which occaſion'd his Majeſty's March from Berthieme to Hortogendale) he maintain'd the War on the Confederate Side of the Country, we ſhall be forc'd to confeſs, that the Honour and Advantage, both of the firſt and ſecond Motion, belong'd to him: For having continu'd three or four Days in this Camp, on the 18th he diſlodg'd again, and took Poſt between St. Tron and Wareheim.

The Confederates, it is true, on the 19th remov'd alſo from Hortogendale to Rooſbeck; but then it was as Obſervers, not as Aſſailants: Or rather as thoſe who were more than half afraid of being aſſail'd themſelves: For on the fourth or fifth Day after this Remove, his Majeſty caus'd ſix Regiments of Foot to march from the Right to the Left Wing, in order to ſtrengthen that Part of his Camp which lay neareſt to the Enemy.

In this Situation, however, the two Armies lay till the 11th of July, in which Interval the Marſhal de Boufflers, who had the Command of a ſeperate Army near Chency, paſs'd the Maeſe, and encamp'd at Wareheim, near Huy; as did alſo Mr. Harcourt, with another ſeperate Corps, on the other Side of the Maeſe. The Brandenburgh Army conſiſting of ſixteen Battalions, ſeven Regiments of Horſe, and four of Dragoons, broke up from the Viſet, where they had been poſted, and were diſtributed part into Liege, part into Maeſtricht; and the Elector of Bavaria, with his Forces, conſiſting of his Troop of Guards, two Regiments of Cuiraſſiers, two of Dragoons, and four Battalions of Foot, making in all about 6000 Men, took Poſt at Neder-Iſche, within a few Hours March of the grand Camp, to be ready to co-operate on the firſt Notice.

Feuquieres, the military Critic, aſſures us, That M. de Luxemburgh, thinking it diſhonourable to the Dauphin to continue merely on the Defenſive, took all his Meaſures ſo as to create a Belief in the King, That he deſign'd to make an Attempt on Liege, in caſe his Majeſty ventur'd to advance towards Flanders: And, farther, that the King being effectually deceiv'd by theſe Meaſures, directed all his counter Motions ſo as to cover Louvain; and that he might be in a Condition to fight the French Army, in caſe they made an Attempt on Liege: He alſo adds, That another Part of the Marſhal's Deſign, was to ſubſiſt his Forces in the Enemy's Country, during the greateſt Part of the Campaign; which he not only effected likewiſe, but thereby gave the Huſband-Men in their own Provinces, Time and Opportunity to complete their Harveſt.

M. de Feuquieres's Account of Luxemburgh's Views. Tome I.

The latter Part of this Evidence has been already acknowledg'd: And even in the Accounts tranſmitted from the Confederate Army at that time, there is no want of Vouchers for the reſt, as will be made appear in the Sequel.

Upon the 11th, before-Day-break, the Dauphin decamp'd from St. Tron, and, having diſpos'd his Army in four Columns, proceeded

The Dauphin removes from St. Tron to Tongres.

D. 1694. ceeded to Oerle, upon the Jaar, or Jecker, where he fix'd his Head Quarters; his Right extending to Tongres, his Left to Fies, and the two ſeperate Corps under M. Boufflers and M. Harcourt remaining in their former Poſts near Huy. On the other Hand, no ſooner had the King receiv'd Notice of this Motion, than he invited the Elector of Bavaria to repair, with all poſſible Expedition, to his Camp, in order to aſſiſt at a Council of War, which was held immediately on his Arrival, and at which, it was reſolv'd, as we are expreſly told, To decamp and follow the Enemy, as well to obſerve their Motions, as to prevent any Deſigns they might have form'd upon Liege and Maeſtricht, between which two Places they had poſted themſelves.

[State of Europe, Vol. VI. p. 243.]

which is ſuppos'd to be an Overſight.

And here it is fit to obſerve, That as the Marſhal de Luxemburgh is ſuppos'd to have committed a great Overſight in making this Advance, accompany'd, or rather encumber'd, with his heavy Baggage and Cannon, ſo the Confederates are ſuppos'd to have committed a much greater, in not having improv'd the Opportunity, which was thus unexpectedly thrown into their Hands.

Namur, Huy, Liege, and Maeſtricht lie all along the Maes: The two Former, it may be remember'd, were in the Poſſeſſion of the Enemy, the two Latter in that of the Confederates: And by making ſuch an Advance towards the one, it became extremely practicable to cut off their Communication with the other. The Army under the King's Command was ſaid to amount to 31,000 Horſe and Dragoons, and 51,000 Foot, without reckoning the Troops poſted at Liege, or another Body of 7000, under the Command of Count Thyan, near Ghent: The French were inferior, in point of Number, by many thouſands: Our Gazettes boaſted, that they had loſt no leſs than 3000 by Deſertion; that their Cavalry were poorly mounted; that their Infantry languiſh'd under the Want of all kinds of Neceſſaries; and, it is added, by the Hiſtorians of theſe Times, that the Troops of the Confederates, both Horſe and Foot, were, on the contrary, the fineſt and the beſt furniſh'd, in all reſpects, of any that had ever taken the Field during the War.

Kennet, Oldmixon.

Hence, therefore, it appears, that the Confederates were in the beſt Condition imaginable to make a proper uſe of every Advantage that offer'd, and to interpoſe between the French and Huy, in order to cut off their Retreat, as above hinted, was thought to be the beſt uſe that could be made of This: But after all the neceſſary Diſpoſitions had been made on the 11th, for following the Enemy the next Day, agreeable to the Reſult of the Council of War, freſh Advice having been receiv'd, That they had halted again; or, as it is more tenderly expreſs'd, That they had only chang'd their Camp for the Convenience of Forage, a new Reſolution was taken by the Confederates to ſuſpend their March, and it was ſuſpended accordingly; after which both Armies continued quietly, in their reſpective Poſts, till the 22d: But then the Diſcovery being at laſt made, that the Enemy had over-ſhot themſelves; and ſufficient Care having been taken of Liege and Maeſtricht, his Majeſty thought fit to put his whole Army in motion, ſoon after Midnight, and to appoint the Spaniſh, Bavarian, and Brandenburgh Horſe, who were to have the Van, to join him by the way.

A. D. 1694. During theſe Days the Confederates take no Advantage of it.

Of all the Places on the French Frontiers Huy projected fartheſt out, towards the Quarters of the Confederates, and conſequently was the poſt which it was reaſonable to think the Latter would endeavour to recover firſt: But what was Reaſon to them, did not appear ſo to their Adverſaries: His Majeſty, it ſeems, held it more adviſable to take a much longer and more difficult March, in order to interpoſe between them and Namur, at leaſt on that Side the Maeſe, which he believed would either oblige them to fight him, under a Variety of Diſadvantages, or to repaſs the River; in which caſe he hop'd to have an Opportunity to fall upon their Rear.

It is acknowledg'd, that ſuch were the Difficulties, by reaſon of bad Ways, and frequent Defiles, which the ſeveral Diviſions of the Troops before ſpecify'd had to ſurmount in their March, that the reſt of the Army were forc'd to halt for them above two Hours in the Plains of Judoigne: That the Right Wing, commanded by the Elector of Bavaria, did not reach Bonnaile till two in the Afternoon, nor the Left, under the Duke of Holſtein Ploen, till Evening; that they march'd ſix great Leagues that Day; and that from Judoigne they proceeded in order of Battle, as well as the Ground would give them leave, for fear of being attack'd by the Enemy.

But therefore move to Bonnaile,

The Enemy, however, gave them no Diſturbance, nor even mov'd out of their Camp: But on the Morrow, when the Drift of his Majeſty's Motion was fully diſcover'd, ſtruck their Tents, and took up their Quarters at Vignamont, in the Neighbourhood of Huy, as if with a Deſign to let him ſee, he had carry'd but half his Purpoſe: It is true, he was between them and Namur; but then they had a Bridge over the Maeſe at Huy, and they immediately made it their Buſineſs to throw over ſeveral more; whereas he had none, nor did he ever attempt to have one: They had, conſequently, the ſole Command of the Country on the other Side; and they were ſtill in a Condition to diſpute the Command with him on this: The Front of their Lines was ſo cover'd by the Jecker and the Mehaigne, as alſo the hollow way and marſhy Ground between thoſe Rivers, that it was impracticable to force them: And, laſtly, he allow'd them time enough, both to ſend off their Artillery and heavy Baggage, and to entrench every Paſs that was likely to give the leaſt Encouragement, even to the moſt deſperate Aſſailant.

and the French to Vignamont, where they entrench themſelves.

All, therefore, that his Majeſty had to boaſt of in this Affair, was the palpable Neceſſity which the Dauphin was reduc'd to,

A. D. 1694. of remaining on the Defenſive merely: And that in this Interval, his Parties had every where the Advantage of thoſe of the Enemy. But then the forcing the French Lines, between Conde and St. Guiſlain, by a Detachment from the Garriſon of Aeth, ſupported by a Party of Horſe from the flying Camp, under the Command of the Count de Thian, the Ravages committed by the Troops of Liege, and ſuch like inconſiderable Advantages, but ill anſwer'd the Expectations which the manifeſt Superiority of the Allies had rais'd; and which, it had been ſuppos'd, was the only thing wanting, to turn the whole Current of the War.

Beſides; it appear'd from the Event, that this Motion of his Majeſty's from Rooſbeck to Bonmale, did not anſwer what even his own Partiſans gave out concerning it: For inſtead of obliging the Enemy to repaſs the Maſe, and from their ſo doing, deriving an Opportunity to fall upon their Rear, he himſelf was oblig'd to decamp firſt; tho' the contrary has been ſuggeſted by his Apologiſts, who pretend, that M. de Luxemburgh had form'd a Deſign to ſecure the ſtrong Poſt at Peyten; and that the King decamp'd only to prevent him.

The Confederates oblig'd to decamp firſt.

But even our own Gazettes do not countenance theſe Suggeſtions: On the contrary they ſay, That the heavy Baggage was ſent away to Louvain on the 15th of Auguſt, under the Convoy of one Engliſh Regiment of Dragoons: That the next Morning the King took a Review of all the light Horſe in the Engliſh Pay: That on the 18th, very early in the Morning, the Army remov'd to Sombref, which they did not reach till late at Night; and that the Enemy, upon receiving Notice of their March, decamp'd alſo about Noon; and having march'd all Night, poſted themſelves between Tempion and Maſy, with the Rivulet of Orn before them, within a League and a half of the Confederates.

Thus it is, in effect, admitted, that the King grew ſick of his own Experiment; and we ſhall find, that every ſubſequent Motion he made, was part of a new one, which it was hop'd would atone for the Diſappointment of the Former.

For his Majeſty, on the 20th, (having firſt detach'd twelve Battalions of Foot, under the Command of Lieutenant-General Fagel, to join twenty-two more from Maeſtricht and Liege) continued his March from Sombref to Neville; on the 21ſt to Sognies, on the 22d to Chivere, from whence, on the 23d, early in the Morning, he detach'd the Duke of Wirtemburgh, with fifteen Squadrons of Horſe and Dragoons, to take under his Command the Forces commanded by the Count de Thian; as alſo the two Bodies of Foot juſt mention'd, to paſs the Scheldt at Audenarde, and poſt himſelf on the other Side, in order to facilitate the Paſſage of the Army over that River. The ſame Day his Majeſty alſo proceeded on to Grames, near Aeth; and the next, the Elector of Bavaria, with a Detachment of about 6000 Men, advanc'd with an Intention to paſs the Scheldt at Pont d'Eſperies: But, tho' the Confederates had much the ſhorteſt Cut to the Poſt they intended to ſurprize, and had gain'd three or four Marches, when the Elector came in ſight of it, he diſcover'd a great Body of the French, both Horſe and Foot, entrenching themſelves on the other Side of the River, and making ſo formidable an Appearance, at leaſt, that it was not thought prudent to attack them. A. D. 1694.

M. de Luxemburgh was no ſooner appriz'd of the Rout which the Confederates had taken, than he detach'd 4000 of his beſt Horſe, with each a Foot-Soldier behind him, to reinforce M. de Valette, who had the Command of the French Lines at Pont d'Eſperies, with all poſſible Expedition: He alſo detach'd certain of his choiceſt Corps to follow as cloſe at their Heels as poſſible, and for the more Expedition Sake, without obſerving the uſual Forms of a March: The Marſhal de Villeroy, with all the Cavalry of the Right Wing, the Houſhold-Troops, and twenty Field-Pieces, advanc'd next; and behind him the Dauphin in Perſon, with the Cavalry of the Left, and certain Parties of the Muſketeers and Body-Guards: All theſe march'd with ſo much Precipitation, that they ſometimes meaſur'd ten Leagues a Day: Nay, the foremoſt Parties made ſuch incredible Haſte, that the Confederates, in the firſt Tranſports of their Aſtoniſhment, were almoſt induc'd to believe they flew. M. de Valette, as being neareſt to the Poſt endanger'd, arriv'd there firſt, with fifteen Battalions, nine Regiments of Cavalry, and two of Dragoons; but was the ſame Evening join'd by the Marſhal de Villeroy, after a March of ſeventeen Hours, without drawing Bit; and even the Dauphin himſelf reach'd Tournai, where he thought fit to repoſe himſelf till the Center of his Army could overtake him.

but is prevented by M. de Luxemburgh.

But if all Europe was amaz'd at this prodigious March, the Amazement was almoſt equal, that the Elector did not make an Attempt to force their Lines, as ſoon as he appear'd before them; while the Enemy, both Men and Horſe, were, in a manner, incapable of ſtanding upon their Legs, and while the Bulk of their Army was ſo far behind, that it was impoſſible they ſhould advance time enough to countenance their Efforts, much leſs to ſuſtain them. The Detachment he commanded was, indeed, inſufficient for the Enterprize: But we find by an Article in our own Gazette, dated the 23d, No. 3004. that the Confederates were appriz'd that the Duke de Villeroy was advancing, with long and continual Marches to prevent them; and from thence it is but fair to aſk, Why his electoral Highneſs was not better provided to execute a Project of ſo much Importance, which could not have miſcarry'd, if the Army of the Allies had proceeded with half the Vigour manifeſted by the Enemy? Why ſeveral Parties were not employ'd in the ſame Service? And why the Attempt was not made in ſeveral Places at once? It has alſo been aſk'd by Others, Why his Majeſty, whoſe Troops had ſuffer'd little

A. D. 1694. little or no Fatigue, in compariſon of the Enemy, did not proſecute his March into France, when he found it impoſſible to paſs the Schelde? But, perhaps, the very Mention of this Cavil is ſufficient to anſwer it: And inſtead of dwelling any longer on the Reſinements which either the Malice or ill Humour of the Times gave riſe to, we ought to return to thoſe Facts which are uncontroverted and undeniable.

That the King himſelf reconnoitred the Diſpoſition of the Enemy, and the Banks of the River; that he concluded it impracticable to paſs in ſight of the Enemy, and that he coaſted it downwards, towards Audenarde, is acknowledged on all Hands.

This took up part of the 24th, the 25th, and part of the 26th; at which time the French having made a Motion to attack the Duke of Wirtembergh who lay with his Detachment on the other Side of the Schelde, according to his Orders, one whole Column paſs'd the River at Audenarde, in order to reinforce him, and on the 27th was follow'd by the reſt of the Army, which was now poſted between the Schelde and the Lys; the King having his Head Quarters at Wanneghem, and the Elector his at Cruſhouten.

The Confederates paſs the Schelde at Audenarde.

According to M. de Feuquieres, his Majeſty's Intention in making this Motion from Taviers to the Schelde, was to finiſh his Campaign, by taking poſſeſſion of Courtray before the Dauphin, or rather M. de Luxemburgh, could prevent him, and thereby not only to ſecure the Forage between the Lys and the Schelde, but to eſtabliſh Winter-Quarters in that Diſtrict for a conſiderable Part of his Army; in every Particular of which he was defeated: For the Marſhal having poſted his Army between Courtray and Menin, found Means both to extend and cover his Lines in ſo maſterly a manner, that the Confederates on the one hand, durſt not attempt to force them, nor, on the other, could hinder him from ſubſiſting his Army, during the Remainder of the Campaign, at the Expence of the Caſtellany of Courtray, as alſo of the Spaniards, and even from foraging on the other Side of the Lys.

But find the French Lines impracticable.

King Lewis ſends a Letter of Thanks to his Army.

It is yet farther aſſerted, by the Writers of thoſe Times, That his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty was ſo ſenſible of the excellent Conduct of his Generals on this Occaſion, and the vigorous Efforts of his Troops, and thought it ſo eſſential to his Intereſt to make them acquainted with that Senſibility, that he writ a Letter, with his own Hand, to the Dauphin, the Princes of the Blood, M. de Luxemburgh, the Commanders under him, and, in general, to the Officers and Soldiers of the whole Army, acknowledging, That he ſtood oblig'd to their unparallell'd Zeal and Diligence for the Preſervation of the Frontiers on that Side; and aſſuring them, That he would take all Opportunities to make them ſuitable Returns.—And it is added, That by his Majeſty's expreſs Command, this gracious Letter was read to every Corps, from the Right to the Left of the Army.

But if King William was diſappointed in his immediate Purpoſe, he had ſtill another in reſerve, which it was not in the Power of France to diſappoint him of: For being aware that his Enemies would not fail to be ſevere on his Conduct, if he did not derive ſome Advantage from the Superiority which he had ſo warmly contended for, and which he was now in poſſeſſion of; and knowing that Huy muſt be left expos'd, in caſe the Marſhal de Luxemburgh undertook to diſpute the Paſſage of the Schelde, he caus'd a Body of Troops to be drawn out of the Garriſons of Liege and Maeſtricht, and to encamp firſt near Vilvord, and then without the Gates of Ghent, to be in readineſs to inveſt that Place, as ſoon as he found it convenient to ſend them a proper Reinforcement: Accordingly, on the 3d of September, he detach'd all the Brandenburgh Horſe, and ſixteen Regiments of Foot, from his Camp at Wanneghem, to join them; and appointed the Duke of Holſtein-Ploen, as Commander in Chief, to put himſelf at their Head with all poſſible Expedition. A. D. 1694.

The Confederates paſs the Lys.

The next Day his Majeſty made the neceſſary Diſpoſitions for his Army to paſs the Lys, which they perform'd in ſeveral Columns, ſome at Deynſe and ſome over Pontoons: A Camp having been prepar'd for them at Wenterghem, the whole Army took Poſt there on the 6th at Night, and continued in it till the 8th, when his Majeſty, with a great Part of the Army, march'd to Reſelaer, which in the London Gazette was ſaid to be four Leagues in the Enemy's Country: But this is diſputed: For ſome ſay, That only was to be eſteem'd the Enemy's Country which was within their Lines; whereas his Majeſty's Camp was not only without thoſe Lines, but eight or nine Miles ſhort of them. However this may be, the Reſidue of the Army, which conſiſted of the Troops formerly mention'd to be under the Command of Count Thian, and part of the Left Wing, compos'd chiefly of Engliſh Horſe, continued at Wenterghem: Which Diviſion of the Confederate Forces oblig'd the French, on the one Hand, to make Detachments to the amount of 16000 Men, to cover Ipres and Menin, and of 6000, on the other, to cover Furnes and Dunkirk.

A Frenchman ſaves alive for attempting to fire the Magazines.

And while this was the Situation of Things, a Frenchman was ſeiz'd in his Majeſty's Camp, in the very act of placing a lighted Match in one of the Ammunition Waggons: Being examin'd, whether by Torture or not, is not ſpecify'd, he acknowledg'd, That he was employ'd by ſeveral of the General Officers of the French Army, to ſet fire to the whole Magazine; which being held an unwarrantable way of making a War, the wretched Undertaker was ſentenc'd, by a Court-Martial, to have his Right Hand cut off, and afterwards to be burnt alive; which was perform'd accordingly.

Whether the Diſcovery and Execution of this Miſcreant put an End to the Projects of the Enemy for this Campaign, or whether the Dauphin was weary of a Command which was not like to produce a Sufficiency of Glory to balance the Fatigues and Hazards of it, he took his Leave of it, on the 18th; and tho' his Majesty kept the Field till the 30th following, it does not appear it was for any other Purpose than to wait for the Surrender of Huy.

Huy retak'd.

On the 16th that Place had been invested: The next Day the City was surrender'd to the Besiegers, on the same Conditions Namur had been surrender'd to the French two Years before; that is to say, That the Garrison should retire into the Castle; and that neither the Castle should fire upon the City, nor the City upon the Castle. On the 18th several Batteries were rais'd, and a Bridge of Communication was thrown over the Maese. On the 21st, at Night, the Trenches were open'd: On the 24th Fort Picard, and the Red Fort, were taken by Assault: In the Afternoon, on the 27th, the Garrison capitulated; and the same Evening the Besiegers were put in Possession of the Castle-Gate.

Two things remain to be observ'd, viz. 1. That it was expected the Body of Troops which had form'd the Siege, and which amounted to 26000 Men, would immediately after have enter'd into the Duchy of Luxemburgh: And the London-Gazette (No. 3017) insinuates, That the Cavalry, together with six Battalions of Foot, and some Field-Pieces, did actually march thither, and put the Country round under Contribution: But others assert, That they never ventur'd out of the Diocese of Liege, and for Proof cite the same Gazette, which says, They took Post between Navaigne and Franchimont, both which Places are in the same Diocese. 2. That before the King left the Army, a Resolution had been taken to fortify Dixmuyde, which the French had slighted and abandon'd, as also Deynse, Ninove, and Tirlemont, which would not only afford very good Winter-Quarters for a large Number of Troops, but very much straiten the neighbouring Garrisons, if not enable the Confederates to force their way into the Districts they were intended to secure. Thus, at least, the Affair was represented by the Voice of Authority in England: But those who were not in a Humour to be satisfied with his Majesty's Proceedings, on the contrary gave out, That every one of these Places was so near some other Garrison of our own; and all together would contribute so little to the Maintainance of the Garrisons necessary for their Defence, that the Benefit would not answer the twentieth Part of the Charge.

But howsoever the military Critics may think fit to decide on these Transactions, they were the last of the Campaign: And about the middle of October both Armies seperated, and went into Winter-Quarters.

We must now return once more to our own Element the Sea, that we may have the whole of our military Exploits before us at one view.

An Attempt on Dunkirk.

The Bombardments of Dieppe and Havre had not answered his Majesty's Purposes: He was for bringing all the Force he could against France on the Side of Flanders; and for that Reason had, thorough the whole course of the Summer, recommended an Attempt upon Dunkirk and Calais. But without effect: Lord Berkeley, who had the Command in the Channel, had no Opinion of the Service; and All, both Officers and Pilots, had given it as their Opinion, that it was impracticable. His Majesty, nevertheless, persevered in his Opinion: And Lord Berkeley having struck his Flag, it fell to the Lot of Sir Cloudsley Shovel, as next in Command, to gratify his Majesty, whose Orders were now become peremptory, with the Attempt he was so fond of. There was one Mr. Meesters, a Dutchman, who had invented a sort of Machine, which had been call'd an Infernal, from the Smoke it vomited, and from the Fury of its Discharge: It was on the Representations of this Man that the King had founded his Belief: And whereas the English Pilots had declin'd the Service, he was authoris'd to collect such foreign Pilots in Flanders, as were either better qualify'd, or better dispos'd to officiate in their Places.

A. D. 1694.

The Squadron to be employ'd in this Enterprize, consisted of thirteen English, and six Dutch Men of War, two Bomb-Vessels, seventeen Machine-Ships, or Infernals, and certain Frigates, &c. On the 4th of September, O. S. this Squadron came to Anchor in the Downs, where they were to wait for the Arrival of the foreign Pilots, mention'd above, and their Director-General, Mr. Meesters, who seems to have been also constituted Director-General of the Expedition: For Captain Benbow, who was appointed to command the Bomb-Ships, and other small Vessels to be employ'd in the Attempt, was also appointed to take his Orders from him. On the 7th Mr. Meesters and his Party arrived, and the same Day they set Sail; but were oblig'd, by the hard Weather they met with, to come to Anchor again the same Day.

On the 12th, however, they came before Dunkirk; towards the Evening Captain Benbow, with his Boats, sounded the Western Channel, in the midst of the Enemy's Fire: The next Morning he repeated the Experiment: And, upon his Report of the Precautions which the Enemy had taken for the Security of their Works, it was judg'd impossible to destroy them, unless they could first destroy the two Forts which cover'd the Risbank: That, however, nothing might be wanting on their Side, in the Afternoon two of the Infernals were sent in, with the Promise of a good Reward to him who should venture farthest, and do most Execution: But whether the Attempt was really impracticable, as our English Pilots had pronounc'd, or the Flemings were too discrete to sacrifice themselves for any Consideration whatsoever, neither of them had any Effect: The first being fir'd before it was possible for her to do the Enemy any Mischief; and the second, which it is said had stood in very boldly, being abandon'd, when pretty far advanc'd to the Mole Head,

A. D. 1694. was overset by the Tide for want of Steerage; and having drove side-ways about a Cables length, blew up, to as little Purpose as the Other had done before.

As Mr. Meesters and his Pilots were the only Persons to be convinc'd, That his Infernals were useless, because unmanageable, Things, that great Point was no sooner carry'd, than the Admiral gave over the Attempt, and withdrew to Gravelines. And whereas some Persons have suggested, that the Precautions which the French had taken for their Security, were the Effect of the Intelligence transmitted to them, according to Custom, from hence; it is a known thing, that the Intention of this Visit had been long the Talk of Europe: Vice-Admiral Hopson, with a strong Squadron, had, moreover, been station'd in their Road, just before, for the Sake of preventing the Depredations of du Bast, who, for the more Security, had drawn up his Ships within the Bason; and even the recent Examples of Dieppe, &c. were alone sufficient to put them on their Guard.

A like fruitless Attempt on Calais.

Still, however, Sir Cloudsley had not executed the whole of the King's Commands: His Majesty had procur'd a Plan of Calais, which had brought him to conceive, that France was accessible there; and the Admiral was requir'd to make the Trial: Accordingly, having been join'd in the Downs on the 16th, by all the Bomb-Vessels, and a Body of Land Forces, under the Command of Sir Martin Beckman, he came the same Day before that Place, where our Ancestors had left the last Print of their Foot-steps in the French Soil; and the Weather proving fair and favourable, on the Morrow, the Bomb-Vessels went in, and threw some Shells into the Town: These are the Words of the Gazette; but with what Effect they were thrown, is not specified: It is, indeed, said elsewhere, that thirty Houses were ruin'd, and some others damag'd. But if the Number so damag'd and destroy'd had been a hundred or two, surely it was not worth the Attention and Solicitude of a great King, to make War at the Expence of a few miserable Individuals, who had never provok'd his Indignation. And we must therefore conclude, That his Majesty was equally misled in both these Attempts; For it is agreed on all Hands, That no Man was braver, more indefatigable, or better dispos'd to do his Duty, in all Respects, or more belov'd and esteem'd, both by Officers and Seamen, than Shovel: And yet Shovel did not think fit to waste his Stores, or expose his Men any farther; but, on the contrary, as the Failure of the Spring-Tides furnish'd him with a reasonable Pretence for quitting Dunkirk, a rough Gale, at N. W. and W. and a rolling Sea, furnish'd him with a like Pretence for quitting Calais, which he did on the 19th, without discharging, or attempting to discharge another Bomb in the Interval. A. D. 1694.

Sir Cloudsley was, after this, sent with his Squadron to the Eastward, to protect the Trade against du Bart, who had made his Escape out of Dunkirk: And all that remains to be said in relation to this, and every other Measure of the like kind, is, That it gave Rise to two opposite Opinions: One, which was universally the Opinion of the Seamen, and, therefore, is echoed by Burchet, viz. That in all such expensive, and ineffectual Attempts, we more (b) expos'd and injur'd ourselves than the Enemy: And another, which had its Origin at Court, viz. That in obliging the Enemy to distribute a large Body of regular Troops along their Coast, and in convincing all Europe, That they were so far from being Lords of both Seas, as they had given out, that they could not protect their own Ports, the Adventure abundantly overpaid us, both in Glory and Profit.

Two Attempts of the French on Jamaica.

The last naval Attempts of this Year, that we are to speak of, are those of the French in America, by way of Reprizal, for Wheeler's Enterprizes on their Colonies the Year before: Of these, the first was made on Jamaica, by M. du Casi, Governor of St. Domingo, who having rais'd a Body of Forces, and embark'd them on board five Men of War, and nine other Vessels, came to Anchor in Cow-Bay, on the 17th of June, with a Purpose to land immediately: For he had receiv'd Information, That the Inhabitants were equally unapprehensive of such a Visit, and unprovided for a Defence; and fully believ'd, That he should find little or no Resistance.

But one Elliot, a Master of a Sloop belonging to that Island, who had been taken at Sea, and sent Prisoner to Petit-Guaves, in Hispaniola, having come to the Knowledge of M. du Casi's Design, found means to make his Escape, in an open Canoe, with two of his Men; and, almost by Miracle, reaching Port-Royal in Safety, imparted the Discovery he had made to Sir William Beeston, the Governor; who made such notable use of it, that when M. du Casi, and his Squadron, came upon the Coast, he found such a Disposition made, at all the considerable Parts on the Island, to give him a proper Reception, that all he adventur'd to do, was to land his Forces in small Parties, who destroy'd the Plantations and Sugar-Works, and committed every other kind of Outrage in their Power, tho' not without Loss to themselves; for some of these Parties were defeated and cut off, and the rest were so dispirited with the unexpected Opposition they met with, that M. du Casi thought it advisable to compound for the Plunder he had got, and the Mischief he had done, and to quit the Island. Soon after which, by way of Bravade, Sir William Beeston

(b) The Jacobites also took occasion to insinuate, That the Government neglected the Care of our Commerce and Navigation, which they illustrate, among others, by the Case of a Merchant, who lost Shares in twenty-three Ships, that our Fleet might fool away a Campaign, and squander the Treasure of the Nation upon impracticable Expeditions, such as the Bombarding of Brest, Calais, &c. and blowing up Dunkirk with Machine Vessels.——See a Letter to Mr. Secretary Trenchard, and other Pieces from that Quarter, publish'd about this time.

A. D. 1694. Beeston diſpatch'd the Advice, the Hampſhire, and Experiment, three ſmall Men of War, to annoy the Coaſt of Hiſpaniola; and we find an Article in the Gazette, ſignifying, that having cannonaded the Town of Leogana, and ſet fire to a rich Merchant Ship, (in which Attempt the Captain of the Advice was kill'd, by a Shot from the Shore) the ſaid three Frigates return'd to Jamaica.

A. D. 1694.

As to Elliot, and his Men, his Majeſty was graciouſly pleas'd, in conſideration of their good Services, to give the Latter 50*l.* a piece, and 500*l.* to the Former, together with a Medal and Chain, valued at 100*l.* more; and was, moreover, pleas'd to recommend him to the Lords of the Admiralty for an Employment in the Navy.

and St. John's in Newfoundland. The ſecond Attempt of the French was made by M. St. Clair, with four Men of War, upon St. John's Fort in Newfoundland, but with no better Succeſs than the Former: For the Ships in the Harbour having been drawn up under the Cover of the Cannon on Shore, and the Inhabitants plying their ſmall Arms, with as much Dexterity as Reſolution, the Aſſailants were beaten off, and the Place preſerved.

State of Hoſtilities between the Miniſters and Jacobites. And, now, before we can accompany his Majeſty in his Retreat to Leo, &c. or follow the general Current of public Affairs, it is incumbent on us to ſpeak of the Interior of our own Country; and more particularly of the Attempts, real or imputed, of the Jacobites againſt the Government, and the Proceedings of the Government againſt them.

That theſe Oppoſites were ever at mortal Variance; and that it was their reciprocal Study to ruin and deſtroy each other, may be eaſily believed: But for that very Reaſon we ought not over eaſily to believe or adopt the Aſperſions of either.

If the Jacobites had no other way left to ſerve their Cauſe, than by Plots and Conſpiracies, the Government could no otherwiſe juſtify their Severities againſt them, or obtain other political Purpoſes they had to obtain, than by perpetual Accuſations: And as the Forgeries of Fuller, Young, Whitney, &c. were yet freſh in Remembrance, the Courtiers found it almoſt as hard to perſuade the Bulk of the People, That thoſe Accuſations were founded upon Evidence and Conviction, as the Jacobites to find any People deſperate enough to be their Co-adjutors.

Lancaſhire Plot. This was the State of the Caſe on both Sides, when the Miniſters thought fit to revive the cold Scent of a Conſpiracy among certain of the Gentlemen in Lancaſhire and Cheſhire, to favour the intended Invaſion from the Coaſt of Normandy, in the Year 92, by cauſing an Inſurrection in the Name, and on the Behalf of the late King James. Lunt, an Iriſhman, was the firſt Informer; but many more came in afterwards; with what Characters, and under what Encouragement, will be expreſs'd in its Place: The Depoſitions were taken by Mr. Secretary Trenchard; the Warrants for apprehending the Perſons accus'd, were iſſued from his Office; and the ſerving them was entruſted to the Informers themſelves, accompany'd by the Meſſengers of State, as alſo by a Party of the Dutch Horſe-Guards, under the Command of one Captain Baker, who was moreover commiſſion'd to break open Doors, and ſeize Papers and Arms, as well as Perſons, without an over-ſcrupulous Regard to the uſual Forms of Law, or the Rights of the Subject.

Parker and Croſby impriſon'd. Colonel Parker, formerly mention'd, as one of the Perſons employ'd by king James to promote this Inſurrection, and one Mr. Croſby, had been ſeiz'd and committed, the one to the Tower, the other to Newgate, ſome time before, on Suſpicion only: For tho' certain Papers, of a dangerous Tendency, were ſaid to be found in Croſby's Cuſtody, they proved nothing; and how well diſpos'd ſoever the Proſecutors might be to ſecure the Government from the Practices of Perſons ſo notoriouſly known to be diſaffected to it, a Verdict was not to be obtain'd without ſufficient Witneſſes.

The Priſoners, in the mean time, as if conſcious of their Innocency, mov'd the Court of King's-Bench for the Benefit of the Habeas-Corpus Act; but were detain'd in Cuſtody, in virtue of a Bill of High-Treaſon, found againſt each, for having been in Arms in Ireland, under King James; which, if admitted, could not warrant a Proſecution againſt them; becauſe every ſuch Offence had been remitted and pardon'd, in the fulleſt manner, by the Articles of Limerick.

Letter to Sir J. Trenchard. Thoſe who have tranſmitted certain Circumſtances to us, which our Hiſtorians in general have not thought worth their Notice, moreover accuſe Mr. Secretary Trenchard of having endeavour'd, tho' without effect, to get this Deficiency of Evidence ſupply'd, by tempting certain Perſons, under examination before him, to acknowledge, as, he ſaid, Parker himſelf had already done, That he, Parker, had return'd from France, ſince the enacting of the Law which made it Treaſon for any Engliſh Subject to return from thence without Leave: As alſo, That he was of the Concert with Grandval, to aſſaſſinate his Majeſty, &c. To which one of the ſaid Perſons reply'd, That if Parker had made any ſuch Acknowledgment, he had ſlander'd and bely'd himſelf: For that, to his Knowledge, he had not been in France within that Interval. And if the ſame Authority is to be rely'd on, the Secretary himſelf acknowledg'd to Lord Lucas, Lieutenant of the Tower, That he had no Witneſſes againſt the Colonel, but was reſolv'd to hold him in Priſon till he had: Which his Lordſhip having imparted to his Priſoner, either thro' Compaſſion or Indiſcretion, the Latter reſolv'd to make uſe of every Expedient he could think of to facilitate his Eſcape; as thinking that ſuch a Declaration imply'd a ſettled Reſolution to make him a Victim to Revenge, if it ſhould be found impoſſible to make him one to Juſtice.

The Former makes his Eſcape. But whether he was actuated by a Dread of Power, or a Conſciouſneſs of Guilt, it is certain that he did make his Eſcape out of the

A. D. 1694. the Tower, on the 11th of Auguſt: And tho' a Proclamation was iſſued, with the Offer of 400*l.* Reward, to any Perſon who ſhould apprehend him, and both a Pardon and the like Reward to any of his Abettors, who ſhould do the Government that Service, ſo faithful were his Friends, or ſo artful his Conduct, that his Perſuers could never overtake him.

Of Croſby we ſhall find occaſion to ſpeak hereafter: And in the mean time, it is neceſſary to obſerve, that the famous Ferguſon, who had been ſo deeply concern'd with the Malcontents in the Reign of King Charles, who had accompany'd both the Duke of Monmouth and Prince of Orange in their ſeveral Expeditions to England, who had been made Houſe-keeper to the Exciſe-Office in the preſent Reign, and who, growing again diſſatisfy'd either with the Meaſures of the Government, or the very contemptible Reward he had receiv'd, for the great Share he had taken, and the Riſque he had run, in aſſiſting to eſtabliſh it, had gone off to the Jacobites, and enter'd as deeply into their Service, as he had ever done into that of their Adverſaries: This Ferguſon, concerning whom it had been writ by Biſhop Sprat, That he had declar'd a Reſolution to be a Plotter in every Plot during his Time: This extraordinary Man, who was perſonally known to every Miniſter, and every one of their Implements, who had every Year ſince his laſt Tergiverſation, ſet forth a Pamphlet or two which endanger'd his Neck, and who had hitherto eſcap'd with Impunity, now ſet forth a familiar Letter to his old Friend and fellow Labourer in the Cauſe of Liberty, Sir John Trenchard, on the Abuſe of Power daily practis'd by himſelf and the Scots Secretary of State, Johnſton, in their ſeveral Offices; and the wicked Methods they purſued to ſuborn Witneſſes, and furniſh them with forged Matter againſt thoſe whom they intended to ſacrifice. A. D. 1694.

Ferguſon's Charge againſt Sir John Trenchard.

The Charge he brings againſt the firſt of theſe Miniſters, conſiſts of thirteen Articles, (which ſo much the more deſerve to be enumerated, becauſe they make a Part of the Hiſtory of theſe Times, and may be an Admonition to thoſe to come) and in his Preamble to them he lays down the following Poſtulata, viz. 1. That whether there was an original Contract between former Kings and the free People of this Country or not, there was a very formal and explicite one between them and King William. 2. That by not puniſhing the Inſtruments of the Miſcarriages in the late Reign, who were by Law the only Perſons puniſhable for them, King William had made himſelf reſponſible for the political Crimes of his Civil Officers: And, 3. That the Majority of thoſe who had taken the Oaths to the new Government, as well as thoſe who had refus'd them, did believe him to be only King de facto, not de jure. He alſo draws from theſe Poſtulata ſome very (i) ſevere Concluſions; and then proceeds in his Charge in the Order following, viz.

1. That he hounded out his Meſſengers, arm'd with Blank-Warrants, which was in itſelf an arbitrary Meaſure; and of which they made as arbitrary an Uſe: And of this, ſays he, I not only accuſe, but publiſh you guilty, and conſign you over to Parliament, to be impeach'd and proſecuted for.

2. That in ſome of thoſe Warrants, the Crimes of thoſe who were apprehended in Virtue of them, were not ſpecify'd, which was contrary both to the Letter and Spirit of the Law.

3. That

(i) Which I have inſerted underneath for fear the ſuppreſſing them ſhould be conſtrued into a tacit Acknowledgment, That they were founded on Truth and Reaſon.

"And therefore having diſcharged the foregoing Poſtulata, with all the Brevity that the Matter would admit, I ſhall now proceed to a more particular Recapitulation of the Miſcarriages in the Conduct of King William's Miniſters, and chiefly of yours, which have far exceeded that of others in Illegality, Inhumanities, and barbarous Practices. And I do challenge all Mankind, e're I advance any further, to name ſo much as one Thing call'd a Grievance under the Reign of King James, that has not been repeated, or outgone ſince the Reign of King William. May be we have not had all the ſame Things over again in Species, but we have had them to the full in the Value and Equivalent. And for thoſe we have not had ſpecifically repeated, it is not becauſe they have been thought unlawful, but becauſe the Paſſions and Inclinations of King William, and his Miniſters, are of a diſtinct kind from thoſe of King James, and travel in a different Road from what his did. But if the Former King did, in ſome Things, exceed the Bounds which the Law had chalk'd out as the Meaſures of his Government, that he might thereby have brought all his People to ſtand upon the ſame Level of Capacity, in reference to Civil and Military Employs, and in order to putting a Period to Perſecutions for Matters of meer Conſcience and reveal'd Religion, without Damage to the Church by Law eſtabliſh'd, either in its Dignities, Properties, or Juriſdictions, they were ſo noble and royal Ends, as might have ſerv'd to excuſe, if not to juſtify, the little irregular Exceſſes taken and purſued for compaſſing of them: Whereas, we have ſince the Reſolution, not only ſeen the principal Offices of Honour and Truſt, rightfully due to natural Subjects, conferr'd and beſtow'd chiefly upon Foreigners, but have had the Misfortune to be often arbitrarily robb'd of our Liberties, which is both the leaving us no legal Bottom at all to ſtand upon, and infinitely worſe in itſelf, than the having our Country-men, Fellow-Chriſtians, and Neighbours brought, in the Things forementioned and practiſed under King James's Reign, to live upon the Square with ourſelves. And the Invaſion upon our moſt eſſential Right, as well as the firſt and moſt inſeparable and valuable Property, which is that of the Freedom of our Perſons, and Safety of our Manſion-Houſes, has been ſo daringly, notoriouſly, and often repeated, that the Miniſters of King William have been forced to ſolicite and procure divers Acts of Parliament, ſometimes to legitimate them, before hand, to commit Rapine upon our Liberties; as in the diſpenſing oftener than once with the Habeas Corpus Act; and at other times to indemnify them for the Violences they had perpetrated without a previous Allowance. And as we have had the ſame, or the like Oppreſſions and Grievances renewed, which we pretended to be under, and ſo much complain'd of before, ſo there are two very ill favour'd Aggravations attend the Latter, wherewith the Former were no ways accompany'd. One is, That we have increaſed our Diſeaſe, where we expected our Remedy; and that thoſe who ſet up for our Phyſicians, have enlarged our Wounds, in the ſtead of curing them; and that we have Poiſon adminiſter'd to us in the room of healing Medicines. All Men know with what different Pre-apprehenſions, in many of the People, King James and King William came to the Crown; and the firſt as much exceeded our Hopes, as the laſt has diſappointed them. The other is, That whereas King James erred upon Example in moſt Things, without ſeaſonable and temperate Caution given him in any, and upon the Authority of the Judges (whoſe Office it was to expound the Law to him) in ſome: The Illegalities of this Reign are in Contradiction to Promiſes, in Violation of Stipulations, in Defiance of Warnings, without the Countenance and Concurrence of the Judges, and with the Improbation of the Parliament, regiſter'd in divers of their Addreſſes: From which it is very obvious for peeviſh People to draw a couple of unfriendly but very natural Conſequences; namely, that as by repeating the worſt of Things chargeable upon King James's Government, as well as by perpetrating thoſe of a more miſchievous Nature, than any it could be accuſed of, you have ridiculed all the Motives of his Abdication."

A. D. 1694.

3. That often when both Perſons and Crimes were ſpecified, that Specification was made on bare Suſpicion only, unſupported with any Proof or Depoſition upon Oath, which Form of Commitment had been argued in the King's-Bench, An. 1690, and declar'd Contra Legem Terræ.

4. That in his Warrants he aſſign'd thoſe Matters for Crimes, which the Law did not account ſufficient, either for the ſeizing or detaining any Body.

(The Fifth might have been comprehended in the Third; for it only charges the Secretary with omitting to declare in his Warrants, as the Law preſcrib'd, That the Facts alledg'd had been depos'd and ſworn to before him.)

6. That his Meſſengers did often ſearch Houſes, and that by Night, as well as by Day, without the Preſence of a Conſtable or Head-borough: And in another Part of this Letter it is ſhewn, That they did this without Warrant, as well as without the Authority of a Peace-Officer. For one Mr. Graſcom, a Nonjuring Clergyman, with his little Congregation, being at their Devotions, at a Houſe in Scroop's-Court, near St. Andrew's Church, Kitſon, a Meſſenger, with his Poſſe, broke in, and ſeiz'd ſeveral of them, without producing or having any Warrant; and what is ſtill more extraordinary, Graſcom refuſing to deliver to him the Key of his, Graſcom's, Study, unleſs he ſhew'd by what Authority he acted, Kitſon pointed to his Badge with one Hand, and pulling out a Piſtol with the other, ſwore by God, he would ſhoot Graſcom thro' the Head, if he heſitated a Moment longer.

7. That under the Pretence of ſeizing treaſonable Papers, his Officers made no Difficulty to ſeize and carry off the Tide-Deeds of Mens Eſtates, their Books of Accounts, and Letters concerning their private Affairs: That they did this without numbering or marking the Papers they ſeiz'd, or ſuffering the Priſoners to do it; in conſequence of which unfair Proceeding, they had it in their Power to create the Crime they pretended to puniſh, by intermixing Papers of a dangerous Tendency, and making their Priſoners anſwerable for them: And that they often plunder'd them of what they found in their Cuſtody, as was the Caſe of Mr. Tildeſly, one of the Lancaſhire Gentlemen, who was robb'd of a Purſe of Gold by Captain Baker and his Dutch Co-adjutors; who on this Occaſion are ſarcaſtically call'd, The Conſervators of Britiſh Liberty. As if it was criminal for Perſons, reputed Jacobites, to have Money, Arms, or Papers.

8. That when innocent Perſons had been thus arbitrarily ſeiz'd and confin'd, they were ſuffer'd to languiſh for three or four Months together, in the Cuſtody of a Meſſenger, without being heard or examin'd.

9. That the making Goals of Meſſengers Houſes, and converting Meſſengers into Goalers, was illegal, and a manifold Violation of the Birth-right of the Subject.

10. That Priſoners of State, both in Goals and Meſſengers Houſes, were treated with the utmoſt Indecency; Rudeneſs, and Barbarity in ſeveral Inſtances, ſuch as lodging them in damp, unwholſome Chambers, debarring all Acceſs to them, even of their Lawyers, except in the Preſence of a Keeper, extorting extravagant Fees from them, under Pretence of Civility-Money, for not putting them in Irons, &c.

11. The refuſing to admit the ſaid Priſoners to Bail, in Caſes Bailable by Law, and the allowing none to be ſufficient Bail but ſuch as Aaron Smith, the Solicitor for the Treaſury, thought fit to approve of; which was, in effect, conſtituting him ſovereign Judge of the Reputations, Fortunes, and Qualities of the whole middle Claſs of Subjects.

12. That the ſaid Secretary had employ'd Trepans to decoy indiſcreet but well-meaning Perſons into Crimes, which otherwiſe they would never have entertain'd a Thought of; in Confirmation of which, mention is made of one Kingſton, who had been ſent into two ſeveral Counties, (meaning Cheſhire and Lancaſhire) ſometimes in the Character and Habit of a Parſon, ſometimes of a Phyſician, and ſometimes of a diſcarded Jacobite Officer, with Inſtructions to ſpeak of a Conſpiracy againſt the Government, in ſuch plauſible and captivating Terms, as ſhould induce the Unwary not only to give him a favorable Hearing, but, if poſſible, to ſpeak as favourably of it, and thereby to draw theſe very Perſons within the Suſpicion of being Accomplices, and furniſh his Employers with freſh Matter to eſtabliſh a Belief, That that Plot was a Fact, and not a Forgery.

A. D. 1694.

And, laſtly, That the ſaid Secretary countenance'd and abetted the Subornation of infamous Fellows, to ſwear innocent and peaceable Perſons out of their Lives; in Exemplification of which, he tells us of a Qualification-Office, kept at the Rummer Tavern below Charing-Croſs, by Alexander Johnſton, Brother to Johnſton the Scotiſh Secretary of State: And adds, that it was the Cuſtom of the ſaid Johnſton to warm thoſe with Plenty of Wine firſt, whom he propos'd to coin into Witneſſes, and then to corrupt them with the Offer of Guineas, and Aſſurances of Civil and Military Employs: That if his own Boaſts were to be believ'd, all the Scots Witneſſes were of his procuring: That preſuming on the Merit of his Service, he had told Sir George Maxwell he was to die as a Traitor; and that his, Sir George's, Eſtate had been offer'd to him. That the (k) Story of one Lieutenant Drummond was ſufficient to ſhew with what Intemperance, Temerity, and Malice Mr. Secretary Johnſton himſelf had

(k) Which, as he tells it, is as follows: Namely, "That the ſaid Mr. Secretary being inform'd, or at leaſt pretended to be ſo, by that ſuborn'd and mercenary Fellow Bates, how one Lieutenant Drummond, who ſerves King William in one of the Regiments in Flanders, could be an Evidence againſt Colonel Fountain, he not only writ to have the ſaid Drummond ſent immediately over from thence hither, which King William (whom you Mobbers have drawn into the Belief of

A. D. 1694. had engag'd in ſupporting, if not in forming this Sham Plot, on the Credit of his Brother Alexander: And, upon the whole, That the ſaid Alexander, and Captain Baker, before-mention'd, were evidently the principal Procurers and Suborners of Witneſſes in ſupport of the ſaid Plot: That even Mr. Secretary Trenchard had been pleas'd to declare, He knew no more of it than what the Scots Secretary had inform'd him. And that if it ſhould be admitted, that the laſt of thoſe Secretaries rely'd on the Intelligence procur'd by his Brother, it would follow, That the two Undertakers above-mention'd were the Forgers of the Plot; and that it was made current thro' the Kingdom, by the Credit which the ſaid two Secretaries had ſtampt upon it.

In the ſame Paragraph the Letter-Writer is pleas'd to diſcharge his Grace of Shreſbury from all Concern in theſe infamous Practices; any otherwiſe, than as They, ſays he, meaning the two other Secretaries, had involv'd him in the ignominious Drudgery of perſuing it, by craftily, as well imperiouſly, playing their Witneſſes upon him, while Trenchard withdrew into the Country, to obſerve, at a diſtance, how the Mine would ſpring.

Inſtance of Subordination. He then proceeds to ſhew, That the Trade of Suborning was grown ſo common, that every pitiful Fellow who had aſpir'd to Court Favour, or a Court Penſion, durſt openly practice it; and in ſupport of this Aſſertion, he produces three Inſtances, viz. 1. Of two Bailiffs, who tempted a Third to come in as an Evidence againſt Mr. Tildſley, and another Gentleman, (neither of which he had ever ſeen) for having dropt certain treaſonable Expreſſions concerning the Murder of the Queen. 2. A Conference between Lunt, Taaſe, and two other Perſons, Banks and Bereſford, whom Taaſe introduc'd to Lunt as Perſons proper for his Purpoſe, at the Ship Ale-Houſe in Butcher-Row; in which the Latter declar'd, That he ſtood in Need of ſome Gentlemen of Reputation to ſupport his Deſign; that for want of ſuch, he was forc'd to maintain ſome ſcandalous Fellows to keep his Plot on foot; that if they co-operated with him, they ſhould be plentifully provided for: And, having caus'd the ſaid Taaſe to read the Narrative of his Plot to them, and boaſted of his own Dexterity in the Management of it, proceeded to tell them, That Mr. Lee, of Lime, having a vaſt Eſtate, his Buſineſs was to be done: That he deſign'd them to do a particular Service in that Matter; and that they muſt procure certain Commiſſions to be A. D. 1694. drawn, as from the late King James, for the raiſing Troops to ſubvert the preſent Government; and that he would take Care to have them ſign'd with King James's Hand, as he uſually writ it: All which had been depos'd upon Oath by the ſaid Banks and Bereſford, and had been imparted to the Lord Chief Juſtice Holt. And, 3. A ſubſequent Attempt of the ſaid Lunt, to induce one of the Priſoners committed to Cheſter Goal, firſt, by the Promiſe of great Rewards, to ſwear, That he had receiv'd Money of Mr. Walmſley for the carrying on the Service of King James; and then, by Menaces, of cauſing his Allowance to be leſſen'd, and of expoſing him to all the Severities that could be inflicted in a Goal; which, on his proving intractable, were not only put in Execution, but the Man, with two others under the like Circumſtance, were hurry'd up to London, where they were diſpos'd of in the Hands of Meſſengers, as it is alledg'd, tho' the ſaid Meſſengers would not own they had any ſuch Priſoners in their Cuſtody.

Having thus circumſtantially clear'd and An Account of the Witneſſes. prepar'd his way, our Letter-Writer, at laſt, comes to the great Point he had in View from the Beginning, that is to ſay, to lay before the Public ſuch an Account of thoſe Perſons, who had been glean'd up by the Creatures of Power, to appear againſt the Gentlemen of Lancaſhire, as ſhould effectually blaſt their Evidence.

And he begins with one Brereton, on Brereton: whoſe Credit a Bill had already been found againſt one Captain Williamſon, at Hicks's-Hall, for having been in France after the Time limited by the Act, whom he proves to be a common Sharper, by Reference upon Reference to the Perſons whom he had cheated and robb'd. That he had been in France, and was known at the Court of St. Germains, he admits; but after what manner, he expreſſes by the following Incident, viz. That having wander'd to Liſle; and been detain'd there till ſome Account could be had of him from the Miniſters of that Court, the Repreſentations they gave of him were ſo little to his Advantage, that upon the Receipt of them, he was drumm'd out of the Place.

The next Perſon he ſpeaks of, is one Slingſby. Slingſby, who had been an Agent to a Regiment in Ireland, and who, on the Court-Side, was ſaid to be a Gentleman of Character and Fortune: But, according to his Account, Slingſby was altogether as much an a Conſpiracy againſt him) accordingly did; and that under a Command of making ſo much haſte to be here, that the Gentleman had not ſo much time allow'd him, as to fetch his Linnen and Cloaths from the Place where they lay: But upon his Arrival the ſaid Secretary would have at firſt wheedled, and at laſt endeavour'd to huff, him to appear as an Evidence againſt the forementioned Colonel Fountain. And tho' Drummond averred to him, upon the Word of a Gentleman, that he was ſo far from underſtanding any thing whereof the Colonel was accuſed, that he did not ſo much as know him, nor was ever in his Company, to the beſt of his Remembrance: Yet the forenamed Secretary continued not only to rail againſt Colonel Fountain, as a heinous Traytor that muſt die, but both to inſinuate and affirm, that Drummond muſt know a great deal againſt him. Which ſo provoked the Gentleman, upon the finding himſelf tempted and importuned to murder an innocent Man, by a falſe and perjurious Depoſition, that he told the ſaid Secretary, That as he neither could, nor would be an Evidence in that Matter, ſo the Secretary needed not to be ſo earneſt to ſuborn and debauch him; ſeeing he might eaſily furniſh himſelf with enough of ſuch Witneſſes about the Town, as he look'd after, for half a Guinea a Man. Which as it declares how large and deep this Conſpiracy is, of thoſe that ſerve the Government, againſt the Lives of guiltleſs Perſons; ſo it both ſhews the Hazard that Colonel Fountain is in, upon no other Score ſave that of meer Malice: and unfolds unto us the Methods taken and purſued to draw in and ſuborn Witneſſes.

A. D. 1694. an Adventurer as Brereton, and had even blasted his on Credibility by acknowledging to one Mr. Willoughby, that one of the Lords Justices of Ireland had promis'd he should be provided for all his Life, in case he would be a Witness against Crosby. He also charges him with having defrauded Lord Ranelagh, the Pay-Master of the Forces, of 60*l.* with having forg'd a Bill of 50*l.* of which he receiv'd 15*l.* before the Cheat was discover'd, and with having doubly falsified his Faith, by pretending to be a Convert to the Church of Rome, and, at the same time declaring, that it was not upon Conviction he had done so, but merely to make his Court to his Relations.

Lunt. Lunt comes forward next; and him he traces from the Condition of a Labourer at Highgate, at Twelve-pence a Day, to that of a Gentleman-Witness, with his Purse overflowing with Gold; but not Stage by Stage: For, in order to expose the Ingratitude of the Man, having occasion to say, that he had landed at Dover, from Flanders, in the Year 93, he passes over the Occasion, real or pretended, of his Voyage: It is also observable, that the Instances given of his Ingratitude, are confin'd to the Accusations he had brought against several Persons, who had furnish'd him with Money at Dover, Canterbury, and Rochester, on his Return from that Voyage; and against two more of his Creditors, the one a Man, who, hearing of the Change in his Circumstances, had importun'd him for his Debt; and the other, one who, at several times, had lent him Money to the Amount of 40*l.* And, tho' it should be acknowledg'd, that none but a Villain would have made such a Return to his Benefactors, one cannot help concluding, That neither would the Latter of these have given a mere Labourer Credit for such a Sum as 40*l.* nor the Former been so uncommonly generous to a Traveller on the Road, if there had not been some more cogent Recommendation in his Favour, than the pitiful Tale of a Robbery, which is mention'd as the Inducement in one Instance, or a Series of common Distresses, which we are to believe had the like Operation in the other.

For the Sake of exposing this Witness, and his Employers, it is also said, That he, Lunt, having been serv'd with a legal Warrant, on the 2d of October, for having marry'd two Wives, Aaron Smith, the Solicitor for the Treasury, had represented him as an Instrument of such Consequence to the State, at this Crisis, and had enforc'd this Plea with so menacing an Air, that the Lord Mayor and Recorder, before whom he was brought, admitted him to Bail: Which certainly indicates, that the Solicitor was not more earnest to have the Benefit of his, Lunt's, Evidence, than the Defendants to exempt themselves from the Danger of it.

Wilson. The next Person upon the List is one Wilson, once a Chamberlain at an Inn in Smithfield, whom he dispatches in few Words, by saying, he had been convicted of stealing four Bullocks, before Baron Turton, and burnt in the Hand. He then proceeds to one Chezall, whom he brands with having been dismissed out of Service, for defrauding his Master; with having afterwards forged Notes in his Name four several Times; with having also forged the Hand of one Mr. l'Espine; and with having broke open a Trunk at a Tavern in Bartholomew-Lane. One Aylock, who had been a Servant to the famous Doctor Oates, makes the Third on this black List of Thieves, who having been thrown into Newgate, for robbing a Man of Money and Hair to the Value of 30 l. drew, up in that Place, a Narrative of a Design to assassinate the Queen, and sent it to Ashurst, the Lord Mayor of that Year, who having transmitted it to Mr. Secretary Trenchard, the Latter was not only pleased to cause the Prosecution of the Felon to be suspended, but to give him a weekly Allowance, and to compound the Felony with the Prosecutor. A. D. 1694. Aylock.

The last Persons mentioned by him, are one Bateman and his Wife, who had been thrown into Prison in Flanders, for robbing a Church, and having Reason to apprehend they should be boiled to Death, according to the Usage of the Country in the like Case, found means to obtain a Release through the Intercession of King William, by the Offer of making great Discoveries of a Conspiracy in England against his Person and Government: But these Persons having been consign'd to the Keeping of one Cooke a Messenger, and thinking Theft and Sacrilege to be less Crimes than Perjury, took an Opportunity to rifle their Lodgings of all the Money and Valuables they could find, and made their Escape. Bateman and his Wife.

And lastly, he takes Occasion to observe, That though the violent Prosecution of Plots, was the Disgrace of both Parties in the Reign of King Charles II. no-body was prosecuted by those in Power, for detecting the Forgeries of those Plots, or exposing the detestable Lives and Characters of the Persons then called the King's Witnesses: Whereas such was the Violence of the present Times, that a warrant had been issued from the Secretary's Office in these Words, That They (the Persons empowered to serve them) should apprehend and bring before them, (the said Secretary or Secretaries) the Persons of together with their Papers, for conspiring and endeavouring to suborn Witnesses, against the Lives and Credit of several Witnesses for their Majesties against Persons charged with High-Treason, &c. "Which looks, continues he, like a summoning all the Malefactors in the several Goals of the Kingdom, to come in and list themselves Witnesses for the Government, with an assurance, not only of Protections and Rewards, but that they would have the Satisfaction and Pleasure to see those imprisoned and punished, who should dare to prosecute them for their Crimes." Warrants issued out to screen the Witnesses from Prosecution.

Thus we are to understand, that all was Forgery and Persecution on one Side, and all Innocence and Injury on the other: But if we should allow that the Practices of those in Power, were over violent; that they went upon Presumptions rather than Proofs,

A. D. 1694. Proofs, and that the Character of their Witneſſes were, in general, as black as they were painted, it is but reaſonable to conclude notwithſtanding, That the Repreſentation partakes as ſtrongly of a Party-Biaſs, as the very Proſecutions, it is calculated to expoſe: The Man who makes it, was of as violent a Turn as Trenchard, Johnſton, or the moſt thorough-pac'd Implements of Power: And tho' we are not furniſhed with ſufficient Matter to confute his Facts, we may juſtly queſtion his Ingenuity. A Hint of this Nature has already been dropt; and it is farther to be obſerved, that he, who was ſo particular in remembring, that Lunt, the Witneſs, had once been Lunt the Labourer, ſtudiouſly forgot, that in the Interval, he, Lunt, had been ennobled by the Truſt, repos'd in him by the Jacobite-Party, had undergone a Trial for High-Treaſon at Manchester, and had been acquitted for want of Poſitive, not circumſtantial Proofs.—But Diſingenuity is a Curſe that cleaves to all Parties a-like: And thoſe who endeavour to eſtabliſh the Belief of their Conſpiracy, and thoſe who would explain it away, are alike tainted.

Great Diſingenuity in both Parties.

Vid. p. 349. As far back as the Year 92, we met with ſome Traces of the Diſcovery; and it has been already acknowledged, that ſuch was then the Criſis, as both warranted all the Suſpicions of the Government, and the Precautions that were taken for its Preſervation: But then it has alſo been acknowledged, that theſe Diſcoveries were not ſo perfect as could have been wiſhed: It is moreover reaſonable to think if they had been ſo, the Miniſters would have immediately proceeded to puniſh the Parties concerned; and while they waited for fuller Evidence, the Affair of La Hogue blew up the whole Project, and almoſt extinguiſhed the very Hopes of the Undertakers. How truly, then, ſoever their Intelligence was founded, there was certainly more of Malice and Intereſt, than Wiſdom and Policy in the Uſe that was made of it. At leaſt, we may venture to pronounce, that unleſs the Danger was inſtant, or the Evidence unexceptionable (neither of which happened to be the Caſe) they ought not to have ſet the Nation in a Ferment, for the puniſhing a few obnoxious Individuals, or to furniſh the Malcontents with a Pretence to complain of the Rigour of the Government, merely to make a Merit of their own Vigilance.

The Government Account of the Plot.

Hiſt. of the late Conſpiracy.

And that this was the Caſe, appears in a good Degree, even from that very Book which was ſet forth by the Direction of thoſe in Power, for their own Juſtification. According to that Authority, this Lancaſhire Plot, as it came to be call'd, was ſet on Foot in the Year 1689, by one Bromfield a Quaker; after whom it fell to the Management of one Gordon, one Thriſſall, and Lunt, the Labourer, who were ſent A. D. 1694. from Ireland with Declarations and Commiſſions, from King James to the Roman Catholics; that is to ſay, Gordon to thoſe of Scotland; Thriſſall to thoſe of Yorkſhire; and Lunt to thoſe of Staffordſhire, Cheſhire, and Lancaſhire.

Of Gordon we hear no more: But Thriſſall, we are told, having finiſhed his Negotiation, and being on his return thro' Cheſhire into Ireland, was purſued upon ſuſpicion, and killed in endeavouring to defend himſelf: And as to Lunt, we have already heard how he got off.

Two Perſons more are then mentioned as being in the Secret, viz. one Kelly and one Dodſworth; both of whom turn'd Diſcoverers, and were to have been Joint-Witneſſes againſt Lunt: But the Former diſappeared of a ſudden, no Body could tell how; and the ſingle evidence of the latter was of no Significancy.

For the next Stage of the Plot, we are told of Lunt's being ſent into France, by a Convention of Jacobites at Standiſh-Hall in Lancaſhire, to acquaint King James with the Poſture of Affairs, and to know what Aſſiſtance might be expected from him. This was in November 91, and in December he, Lunt, returned with Aſſurances, That he, King James, was preparing to come in Perſon next Spring; and that, in the mean Time, he would ſend them his laſt inſtructions by a ſure and faithful Hand. Accordingly, Walmſley and Parker were diſpatched on that Errand in the Spring; at leaſt we are ſo informed: As alſo, that they appointed a Meeting of the principal Perſons of their Faction at Dingen-Hall, where they delivered the Commiſſions and Preſents they had brought from France; and confirmed the Advices brought by Lunt, That King James would ſpeedily land in England, with a Force ſufficient to countenance the Efforts of his Friends. But whether theſe Preſents and Commiſſions were accompany'd with the promis'd inſtructions, or, what thoſe Inſtructions were, has never been explain'd.

What follows, is an Account of the intended Deſcent, and of Grandval's Conſpiracy, which is more artfully than fairly made a Branch of the ſame Conſpiracy, by the Mention of Parker as privy to the whole.

The Applications of Sir John Cochran to King James for Money, to enable him to raiſe Commotions in Scotland, ſupported by the Depoſitions of one ſingle Witneſs (Brice Blaire) and an Aſſertion, that Ferguſon was alſo one of the Conſpirators, unſupported by any Depoſition at all, make the next Sections of this Narrative that deſerve Notice: And after a ſtrange Mixture of groſs, general, and inconcluſive Invectives, Lunt is brought upon the Stage again, as very

D. 1694. very active in performing his Commiſſion, and having made a conſiderable Progreſs about the Time when the French Forces were expected to land, by providing Arms, and liſting Men with the Money he had received from Lord Molineaux, and (m) Others of the Conſpirators; as having alſo inſinuated himſelf ſo far into the Favour and Eſteem of the Party, that they again ſent him into France in the Year 93: But whether to carry Advices, or receive Inſtructions, the Author has not thought fit to inform the World. Having then given us a View of King James's Court, as divided into the two Factions of Compounders and Non-compounders, (that is to ſay, Such as were for ſubduing the Nation by Force, and Such as were for giving the People reaſonable Terms) under the Direction of the Lords Middleton and Melford, he tells us, ſomewhat abruptly, That the Latter, whoſe Credit had been in the Wane for ſome time, undertook to recover it, by contriving the Project of aſſaſſinating his Majeſty.

It is ſaid, he had already engag'd Broomfield and Griffin, who had their Correſpondents in England; and that upon Lunt's Arrival, he propos'd the Deſign to him, engag'd him in it, and ſent him to Dover, to concert the Means of executing it, with Captain Stone, Captain Walter, Captain Roberts, one Pepper, and one Preſton, Names never mention'd on the Liſt before.

This, it ſeems, was in July 93; and in the December following, this worthy Fraternity not only engage in this Deſign, but deliberately ſign an Obligation to that Effect: After which, conſulting anew with Lunt about the Means, they were all ſuddenly ſeiz'd with Horror and Remorſe, and as ſuddenly reſolve to atone for their Crime, by diſcovering it to the Council.

It is in this ſtrange manner, and almoſt in theſe Words, this ſtrange Story is told; and that their Information might neither be ſlighted nor ſuſpected, ſays our Author, they made uſe of one Taafe, who, not long before, had done a conſiderable Service to the Government, and conſequently was neither unknown nor unwelcome at Court: But, according to Biſhop Burnet, inſtead of being ſtruck with Horror and Remorſe, Lunt, being bold and poor, turn'd Diſcoverer for the ſake of the Reward; and falling into the Hands of Taafe, was by him introduc'd to the Miniſters, as a Man who had great Diſcoveries to make: To ſhew, alſo, what Reaſon the Miniſters had to confide in Taafe, his Lordſhip moreover tells us, That he was an Iriſh Prieſt, who had not only chang'd his Religion, but had marry'd in King James's Time: That he had been retain'd in the Service of the Government, and had a ſmall Penſion: That he had been long in purſuit of a Diſcovery of the Impoſture in the Birth of the Prince of Wales, and was engag'd with more Succeſs in diſcovering the conceal'd Eſtates of the Prieſts, A. D. 1694. and the religious Orders, in which ſome Progreſs was made.

This, perhaps, was the conſiderable Service before ſpoken of; but whether it was or not, it is manifeſt by the Sequel, That Taafe and Lunt were not more forward to inform, than the Miniſters to believe. In January theſe Informations were taken, and the whole Plan of Proſecution being thoroughly digeſted by the July following, Baker, Taafe, and Lunt were immediately ſent into Lancaſhire, as ſpecified above, in order to ſeize the Conſpirators, and trace out ſuch collateral Proofs of their Guilt, as ſhould ſerve to ſupply all Defects of living Evidence. Some of the Former were taken, and ſome thought fit to abſcond; and as to the Latter, we find them in the Hiſtory of the Conſpiracy ſumm'd up in theſe Words: "Their Houſes were ſearch'd, and in them were found Saddles, Swords, Carbines, great Quantities of Powder and Bullets, Standards, a Commiſſion from King James, &c." But Biſhop Burnet mentions a Carrier, who had been employ'd by the Conſpirators a great while, in carrying down Cheſts of Arms, the Contents of which he had diſcover'd, by the breaking of one of them: He alſo ſays, That in one of their Houſes, incloſ'd very dextrouſly within Walls, Arms were found for a Troop of Horſe: But then he does not ſpecify in whoſe Houſe theſe Arms were found, nor who the Perſons were that employ'd the Carrier. Other Writers mention the Draught of a Remonſtrance or Declaration, to be printed and publiſh'd at King James's landing, which was found at Standiſh-Hall: And when the Trials came on at Mancheſter, by ſpecial Commiſſion, on the 16th and 17th of Octo- The Trials come on at Mancheſter. ber, the Drift of the Depoſitions was to prove, That the Priſoners had receiv'd Commiſſions from the late King James to levy Troops: That they had accordingly levy'd Troops, and form'd them into Bodies, with a Deſign to aſſiſt the French after their landing: That the Papiſts in Lancaſhire contributed Money for the Subſiſtance of theſe Troops: And that they were furniſh'd with Officers, Arms, and all Sorts of Ammunition for War, &c. The Witneſſes who made theſe Depoſitions were Lunt, Wombal, Wilſon, &c. But whatever Foundations of Truth they built upon, or whatever Degree of Credit their Evidence might have deriv'd from the la Hogue Preparations, carry'd on at the ſame Period of Time, and other Circumſtances of Suſpicion; and whatever Precautions had been taken, or Practices had been us'd, to render the whole Detail conſiſtent, and of a Piece, no Regard was ſhewn to their Teſtimony; which was owing to theſe ſeveral Conſiderations: Ferguſon's Letter to Trenchard was in every Man's Hand, and had induc'd all the Effects that the moſt ſanguine of his Party could have expected

(m) Amongſt whom Sir John Friend was one.

A. D. 1694. expected from it: The Miniſtry were ſuſpected of being themſelves the only Plotters; the Witneſſes were, one and all, eſteem'd the moſt profligate of Men: The Inhabitants of Manchester, and the Parts adjacent, were exaſperated to ſuch a Degree, not only againſt them, but againſt all thoſe concern'd in the Proſecution, that it was with great Difficulty ſome of them eſcap'd with their Lives: And if the ſame Spirit of Outrage did not follow them into Court, it is ſaid a Spirit of Prejudice did: Sir William Williams, who was firſt Counſel for the King, ſtands charg'd with having endeavour'd to baffle and confound the King's Witneſſes; and ſome of the Judges themſelves with being pre-engag'd and poſſeſs'd with groundleſs Prejudices againſt them: And when Lunt was requir'd to diſtinguiſh every one of the Priſoners at the Bar by Name, and happen'd to miſtake one Perſon for another, the Court rung with the Shouts of Joy and Diriſion it occaſion'd.

Boyer. Tindal. Hiſt. of the Conſpiracy.

But tho' theſe Circumſtances are dwelt upon by thoſe who are themſelves tinctur'd with the Jaundice of Party, That which brought the Affair to a Deciſion, was the ſurprizing Declaration made by Taaſe in open Court, viz. That the whole Plot was no other than a villanous Contrivance between himſelf and Lunt: For no ſooner had this counter Diſcovery been made, than Sir William Williams threw up the Cauſe; and the Judges, in their Charge to the Jury, directed ſuch an Iſſue, that the Priſoners were acquitted, and all thoſe who were under Confinement, on the ſame Evidence, were order'd to be enlarg'd.

The King's Council threw up the Proſecution.

It ought not, however, to be forgot, That this ſtrange Turn in Taaſe's Conduct, is aſcrib'd to a corrupt Influence. This is aſſerted by ſome in general Terms; as that, being diſappointed in his Hopes of a farther Proviſion from the Court, he liſten'd to the advantageous Offers made him by the other Side: According to Biſhop Burnet, he ſent them Word, That if he could be well paid for it, he would bring them all off; and, continues he, it may be eaſily imagin'd that they ſtuck at nothing for ſuch a Service: But Others more particularly tell us, That having committed ſeveral groſs Felonies in the Courſe of his Attendance on Captain Baker and his military Aſſiſtants, and finding himſelf not only ſlighted, but reprimanded, when he apply'd for a Reward, he grew angry, and ſtruck a Bargain with the Agents of the Priſoners for twenty Pounds down, and a good Annuity for Life, to be ſettled in Lancaſhire: The Latter moreover add, That other Practices of the ſame kind were try'd on ſeveral other of the King's Witneſſes, tho' without Effect: And that when it appear'd they were not to be corrupted, they brib'd others to blaſt their Credit, by Forgeries of the blackeſt Kind, which theſe laſt were ſo much the more eaſily induc'd to do, becauſe not being upon their Oaths, they could not incur either the Guilt or Danger of Perjury. What, however is ſcarce to be accounted for, we are yet farther told, That nothing was alledg'd by theſe Hirelings (except what was alledg'd by Taaſe) that could invalidate the King's Evidence: So that we muſt either conclude that their Invention fell ſhort of their Wickedneſs, or, which is more likely to be the Caſe, that, inſtead of endeavouring to diſprove any part of the Evidence, they were brought forward to ſhew, That the Evidence of ſuch Miſcreants ought not to be admitted at all. Burnet, who had many Reaſons, to give the beſt Colour he could to this Proceeding, is expreſs, "That Taaſe witneſs'd many Things againſt Lunt that ſhook his Credit. Taaſe, continues he, had engag'd him in Company in London, to whom he had talk'd very idly, like a Man who reſolv'd to make a Fortune by Swearing: And it ſeem'd by what he had ſaid, That he had many Diſcoveries yet in Reſerve, which he intended to ſpread among many, till he ſhould grow rich and conſiderable by it; this was ſworn againſt him." He alſo ſays, "There was another Evidence that ſupported Lunt's Evidence; but he was ſo profligate a Man, that great and juſt Obligations lay againſt giving him any Credit." In ſhort, the Biſhop himſelf is forc'd to reſt the Merits of the Cauſe on the Carrier's Evidence only, which he ſays, was not ſhaken. If, therefore, all that he depos'd ſhould be admitted, and farther, that the Arms he had carry'd at different Times from London, were to be apply'd to traitorous Purpoſes, which even the Carrier himſelf could not prove, the Law could take no Cognizance of the Fact, for want of ſufficient Evidence: It is therefore no Wonder at all, That Sir William Williams ſhould refuſe to proceed with the Trials, when the Credit of Lunt, the principal Witneſs, was ſo effectually blaſted; That he ſhould ſet out Poſt for London, as ſoon as the Trial was over, to remonſtrate againſt the Iniquity of the whole Proceeding; or That the Court ſhould endeavour to make their Peace with the Public, by committing their own Witneſſes to Newgate, and ordering them to be proſecuted for a Conſpiracy againſt the Lives and Honours of the Gentlemen of Lancaſhire: And all that is left us to wonder at, is, That in the Hiſtory of the Conſpiracy, ſo often quoted, and which was ſet forth under the Countenance of the Miniſters themſelves, the Aſſaſſination-Part of the Conſpiracy ſhould be retain'd, when not one Syllable of the Nature was offer'd in Evidence.

A. D. 1694.

The Witneſſes committed.

The whole Kingdom rung with every Particular of the Story: The Diſaffected did not fail to make the moſt malicious Uſe of it; and thoſe who had the Honour and Intereſt of the Government moſt at Heart, found it extremely difficult to obviate the Reſentments it cauſ'd. That, however, the Abhorrence which the Court affected to teſtify on the Occaſion, was Affectation merely, or ſomewhat worſe; namely, an Artifice to take the Proſecution out of the Hands of the injur'd Perſons, who, they were ſure, would make the moſt of it, the Sequel will ſufficiently manifeſt: But that

A. D. 1694. we may not anticipate Events, it is neceſſary, in the firſt Place, to accompany the King in his Return from the Army, and to bring down the Series of Affairs to the Opening of the Seſſion.

It was the 30th of September, N. S. when his Majeſty quitted the Field; and on the 5th of October, late at Night, he arrived at Loo, having review'd the Troops commanded by the Earl of Athlone, in the Neighbourhood of Ghent, and viſited the Fortifications of Leige and Maeſtricht, in his Way: Here he remain'd till the 23d; and in this Interval a Paper was handed about the ſeveral Courts of Europe, under the Title of Articles of Peace propoſ'd by the King of France to the Confederates; which Articles were as follow, viz.

Propoſals of Peace ſaid to be made by France.

1. That the King abſolutely abandons the Thoughts of aggrandiſing himſelf, and enlarging his Conqueſts.

2. That the King will reſtore, to thoſe to whom they belong, all his Conqueſts won ſince the Beginning of the War, without Exception.

3. That the King will reſtore Straſburg, Luxemburg, Mont-Royal, Fort-Lewis, and Friburg, as they are, and Hunningen demoliſh'd.

4. That the Pretenſions of the Duke of Orleans, and Madame his Wife, ſhall be compenſated by the Immunities allow'd by the Prince Palatine.

5. That the King will reſtore Lorrain entire, excepting Saar Lewis, Binche, and Homburg, for which the King will give an Equivalent.

6. That the King will reſtore Caſal to the Duke of Mantua, provided he pay back the Money which he receiv'd.

7. That a good Correſpondence ſhall be eſtabliſh'd between France and England, as well in Europe as in America, and other Places: To which Purpoſe the King promiſes not to give any Aid or Support to King James, or his Children, provided King William ſhall allow King James a Penſion, where he ſhall think convenient to retire.

8. That Trade ſhall be reſtor'd between the King of France and the States-General, as it was before the War.

9. That the King, in reſpect to the potent Allies, and for the Good of the Peace, ſhall reſtore to the Proteſtants of his Kingdom, as alſo thoſe that are Abroad, without Exception, entire Liberty of Conſcience, with full Poſſeſſion of their Eſtates, Advantages and Prerogatives, as before the vacating the Edict of Nants.

10. That the King, in caſe the King of Spain dies without Children, renounces all the Right and Title which the Dauphin may pretend to in Flanders, in favour of the Duke of Bavaria, provided the Emperor conſent to the Renunciation of the deceas'd Queen, Mary Thereſa of Auſtria, to the Crown of Spain.

11. That for the Eſtabliſhment of a good and firm Peace, and in order to a juſt and amicable Adjuſtment of the Pretenſions and Exceptions of Parties, Commiſſioners ſhall be appointed on both Sides, with plenary Power: And in caſe they cannot agree, the King offers to ſubmit fully and wholly the Deciſion of the Queſtions undetermin'd, to the moſt ſerene Republick of Venice. A. D. 1694.

But tho' theſe Articles were aſcrib'd to France, there is no Proof to be trac'd that they were iſſued from hence: On the contrary, thoſe, who furniſe, that they might poſſibly be thrown out as a Lure by the French Miniſters, profeſs to believe the contrary: On the other Hand, Hallewyn's Caſe has already furniſh'd us with ſufficient Evidence, That as there was one Faction in Holland, who had their Reaſons to be as deſirous of Peace as any of the French Cabinet, ſo there was alſo Another, which being as obſtinately bent on continuing the War, made it their Buſineſs to decry every Propoſition which had a Tendency that way, as calculated only to render the Confederates ſuſpicious of each other, and conſequently to diſſolve the Union. Remarks thereon.

Even Burnet himſelf makes uſe of the following Expreſſions: "At the End of the Campaign, the Court of France flatter'd their People with Hopes of a ſpeedy End of the War: And ſome Men, of great Conſideration, were ſent to try what Terms they could bring the Empire or the States to: But the French were yet far from offering Conditions, upon which a juſt or a ſafe Peace could be treated of: The States ſent ſome as far as to Maeſtricht, to ſee what Powers thoſe ſent from France had brought with them, before they would grant them the Paſſports that they deſir'd: And when they ſaw how limited theſe were, the Negotiation was ſoon at an End, or rather, it never began. When the French ſaw this, they diſown'd their having ſent any on ſuch an Errand; and pretended, that this was only an Artifice of the Confederates to keep one another, and their People in Heart, by making them believe that they had now only a ſmall Remnant of the War before them, ſince the French had Inſtruments every where at work to ſolicit a Peace."

Thus we have an Acknowledgement, that ſome new Advances were made on the Side of France: And in order to prove that the Powers of the French Agents were too limited, and that their Offers were unjuſt and unſafe, both the one and the other ſhould have been explan'd: But however this may be, that the French ſhould diſown their having ſent any Perſons on ſuch Errand, is utterly inconceivable: For we have ſeen the Miniſters of Sweden and Denmark openly acting as their Solicitors; and the great Meaſure they made uſe of to reconcile their People to the Burden and Miſery of the War, was a conſtant Avowal of their Inclinations and Endeavours to effectuate a Peace.

But whether the Offers they made were really unreaſonable, or were unreaſonably refus'd, when his Majeſty repair'd to the Hague, the State of the War was adjuſted for the enſuing Year; and to induce the Parliament of England to concur, was all that remain'd to be done, to render the Syſtem complete.

According

A. D. 1694. According to the Proclamation which had been iſſued for the Meeting, the Members of both Houſes had been charg'd and commanded to give their Attendance, for the Diſpatch of Buſineſs, on the 6th of November: The Marquis of Carmarthen, with the Yachts and a Squadron of Men of War, had arriv'd in the Maeſe, about the 10th of October, to wait his Majeſty's Leiſure: But the Winds hanging Weſterly, and *continuing to blow very hard for ſeveral Days together, he could not embark till the 6th of November, (on which Day the Parliament was adjourn'd, by Commiſſion, till the 12th) nor ſet Sail till the 8th at Noon; but was then favour'd with ſo quick a Paſſage, that he landed at Twelve the next Day at Margate, from whence he proceeded to Canterbury the ſame Night; and having been met by the Queen at Rocheſter on the Morrow, arriv'd at Kenſington in the Evening; having been receiv'd as a Conqueror all the way; and as if there was no ſuch thing as Diſcontent or Diſaffection in the Land.

The King lands at Margate.

Congratulated by the City.

On the 12th the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London waited on his Majeſty; and the Recorder, in the Name of the City, congratulated him on his ſafe and happy Return, and the proſperous State of his Affairs, both by Sea and Land: After which they paid the ſame Compliments to the Queen, with ſupplemental Acknowledgments of her wiſe and proſperous Adminiſtration of the Government, during his Majeſty's Abſence: Of the whole Ceremonial, a proper Entry was made in the Gazette; and as if to reproach the other Corporations of the Kingdom, for not having diſcover'd a ſufficient Senſibility of the Happineſs they enjoy'd, a few Days after, a national Thankſgiving was appointed for the great Mercies of Almighty God, in preſerving their Majeſties, and their Government, againſt the Deſigns and Attempts of their open and ſecret Enemies; in protecting his Majeſty's Perſon from the Danger to which it had been expos'd in his late Expedition, and in granting ſuch Succeſs to his Arms, and to thoſe of his Confederates, both by Sea and Land, as had put a conſiderable Stop to the Rage and Fury of the Enemy.

Proclamation for a national Thankſgiving.

It will now, perhaps, be expected that we ſhould proceed to the Buſineſs of the Seſſion: But there remains ſtill another Point to be treated of firſt; as well becauſe it ſtands foremoſt in order of Time, as becauſe of the great Uſe that was made of it for twenty Years together, by all the Diſcontented of the old monarchical Party.

Finding the People were not to be ſufficiently fermented by any civil Conſiderations, and recollecting what Uſe had been made of the Affair of Magdalen College, the Trial of the Biſhops, &c. by the Undertakers in the late Revolution, the Enemies to the Government ſet forth a Pamphlet, during the Receſs, under the Title of Querela Temporum, or, The Danger of the Church of England: The Scope and Tendency of which was to ſhew, That as much was to be apprehended from Preſbytery now, as from Popery then; by Arguments and Inferences drawn from the Abolition of Epiſcopacy in Scotland; the diſtributing all the Powers of the State, Eccleſiaſtic, Civil, and Military, among Latitudinarian Time-ſervers, political Indifferents, known Atheiſts, and occaſional Conformiſts, and the Act of Toleration; concerning which, and the State of Epiſcopacy in England, he takes the Liberty to write as follows: "What a contemptible Figure do our Biſhops now make in the Houſe of Lords? It was never ſo known before: No, never! They are oblig'd either to quit their Seats in that Houſe, or to bear the Raillery of the Lay-Lords every Day, who think them a dead Weight among the Peers, of whom the greateſt Part would be glad to be rid of them, not only out of their Houſe, but out of the Nation. And the Houſe of Commons, as well as the Lords, have ſeveral Times minded them of their Frailty; and that what has been done (in Scotland, for example, and in England in 42) may be done as well in this as in other Things. But more than all this, both Houſes of Commons and Lords have ſhewn their Love to us, and high Regard of our Conſtitution, in that they have diveſted us of all our Authority over the People, by their unlimited Act of Indulgence to all Sorts and Sizes of Diſſenters; and commanding, That the eccleſiaſtical Courts ſhould have no Power to proceed againſt any of them; and giving Power to the Juſtices of Peace, at this Seſſions, to licence Teachers and Preachers, as it is in the Act of Toleration, 24 May, 89, prim. Guil. & Mar. This has render'd our Church a perfect Cypher: And if any, or all, of our Flocks ſhould deſert us To-morrow, and go over openly to the Diſſenters, we have no Power left us, by this Act, to reſtrain any of them by eccleſiaſtic Cenſures, or any other way; and the whole Nation have Liberty to believe any of their Communicants to be as ſafe a way to Heaven, as our own."—How ſtrong an Argument this very Invective contains for the Toleration, there is no need to point out: And how untowardly the Author plays the Advocate, even for that very Church, which he affects to be ſo much concern'd for, may be farther ſeen, when, coming to ſpeak of the Rents and Revenues, which, he ſays, were all which the Government had left it; he proceeds in theſe Words: "The Church, tho' over-run with Errors, was in far greater Authority and Reverence than now, when Henry VIII. ſeiz'd her Revenue; and had more, and greater Friends to ſtand by her. The Pope, and all the then Chriſtian Princes, did deteſt this Act as ſacrilegious, and were highly concern'd to have it rectify'd; and it was thought abominable to all England, except thoſe among whom he divided the Spoil. But is there one Man in the World would be concern'd for us, or pity us, if we loſt all?" Thus it appears, That the firſt Outcry concerning the Danger of the Church, aroſe from a Popiſh Prieſt; for ſurely none but a Popiſh Prieſt would have ſet ſuch a Value on the Pope's Deteſtation of that Act, Account of a Pamphlet concerning the Danger of the Church.

Reaſon for aſcribing it to a Popiſh Prieſt.

A. D. 1694. or his Concern to have it rectify'd: With what Intent it was rais'd, appears alſo from the following Paſſage: "We ſee the Enemy already Roar in the Midſt of our Congregations, and they have ſet up their Banners for a Token: We ſeem now to hold our Poſt, but at their Diſcretion, till they are ready to give the Word, as in Scotland, No more Epiſcopacy! No more Church of England! But we ſhall not fall like them: They fell altogether; every Biſhop in the Kingdom, and almoſt the whole Number of the inferior Clergy. They may riſe again, and will riſe Glorious, aſſerting ſtill the ſame Principles as we did before in the Reſtoration, 1660. But as for us now, Whether ſhall we cauſe our Shame to go? Will not the Scots upbraid us? Where was our Zeal for Epiſcopacy, or Foreſight of our own Danger, when we ſtood ſilent by, and ſaw their Fall, without putting in one Addreſs, or ſhewing the leaſt Concern for our Brethren? They will mind us (for we have not thought of it) of the Zeal which the Engliſh Biſhops ſhew'd in the Caſe of the Archbiſhop of Glaſgow, unjuſtly depriv'd by Lay-Authority, in the Reign of Charles the Second, tho' there was an Act of Parliament there to countenance it; they eſpous'd it as their own Cauſe, (for ſo indeed it was) till they prevail'd with the King to have him reſtor'd. But now we could ſee not only all the Biſhops in that Kingdom, but our own renown'd Metropolitan, and near half of the then Biſhops of our own Kingdom, depriv'd by mere Lay-Authority, (not to mention the Diſpute of the Validity of that Lay-Authority, and the Cauſe, which none of us did think ſufficient for a Deprivation) without interpoſing one Word on their Behalf; or ſo much as for having that Allowance made good to them, which was provided for them by the Act of Parliament, either by King William, to whom the Act entruſted the diſpoſing of it; or if not from his Juſtice, yet at leaſt from the Generoſity of thoſe who came, unwilling and ſorrowful, as they pretended, into their Places: Nor did our Convocation once complain of the Abſence of their Archbiſhop, and ſo many of their other Biſhops, or make any Addreſs on their Behalf, or deſire any Conference with them, to know their Reaſons, and endeavour any Accommodation. No; we did none of theſe Things: We were ſeiz'd with, I know not what, panic Conſternation. Though all were well inclin'd, and every one would gladly have been a Second, yet none durſt begin. We were Paſſive here to a ſuperlative Degree: Our Courage and our Souls have left us: We lie under the Load, tho' we ſee ourſelves ſinking with it. What is this but Infatuation! and the End muſt be Deſtruction. But now, at laſt, if we have any Spirit left, tho' we have not made any Addreſs, or ſhewn ourſelves concern'd for the Caſe of our Brethren in Scotland, or for our depriv'd Biſhops and Clergy here; yet let us not ſit ſtill, and, by a ſupine Negligence, be ſo wanting to ourſelves, as at leaſt not to Petition, to repreſent our Fears and our Danger to the King and Government, to deſire ſome Redreſs to our juſt Grievances; that there may be an Alteration of the Perſons employ'd in public Offices, and ſuch only ſet at the Head of Affairs as are ſincerely for the Church of England; and let us make our Exceptions againſt thoſe whom we know to be of a quite different Intereſt. We ventur'd upon all this, and more, to King James, and had good Succeſs in it. Who knows but, upon our appearing zealous and active for the Safety of the Church, Others of our Flocks may join with us; at leaſt, they will approve and juſtify us in aſſerting our and their true Intereſt. But who will ſtir for us, or ſtand by us, if we dare not ſo much as open our Mouths in our own Behalf? It is our Office to lead and inſtruct them: They will love us the better for it; and we may, by this, recover many whom we have loſt. But we ſhall loſe all, if we render ourſelves wholy inſignificant and inſenſible of the Encroachments which are daily made upon us: And our Poſterities may curſe us, in whoſe Power it was to have ſtem'd this Tide, if we had taken it in time. The People will never believe that we can be hearty to them, and ſtand in the Gap for Preſervation of their Rights and Privileges, (as we have heretofore done, and were honour'd for it) while they ſee us ſo very diſpirited and negligent in our own. At leaſt this we ſhall gain by it, That if a deaf Ear be given to all our Applications, we may then reſt aſſur'd of what is determin'd againſt us."

A. D. 1694.

And with how little Reaſon this Outcry was rais'd, not only the political Uſe, which in all Reigns has been made both of the Church and her right Reverend Fathers, but the Experience of more than half a Century has demonſtrated.

Thoſe who either compos'd, or directed the compoſing this Pamphlet, it muſt be imagin'd, ſpar'd no Pains either to diſperſe or countenance it: But how earneſtly and ſincerely ſoever they labour'd to render it effectual, it had not the deſir'd Effect: The Clergy, ſatisfied, That their Rents and Revenues were ſafe, had no Inclination to countenance any ſuch Meaſure, as, perhaps, might really endanger them: And hence it follow'd, that, notwithſtanding theſe Endeavours on one Hand, and thoſe of the Lancaſhire Gentlemen, and their Friends, on the other, that Biſhop Burnet is authoris'd to ſay, That the Parliament was open'd with a calmer Face than had appear'd in any Seſſion during the Reign. A Seſſion of Parliament.

His Majeſty's Speech, upon this Occaſion, was conceiv'd in the following Words:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

I am glad to meet you here, when I can ſay our Affairs are in a better Poſture, both by Sea and Land, than when we parted laſt. The King's Speech.

The Enemy has not been in a Condition to oppoſe our Fleet in theſe Seas; and our ſending ſo great a Force into the Mediterranean, has diſappointed their Deſigns, and leaves us a Proſpect of farther Succeſs.

With reſpect to the War by Land, I think I may ſay, that this Year a Stop has been

A. D. 1694. been put to the Progreſs of the French Arms.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

I have had ſo much Experience of your good Affection to me, and of your Zeal for the Public, that I cannot doubt of your Aſſiſtance at this Time: I do therefore earneſtly recommend to you, to provide ſuch Supplies, as may enable me to proſecute the War with Vigour; which is the only Means to procure Peace to Chriſtendom, with the Safety and Honour of England.

I muſt likewiſe put you in Mind, that the Act of Tunnage and Poundage expires at Chriſtmas; and I hope you will think fit to continue that Revenue to the Crown: Which is the more neceſſary at this Time, in regard the ſeveral Branches of the Revenue are under great Anticipations, for extraordinary Expences of the War, and ſubject to many Demands upon other Accounts.

I cannot but mention to you again, the Debt for the Tranſport-Ships employ'd in reducing of Ireland, which is a Caſe of Compaſſion, and deſerves Relief.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I ſhould be glad you would take into your Conſideration, the preparing ſome good Bill for the Encouragement of our Seamen: You cannot but be ſenſible, how much a Law of this Nature, would tend to the Advancement of Trade, and of the naval Strength of the Kingdom, which is our great Intereſt, and ought to be our principal Care."

Commons adjourn.

It is remarkable, that tho' the Seſſion was open'd ſix Days later than was expected, the Commons did not proceed to Buſineſs; but, on the contrary, adjourn'd till the 19th; which ſeem'd to indicate, either That the Plan was not ſettled, or that ſome preparatory Meaſures were firſt to be taken with the Leaders of the Oppoſition: Biſhop Burnet ſuggeſts, That the Bill of frequent Parliaments, or, as it has been ſince call'd, the Triennial Bill, was, by expreſs Bargain, the Price of the Supply: And ſo far, indeed, this Suggeſtion is countenanc'd by the Matter of Fact, that the firſt material Order of the Houſe, after Adjournment, was for

Bill for frequent Parliaments order'd.

Mr. Harley to prepare and bring in the ſaid Bill: And what follow'd was calling for Accounts, Eſtimates, Contracts, and all thoſe other Papers which are made uſe of to juſtify Demands on one Side, and Compliances on the other. On the 21ſt a Supply was unanimouſly voted: On the 22d the Bill was preſented and receiv'd. On the 30th it was reſolv'd, That the Sum of 2,382,712*l.* ſhould be granted for the Service of the Navy, and 2,382,000*l.* for that of the Army: Towards the raiſing theſe immenſe Sums, it was farther reſolv'd December 4. That Four Shillings in the Pound ſhould be levy'd on the Land; and that the Subſidies of Tunnage and Poundage, which expir'd on the 24th inſtant, ſhould be granted for the Term of five Years longer, to begin from the 26th; ſo that there was an Intermiſſion of theſe Duties for one Day; and this was wiſely provided, that the Crown might not, in length of Time, plead Preſcription for thoſe Revenues, and continue to levy them by Prerogative, inſtead of Donation from the People: On the 30th the Triennial Bill was ſent up by Colonel Granville to the Lords, and on the 18th the Lordſhips ſignify'd by Meſſage, That they had agreed to it without Amendment; and in every Stage of its Progreſs the Tunnage-Bill waited upon it, if it did not bear it Company.

A. D. 1694.

Tunnage and Poundage renew'd.

The two Bills keep pace.

Of the Latter of theſe Bills, no more need be ſaid than is contain'd in the Preamble to it; which runs in theſe Words—"The Commons, aſſembled in Parliament, repoſing Truſt and Confidence in your Majeſties, for the guarding of the Seas, againſt all Perſons who ſhall attempt to invade this your Realm, or to diſturb your Subjects in their Trade and Commerce, towards the defraying the neceſſary Charge thereof, and alſo for the better enabling your Majeſties to proſecute the preſent War, againſt the French King, with Vigour, have chearfully and unanimouſly given and granted, &c."

Some Account of them.

But of the Former, as well becauſe of the many fruitleſs Efforts which had been made to obtain it, as becauſe of the extraordinary Fate which many Years afterwards overtook it, a more copious Account ought to be given.

The Neceſſity of frequent Parliaments had been aſſerted in the laſt Article of the Declaration of Rights; but then it had been aſſerted in ſuch indefinite Terms, that the King did not think himſelf oblig'd to obſerve it: And in the Courtiers Senſe, frequent Seſſions did as well: When, therefore, Experience began to ſhew, That long Parliaments, and all the Abuſes and Corruptions they produc'd, were as fondly cheriſh'd in this Reign, and by the ſame Party, which in that of Charles II. had been ſo eager to detect and expoſe them, this Expedient of the Triennial Bill was again brought into Play, and proſecuted with ſo much Steddineſs and Perſeverance, as, at length, got the better of all Oppoſition.

The Preamble, which deſerves to be had in everlaſting Remembrance, was conceiv'd in theſe Words: "Whereas, by the antient Laws and Statutes of this Kingdom, frequent Parliaments ought to be held; and whereas frequent and new Parliaments tend very much to the happy Union and good Agreement of the King and People, we, your Majeſties moſt loyal and obedient Subjects, the Lords &c. do moſt humbly beſeech your moſt excellent Majeſties, &c."

By the firſt enacting Clauſe, it was provided, That from thenceforth a Parliament ſhould be held once in three Years at the leaſt: By the Second, That within three Years at fartheſt, after the Diſſolution of the Parliament then ſubſiſting, and ſo from time to time for ever after, legal Writs under the great Seal, ſhould be iſſued, by the Direction

A. D. 1694. rection of the (n) Crown, for calling, aſſembling, and holding another new Parliament. By the Third, That no Parliament whatſoever ſhould have Continuance longer than for three Years only, at the fartheſt; to be accounted from the firſt Day of the firſt Seſſion: And by the Fourth, That the ſaid then ſubſiſting Parliament ſhould ceaſe and determine on the firſt Day of the next following November, unleſs their Majeſties ſhould think fit to diſſolve it ſooner.

A Proteſt againſt the Triennial Bill. It ſhould alſo be remember'd, that, upon the laſt reading of the Bill in the Houſe of Lords, the Lords Devonſhire, Weymouth, Aylesbury, and Halifax, enter'd their Proteſt againſt it, for this Reaſon, viz. Becauſe it tended to the Continuance of the preſent Parliament, longer than, as they apprehended, was agreeable to the Conſtitution of England; and becauſe of the ill Conſequences which, in many Reſpects, might attend it.

Royal Aſſent given to both. And now both Bills lying ready for the Royal Aſſent, his Majeſty came to the Houſe of Peers, on the 22d, and having firſt beſtow'd that Grace on the Tunnage-Bill, ſuffer'd its Companion, the (o) Triennial-Bill, alſo to become a Law.

Remarks thereon. Why his Majeſty formerly rejected this Bill, has been already inſinuated: And that he paſs'd it now, may poſſibly be imputed to the Bargain diſcours'd of by Burnet: But the Fact has been treated in ſo different a manner, by different Authors, that the Reader has a Right to have all their ſeveral Authorities laid before him.

But by way of Preparatory, it will be neceſſary to premiſe, That her Majeſty, the Queen, had been taken ill the Day before, and, according to the general Apprehenſion, of the Small-Pox, which had been very riſe, and very fatal, during the whole Seaſon.—Mr. Boyer, notwithſtanding, ſays, That the paſſing the long-wiſh'd-for Bill, for the frequent meeting of Parliaments, before the Queen was taken ill, was the moſt lucky Hit of King William's Politics: According to Biſhop Kennet, "There ſeem'd to be a particular Providence that directed the King to the Wiſdom of paſſing that popular Bill, before the Death of the Queen; for, continues he, if it had been deferr'd to this time, ſome People would not have fail'd to ſay, That he had been forc'd to it by the Neceſſity of his Affairs." And as to Biſhop Burnet, (forgetting the Bargain which he had ſpoke of before) he roundly declares, That if the King had not paſs'd the Bill on the Second Day of the Queen's Illneſs, it is very probable he would never have paſs'd it. A. D. 1694.

Theſe are almoſt the very Words of his Lordſhip: But, perhaps, he ought rather to have ſaid, That if the Queen's Illneſs had not happen'd, his Majeſty would not have paſs'd it: For, upon her Death, he could ſcarce have avoided it: And his Policy conſiſts in having provided againſt the worſt, and thereby put in for all the Merit, which his former Refuſal had left within his Reach. What, however, the Former of theſe Right Reverend Fathers does not care to admit, the Latter makes no Difficulty to avow: And it is certain, that if either the Rectitude of the Meaſure, or the Demands of his People, had weigh'd with him, they would have operated as forcibly in the firſt Inſtance as in the laſt.

Having incidentally touch'd on the Malady which had ſeiz'd the Queen, it may be expected that we ſhould now haſten to the Event: But there is yet another melancholy Incident, the Death of Archbiſhop Tillotſon, which, ſtanding foremoſt in point of Time, muſt, for that Reaſon, be treated of firſt.

Death of Archbiſhop Tillotſon. He was ſeiz'd with a Fit of the dead Palſy, at Whitehall-Chapel: But tho' he felt the Approach, did not think it decent to interrupt the Courſe of divine Service, by withdrawing for Aſſiſtance: The Conſequence was, that the Diſeaſe obtain'd the Maſtery, and Death follow'd on the fifth Day after the Attack. It is ſaid, That he continued ſenſible a great part of the Time; that he appear'd compos'd and reſign'd; and that in broken Words he made a Shift to ſay, Thank God I am quiet within!—I have nothing to do but to wait the Will of Heaven. Burnet preach'd his Funeral Sermon; and the Character he gave of the Deceas'd, (ſeverely true, as he declares it was, and rather leſs than larger than the Life) together with the over-flow of Rancour, which, in the ſame Breath, he raſhly diſcharg'd againſt the depriv'd Clergy, drew both on the Dead and the Living as ſevere Invectives: According to the Preacher, Tillotſon was a Man whoſe Life was free from Blemiſhes, was ſhining in all the Parts of it, was an Example of all ſublime and heroical Piety and Virtue, and a Pattern both to Church and State: According to Thoſe who anſwer'd him, ſuppoſing theſe Things to be true, they were not to be admitted on the Authority of him who deliver'd them: According to them, Burnet had no (p) Authority, and Til-

Different Characters of him.

(n) By the Triennial Act, paſs'd in 1640, the Lord-Chancellor, or Lord-Keeper, were oblig'd to iſſue the Writs within the Term, whether directed or not, on pain of loſing their Places: And when King Charles afterwards upbraided the Parliament with the Favour he had done them in paſſing this Act, they reply'd, That it was not ſo much as by Law they could require, there being two Statutes then in force for a Parliament once a Year. Theſe two Statutes were, 1. That of the 4th of Edward III. in which it is accorded, That a Parliament ſhould be holden every Year once, and more often if Need be. And 2dly, That of the 36th of the ſame Edward, in which it is enacted, That for the Maintenance of the ſaid Articles and Statutes, and the Redreſs of divers Miſchiefs and Grievances which daily happen, a Parliament ſhould be holden every Year.

(o) In the Year 1716 this Act was repeal'd, and a Septennial Act was ſubſtituted in lieu of it, which I mention in this Place for the ſake of what follows: One Cranfhanks, an Officer in the Treaſury, writing four Years after upon the Funds, in anſwer to certain Papers ſet forth by Archibald Hutcheſon, Eſq; and often going out of his way for the ſake of forcing a Compliment on our great Deliverer, found the Times ſo ſore on that Head, and was ſo afraid of touching the Ulcer, that tho' he has treated largely of the Tunnage Bill, and the Queen's Death, he did not think fit to mention the Triennial Bill at all.

(p) To prove this they quoted Paſſages out of his own Writings, to this Effect, "That there was no Hereſy ſo contrary to the whole Deſign of Religion, and more deſtructive to Mankind, than the bloody Opinion of defending Religion by

A. D. 1694. Tillotson's Life abounded more with (q) Blemishes than Beauties; and the Truth of the Matter is, That Prejudice was equally predominant on both Sides. The Archbishop was a Man of shining Parts, and eminent Accomplishments; but not altogether so consistent with himself as became a Philosopher, a Hero, and a Saint: That he was as much an Enemy to the narrow, servile, selfish, hypocritical Practices of Priests, as a Priest could be, ought to be acknowledg'd: But then, that he was not so averse to the Refinements of the Courtier, as an inflexible Patriot ought to have been, cannot be deny'd: In all that Largeness of Sentiment, and Extensiveness of Charity, for which he has been so highly extoll'd by some, and so bitterly reproach'd by others, there was more of A. D. 1694.

by Arms, and of forcible Resistance, upon the Colour of preserving Religion. And that less Disorder was to be apprehended from the Pretensions of the Roman Bishops, than from those Maxims which put the Power of judging and controlling the Magistrate, and which open'd a Door to endless Confusion, and set every private Person in the Throne." And to these Passages of his own Writing, they oppos'd his own Practice, 1. In persuading the Princess of Orange to the unnatural Invasion of her Father's Crown. 2. In answering a certain noble Lord, (the Marquis of Halifax) who ask'd him, when sent as one of the three Commissioners from his Majesty to the Prince of Orange, What then must we do with the King? In these Words, He must be deposed! He must be deposed! [See the Bishop's Account of this Matter in the History of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 794.] And, 3dly, (tho' many more Instances are given) In his Behaviour to Mr. Nopleton, who brought Advice to the Prince, then at Windsor, of the King's having been stopt at Feversham, of which a Detail has already been given in the former Volume, p. 1066. and to which the following Paragraph was, at the time of this Controversy, annex'd. "He wept like any Crocodile at Mr. Nopleton's Relation of the barbarous Usage which the King met with at Feversham: And, pray, Mr. Nopleton, said he, still wiping his Eyes, carry my Duty to the King, and let him know my Concern for him. Which puts me in mind of a Story that I have heard of that Master-Enthusiast Cromwell, who, when a Gentleman came to entreat his Excellency, that he would give him Leave that he might have a Lock of the beheaded King's Hair, for an honourable Lady—Ah No, Sir, said he, bursting into Tears, That must not be: For, I swore to him, when he was living, That not a Hair of his Head should perish.

(q) To prove which, as also, That he was not educated among the best Sort of Puritans, as Burnet had asserted in his Sermon, they made a Collection of all the exceptionable Passages in his Life, of which the following may serve for a Specimen.

"But I have reason to think that they were not the best Sort of Puritans, under whom he had his first Education: First, Because his Father very early turn'd Anabaptist, which gave some Occasion to call his Baptism into question: And, Secondly, Because the best sort of Puritans, as hath been often shew'd, were far from the Principles of Resistance and Rebellion; but under whomsoever he had his first Education, he came season'd to the University of Cambridge, with those Principles. For not long after he came thither, King Charles the First was brought by Cambridge to Hampton-Court, and lodging at Sir John Cuts's House, at Childerly, near that University, the Scholars went thither to kiss his Hand: But he, and some few more, had so signaliz'd themselves for those they then call'd Round-Heads, that they were not admitted to that Honour with the rest of the Scholars. Within a Year or two after he went out Midsummer Batchelor of Arts; by which, having locally qualify'd himself for a Fellowship, he got the King's Mandamus for Dr. Gunning's, (which I think one of his own Gang enjoy'd a little before him) as a Reward for his good Affection to the Cause. From that time, to his Discontinuance, he govern'd the College; the Senior Fellows not daring to oppose him, because of the Interest he had with his great Masters: And so zealous was he for them, that the Corner of the College, which he and his Pupils took up in the new Building, was call'd the Roued-Headed Corner. And when King Charles the Second was beaten at Worcester, he sent for the Tables in which the College Grace was written, and after the Passage of Thanksgiving for their Benefactors, Te Laudamus pro Benefactoribus nostris, &c. he added, with his own Hand, and of his own Head, Præfertim pro nostra Victoria contra, Carolum Stuartum, in Agro Wigorniensi reportata, or to that Effect. In the Year 1656, or the Beginning of 1657, he discontinued from the College, being invited by Prideaux, Cromwell's Attorney-General, to teach his Son, and do the Office of a Chaplain in his Family; and the Reader may please to take Notice, That his Son was the same Mr. Prideaux who was in the Duke of Monmouth's Rebellion. I have related all this upon very good Authority, to shew that Dr. Tillotson had not his first Education under the best Puritans, and that he was not so soon freed from the Prejudices and Impressions of it; but that hitherto he was perfectly master'd by them: And whether or no they had not some influence over him all his Life long, I leave the Reader, from what I have said of him in this Chapter to Judge.

Cromwell was his Uncle.

He also saith, That his extraordinary Worth forc'd some, who had no Kindness for him, to advance him: The same he means is only King Charles the Second, who plainly perceiv'd, that he was not quite freed from the Prejudices of his first Education; for when he officiated in the Closet, instead of bowing at the Name of Jesus, or rather to Jesus, at the mentioning of his saving Name, that he might seem to do something, and yet not do the thing itself, he used to step and bend backwards, calling up his Eyes to Heaven; which the King observing, said, He bowed the wrong way, as the Quakers do when they salute their Friends. And yet, tho' his Majesty, who was a great Discerner of Men, perfectly knew him, he prefer'd him to gratify the Heads of a Party. And may all Princes, who, for politic Ends, prefer those for whom they have no Kindness, and who have no true Kindness for them, be requited as he was.

I now proceed to shew, that he hath not follow'd the generous and laudable Example of another Person, in the very Case in which he hath proposed it for Imitation. "It cannot be denied, nor am I much concern'd to dissemble it, (saith he, Tillotson, in his Funeral Sermon on Dr. Whitehcot) that here he possess'd another Man's Place, who, by the Iniquity of the Times, was wrongfully ejected; I mean Dr. Collins, the famous and learn'd Divinity Professor, of that University; during whose Life, (and he lived many Years after) by the free Consent of the College, there were two Shares, out of the common Dividend, allotted to the Provost, one whereof was constantly paid to Dr. Collins, as if he had been still Provost. To this Dr. Whitchcot did not only give his Consent, (without which the thing could not have been done) but was very forward in doing of it; tho' hereby he did not only considerably lessen his own Profit, but likewise incur no small Censure and Hazard, as Times then were: And left this had not been Kindness enough to that worthy Person, whose Place he possess'd, in his last Will he left to his Son, Sir John Collins, a Legacy of 100*l.*"

One would think, that such heroic Virtue as his, should have follow'd such a generous Example of his own proposing; but as Dr. Whitchcot had Dr. Collins's Place, so he had Dr. Gunning's Fellowship at the same time, and never allow'd him one Farthing; tho' he was as wrongfully ejected as Dr. Collins, and stood in more Need of an Allowance than the Doctor did. But there is one thing more to be said for the Honour of Dr. Whitchcot, which he took no Notice of, and it is this, That he had Dr Collins's Consent to take his Place, which he himself had not from Dr. Gunning to take his; and yet he was very angry at him for resuming his Fellowship from him at the Restoration. This would pass for a Blemish in any other Man's Life but Dr. Tillotson's; or if it would not, methinks his taking the Archbishop's Place, not only without but against his Consent, should pass for a Blemish in his Life: He having not only got him extruded by Force out of it, but thereby made himself the Author and Architect of a most scandalous and outragious Schism; which will not only be an everlasting Blot upon his Memory, but, if not healed, an everlasting Blemish upon the Church. Methinks he might have so far follow'd Dr. Whitchcot's Example, and to have made him an Offer of some Allowance, tho' he had refus'd it, as I am sure he would have done: But far from doing that, he behav'd himself towards him with the greatest Inhumanity, as appear'd from expressing his Joy, unawares, to Dr. Beveridge, for the glorious Device of the Writ of Intrusion, thinking the Doctor had come to talk with him, as one that had accepted the Bishopric of Wells: but when he found that he came to excuse himself from the Acceptance of it, (worth 200*l.*) he turn'd pale upon reflecting he had discover'd too much. He also suffer'd his Grace's Steward and Nephew, Mr. Somerset, who kept Possession at Lambeth for his Uncle, to be imprison'd and fin'd, tho' he might have prevented both if he would; and yet left him not a Legacy for reparation of his great Fine, as Dr. Whitchcot did to Sir John Collins, tho' he had all the Fruits and Profits of the Archbishopric, from the time of the Deprivation, to the time that he took Possession thereof. And it is further observable, That as he enjoy'd the Place of one, who was deprived by those who had usurp'd the Authority of Charles the First, and that of another, but of vaster Consequence, who was depriv'd by the Power of those who had first depriv'd King James the Second; so he took the Place of a Third, a Minister in Suffolk, who was legally ejected by the Bartholomew Act, upon the Return of Charles the Second: Which shews, That he was a Man of all Times, and all Governments, Right or Wrong; and which, in truth, makes him look more like a Vicar of Bray, than an Hero in Virtue.

A. D. 1694. of the Politician than the Chriſtian. Tho' many of the high Clergy had temporis'd with the Government, they were not thoroughly reconcil'd to it: Thoſe who could not pretend to the divine Right of Kingſhip, would never acknowledge a divine Right in the Prieſthood: And the great Link of Church and King being thus broke, it was eaſy to ſee, that the two Principles would ferment; and, as in all other Fermentations, that the Mightieſt would prevail: This made it neceſſary to humble Thoſe whom it was not ſafe to combat with any other way; and by a gradual Introduction of new Principles, and new Doctrines, as well as by a proper Diſtribution of Preferments, to new-model the whole eccleſiaſtical Part of the Conſtitution: It was for this great (r) End that he was promoted: And it is in this great Light that his Character and Conduct, after this Promotion, are to be conſider'd; not that of a ſplendid Preacher, or a mere Metropolitan: And if his Heart had been as firm as his Head was clear; or, in other Words, if his Reſolution had been equal to his Capacity, Envy muſt have own'd, That he was every way qualify'd for the great Poſt he was choſe to fill. But even Burnet acknowledges, A. D. 1694.

(r) Burnet, in his Sermon had ſaid, That their Majeſties had made choice of Dr. Tillotſon for the Archbiſhopric, as the fitteſt Perſon: And the Anſwerer agrees, That he was as fit a Perſon for that Turn, as they could have pitch'd upon: But the Biſhop proceeding to ſay, That he (Tillotſon) was unwilling to accept it, yet their Majeſties, perſiſting in their Intentions, made him think it was the Call and Voice of God, and ſo he ſubmitted; adds—Kings may call, tempt, and importune us to commit deadly Sins, as well as other Men.

That the Archbiſhop was an egregious Flatterer, the ſaid Anſwerer farther endeavours to prove, by a Quotation out of his Thankſgiving Sermon, for the Victory at la Hogue; in which he ſays, That King William was a Prince, who had made it the great Study and Endeavour of his Life, to imitate the Divine Perfections, as far as the Imperfection of human Nature, in this mortal State, would admit. And that he had none of the Candour and Benevolence, which was aſcrib'd to him, from his preaching often againſt the Nonjurors; and declaring, He thought Priſons, and all the hard Uſages of them, which in former Reigns he was wont to call unchriſtian and inhuman Methods of converting Men, not too bad for the beſt of them.

Taking occaſion, alſo, to ſpeak of Dr. Tillotſon's famous Letter to Lord Ruſſel, concerning Reſiſtance: and his laſt Prayer with him on the Scaffold, in which he ſaid, Grant, Lord, That all we who ſurvive, by This and other Inſtances of thy Providence, may learn our Duty to God and the King! He compares his Principles and Behaviour then, with his Thankſgiving Sermon at Lincoln's-Inn, January 31, 1688, in which he call'd the late Deliverance, the Lord's Doing; adds', ſaid the Anſwerer, it was brought about by the utter Violation of that Doctrine, and the whole Duty of Subjects withal ſolemnly from us. And adds, That it was in conſequence of a cloſe Conſult, with him and one or two more, that a Motion was made, in the Houſe of Lords, for appointing the ſaid Thankſgiving to God, for having made his Highneſs, the Prince of Orange, the glorious Inſtrument of delivering this Kingdom from Popery and arbitrary Power.

Laſtly, as well with regard to this Looſeneſs of Principle and Inconſiſtency of Practice, as the Concern he felt from the Treatment it brought upon him, he proceeds as follows:

But this is but one Inſtance of acting in contradiction to his own Doctrine, when the appointed time of Tryal came; there are many more ſo well known, that I need not mention them: For, indeed, his whole Practice, ſince the Revolution, hath been one Series of Apoſtacy, and by which he hath not only diſhonour'd his Memory, and made all his other Good be evil ſpoken of, but been a Scandal to our holy Church and Religion, to which our Preacher's faith, he was ſuch an Honour; giving the Enemies of them great occaſion to triumph, their beſt and moſt ſtedfaſt Friends great occaſion of Grief and Shame: And, laſtly, tempted looſe and unprincipled Men to turn Atheiſts, and ridicule our Prieſthood and Religion: And this he hath been told of in ſuch different Manners, that I do not wonder it ſank deep into him, and had ſuch influence upon his Health.

I cannot imagine but that one Letter, which was ſent to his Lady for him, and ſuperſcrib'd for Dr. Tillotſon, muſt needs diſquiet him very much, if he receiv'd it, and read it. It is written throughout with a ſerious Air, and every Line of it ſpeaks to his Conſcience: And becauſe I know the worthy Gentleman who wrote it, and that it is a full and clear Proof of what I have ſaid, I preſent my Reader, but more eſpecially the Preacher of his funeral Sermon, with a few Paragraphs of it, if he will have the Patience to read them. It begins thus, "Sir, I ſhall preface what I am about to ſay with an Aſſurance, That I have formerly had the greateſt Veneration for you, as well for your Piety, as good Senſe and Learning; that my Notions of Government are ſo large, that the firſt thing I ever doubtfully examin'd, that had your Name affix'd to it, was your Letter to my Lord Ruſſel: But your Actions ſince do leſs quadrate with that Opinion, and ſeriouſly make me addreſs myſelf to you, to know how you reconcile your preſent Actings to the Principles either of natural or reveal'd Religion; eſpecially how you reconcile them with the Poſitions and Intentions of that Letter, and conſequently whether you have a Belief of God, and the World to come.——But to come to your more particular Caſe: I beſeech you to publiſh ſome Diſcourſe (if you can clear Things) to demonſtrate either your Repentance of what you wrote to my Lord Ruſſel, or the Reaſons that make that, and what you now do, conſiſtent: And that you, with the uſual Solidity, with which you treat upon other Subjects, juſtify the Proceedings, and explain the Title of King William. I know no Body hath a ſtronger and clearer Head; and, if you have Truth on your Side, you can write unanſwerably. God's Glory, and the Reputation of the Proteſtant Religion, is at Stake: Your own good Name calls for it; and more eſpecially becauſe you have accepted a moſt reverend and devout Man's Archbiſhopric. A Man who hath given Evidence, how unalterably he is a Proteſtant: A Sufferer formerly for the Laws, and Church of England; and a Sufferer for thoſe very Principles upon which that Letter to my Lord was written; for thoſe very Principles which you diſputed for, when he had ſo ſworn a Time to live? Nay, which you remember'd him of, even upon the Scaffold, with the dreadful Commination of eternal Woe. Really, Sir, if there be any Truth, if there be any Virtue, if there be any Religion, what ſhall we ſay to theſe Things? What will you ſay to them? You muſt be at the Pains to clear this Matter, that we may not believe the Boundaries of Right and Wrong, the Meaſures of Violence and Juſtice quite taken away; that we may not be tempted to ſpeculative, and from thence to practical Atheiſm. This Change has made many ſober Men ſceptical, and gone further towards the eradicating all the Notions of a Deity, than all the Labours of Hobs; and your Part in it hath, I confeſs, more ſtagger'd me, than any one thing elſe. I have been ready to ſuſpect, that Religion itſelf was a Cheat, and that it was a Defect in my Underſtanding that I could not look into it; for I think, if I can know any Right Hand from my Left, our preſent Government ſtands upon Foundations, that contradict all thoſe Diſcourſes which you, as well as others, have ſent to, paſſive Obedience. The exceſſive Value I have for you, for your Knowledge, your Judgment, your Largeneſs of Spirit, your Moderation, and many other great Qualities, that have ſignaliz'd your Name, once made you one of the greateſt Ornaments of the Chriſtian Church.—Apology from what you preached, and wrote, pretended to believe, and would have others believe, ſhake me ſo violently, in the firſt Credenda of Religion, that I beſeech you, if you think it neceſſary upon no other Account, that you will publiſh ſuch a Diſcourſe, at leaſt for the Satisfaction of mine, and other Mens Conſciences, who, I can aſſure you, of my own Knowledge, lie under the ſame Scruples with myſelf, have the ſame Scruples in relation to the Government, and the ſame Temptations to queſtion Religion itſelf upon your Account.——I beg of God Almighty to lay an happy Conſtraint upon you, to do what may be moſt for his Glory, and the Good of theſe Nations: and I earneſtly ſupplicate him, that he will enable me to ſuffer whatever may be neceſſary for thoſe great Ends; and that he will incline you to publiſh your Reaſons, or Repentance."

Such was the Matter of Invective brought againſt this eminent Prelate, by his profeſs'd Enemies. But, on the other Hand, all that were perſonally attach'd to him, the whole Body of the Diſſenters, the Court, and all that depended upon it, as well as Dr. Burnet, talk'd of him as a Man that ſeem'd not to have the Frailties of Mankind; and that even in this mortal State, was fit for the Society of Angels: With them, that he had held Pluralities, was no Reproach to his Chriſtianity: And that he accepted the higheſt Station in the Church, after he had refus'd many inferior Biſhoprics, and often declar'd, he would accept of none, was a Theme neither to his Sincerity or Humility: In ſhort, he was as much the Idol of one Party, as the Averſion of the other: And if we may believe Dr. Sherlock from the Pulpit, "The greateſt Fault "he had was, That ſome envious and ambitious Men could "not bear his Greatneſs, which he himſelf never courted, "but always induſtriouſly avoided.——All England knew and "own'd his Worth; and if it had been put to the Poll, there "would have been vaſt Odds on his Side, That he would "have been voted into the See of Canterbury."

A. D. 1694. ledges, That the Slanders which perpetually follow'd him affected him ſo much, that they were thought to have ſhorten'd his Days.

Sancroft had died the Year before, and his Character was now put into the Scale againſt Tillotſon, together with the Weight of the whole Nonjuring Party: The one was call'd an Intruder: The other a Confeſſor: This a Man after our Saviour's own Heart; That a Man of Craft and Ambition, who had invented the very Writ of Intruſion, by which he got Poſſeſſion of an Archbiſhopric, worth above 5000*l.* a Year. Burnet reproach'd Sancroft with having rais'd a great Eſtate out of the Revenues of his Dioceſe: His Partiſans affirm'd, no Man ever ſet a leſs Value on his Revenues than he: And this is ſelf-evident, That if Avarice was one of his Vices, the Sacrifice he made was ſo much the greater: On the other Hand, it muſt be admitted, That the true Levitical Leaven had ſeaſon'd his whole Deportment; That he went too far in countenancing the Revolution, according to his own Principles; and That he ſtopt too ſoon, according to thoſe of the contrary Party. But if he, as well as Tillotſon, has juſtly incurr'd Cenſure for this unevenneſs of Conduct; if it is juſtly imputed to him, that he at firſt countenanc'd the Prince of Orange's Undertaking, in hope to have ſhar'd with him in the Kingdom, the Power, and the Glory; and that he retir'd again to his Cell, when he found he was not to be a Co-adjutor to the Throne, he ought, nevertheleſs, to be exempt from the Cenſures, which Burnet has paſs'd upon him, for having liv'd in a State of Seperation form the Church, without daring to own it in any public Declaration: As a private Man, he was accountable only to God and himſelf for Matters of Opinion: As a public Man, in ſuffering the Controverſy to die, as far as regarded him, he acted in the wiſeſt Manner with regard to the public Peace; and in his laſt Conference, with one of his conforming Chaplains, his Expreſſions ſeem to bear Witneſs, That he dy'd in Charity with all Men. "You and "I, ſaid he, have gone different Ways in "theſe late Affairs: But I truſt Heaven's "Gates are wide enough to receive us "both: What I have done, I have done "in the Integrity of my Heart; indeed, in "the great Integrity of my Heart."

Sancroft oppos'd to him.

To cloſe on this Head, if Sancroft dy'd rich, it is ſaid, that Tillotſon dy'd ſo poor, that, if the King had not forgiven him his firſt Fruits, his Debts could not all have been paid: This is a Circumſtance which has ever been mention'd to his Honour; and alſo, that while he was in a private Station, his Cuſtom was to lay aſide two Tenths of his Income for charitable Uſes: But if it be true, as we find it aſſerted, That he had all the Profits of the Archbiſhopric, from the Time of the Deprivation, to the Time that he took Poſſeſſion of it, it muſt be admitted, that he had it in his Power to be as juſt on one Hand, as munificent on the other. —But whatever Parties may ſay, Men will be Men: The moſt obnoxious may have a Vein of Worth, tho' broken and interrupted, which their Enemies may not chuſe to acknowledge; and the moſt admir'd and exalted, ſuch Spots and Flaws, as all the Endeavours of their Friends may not be able to purge away. A. D. 16

A Portion of that high Favour which he enjoy'd at Court, deſcended to his Widow, who, at the Interceſſion of the Queen, it is ſaid, tho' the Date of the (z) Grants do not warrant it, had a Penſion of 400*l.* per An. ſettled upon her firſt, and afterwards 200*l.* per An. more.

But what more than all diſcover'd his Importance, her Majeſty honour'd his Aſhes with her Tears: And the King never mention'd him but with ſome Teſtimony of his ſingular Eſteem for his Memory; as in particular to Mr. Chadwick, his Son-in-Law, in theſe and the like Terms: I lov'd your Father: I never knew an honeſter Man; and I never had a better Friend. Burnet. Kennet.

Several eminent Divines were not only talk'd of for his Succeſſor, but had their ſeveral Factions to ſolicit and importune in their Favour: Of theſe Burnet mentions none but Teniſon Biſhop of Lincoln, and Stillingfleet Biſhop of Worceſter; and concerning whom he writes as follows: "Many wiſh'd "that Stillingfleet might have ſucceeded, he "being not only ſo eminently learned, but "judg'd a Man, in all Reſpects, fit for the Poſt. "The Queen was inclin'd to him; ſhe ſpoke "with ſome Earneſtneſs, oftener than once, "to the Duke of Shrewſbury on that Subject: "She thought he would fill that Poſt with "great Dignity: She alſo preſs'd the King earneſtly for him: But as his ill Health made "him not capable of the Fatigue that belong'd "to this Province; ſo the Whigs did generally "apprehend, that both his Notions and his "Temper were too high; and all concurr'd to "deſire Teniſon, who had a firmer Health, "with a more active Temper; and was univerſally well lik'd, for having ſerv'd the Cu"racy of St. Martin's, in the worſt Time, with "ſo much Courage and Diſcretion: So that, "at this Time, he had many Friends, and no "Enemies." Several Perſons ſet up to be his Succeſſor.

How all could concur in the Nomination of Teniſon, when ſo many were ſo preſſing on the Behalf of Stillingfleet; or how the Latter could be, in all Reſpects, fit for the Poſt, and yet be unfit for want of Health and Temper, ſurpaſſes an ordinary Comprehenſion.

But this is not the whole of the Story; and to reconcile theſe ſeveral Difficulties we muſt give the Remainder: There were two other Candidates, namely, Hall Biſhop of Briſtol, and Dr. Thomas Burnet, Maſter of the Chartreaux: The Former, it is ſaid, was

A. D. 1694. was recommended by a great Party of Men, who had an Opinion of his Piety and Moderation: And the Latter had some Prospect of Success, till certain Bishops enter'd a Caveat against him, on account of his Writings, which were not held to be altogether Orthodox. If, therefore, we can suppose that his Majesty, and his Ministers, could be induc'd to relinquish their own Man, in compliment to the Cavils of these Bishops, we may also suppose, that Stillingfleet paid the Price of that Sacrifice; and that the general Concurrence, in favour of Tenison, was neither better nor worse than a Compromise. But however this may be, it is certain the Interest of the Whigs prov'd too mighty for that of the Queen: And on the 10th of December, being the 12th Day after Tillotson's Death, it was declar'd in the Gazette, That the Lot was fallen upon Tennison.

Tenison appointed.

The Queen's Illness.

It is now time to attend the Progress of the Disease which had seis'd upon her Majesty: And, according to the Report of the new Archbishop, as deliver'd by himself to Bishop Kennet, "Her greatest Danger, at first, arose from the different Opinions of her Physicians: Sir Thomas Millington said rightly it would be the Small-Pox, and would have had some suitable Evacuations: But Dr. Radcliffe said, it would be the Measles only, and would not agree to any such Prescription till it was too late." Burnet also says, "The Physicians Part was universally condemn'd: And her Death was imputed to the Negligence or Unskilfulness of Dr. Radcliffe." But tho' he thus far agrees with the Archbishop, in the Sequel of his Report, he differs from him essentially: For he proceeds in these Words: "He (Radcliffe) was call'd for; and it appear'd, but too evidently, that his Opinion was chiefly consulted, and was most depended on. Other Physicians were afterwards called; but not till it was too late." It is not very material which of these Right Reverend Fathers were in the right: But in mitigation of the Censures pass'd by Both on Dr. Radcliffe, it ought to be remember'd, That Millington was a Whig, and Radcliffe a Tory; and such is the Malignity of Party, that it corrodes whatever it touches.

As few Princes had ever a more captivating Manner than the Queen, so none, perhaps, was ever more sincerely or more generally belov'd: It was no wonder, therefore, that both Court and City manifested a more than ordinary Concern for her Danger: And if his Majesty had not discover'd all that Excess of Sorrow which the Historian of his own Times is at so much Pains to describe, he would have been justly esteem'd the most insensible of Men: For she had acted towards him, as if all the Virtue, all the Religion, and even all the Pride of a Wife had consisted in Obedience to her Husband.

It is said, that on the first Attack of the Disease, she prepar'd herself for the worst it could produce: She sent those of her Court out of the way, who had never undergone the same Visitation: She shut herself up in her Closet, to burn some Papers and methodise the rest: When the Symptoms appear'd to be of the most alarming kind, she betray'd none of that Horror or Dismay which the Privilege of her Sex and exalted Condition might have excus'd: When a flattering Interval had not only kindled a Dawn of Hope, but, in a manner, establish'd an Assurance, That nothing fatal was to be apprehended, she discover'd no intemperate Elevation: And when the new Archbishop, among the other Duties of his Office, thought fit to apprise her, That her Case was desperate, and endeavour'd to prepare her for a Sentence which he trembled to pronounce, she receiv'd it, says he, with a Courage agreeable to the Strength of her Faith. Both she was to terrify those about her: But for herself, she seem'd neither to fear Death, nor covet Life. These are the Archbishop's own Words; and Burnet adds, That she continued in that calm and resign'd State to the last Minute of her Life: But then, as the Former hints, That some few Hours before her Death, her Apprehension began to fail, so the Latter admits, That after having continued silent for some Hours, some Words that came from her shew'd her Thoughts began to break. He, Burnet, also says, "She had formerly wrote her Mind, in many Particulars, to the King: And she gave order to look carefully for a small Scrutoir that she made use of, and to deliver it to the King. And having dispatch'd that she avoided giving herself or him the Tenderness which a final Parting might have rais'd in them Both." Which, however, is scarce reconcilable to what he afterwards throws in, viz. That in her last Agonies she try'd once or twice to say something to the King, but was not able to go through with it.

A. D. 1694.

"At last, (these again are the Archbishop's Words) the Helps of Art, and Prayers, and Tears not prevailing, a Quarter before One, on Friday Morning, (December 28) after two or three small Struggles of Nature, and without such Agonies as in such Cases are common, she fell on (t) sleep."

and Death.

She was bury'd at Westminster, with unusual Honours; for both Houses of Parliament assisted at the Solemnity: The Archbishop of Canterbury preach'd her Funeral Sermon, in which he bestow'd on her all the Praises that the best of Women, and the best of Sovereigns could deserve. Burnet also tells us, "That he wrote a Book, as an Essay on her Character, in which, says he, I have said nothing but that which I knew to be strictly true, without the Enlargement of Figure or Rhetoric." Both the Book and the Sermon were soon after made public; as also a variety of other Discourses, all over-flowing with Panegyric: For Men seldom testify so much Zeal in Offerings

(t) In the 33d Year of her Age, and the 6th of her Reign.

A.D. 1694. Offerings of this Nature, as when the Incenſe they burn to the Dead, is grateful to the Living.

But ſuch an Inundation of Praiſe did not fail to provoke a ſuitable Quantity of Invective, in which no Mercy was ſhewn, either to the one or the other: A Sermon was preach'd, or ſaid to be preach'd, on this remarkable Text, Go now, ſee this curſed Woman, and bury her, for ſhe is a King's Daughter: And in another Jacobite Piece, call'd, Remarks on ſome late Sermons, a Vent was given to all the Gall of the Party.

Oldmixon.

But what excited the moſt Attention, was a Letter from Ken, the depriv'd Biſhop of Bath and Wells, to the new Archbiſhop, in which he very freely upbraids him with a Failure of his Duty, in not having endeavour'd to awaken the Queen's Conſcience to a proper Senſe of her Behaviour to her Father; and more than inſinuates, That her teſtifying no Remorſe on that Account, argued either, that her Conſcience was ſear'd, or that the Compoſure ſhe was ſaid to dye with, was fallacious and inſincere.

That indeed, no Reflection on that Subject ſhould ariſe in her Mind, was impoſſible; that ſhe ſhould not communicate what ſhe thought upon it to the Archbiſhop was unlikely; and that his Grace did not impart to the Public all that paſs'd between them, may be inferr'd both from what Burnet mentions, namely, That he had much private Diſcourſe with her; and what Kennet profeſſes to report from the Archbiſhop's own Mouth. That ſhe bid the Company withdraw; and when they ſeem'd to be all gone out, ſhe bid him again look behind the Skreen, For, ſaid ſhe, Dr. Radcliffe has put a popiſh Nurſe upon me; and ſhe is always liſtening to what is ſaid about me: That Woman is a great Diſturbance to me. A. D. 169

But whether any Scruples in relation to her Father, made a part of theſe private Diſcourſes, and the Arch-Divine took upon his own Soul the Preſſures which in thoſe weak, unguarded Moments might poſſibly lye on hers, muſt remain a Secret to the Judgment-day.

The late Ducheſs of Marlborough does indeed not only leave it as a Stain on her Memory, That ſhe did not die in Charity with her Siſter; but embitters her Reproach by recollecting, That tho' ſhe received the Sacrament in her Illneſs, ſhe never made the leaſt advance towards a Reconciliation; or ſignify'd, that ſhe ſet any Value on thoſe made by the Princeſs; and by profeſſing, That "how this Conduct to a Siſter could ſuit with the Character of a devout Queen, ſhe was at a Loſs to know." But then her Grace at the ſame time, forgets, what Burnet, upon another Occaſion, thought fit to acknowledge, namely, That in all which related to the Public, ſhe play'd a Part that was not very natural to her; for ſo much in effect does his Acknowledgment amount to, and if this is admitted, it will follow, That in all political Matters at leaſt, ſhe had no Will nor Direction of her own.

THE

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

During the REIGN of King WILLIAM the Third.

A. D. 1694.

AS all the Popularity of the Government was owing to the frank, open, and affable Deportment of the Queen; as it was believ'd by Many, that ſhe had a natural Right to ſway the Sceptre which her Father had been oblig'd to lay down; and as by profeſſing to make the Welfare of the Church a Fundamental both of her Religion and Policy, ſhe had all the moſt conſiderable Eccleſiaſtics, together with all their Followers, in her Train; it was grievouſly apprehended, that her Death would have ſhook the very Foundation of the new Syſtem. Burnet himſelf acknowledges, that the Proſpect was very melancholy; and that the Turn which Matters took, was beyond all Expectation. But then he will not give us Leave to think, that the King had any Share in the Management of it. "During the Queen's Sickneſs, He was in an Agony that amaz'd us all, (ſays the Biſhop) fainting often, and breaking out into moſt violent Lamentations: When ſhe dy'd, his Spirits ſunk ſo low, that there was great Reaſon to apprehend that he was following her: For ſome Weeks after, he was ſo little Maſter of himſelf, that he was not capable of minding Buſineſs, or of ſeeing Company. He turn'd himſelf much to the Meditations of Religion, and to ſecret Prayer: The Archbiſhop was often and long with him; he enter'd upon ſolemn and ſerious Reſolutions, of becoming, in all Things, an exact and exemplary Chriſtian." Thus we are to underſtand, that the Hero, and the Politician, was, all at once, loſt in the Mourner and the Devotee: But if his Majeſty was really become ſo indifferent as to all worldly Purſuits, and ſo incapable of attending them; and if his frequent and long Conferences with the Archbiſhop, regarded only the ſettling his Conſcience, and making a timely Proviſion for a future State, it muſt be acknowledg'd, that his Miniſters ſerv'd him, during that whole Interval, with as much Zeal, Fidelity, and Ability, as ever Sovereign was ſerv'd with. A. D. 1694.

That the Lord Sunderland was at the Head of Theſe, tho' without any Office, we have already ſeen: And that it was one of his firſt Cares to prevail with the Princeſs to write a Letter of Condolance to his Majeſty; and at the ſame time to ſolicit a Reconciliation, we learn from the Ducheſs of Marlborough's Account: But then her Grace will not ſuffer us to think, that his Majeſty lent a favourable Ear, for any but political Conſiderations. Lord Sunderland prevails with the Princeſs of Denmark to ſolicit a Reconciliation with the King.

"The Kings, ſays ſhe, had Senſe enough to know, that it would be impoſſible to continue any longer an open Difference with the Princeſs, without expoſing himſelf to daily Slights, and a manifeſt Diſregard for his ſovereign Pleaſure; for he could not hope that the Nobility of England would be hinder'd, now the Queen was dead, from paying Reſpect to a Princeſs, who was next Heir to him by Act of Parliament, and who, if Title by Blood had taken Place, would have had the Crown before him: And he was well aware, that every body, who had a mind to ſhew they did not care for him, would certainly do it by making their court to her.

"Quickly after this Letter, therefore, the Princeſs, with the King's Conſent, and at a time which he appointed, waited on him at Kenſington, and was receiv'd with extraordinary Civility.

"I never heard of any Body that oppos'd this Reconciliation, except my Lord Portland: But the Perſon who wholly manag'd the Affair, between the King and Princeſs, was my Lord Sunderland. He had, upon all Occaſions relating to her, ſhewed himſelf a Man of Senſe and Breeding; and

A. D. 1694. before there was any thought of the Queen's dying, had design'd to use his utmost Endeavours to make up the Breach; in which, however I am persuaded, he could not have have succeeded during the Queen's Life. Her Death made it easy to him, (for the Reasons I have mention'd) to bring the King to a Reconcilement; and he also persuaded his Majesty to give the Princess St. James's House. But this, and some other (u) Favours granted her, at his Lordship's Request, were only to save Appearances, and for political Views."

That the Nation in general might also know, as soon as possible, what Sentiments they were to entertain, and what Language they were to use, the two Houses, instead of adjourning, as usual, during the Holydays, were severally call'd upon, to approach the Throne with Addresses suitable to the Occasion, which Both comply'd with on the same Day, viz. the last Day of the Year, tho' with some Difference of Stile and Manner. Said the Lords, "We your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, &c. do, with inexpressible Grief, assure your Majesty of the deep Sense we have of the Loss your Majesty and the whole Kingdom doth sustain by the Death of that excellent Princess, our Sovereign Lady, the Queen; most humbly beseeching your Majesty, that you would not indulge your Grief upon this sad Occasion, to the Prejudice of the Health of your royal Person, in whose Preservation, not only the Welfare of your own Subjects, but of all Christendom is so nearly concern'd. We farther beg Leave upon this sad Occasion, humbly to renew to your Majesty the hearty and sincere Assurances of our utmost Assistance against all your Enemies, both at Home and Abroad; and of all other Demonstrations of the greatest Duty and Affection that can possibly be paid by the most dutiful and loyal Subjects." Said the Commons, "We, &c. being deeply sensible of the great Misfortune which hath befallen your Majesty, and this Kingdom, by the Death of our most gracious Queen, do, with unspeakable Grief of Heart, humbly beg Leave to condole the irreparable Loss of that most excellent Princess, the Best of Women; to enumerate whose Virtues, were to aggravate our Sorrow: We cannot, at the same time, but bless God for the Preservation of your Majesty to us, on whose Life the Welfare and Happiness of this Kingdom, and the Liberties of Europe, do, in so great a Measure, depend." Here follow'd a Paragraph of Advice, That his Majesty would moderate his Grief, and be careful of his Health; and for a Close, they express'd themselves as follows: "We also look upon it as a Duty we owe to your Majesty, to ourselves, and to those we represent, to take this Occasion of assuring your Majesty, That We your faithful Commons, will always, to the utmost of our Power, stand by, support, and defend your Majesty and your Government, against all your Enemies both at Home and Abroad."

The Lords Address of Condolance.

And also that of the Commons.

A. D. 1

Both these Addresses were made public in the Gazette the same Day: The next, the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council of London, also set forth their deep Sense of the unspeakable Loss which the whole Kingdom had sustain'd; humbly besought his Majesty not to entertain such a Resentment of it, as might be dangerous to his Person, and give farther Advantage to his Enemies; and assur'd him, That they would stand by and support him against all his Enemies: And the same Day they came to a Resolution to set up the Statues of both King and Queen in the Royal-Exchange, "in Acknowledgment of the great Benefits and "Advantages the City had receiv'd under "their most gracious Government."

Statues of the King and Queen order'd to be put up in the Exchange.

The Regency of Scotland, the Lords of Session, and the City of Edinburgh, were the next to present their Complements of Condolance, and were follow'd by almost all the considerable Corporations in the three Kingdoms: Some of their own mere Motion; out of Principle, or because it became a Fashion; but the far greater Number, by the usual Stimulation of such Persons, as hope to make their own Court so much the more acceptably, by serving the Purposes of those in Power.

But while the Gazette was croaded with these ostentatious Nothings, a (w) printed Paper was privately handed about, which undertook to prove, That the Parliament was dissolv'd by the Death of the Queen; and which, it is reasonable to think, would have had a very singular Effect, if the late passing the Triennial Act had not dispos'd the Bulk of the People to be satisfy'd with the Provision made therein for a Dissolution.

A Question started whether the Parliament was not dissolv'd by the Death of the Queen.

Burnet

(w) Which being a very curious Piece, and Short, I have thought fit to insert in this Place, for the Information of Posterity.

SIR,

You are pleas'd to observe in your Letter, That it was the general Sense and Discourse in the Country, during the Queen's Sickness, that in Case she should then happen to die, they must go to a new Election of Members; for that her Death would make a Dissolution of the Parliament: And this, you say, was held so plain a Case, that you did not perceive that any body made any Doubt of it, but was taken by all for granted; and that, therefore, you were not a little surpriz'd to hear the Parliament were still sitting, notwithstanding her Death: And the more so, for that you have not heard that either House so much as made any Debate or Question about it, either before or since her Death; which (as you are pleas'd to add) puts you upon a Request to me to know, How I conceive the Matter stands in the Laws of the Land, that you may a little understand whether your Representatives have dealt fairly with you? Now, tho' I might, in answer to what you say, only tell you, That it was then thought as plain a Case here among the Lawyers, and, as I have been inform'd, even among your very Representatives themselves; and thence conclude it vain and needless to send you any particular Opinion, especially of my own: Yet to let you see how well the Law of the Land has provided for this Case, and that we are upon no Uncertainties in Law, however we may be in Men, in a Matter of this high Consequence and Concernment to the Kingdom, I will endeavour, as briefly as I can, to lay the Law before you, in so plain and clear a Light, that you may evidently see that the Parliament became necessarily dissolv'd, in Law, by the Queen's Death.

Now

A. D. 1694. Burnet assures us, That the Earl of Rochester, nevertheless, made it his Endeavour to establish that Doctrine within Doors, which had been handled so plausibly without: Others again affirm, That the Doubt was started by the Earl of Nottingham: And that the Earl of Portland reply'd, It was not fit to be mention'd, much less to be debated: But which soever of these Peers it was, that had the Boldness to make so dangerous a Motion, it met with no Countenance: For it was thought the wisest way to overlook a Defect or Form, if any such Defect there was, rather than suffer the whole Business of the Year to languish, and the whole Kingdom to be put into a Ferment at so delicate a Conjuncture, when more than ordinary Caution was necessary for the Sake of preserving Peace at Home.

And over-ruled in the House of Lords.

It does not appear that any Hint of this Nature

A. D. 1694.

Now you must know, whatever some may fancy, that Parliaments are under the Directions and Restrictions of the Common Law, as well as any inferior Court or Corporation: By the Law they have their Existence, by the Law they Act, and by the Law they cease: For the Being of a Parliament is a legal Being, and therefore can no longer exist than the Law upholds them; they are the King's Writs that raise them, and call them together: 'Tis under the immediate Influence, and legal Authority of these Writs, that they Sit and Act; and when these legal Writs, or the legal Authority they have by them, ceaseth, they necessarily cease too, and fall into Dissolution: So that whether the two Houses, now Sitting in Westminster, are a Parliament, or not, is altogether a Question of Law; and this, as I conceive, will chiefly, if not altogether, depend upon this Enquiry, Whether the Writs, issued out in the Names of King William and Queen Mary, were not abated and determin'd in Law by Queen Mary's Death? For if they were, there is nothing legal left to support them, and consequently (whatever there may be else) can be no Legal Parliament; nor what they Act, or pretend to Enact, have any Force or Validity in Law. Now in order to examine this candidly and impartially (for I utterly abhor all unfair or unfaithful Dealing) I will first set before you a true Copy of the Writ by which this Parliament was call'd; and also so much of the late Act of Settlement of the Crown, 1 William and Mary, as concerns this Question, that you may the more clearly discern and judge of what I herein after say.

The Act 1 William and Mary first reciting the Donation of the Crown and Royal Dignity, by the Convention to the Prince and Princess of Orange, and that thereby they did become, and of Right ought to be, our Sovereign Liege Lord and Lady, King and Queen of England, &c. in and to all those Princely Persons the Royal Estate, Crown, and Dignity of those Realms, with all Honours, Stiles, Titles, Regalities, Prerogatives, Powers, Jurisdictions, and Authorities to the same belonging, are most Fully, Rightfully, and Intirely Invested and Incorporated, United and Annexed; then goes on, and says, That 'tis therein Enacted and Declared, That the Crown, and regal Government of those Realms, with all and singular the Premisses thereunto belonging, shall be and continue to their said Majesties, and the Survivours of them, during their Lives, and the Life of the Survivour of them: And that the intire and full Exercise of the Regal Power and Government be only in and executed by his Majesty in the Names of both their Majesties, during their Joint Lives; and after their Decease, the Crown and Premisses shall be and remain to the Heirs of the Body of her Majesty; and so on to the Princess, Ann, &c.

And the Writ is this:

Gulielmus & Maria, Dei Gratia, Angl. &c. Rex & Regina. Fidei Defensor Vicecomit. B. Salutem. Quia de Advisamento & Assensu Consilii nostri pro quibusdam Arduis & urgentibus negotiis nos, Statum, & Defensionem Regni nostri Angl. & Eccles. Anglican. Concernen. quoddam Parliamentum nostrum apud Civitatem nostram Westminster, *vicesimo die Martii prox. futur. teneri ordinavimus & ibidem cum Prelatis Magnatibus & Proceribus dicti Regni nostri Colloquium habere & tractatus. Now it will not be deny'd, but that all Parliament Writs must naturally, necessarily, and essentially, be deriv'd and proceed from the whole and entire Sovereignty and Royal Dignity; and consequently these our Writs must necessarily have their Being and Authority as well from Queen Mary as King William; because the Sovereignty and Royal Dignity, at the time of issuing these Writs, were no less united and incorporated to the natural Person of Queen Mary than King William; they both then being actually and jointly in the Possession thereof, however distinguish'd in the Exercise of them: And therefore the Clause for using her Name in the Exercise of the Regal Power and Government, was not inserted in the said Act of Settlement, as a Matter only of Respect and Deference, but as a thing necessary and essential to that Share of the Sovereignty wherewith her Person was invested: In respect of which Sovereignty, so lodg'd in her, Treason, no doubt, might no less have been committed against her natural Person, than against his: So that her Name was necessary to these Writs, ex Essentia rei; and the Writs could not have been sufficient or valid in Law, unless her Name had been used in them, and that altho' there had been no such Clause in the said Act for the using both their Names. Now, therefore, if the Validity of these Writs essentially consisted in their being in the Names of both, as proceeding from the joynt regal Authority of these two joint Sovereigns; and could not have been good in either of their Names alone, for want of legal Sovereignty enough in either of them to impregnate the Writs: Then must the Death of either necessarily abate and dissolve these Writs, and the Parliament depending thereon; because the Sovereignty of the one, which necessarily went to the Authority and Support of these Writs, is demised or departed from the natural Body wherein it was invested, and consequently from these Writs. Nihil enim tam Convenions est naturali Equitati unumquodque dissolvi eo ligamine quo Constitutur, as says Bracton. Nor is it any Objection to say, That the Sovereignty vested in Queen Mary, did, by her Death, become vested in King William as Survivor, and the whole Sovereignty is now in him; unless any one could say, or think, That her Sovereignty, which was of absolute Necessity to make good these Writs, and which, by her Death, departed these Writs, could immediately again re-enter into these very Writs; which would be very absurd to say. So that these Writs must either remain half alive, and half dead, or else must wholy abate and determine by the Queen's Death. And to shew you further, that here was a Demise, and consequently a Dissolution, please to observe, That it is not the Kingship, or Sovereignty in Genere, that preserves these Writs, for then they might be as durable as the Monarchy itself; for the King in Genere never dies, but these Writs depend upon the Continuance of the natural Person of the King in Individuo, who issued them out: Now the King, who issued them forth, was King William and Queen Mary (they both being but one Roy in the Sense of the Law) but this one Roy is chang'd and gone by the Queen's Death; unless any one can say, That King William alone is the same Roy in Individuo with King William and Queen Mary. Therefore here is a Demise of the Crown, and consequently an Abatement of the Writs; for where the Sovereignty ceases to be in Statu quo, but is become otherwise lodg'd, and the Sovereign Stile alter'd and chang'd, by the Death of any natural Person invested with the Sovereignty, and a new Stile used in all Writs, Patents, and Acts of Government; such Change and Alteration is in Law a Demise, and what this Kingdom ever took Notice of as such: And if so, then certainly the Queen's Death was a Demise; for thereby the Sovereignty became otherwise lodg'd than it was before: For the Sovereignty thereby became wholy in King William, whereas before he was but a Joynt-tenant with Queen Mary; and, whereas, before the regal Stile was King William and Queen Mary, now, by her Death, the regal Stile is alter'd to King William III. and all this by the Act of God. So that all the legal Demonstrations, that can go to the Proof of a Demise of the Crown, proves this plainly to be one; and consequently the Parliament dissolv'd, if a Demise can do it. 'Tis not at all material to this Argument, how King William now claims or holds the Crown, whether by Survivor, or otherwise; all that need be ask'd is but this, Whether or no any Sovereignty was vested in Queen Mary's natural Person, and whether the same be not thence departed by her Death? For if so, then according to our Laws, 'tis the Law knows what a Demise is; there was a Demise by her Death.

As

A. D. 1694. Nature was ever ſuffer'd to eſcape in the Houſe of Commons: On the contrary, they proceeded, without any Scruple, to the Buſineſs that lay before them: And as the Supplies could neither be refus'd nor retarded, while thoſe in Power made it their chief Buſineſs to fix the Attention of the Houſe on that Point only, thoſe who bid for Popularity, lay in wait for Grievances, and to couple ſo much Clamour with ſo much Service.

A. D. 1694. The Civil-Liſt Eſtabliſhment caſt afresh by the Commons.

On the 12th of January it was order'd, "That a State of the Revenue, with the Loans, Debts, and Charges thereupon; and likewiſe an Account of the Eſtabliſhment, Charge, and Expence of the Civil Liſt, ſhould be laid before the Houſe by the Commiſſioners of the Treaſury, and thoſe for taking and ſtating the public Accounts." And the ſame Day the Match was laid to a long Train of Enquiries into Abuſes and Corruptions, by

---

As to the Power given King William by this Act, for his only Exerciſe of the regal Power, that, if it makes any thing, makes the Diſſolution yet more evident; for that no ways alter'd, or affected the joint Lodgment or Settlement of the Sovereignty, but was only as in the Nature of a Warrant of Attorney; which, by the expreſs Limitation of the Act, wholly determin'd by her Death, being given only during their joynt Lives. But King William now has the ſole Exerciſe, not by Virtue of this Clauſe in the Act, but as reſulting and flowing from his ſole Title by Survivor; and therefore theſe Writs, if they were grounded or depended on his ſole Exercile, muſt conſequently be at an End for this Reaſon alſo.

Beſides, from the very Nature of Joynt-tenancy, theſe Writs muſt be determin'd: For, was it ever made a Queſtion in Law, where two Joynt-tenants grant any Authority to any Perſon or Perſons, but that the Death of the one Joynt-tenant determines the Authority ſo granted? If two Joynt-tenants make a Letter of Attorney to any Perſon or Perſons, to do any Act or Acts, is not the Death of one of ſuch Joynt-tenants, a Determination in Law of ſuch Letter of Attorney? Suppoſe two Joynt-tenants of a Manor grant the ſame to one or more Perſons, and one of theſe Joynt-tenants dies, can the Grantees claim any more than a Moiety only as from the Survivor? For though a ſurviving Joynt-tenant may, in ſome Caſes, claim wholly as immediately from the Donor; yet nothing is plainer in Law than that they that have any Grant or Authority from two Joynt-tenants, cannot afterwards claim as from the ſurviving Joint-tenant only, but muſt from both the Joynt-tenants reſpectively, according to their reſpective Intereſts and Eſtates: And therefore, if the Parliament cannot now make good their Sittings, as if call'd ab Initio from King William only, (which he then alone had no Power to do) then, certainly, neither can the ſole Title of King William, now by Survivor, ſtand them in any ſtead.

You may pleaſe to obſerve further, That for the Parliament to continue longer than the Joynt Lives of King William and Queen Mary, is as contrary to the End and Intent of their Writs, as it is without any Authority from them. The Writ tells you, That they, viz. King William and Queen Mary, for ſome high and urgent Matters concerning themſelves, and the State and Defence of the Kingdom, &c. having, by the Advice of their Council, appointed a Parliament at Weſtminſter, and there to have a Colloquium & Tractatum, i. e. Conference and Conſult with the Preſates, and great Men of their Kingdom, King William and Queen Mary command the Sheriff to proclaim the ſame in his next County Court, after the Receipt of this their Writ, to cauſe two ſuch Knights, &c. to be choſe, &c. as ſhall have ſufficient Power for themſelves, and the Commonalty of the County, &c. to do and conſent to ſuch Things as ſhall fall out to be ordain'd by the Common Council of their Kingdom, upon the Matters aforeſaid, &c. And the Knights, &c. after they are choſe by Virtue of the Writ, have, by Indenture, full Power given them by the Electors of the County, &c. for themſelves, and the whole County, to do and conſent as aforeſaid.

Now the Power and Truſt given by the Electors to the Knights, &c. are conform and correſpondent to the Power requir'd by the Writ, and that is, to repreſent them to King William and Queen Mary jointly; and to do and conſent to ſuch Things as ſhall be ordain'd, as well concerning King William and Queen Mary's Perſons, as the State of the Kingdom: therefore, when either of their Perſons fail, this Power and Truſt given by the Electors, muſt fail and determine; for this being but a bare Authority, muſt be ſtrictly obſerv'd and perſued. Now that this intends their particular natural Perſons, nothing can be more evident, unleſs the Prelates and great Men could have Colloquium & Tractatum, with their politic Capacities. So that the Power theſe Parliament Men had from the People, of repreſenting and doing for them, is at an End; unleſs they could ſtill repreſent them to, and conſent and do, as well for Queen Mary as King William; which was what the Writs requir'd, and the People choſe and ſent them for. If the Parliament, when they made this Act of Settlement, would have had a Parliament to continue in ſuch a Caſe as this, they ſhould have made Proviſion for it in the Act, and have given Power for the making of ſuch Writs as would have ſerv'd on ſuch an Occaſion; and then the People would have diveſted their Choice of Repreſentatives, and impower'd them accordingly: But without an Act of Parliament, the antient Writs cannot be alter'd, any more than any other Part of the Common Law: Neither could the People give their Repreſentatives any other Power than the Writs requir'd; and theſe only go to King William and Queen Mary, jointly, and not to the Survivor of them. Beſides, if the Death of the Queen did not diſſolve this Parliament, then, certainly, neither could King William's, in caſe he had happen'd to die firſt: (For the had the better Eſtate in the Sovereignty, as having an Eſtate tail to ſome Purpoſes executed in her, which, in caſe ſhe had ſurviv'd, had been executed to all Purpoſes.) And if ſo, then was here a Power in them of holding the ſame Parliament, during their joint Lives, and the Life of the longer Liver of them: And by the ſame Reaſon, if the regal Power, had, after the ſame manner, been ſettled alſo on the Prince and Princeſs of Denmark, and Duke of Glouceſter, and twenty more, the ſame Parliament might continue during all their Lives, and the Lives of the Survivors and Survivor of them; and conſequently there would have been an End of the Peoples Elections, for one Age at leaſt, unleſs the Perſon, who, for the time being, ſhould have the Exerciſe of the regal Power, ſhould think fit to diſſolve them. Of what ill Conſequence it may be to the Monarchy, for Parliaments once to begin to ſurvive Demiſes of the Sovereignty, I will neither conſider nor examine, confining myſelf altogether to the Matter of Law. Only I will ſay, with the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke, (4 Inſt. 27.) That the more high and abſolute the high Court of Parliament is, the more juſt and honourable ought it to be, and give Example of Juſtice and fair Dealing to the Kingdom. And as Fleta ſays of Kings, ſo it may be ſaid of Parliaments too, they are ſub Deo & Lege: (As here the Parliament is diſſolv'd in Law by the Act of God) And tho', as Sir Robert Atkins ſays, a Power limited by Law, may be thought poteſtas Minor, ſed tutior & diuturnior.

The Parliament Writs, and the legal Certainty of them, is all the legal Security the People have for the great Truſt and Concernment they commit to Parliaments; and if theſe are once exceeded, and a Parliament got beyond the Boundaries of them, and conſequently of the Law, they may, for all that can be ſaid, as well continue to ſit after the Deceaſes of both King William and Queen Mary, as after the Deceaſe of either; for no one can determine who or what can make them ceaſe and diſſolve, when the Law cannot.

To add yet one Conſideration more; I would fain know how any Laws can be enacted, by the legal Conſent of this Parliament, but only ſuch as receive their Sanction from the Authority both of King William and Queen Mary? For if the Writs neither ſpeak of, or imply any other, neither by the People are their Repreſentatives choſen or impower'd to conſent to any other, but expreſly by the Peoples Indenture, annex'd to the Writs impower'd, only by them to conſent to ſuch Things as ſhall be ordain'd at the ſaid Parliament of King William and Queen Mary, mention'd in the ſaid Writs. How could this be any longer call'd the Parliament of King William and Queen Mary, than whilſt Queen Mary was alive?

Beſides, it has ever been a ſteady ſtanding Rule in all Parliaments, and the Law, That all Acts of Parliament muſt relate to the firſt Day of the Seſſion; ſo that what can't relate to the firſt Day of the Seſſion, can be no Act. And I think no one will ſay, That Acts made now, under the Reign of William III. can have any Relation in Law to the firſt Day of the Seſſion, which was in the Reigns of King William and Queen Mary, any more than they can relate to William the Conqueror.

SIR,

I could ſay much more, to let you ſee how plainly and certainly the Laws of the Kingdom have fixed and fenced the legal Limits and Boundaries of Parliaments, and how evidently and inevitably, by the Queen's Death, the Parliament was diſſolv'd in Law; but ſuppoſing I have ſaid more than enough already, to ſatisfy you that there is Foundation ſufficient in the Law for the Aſſurance you had in the Country of the Parliament's Diſſolution by the Queen's Death; and therefore I ſhall add no more, but that

I am

Your Faithful Servant.

A. D. 1694. A Petition against the Violence of the Soldiery.

by a Petition from the Inhabitants of Royſton, complaining of oppreſſive Uſage from the Officers and Soldiers of Colonel Haſtings's Regiment, quarter'd upon them, in exacting Subſiſtance-Money, almoſt on the Pain of military Execution: As nothing could be of a more provoking and inflammatory Nature than ſuch a Complaint, it met with a ſuitable Reception: The Officers, againſt whom it was levell'd, were immediately taken into Examination, as was alſo one Mr. Tracey Pauncefort, Agent to the ſaid Regiment: And, upon the Iſſue, it was reſolv'd, That the Officers and Soldiers of the Army, demanding and exacting Subſiſtance-Money in their Quarters, or upon a March, is arbitrary and illegal, and a great Violation of the Rights and Liberties of the Subject: And order'd, That the Commiſſioners for taking and ſtating the public Accounts, do lay before the Houſe their Obſervations of the Abuſes and ill Practices committed by the Agents for the ſeveral Regiments of the Army; as alſo a Liſt of thoſe as had neglected to attend their Summons: And farther, That Agent Pauncefort ſhould lay before the Houſe a particular Account of the Money he had receiv'd from the Earl of Ranelagh, Pay-Maſter, and how he had diſpos'd of the ſame. On the 25th this Order was comply'd with: On the 28th Pauncefort preſented his Accounts, and was examin'd as to the Truth of them: And the next Day (for neglecting to pay the Subſiſtance-Money he had receiv'd for the Officers and Soldiers quarter'd at Royſton) was committed to the Cuſtody of the Serjeants, together with two other Agents, and one Lieutenant. On the 12th of February, he, Pauncefort, was re-examin'd; but refuſing to give ſatisfactory Anſwers, was committed to the Tower for a Contempt: And on the 15th, having been brought again to the Bar, on his Petition, acknowledging his Offence, and ſetting forth his Sorrow for it, but continuing to evade the Purpoſe of the Houſe, as before, was re-committed: On the 16th, his Brother, Edward Pauncefort, having been examin'd, and the Houſe having obtain'd ſuch other Lights as ſeem'd to aſcertain the Grievances, which ſo loudly cry'd for Redreſs, came to the following Reſolutions, viz. That the ſaid Edward Pauncefort, for contriving to cheat Colonel Haſtings's Regiment of 500 Guineas, and for giving a Bribe of 200 Guineas to obtain the King's Bounty, be taken into Cuſtody: And that Mr. Henry Guy, (a Member) for taking the ſaid Bribe, be committed Priſoner to the Tower; which was done accordingly. That this Gentleman was Secretary of the Treaſury, and that a great Part of the Secret-Service Money paſs'd thro' his Hands, has already been diſcours'd of more than once. That, therefore, the Anti-Courtiers ſhould ſnatch this Opportunity to ſet a Mark upon him, is not ſo much to be wonder'd at, as that the Courtiers durſt not venture to ſkreen him from the Indignation he had incurr'd. But this is a new Inſtance, That theſe Times had not wholly abandon'd their Modeſty, how much ſoever they had tarniſh'd their Virtue.—Even Biſhop Burnet admits, "That many were the more ſharpen'd againſt Guy, becauſe it was believ'd that he, as well as Trevor, the Speaker, was deeply concern'd in corrupting the Members of the Houſe of Commons." But then he takes care to inſinuate, That he learn'd his Trade in the two preceding Reigns, by adding, "That he had held his Place both in King Charles and King James's Time; and the Share he had in the ſecret Diſtribution of Money, had made him a neceſſary Man for thoſe Methods." But, whether he was moſt obnoxious for his preſent or paſt Corruptions, or becauſe he was in the way of the preſent Corruptors, the Commons follow'd their Blow, and importun'd the King, by Addreſs, to remove him from his Place, which it does not appear that he made any Difficulty to comply with.

A. D. 1694.

Several Agents committed.

Guy, Secretary of the Treaſury, ſent to the Tower for taking a Bribe.

That his Majeſty might not, however, be too ſenſible of the Smart of theſe Proceedings, and that They might not incur the Odium of any malignant Intention, they, in this Interval, incorporated two Bills, namely, one for graning an Aid of Four Shillings in the Pound upon Land, with a Clauſe of Loan at 5 per Cent. and a Proviſo, that the forty-three Cruiſers ſhould be continued, according to the Regulation of the preceding Year; and one to direct and provide, that the Tunnage and Poundage-Duties ſhould be made a Fund of Credit, during their Continuance, for raiſing 300,000 l. yearly. The ſaid Bill was ſent up to the Lords on the 7th of February, and having been return'd, as uſual, without any Amendment, on the 11th, it receiv'd the Royal Aſſent on the ſame Day.

Land-Tax Bill paſs'd.

Thus part of the current Service was provided for; and while Ways and Means to provide for the reſt were under Conſideration, the Houſe, in proſecution of their Enquiry into the Abuſes and ill Practices of the Agents, &c. agreed to the following Repreſentation to his Majeſty.

Repreſentation of the Commons.

"We, your Majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Commons in this preſent Parliament aſſembled, do, from a true and unfeign'd Zeal for your Majeſty's Perſon and Government, (which God long preſerve) and from the Obligation that lieth upon us, in behalf of thoſe whom we repreſent, moſt humbly lay before your Majeſty the Grievances we lie under, by ſome of the Officers and Soldiers of the Army, in raiſing Money upon the Country, under Pretence of Subſiſtance; which is ſuch a Violation of the Liberty and Property of your Subjects, that it needeth no Aggravation.

"This is, in great Meaſure, occaſion'd by the undue Practices of ſome of the Agents and Officers; the Particulars of which, we beg leave to lay before your Majeſty, in order to the more effectual preventing the like Miſcarriages for the future.

"I. Some of the Agents, amongſt other their ill Practices, have detain'd the Money, due to the Soldiers, in their Hands; and made uſe of it for their own Advantage, inſtead of immediately applying it to the Subſiſtence

A. D. 1694. fiſtence of the Officers and Soldiers, for whom they were intruſted.

" II. Their intolerable Exactions, and great Extortions upon the Officers and Soldiers, for paying Money by way of Advance; their charging more for the Diſcounts of Tallies, than they actually paid: By which fraudulent impoſing upon thoſe who ſerve in your Majeſty's Armies, it appeareth, That notwithſtanding they have a greater Pay, than is given in any other Part of the World, they are yet reduc'd to Inconveniencies and Extremities; which ought not to be put upon thoſe, who venture their Lives for the Honour and Safety of the Nation.

" III. In particular, Colonel Haſtings hath compell'd ſome Officers of his Regiment, to take their Clothes from him at extravagant Rates, by confining and threatning thoſe that would not comply therewith: By which the Authority, that may be neceſſary to be lodg'd in the Colonel, over the inferior Officers in ſome Caſes, is miſapply'd, and extended ſo as to promote a private Advantage of his own, without any Regard to your Majeſty's Service, or to the Diſcipline of the Army.

" IV. Colonel Haſtings's Agent hath preſum'd fraudulently to detain 500 Guineas, out of a Bounty given by your Majeſty to the Officers of that Regiment, under Pretence of giving them as a Bribe to obtain the ſame, to the Diſhonour of your Majeſty, and Injury to the Officers thereof: And hath taken Two-pence per Pound, out of the Money due to the Officers and Soldiers; for which Deductions, there being no Warrant, the Colonel, whoſe Servant the Agent is, is anſwerable.

" V. Colonel Haſtings's Agent hath refuſed or neglected to give an Account of the Pay due to the Captains of his Regiment, and their Companies; which tends apparently to the defrauding the Officers and Soldiers.

" VI. Some of the Agents aſſume to themſelves the Liberty of making great Deductions: Which, ſince they know not how to juſtify, they endeavour to cover, by putting them under the Shelter of the uncertain Head of Contingencies; which giveth them the better Opportunity of hiding the Frauds and Abuſes, that would otherwiſe be more liable to be detected.

" VII. Colonel Haſtings hath diſcharg'd an Enſign, by putting another in his room, contrary to the true Diſcipline of an Army; from which the Colonels have no Right to exempt themſelves, to enlarge their own Authority, to the Prejudice of your Majeſty's Service, and of the Officers who ſerve under them.

" VIII. Colonel Haſtings hath taken Money for the recommending to Commands in his Regiment, to the great Diſcouragement to the Officers who are to ſerve in your Majeſty's Armies; who ought to be ſuch as deſerve their Commands, and not ſuch as pay for them.

" Theſe Things we moſt humbly repreſent to your Majeſty, in Confidence of having them redreſs'd by your Majeſty's Juſtice and Wiſdom. A. D. 1

" Your loyal Commons, as they have been always ready to ſupply your Majeſty, cannot but be ſenſible of ſuch Miſcarriages, as may either diminiſh the Strength of your Armies, or the Affections of your People: And it is from a Principle of the higheſt Duty, that we take this way of applying ourſelves to your Majeſty for Redreſs; having an entire Aſſurance, that this our moſt humble Repreſentation, will not only be graciouſly accepted, but that our Expectations from it will be fully anſwer'd."

To this his Majeſty was pleas'd to reply:

" Gentlemen,

" I will conſider your Repreſentation, The King's Anſwer.
" and take all Care poſſible to have the " Grievances redreſs'd."

And ſo far he had already thought fit to interpoſe, that on the 19th of February, he had been pleas'd to order in Council, That the chief Officers of the Army ſhould meet twice a Week, to receive and examine all Informations and Complaints that ſhould be brought before them, againſt any Officer or Soldier in his Majeſty's Pay, in order to redreſs the ſame. It is true, this kind of Remedy, tho' countenanc'd by the Privy-Council, was not authoris'd by the Conſtitution; and, according to the very Nature of Things, it was not over-reaſonable to imagine, that the injur'd would take their Caſe out of the Houſe of Commons, in order to put their Truſt in the Equity of a military Court. But his Majeſty, moreover, made an inſtant Example of Colonel Haſtings, by caſhiering him, and giving his Regiment to Sir John Jacob, his Lieutenant-Colonel: And on the 11th of March following, [the Repreſentation was preſented on the 4th] caus'd a Declaration to be iſſued for the ſtrict Diſcipline of the Army, and due Payment of Quarters; charging and commanding all Officers and Soldiers, not to exact or demand any Subſiſtance-Money, or to commit any Spoil or Diſorder, or to uſe any Violence or threatening Words, or otherwiſe to miſbehave themſelves, under Pain of being caſhier'd, and loſing their Pay. Gazette, No. 3062.

But theſe Relentings, on the Court Side, did not, as yet, produce any Relenting in the Commons: On the contrary, Mr. James Craggs,, and Mr. Richard Harnage, two of the Contractors for cloathing the Army, having refus'd to be examin'd upon Oath, by the Commiſſioners of Accounts, Craggs, upon their Report, was committed to the Tower; and a Bill was order'd in to oblige the ſaid two Contractors, and alſo the two Pouncefoots, to diſcover how they had diſpos'd of the Moneys paid into their Hands, on account of the Army, &c. and for puniſhing them in caſe they perſiſted in their Refuſal. A Bill order'd in to oblige the Agents, &c. to account for the Diſpoſal of the Money they had receiv'd.

The Cry againſt Bribery and Corruption being thus rais'd, and the whole Nation attentive to the Iſſue of the Purſuit, a Petition was, about the ſame time, lodg'd Commiſſioners of Hackney-Coaches charg'd with Bribery.

A. D. 1694. againſt the Commiſſioners for licenſing and regulating Hackney Coaches, which was refer'd to a Committee, who reported to the Houſe, That the Petitioners had prov'd the Subſtance of their Complaint, and were worthy the Conſideration and Relief of the Houſe: As alſo, That ſeveral of the ſaid Commiſſioners had, by receiving Bribes, and by other undue Means, acted corruptly, arbitrarily, and contrary to the Truſt repos'd in them by Act of Parliament. And upon the whole Matter, two of them were acquitted with Honour, and three were remov'd in Diſgrace, in conſequence of an Addreſs to his Majeſty for that Purpoſe, ſetting forth the Particulars of their Mal-Adminiſtration.

and three of them remov'd.

State Trials, Vol. II. p. 480.

"From theſe ſmall Beginnings, ſays a Writer of the Times, a common Murmur aroſe, that an univerſal Corruption had overſpread the Nation; that Court, Camp, and City, nay, the very Parliament itſelf were tainted: So that both Lords and Commons were ready to write Lord have Mercy upon us, over their Doors." Nor was a Variety of Facts wanting to authoriſe this Murmur: For, partly by comparing the many unſucceſsful Attempts which had been made to carry the Orphans Bill into a Law, with the free and eaſy Paſſage it obtain'd at laſt, and partly from Informations communicated, it was more than preſum'd, that even that Work of Charity partook of the accurſed Thing, and had turn'd on a mercenary Hinge: In order, therefore, to come at the Bottom of the Affair, while this Spirit of Reformation was abroad, a ſuitable Motion was made; a Committee was appointed to inſpect the Chamberlain's Books, in order to clear up the whole Courſe of that Proceeding: And on the 7th of March they deliver'd in a Report, containing, among other Particulars, the Copy of an Order of the City-Committee, of Aldermen and Commoners, for ſoliciting the Bill, to the Chamberlain, to pay Sir John Trevor, the SPEAKER of the Houſe of Commons, a thouſand Guineas, ſo ſoon as the ſaid Bill ſhould be paſs'd: As alſo, an Intimation of Sir William Hodges, one of the Aldermen, and Mr. Dorville, one of the Commoners, That the ſaid Committee had receiv'd a Hint from Mr. Borret, the City Solicitor, That, unleſs the ſaid Sum was given, the Bill would not paſs: And Borret's own Confeſſion, That he believ'd the Speaker was privy to the Order, which alſo had been admitted by Dorville: And, laſtly, the Information of Alderman Houblon, That Sir Robert Clayton, himſelf, and the Chamberlain, had waited on the Speaker, with a Complement of Thanks in the Name of the City, and a Bill for the ſaid Guineas, which the Speaker accepted, and ſent for the Money, two or three Days afterwards.

Report concerning the Orphans Bill.

In the ſaid Report there was alſo a Copy of all the Entries in the Chamberlain's Books, of Moneys, iſſued out on this Occaſion, and among them the following one, Paid Mr. Hungerford, Chairman of the Grand Committee, for his Pains and Services, Twenty Guineas.

Laſtly, one Nois and one Smith, who had been joint Solicitors and Undertakers for the Bill, and who had receiv'd a Bond from the Orphans of Twelve-pence in the Pound for their Pains and Charges, to juſtify the ſaid Contract, brought in a Bill to the Committee of 3457*l.* 16*s.* by them diſburs'd; to which they added verbally, That they were a great deal more out of Pocket. But being examin'd to all Item in the ſaid Bill, of 1650*l.* paid to Mr. G. Finch, who was himſelf one of the Suiters, ſaid, That the ſaid Sum was to be underſtood of ſo much remitted to him on his Bond for the Twelve-pence in the Pound; not ſo much advanc'd. Finch being alſo examin'd, confirm'd this Account of theirs; and alſo acknowledg'd, That he had collected 350*l.* from other Suiters, which he had apply'd to his own Uſe, by way of reimburſing his Charges; denying withal, that he had ever paid any Money to any Member of Parliament: But being preſs'd on that Head, falter'd in his Diſcourſe, and ſaid, It was a hard thing to be aſk'd ſuch Queſtions; which, to uſe their own Words, was all the Committee could get out of him. A. D. 1694.

When Corruption had been thus trac'd to the Chair, and it was reaſonable to think had communicated the Taint to many by the way, it was impoſſible for the Houſe to retain any degree of Credit with the People, unleſs they declar'd their Abhorence of the Guilt they had diſcover'd.

The Speaker forc'd to put a Question against himself.

On the receiving and debating this Report, therefore, the Speaker himſelf, in Vertue of his Office, was expos'd to all the Shame and Confuſion of Face which a Man could bear and live, in putting the following Queſtion, viz. "That Sir John Trevor, Speaker of this Houſe, by receiving a Gratuity of 1000 Guineas from the City of London, after paſſing of the Orphans Bill, is guilty of a high Crime and Miſdemeanor."

He ignored guilty of a Misdemeanor:

Abdicates the Chair.

And ſo much Grace did he diſcover upon the Occaſion, That he choſe to abdicate rather than be depos'd: And Paul Foley, Eſq; was elected to fill the Vacancy, in Oppoſition to Sir Thomas Lyttleton, who, having been warmly recommended by Mr. Wharton, the Comptroller, was eſteem'd too much of a Courtier to ſerve in that Office, when the Honour of the Houſe was concern'd in almoſt every Queſtion that came before them.

And Hungerford, &c. alſo Hungerford, the Chairman of the Committee.

The next Steps they took, was to expel both Trevor and Hungerford; to reſolve, That whoſoever ſhould diſcover any Money, or other Gratuity, given to any Member, for Matters tranſacted in that Houſe, ſhould have the Indemnity of the Houſe for ſuch Gift: And to order Nois to be taken into the Cuſtody of the Serjeants, for having occaſion'd a Scandal to the Houſe, by pretending he was engag'd to give great Sums to ſeveral Members, and on his Examination denying it.

But while theſe Affairs were yet in Proceſs, another of the ſame kind, tho' of far greater Moment, becauſe extending much farther, riſing much higher, and comprehending a much wider Field of Venality, broke

A. D. 1694. broke out: For no ſooner was it become notorious, That voting was a Trade, and that Members, in conſequence of it, might be Sharers in every profitable Adventure that came before Parliament, than it immediately occur'd to the ſhrew'd Men, That the Favour which of late had been ſhewn to the Eaſt-India Company, aroſe from the ſame Conſideration: And having, upon Enquiry, ſortify'd their Suſpicions, by a ſuitable Diſcovery of Facts, they contriv'd, That the ſame Committee, which had the Inſpection of the Chamberlain's Books, ſhould alſo be furniſh'd with the ſame Power to inſpect thoſe of the ſaid Company: And the firſt thing they met with, whether by Accident or Information is not material, was an Abſtract of all Monies paid for the ſpecial Service of the Company ſince the Year 1687, which ſerv'd as a Clue to all their ſubſequent Proceedings. For whereas it appear'd, that in the Year 88, the Charge under that Head, amounted to no more than 1284*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* in 89, to no more than 20964*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* in 90, to no more than 30561*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.* in 91, it amounted to 11372*l.* 15*s.* 0*d.* and having fallen again the next Year to 4659*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.* in 93, roſe to no leſs than 80,468*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* which nevertheleſs fell ſhort of the real Sum, by ſeveral thouſands, as will preſently appear.

An Enquiry into the Conduct of the Eaſt-India Company.

In the two firſt Years, Sir Benjamin Bathurſt and Sir Joſiah Child had been their Governor and Deputy-Governor: In the two next, Sir Joſeph Hern and Sir Thomas Cooke; and in the two laſt Sir Thomas Cooke and Mr. Tyſſen.

The Secret, it was therefore moſt reaſonably concluded, lay in Cooke; and in order to a regular Train of Diſcovery, they had Recourſe to the Minute Books of the Court of Committees; where they found Entries made, of certain Informations given by the Governor, of his Endeavours to obtain a new Charter; and Accounts of Sums diſburs'd in Proſecution thereof; but without deſcending to Particulars, either as to Perſons or Things, which was a Method of Proceeding never admitted before: In the ſaid Entries they moreover found Expreſſions of Approbation and Thankfulneſs, from the ſaid Court of Committees, to the Governor, for his great Care, Pains, and Trouble therein: As alſo, general Orders to their Caſhiers, to make Payment of ſuch Sums of Money for carrying on the Company's Service, as the ſaid Governor ſhould direct: And particular Orders for the three following Sums, namely, one of April 13, 1693, for 22,275*l.* one of November 24, for 24,983*l.* and one of January 22, 1693-4, for 30,000*l.* beſides ſeveral more for ſmaller Sums, to the Amount of 10,144*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* in all, 87,402*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*

But the great Difficulty of all was to trace the Diſpoſal of this Sum: A great Part, it was ſaid, had been paid into the Hands of Sir Baſil Firebrace: Upon examining the Company's Caſh-Book, it appear'd, the Balance was, 124,249*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.* but when they put the Queſtion to Portmans, the Caſhier, whether he had the ſame in Caſh? A. D. 169 he anſwer'd in the Negative, and produc'd a Receipt of Cooke's, dated January 10, 1693-4, for 90,000*l.* and ſignifying, That he had laid out the Sum for 99,197*l.* Eaſt-India Stock, on the Company's Account.

But the Committee could neither find any Warrant for the ſaid Sum, nor any Transfer of Stock on the Company's Account, except 18,300*l.*

They alſo found a Contract, dated February 26, 1693, for 200 Tuns of Salt-Petre, to be brought home in the Ship Seymour, from India, for which the Company was to pay 12,000*l.* and 25*l.* per Tun Freight to the Owners of the ſaid Ship, beſides all Charges here: That 2000*l.* had been iſſued out of the Company's Caſh to pay for the ſaid Salt-Petre in India: And that a Bond had been given for the reſt, under the Company's Seal, payable March 31, 1695, (to Mr. Thomas Colſton, tho', as ſuppos'd, in Truſt for ſome body elſe) whether the Ship arriv'd in Safety or not; with this Exception only, That if 200 Tun of Salt-Petre was not laden upon the ſaid Ship, then there was to be a Defalcation in Proportion to the Deficience.

They alſo found, That, about the ſame time this Contract was made, as many of the Interlopers as would ſell their Shares in the Interloping Trade, were allow'd their firſt Coſt, 25 per Cent. Advance, and half the Profit beſides; which was done by giving them Credit for ſo much in the Company's Books.

Proceeding then to ſuch Particulars as they had been able to diſcover, the Committee obſerv'd, That the Money iſſued during the Government of Herne and Cooke, had been iſſued by them for private Service, but brought to account under the Head of Charges general: That Sir Benjamin Bathurſt, one of the Court of Committees, being examin'd, ſaid, He would have call'd for an Account thereof, but Cooke deſir'd he would not: But another time, expoſtulating warmly with the ſaid Cooke, concerning the great Sums expended in Secret Service, He, the ſaid Cooke, refus'd to give him the Particulars: And again, at another time, concerning the 90,000*l.* Cooke thought fit to acknowledge, It was to gratify ſome Perſons in caſe the Bill ſhould paſs. The Company's Committee of Nine, to whom the Inſpection of the whole Matter was referr'd, alſo declar'd, That they had ſeveral times call'd upon Cooke for an Account of the Diſtributions he had made: That he had ſometimes promis'd to comply; but finally told them, It was not convenient for them to have it.

Sir Baſil Firebrace own'd he had receiv'd upwards of 16,000*l.* which he had laid out in Stock, with the Company's Allowance: That he had invited ſeveral Perſons into the Company, ſome of them Members, and had offer'd to lay down the Money for them, with this additional Inducement, That if they did not like their Bargain at the Year's End, he would take it off their Hands.

Concerning

A. D. 1695. Concerning the Accommodation with the Interlopers, the Committee was inform'd, That Lord Nottingham had acquainted the Company, by Letter, that it was the King's Pleasure they should come to an Agreement with them: That about one half accepted the Terms; but Mr. Godfrey and Mr. Colston insisting upon 30 per Cent. the rest went off: And, lastly, that it was believ'd the Contract for Salt-Petre, with the said Colston, which was the original Inducement for the Leave given, with regard to the Interlopers, was only in Trust with him for some body else.

It was in this Light that this unprecedented Affair first appear'd in the Report of the Committee to the House: And yet, tho' the said Report was receiv'd on the 12th of 1695. March, and tho' common Decency, as well The Report suf- as common Sense, and common Justice, re- fer'd for fourteen Days. quir'd, That Cooke, who was a Member, should have been examin'd immediately, it was the 26th before an Order was made for that Purpose: But then such a Flame of Cooke, on his refusing to be examin'd, order'd to the Tower. Zeal burst forth at once, that, upon his Refusal to answer, he was immediately committed to the Tower; and a Bill of Pains and Penalties was order'd in, to oblige him to give an Account how the said Sum of 87,402*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* mention'd in the Report, had been distributed.

On the 28th this Bill was brought in accordingly, and read for the first time; on the 29th it was read again, and committed to a Committee of the whole House: The same Day Cooke, on his Petition, had Leave to be heard against it by his Council: On the 2d of April several Amendments were A Bill to oblige made to the Bill: On the 3d, those Amend- him to answer first up to the Lords. ments were reported and agreed to: On the 6th, Cooke's Council were heard again; after which the Bill was pass'd, and sent up to the Lords.

And there the Affair took a new Direction: For on the first reading of the Bill, the Duke of Leeds (so often mention'd in the Course of this Work, under the several Titles of the Marquis of Carmarthen, Earl of Danby, and Sir Thomas Osborne) having laid Where it is af- his Hand on his Heart, and prefac'd what he firm'd by the had to say with a solemn Protestation of his Duke of Leeds. own Clearness and Innocence; as also having declar'd, upon his Faith and Honour, That he was perfectly disinterested, as having no Part or Concern in the Matter, took occasion to express his Abhorrence of the Bill, and exhausted all the Arguments his Imagination could furnish, to convince the Lords, That they ought to reject it, as being contrary both to Law and Equity, and furnishing a Precedent of the most dangerous Nature: And so much regard was shewn either to him or them, that seven Days more were wasted, before any material Progress was made in the Affair.

But then, on the 13th of April, that is to say, an Expedient was thought of at once to keep the Ball in motion, and turn the Bias from the Mark: For Cooke being induc'd to petition the Lords for a Hearing at their Bar, their Lordships, by Message, made it their Request to the Commons, That he being a Member, might be permitted, and order'd to make his Appearance there accordingly, when call'd upon: The Commons comply'd, and Cooke, in consequence of the Speaker's Warrant, being brought up from the Tower, declar'd, That he was ready and willing to make a full Discovery, in case he might be favour'd with an indemnifying Vote: That he would have made this full Discovery before to the Commons, if he could have prevail'd on them to shew him the same Favour: That their Denial had laid him under a Necessity of making this Application to their Lordships: And that he bemoan'd himself (this he said with Tears in his Eyes) that he was not already so indemnify'd, because he might then instantly have made the Discovery which was expected from him, and which he was so desirous to make.

Being ask'd, Against what he desir'd to be indemnify'd? He answer'd, against all Actions and Suits, except those of the East-India Company, whom he had never injur'd: And when he was withdrawn, the Duke of Leeds stood up; and, after intimating, That he was glad the Gentleman was in such a Temper, as render'd the Bill unnecessary, which he look'd upon to be so unjust in itself, and so pernicious in its Tendency; put their Lordships in mind, That the Commons had taken care of the Reputation of their House, by asking Cooke, whether he had distributed any Money among their Members; and that he had purg'd them by a solemn Protestation, That he had not: After which he proceeded to say, That he thought it reasonable for the Lords to shew the same Regard to themselves; and concluded with a Motion, That he might be call'd in and ask'd, Whether he was willing to purge all those upon Oath who sat there?

But this was over-rul'd; and upon the whole Matter, their Lordships came to a Resolution to drop the Bill of Pains and Penalties; and to appoint a Committee to with- A Bill of Indemnity order'd by the Lords. draw forthwith, and prepare such a Bill of Indemnification, as Cooke had desir'd.

It is remember'd, That when the said Committee was withdrawn, and had made some Progress, one of the Bishops, (it is pity his Name is not also remember'd) who had appear'd zealous for Cooke in the Course of the Debate, notify'd to their Lordships, on his Behalf, That he was fearful of being misapprehended, in regard to what he had said at the Bar, viz. That he was both ready and willing to make the Discovery expected from him: For that by ready, he meant no more than willing; and four Months, at least, would be necessary to answer that Expectation.

This so highly incens'd some of their Lordships, that they were for rising, not only to report this fresh Matter to the House, but in such a manner as might shew the Necessity of perfecting the former Bill.

It so happen'd, however, that some were of a different Mind; and while the Matter was debating, Cooke made a second Appli- A. D. 1695. cation,

A. D. 1695. cation, on so low a Footing, as to comply with the Bill in a Fortnight; which not being accepted, he at last agreed to the Time prescrib'd, which was seven Days.

It was, however, the 17th before the Bill was sent down to the Commons, who having given it one Reading, order'd it to lye upon the Table, and by Message put their Lordships in mind of their own Bill of Pains and Penalties.

On the Morrow, however, they resum'd the Consideration of the other; and having grafted upon it a penal Clause, by way of Amendment, sent it up to the Lords on the 19th; who the same Day, by Message, signify'd their Concurrence to the said Amendment.

As to the Intents of it, the Preamble set forth, That, whereas it appear'd by the Books of the East-India Company, that Sir Thomas Cooke had receiv'd, out of the Stock and Treasure of the said Company, the several Sums of 10,258*l.* 67,000*l.* and 90,000*l.* it was necessary to the vindicating the Honour and Justice of Government, that a true Discovery of the Distribution of these Sums should be made.

In order to which it was enacted, 1. That, in case the said Cooke, on or before the 23d of April, 1695, did make a true and full Discovery upon Oath, to a joint Committee of Lords and Commons, how, and in what manner, to what Person or Persons, to what particular Uses, Intent, and Purposes, and on what Account the said Sums of 90,000*l.* and 67,000*l.* had been distributed, he should be liable to no Action, except from the East-India Company; and should also be pardon'd and indemnify'd for any Crime by him committed in the Direction or Application thereof. 2. That in case the said Cooke did, on or before the first of September, 1695, in like manner discharge himself upon Oath, to the Commissioners for taking and stating the public Accounts, of the 10,258*l.* above specify'd, he should also be exempted from all Process, and pardon'd.

A penal Clause added by the Commons.

And, 3dly, That, in case he did not make such full and true Discovery, on or before the said 23d of April, he should, from thenceforth, continue a Prisoner in the Tower, until he should have made such full and true Discovery.

This was the Clause added by the Commons, and which, in effect, reduc'd the two Bills into one. But however necessary it was to vindicate the Honour and Justice of the Government, according to the Preamble of the Bill, tho' the said Bill was ready for the Royal Assent on Friday, consequently might have been pass'd the next Day, and on extraordinary Occasions the two Houses have thought it no Breach of the Sabbath, to continue their Sittings on that Day, for the Dispatch of Business, his Majesty did not come to the House till Monday the 22d; and then having pass'd such Bills as were presented to him (that is say, one for the raising 618,420*l.* by enabling Persons to purchase reversionary Annuities, a Moiety for the Use of the Navy, and the other Moiety for the Use of the Army: A Second for granting several Duties upon Marriages, Births, Burials, Batchelors, and Widowers, for the Term of five Years, with a Clause of Loan for 650,000*l.* at 8 per Cent. Interest: A Third for granting several additional Duties upon Coffee, Tea, &c. for paying the Transport-Service Debt for the Reduction of Ireland, which, as settled by the Commissioners of Accounts, amounted to 330,769*l.* 10*s.* 7*d.* A Fourth for continuing the said Commission of Accounts: The Mutiny Act: An Act for explaining the Stamp Act, and ascertaining the Admeasurement of the Tunnage of Ships: Cooke's Act, &c.) was pleas'd to express himself as follows. A. D. 1695.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

I take this Occasion to tell you, That the Season of the Year is so far advanc'd, and the Circumstances of Affairs are so pressing, that I very earnestly recommend to you the speedy dispatching such Business, as you think of most Importance for the Public Good, because I must put an End to this Session in a few Days." The King presses Dispatch.

As it is impossible not to discern the Drift of this Speech, it is equally impossible not to be shock'd at it: And the more we are dispos'd to revere the Character of a Deliverer, the more we must be confounded at every Measure that serves to disgrace the Deliverance. It was once well said, That he who was not at Leisure to do Justice, ought not to be at Leisure to reign: And to King William it might have been said with more Propriety, than to any other Prince: His high Pretensions to rectify all Abuses, had constituted him a Sovereign: And his Adversaries could find no Defect in his Title, which hurt him so sensibly as the Defects of his Administration.

But to proceed: The shorter the Time assign'd for the Examination was, the greater was the Necessity to make the most of it: Some of both Houses were in earnest, tho' more were otherwise: And having the Cry with them, they resolv'd to expose, tho' they foresaw it would be impossible to punish.

But notwithstanding all the Ardour they shew'd, and the Diligence they us'd, all that was done by the two Houses, during the Residue of the 22d, in relation to the Prosecution of this Affair, was the making choice of the Committee, which were to make the Inquest, in conformity to the Act.

The Lords appointed twelve, viz. The Lord Privy-Seal Pembroke, the Duke of Shrewsbury, the Earls of Manchester, Bridgewater, Thanet, Rochester, Monmouth, Marlborough, and Torrington, the Lord-Viscount Weymouth, and the Lords Cornwallis and Godolphin.

The Commons appointed twenty-four, viz. Sir John Thompson, Sir Richard Onslow, —— Bridges, Esq; Sir Henry Herbert, Charles Montagu, Henry Boyle, —— Hutchinson, Hugh Boscawen, Thomas Pelham, Thomas Wharton, (Comptroller) Robert Harley, James Chadwick, Edward Clarke, Thomas Papillon, Esqrs. Sir Thomas Pope Blunt, Sir Walter

A. D. 1695. Walter Young, Sir Chriſtopher Muſgrave, Sir Edward Abney, Sir Herbert Croſts, Sir Rowland Gwyn, Sir William Cowper, —— Brockman, and Francis Gwinne, Eſq.

Thus it appears, that in each Liſt there was a Mixture of Patriot and Courtier, Whig and Tory: For both Parties affected an equal Concern for the Proſecution; and it is certain that both were equally concern'd in it: Each had Friends to ſkreen, and Adverſaries to expoſe: And the great Point of Conteſt between them probably was, which ſhould be made anſwerable to the Public for the Job.

Cooke examin'd by a joint Committee of both Houſes.

On the Morrow the two Committees met at the Exchequer-Chamber: Cooke was brought before them, and upon the Acts being read, made it his Requeſt, That in caſe he conform'd to the Intentions of it, by a full and perfect Diſcovery, they would recommend him to the two Houſes, in ſuch a manner, as might obtain their Votes for his Diſcharge, which he apprehended, for want of a ſuitable Direction in the Act, he could no otherwiſe obtain. This they agreed to, tho' they did not allow his Apprehenſion to be well founded: And then having been ſworn, he deliver'd in a Paper, which he call'd a full and true Diſcovery to the beſt of his Knowledge, and, which he ſaid, he had put down in writing, for the Eaſe of the Committee.

His firſt Confeſſion.

This conſiſted of ſeveral Articles, of which the moſt material were as follow, viz.

1. Deliver'd to Francis Tyſſen, Eſq; ſeveral Tallies for 10,000 l. for the ſpecial Service of the Company.

2. To Mr. Richard Acton, to defray the Expences of himſelf, and for his Friends ſoliciting to prevent a new Settlement of the Eaſt-India Company, and to endeavour the Eſtabliſhment of the old, 10,000 l.

3. To Ditto for Intereſt of the Money, and Gratitude for his Pains more, 2000 l.

4. To Mr. Molineaux, a Merchant, for himſelf and Friends, in ſoliciting the Company's Affairs, to prevent a new Charter, 310 Guineas.

5. To Colonel Fitz-Patrick, for the Service done the Company, by his Solicitations for a new Charter, 1000 Guineas.

6. To Charles Bates, Eſq; on the ſame Account, 500 Guineas.

7. To Sir Baſil Firebrace, in recompence of his Trouble, in proſecuting the Company's Affairs, and in conſideration of other Loſſes he had ſuſtain'd, by neglecting his own Buſineſs, and by not engaging himſelf with the interloping Ships, 10,000 l.

8. To the ſaid Sir Baſil Firebrace, for 50 per Cent. loſs on Stock, which the ſaid Cooke was oblig'd, by Contract, to accept of him, on the Company's Account, at 150 per Cent. 30,000 l.

To this Paper was alſo annex'd an Account of the 90,000 l. laid out in Stock on the Company's Account, or rather a Liſt of the Perſons of whom the ſaid Stock was bought, to make good the ſaid Loſs.

But this true and full Diſcovery not anſwering its Title, nor the Purpoſes of the Act, the Committeee not only expreſs'd A. D. 1695. their Diſſatisfaction with it, but proceeded to examine him on ſuch Heads as were leaſt explain'd, and yet deſerv'd Explanation moſt.

His ſecond Confeſſion.

Of theſe the 10,000 l. paid to Tyſſen for ſpecial Service, ſtanding firſt in the way, was therefore firſt proceeded upon: And in anſwer to the Queſtions put to him by the Committee, he was pleas'd to confeſs yet farther, That it was paid in November 92, without any Directions as to the Diſpoſal of it.—But it was in expectation of having their Charter confirm'd, and of obtaining new Regulations.—It was for the Service of the King.—But he could not ſay the King had it.—He believ'd Mr. Tyſſen had told him, that he deliver'd it to Sir Joſiah Child, who deliver'd it to the King.—But then it was a cuſtomary Preſent.—It was what King Charles, and other Kings, had receiv'd.—The like had been done for ſeveral Years, as appear'd by the Company's Books.

With regard to the Sums paid to Acton, he ſaid, They were paid about the ſame time.—That they were paid him with the Privity of Sir Joſiah Child, who recommended him as a Perſon capable of doing the Company great Service, becauſe having great Acquaintance among Parliament-Men: Who theſe Parliament-Men were, he could not particulariſe.—The End aim'd at was to get an Act of Parliament—To the beſt of his Remembrance, there was a Bill at that time depending for another Company—And the King had ſent a Meſſage to the Houſe of Commons, to ſettle the Eaſt-India Trade.—He believ'd Acton paid away the ſaid Money the ſame Seſſion.—He underſtood it was laid out for promoting their Affairs in Parliament.—He could not ſay to whom it was given: Nor could any Body but Acton give account, who was now a diſtracted Man, and could give no Account at all.—He had once offer'd to give the Company an Account, but they had refus'd to receive it.—He underſtood, however, that it went no farther than the Houſe of Commons; and it did not appear that the Company had reap'd any Fruit from the Diſtribution.

Concerning the Money paid to Molineaux, which was alſo during the ſame Seſſion, he ſaid, That Molineaux told him it was for Lord Rivers: But ſince his Confinement Molineaux had inform'd him, That was a wrong thing, and that he had made uſe of it himſelf.

The Money paid to Fitzpatrick, was for his Intereſt in Lord Nottingham; and in conſequence of his undertaking to do the Company great Service, provided he might have ſuch a Sum of Money:—He believ'd Fitzpatrick kept the ſaid Money himſelf.—But there was a Promiſe of a farther Sum, in caſe the Act of Parliament to eſtabliſh another Company did not paſs.

The 500 Guineas paid to Mr. Bates, was a conditional Payment, if the Charter was paſs'd: And was accordingly paid on paſſing the Charter, in October 1693.—He, Cooke, had no Acquaintance with Bates: But he had learn'd from Sir Baſil Firebrace, That he

A. D. 1695. he was acquainted with ſeveral Lords, and in particular with the Marquis of Carmarthen, then Duke of Leeds.

Then as to Sir Baſil Firebrace, the firſt 90,000 l. was paid him about November, 1693, as he, Cooke, had always apprehended, for his, Firebrace's, own Uſe, to recompence his Loſſes in the interloping Trade, the Charter being paſs'd; and the other 30,000 l. in recompence of the Loſs incurr'd by the Company, on (x) ten ſeveral Contracts with the ſaid Sir Baſil, for 60,000 l. Stock, at 150 per Cent. when the Market Price of the ſaid Stock was at 100 l.—The Condition of theſe Contracts was, the paſſing the Charter, in which caſe, the Company was to pay the Difference.—Accordingly the Charter being paſs'd, all the ſaid 30,000 l. was paid at one time, that is to ſay, about January, 1693, in ſix ſeveral Sums, on Sir Baſil's Order, to Fowls and Wooton, Allen and Hornby, Goldſmiths.—But to whom the Money was afterwards diſtributed, he could never learn.—He had often preſs'd Sir Baſil to inform him, but he had always refus'd; and at laſt, with a Menace, That in caſe he was preſs'd any farther, he would have no more to do with the Affair.—But both the 10,000 l. and the 30,000 l. were ſubſcrib'd into the Eaſt-India Company; and probably thoſe who ſubſcrib'd it, might be able to give better Information.

Here he was prevail'd upon by the Committee, to produce ſome of the Contracts he had mention'd; and alſo, to confeſs, that there were ſeveral other Contracts in conſideration of a New Charter, to the Amount of 60,000 l. and others for 40,000 l. more, in caſe an Act ſhould, in eighteen Months, be procur'd, to confirm and enlarge the ſaid Charter, which, the ſaid Term being elaps'd, were then become void.

And, finally, as to the 90,000 l. he ſaid, It was laid out in the Purchaſe of Stock, according to the Paper he had deliver'd in, for the Uſe of the Company, to make good the Contracts with Sir Baſil, in caſe he ſhould chuſe Stock rather than Money: That he was accountable for it: That Part had been already transferr'd to the Company: That Part of it had been ſold; and that they had the Money it produc'd.

This was the Subſtance of his Confeſſion. The next Day it was ſeverally reported to each Houſe, and occaſion'd very fierce Debates in both: The Innocent were proud of an Opportunity to make a Merit of that Innocence: The Guilty durſt not draw themſelves into Suſpicion, by any Endeavour to moderate the Reſentment which A. D. 1695. that Guilt had caus'd: And even the Lords who had been nam'd, ſeem'd to be more incens'd, and to expreſs more Abhorrence of ſuch corrupt Practices than the reſt, to make the way ſo much the eaſier to their own Juſtification. Lord Rivers not only took care to purge himſelf by the ſtrongeſt Aſſeverations to his Peers, and obtain'd an Order for Molineaux to be ſent for, to juſtify him at the Bar of the Houſe, (tho' it does not appear that he caus'd him to be puniſh'd for the Aſperſion) but found means to have his Defence reported to the Houſe of Commons, together with certain Complements, ſignifying, That he had ſtill as high an Eſteem for the Houſe, as when he was a Member of it; and that he had the ſame Concern to be thought well of by them.

Againſt Lord Nottingham, Cooke had ſaid nothing poſitive; and Fitzpatrick being dead, all that lay upon his Lordſhip was eaſily transferr'd to him, who, it was ſaid, had equally abus'd the Company, by taking their Money, and his Lordſhip, by proſtituting his Name.

And as to the Duke of Leeds, who declar'd himſelf againſt the Bill of Pains and Penalties, under ſuch extraordinary Profeſſions of his being wholly diſintereſted, it is yet too ſoon to ſpeak of the Imputation faſten'd upon him.

But the very mention of theſe Names, and the Knowledge that Wharton, the Comptroller, preſented the Report to the Commons, is ſufficient to ſhew, that the Direction of the Affair was principally againſt the Tories: Beſides, the Eaſt-India Company was ſtill under a Tory, if not a Jacobite Direction: One of their Ships had been call'd the Modena, a long while after the Revolution: Theſe corrupt Proceedings had all taken Place, while the Tories had the Upper Hand in the Adminiſtration: Thoſe, who by their Endeavours to eſtabliſh a new Company, had given occaſion to them, were known Whigs: And in a State where Party-Intereſts were always preferr'd to the Intereſt of the whole, what Cry ſoever is rais'd, we muſt expect to ſee it made uſe of, to anſwer a Party-Purpoſe.

The Enquiry levell'd againſt the Tories.

Cooke's Confeſſion had only ſerv'd to enflame, not to ſatisfy: And as nothing material could be ſaid in extenuation of the Facts, which already appear'd, it was but reaſonable to follow the Clue, if poſſible, till it led to the Authors of them: Accordingly a Motion was made, and ſeconded, for an Order, That Firebrace and Acton ſhould attend

A. D. 1695 tend the Houſe of Commons the next Day: But before any Reſolution could be taken, the Lords, by Meſſage, deſir'd an immediate Conference; and at that Conference ſignify'd, That Firebrace was near at Hand, and would appear when call'd for: As alſo, That it was their Lordſhips Opinion, That all Examinations ſhould be taken by a Committee of both Houſes, as in Cooke's Caſe: The Commons, upon the Report, acquieſce'd; their Committee, which was the ſame as before, immediately withdrew to join that of the Lords in the Exchequer-Chamber; and Firebrace being call'd in, reply'd to their Interrogatories, in ſubſtance as follows, viz. That he had receiv'd the firſt 10,000*l.* as a Gratuity for his Loſſes: That he had receiv'd the 30,000*l.* by virtue of a Contract with Cooke, and the Money was for Favours and Services done: That the Loſs upon the Stock was occaſion'd by the Ships not coming in: That in caſe the Ships had come in, there would have been no ſuch Loſs, and he ſhould have gain'd as much as the 30,000*l.* That both the 10,000*l.* and the 30,000*l.* were directly for himſelf, and for the Uſe of no other Perſon whatſoever. That he had paid no Part of the ſame towards procuring a Charter, nor made any Promiſe ſo to do. That he had had, indeed, ſeveral Diſcourſes with Cooke, about uſing his Intereſt to procure a new Charter: But then it was becauſe it was his Intereſt to obtain one, after the Contracts were made: That he believ'd Cooke might deſire to be inform'd how he diſpos'd of the Money, and he anſwer'd, It was not fair; it was contrary to his Agreement.—He was not to aſk what he did with his own, &c.

Firebrace's first Examination.

Thus far he went on with Confidence enough: But being farther aſk'd, What particular Service he did, or was to do, for procuring a new Charter? he fell into Confuſion, and ſaid, He wiſh'd he might be permitted to anſwer that Queſtion ſome other time.—He was not well.—He had not ſlept for two or three Nights.—He was unwilling to take too much upon himſelf.—He thought, however, he had done the Company great Service in ſoliciting, and other ways. He knew not of any Money or Stock given to any Perſon whatſoever for procuring a new Charter.

Laſtly, being again aſk'd whether the 30,000*l.* or the Value of 30,000*l.* was wholly for himſelf, and whether no Part of it was diſpos'd of to any other Perſon, his Anſwer was, That no Part of it was paid to any body but himſelf, except 500*l.* to one Mr. Powel, for his good Offices amongſt the Interlopers, and his Aſſiſtance in reconciling Differences.

Thus the Scent was foil'd again: And it became as neceſſary to proceed by Bill againſt Firebrace as Cooke: But ſuch a Bill might have brought out the whole Secret, which, it is reaſonable to think, was never intended.

To amuſe the Houſe, therefore, while ſome other Practice was try'd, it was reſolv'd to ſend for the Goldſmiths with whom the Money had been lodg'd by Firebrace, and to endeavour to ſift out of them the Secret of the Diſtribution. But tho' they attended the Committee, and produc'd the Caſh-Accounts between them and Firebrace, nothing appear'd that was of any Moment. A. D. 1695

As Firebrace had been examin'd on the 24th, their Turn was on the 28th: And what is very obſervable, when the Committee was almoſt in Deſpair, Firebrace, of his own Motion, for aught that appears, ſent in a Meſſage, deſiring to be call'd in again, and to be re-examin'd. His Second Examination.

Accordingly, being call'd in, and having ſlept on the Queſtions put to him the Day before, he could now recollect, That, in conſequence of a Treaty with Mr. Bates, whom he thought able to do Service in paſſing the Charter, he had given him two Notes for 5500 Guineas: That one of theſe Notes, which was for 2500 Guineas, was paid, after the Charter for reſtoring the Company was paſs'd, and the other, which was for 3000, after the Charter of Regulations was paſs'd: That he had theſe Notes from Cooke, and was accountable to him for them. That, as he verily believ'd, the ſaid Cooke did know how the ſaid Notes were to be diſpos'd of: That he had told him, the ſaid Bates had Acquaintance with ſeveral Lords, naming the Lord Preſident, and others: That, nevertheleſs, he could not tell whom the Money was deſign'd for, Bates refuſing to deal on the Terms of telling Names: That, indeed, he had introduc'd the Deponent ſeveral times to the Lord-Preſident, who ſtarting ſome Scruples in point of Law, he had his Grace's Leave to bring the Attorney-General to him, in order to remove them: That he did not remember Bates had ever introduc'd him to any other Lord. That one Day laſt Week, Bates made an Offer of returning the ſaid 5000 Guineas, ſaying, it might make a Noiſe. That on the Tueſday before 4400 Guineas being the Value of 5500*l.* was brought to the Deponent accordingly: That the other 500 Guineas were ſtill in Bates's Hands. That Cooke at firſt made a Scruple of retaking this Money, but, on the Morning he was brought before the Committee, did conſent to it. That he, the ſaid Deponent, believ'd Cooke had a double Account, one made up with this Sum, the other without: That Bates would have paid back the whole, but Cooke refus'd it, ſaying, it would make the Account uneven. That the ſaid 5000 Guineas were no Part of the 40,000*l.* before-mention'd: That the ſaid 40,000*l.* was wholly his own; and that he always took care to have it particularly underſtood, That it was for his own Uſe and Benefit. That finding great Stops in the Buſineſs of the Charter, they apprehended it proceeded ſometimes from the Earl of Nottingham, ſometimes from others. That Fitzpatrick receiv'd 1000 Guineas on the ſame Terms as Others receiv'd the Sums alotted them, that is to ſay, if the Charter paſs'd. That he pretended to have great Intereſt with Lord Nottingham; and that he could procure Information from Lady Darby how the Queen's Pleaſure was. That he would

A. D. 1693. try to prevail with Lord Nottingham for 5000 Guineas on paſſing the Charter, and 3000 l. on the Act of Parliament: But that his Lordſhip refus'd to take it. That he had heard that a Note, ſign'd by Child and Cooke, for 50,000 l. was lodg'd in Tyſſon's Hands, for about a Year, to be paid in caſe the Act paſs'd: That it was refus'd, as he underſtood, by Lord Portland, and that Tyſſon had told him this lately.

This was all that was, thus far, material in the Recollections of Firebrace: And the ſame Day Acton being examin'd, he had alſo the Addreſs (diſtracted as he had been repreſented by Cooke) to confeſs no more than is contain'd in the following Particulars, viz. That he had receiv'd the Sums of 10,000 l. and 2000 l. from Cooke: That he had told Cooke he had Friends who would take Pains to do the Company Service, but they would have 10,000 l. That Cooke agreed to give the ſaid 10,000 l. That he, the ſaid Deponent, advanc'd the Money: That the 2000 l. was for his own Pains and Trouble in attending two Seſſions: That, however, in caſe the Bill for a new Company had paſs'd, he was to have had nothing. That he verily believ'd he had given Cooke an Acccount of the Diſtribution of the Money, or elſe it would not have been truſted to him. That he did not diſtribute it to Members, but to ſuch as had an Intereſt with Members. That a conſiderable Part of the Money had paſs'd thro' the Hands of Craggs, whom he (the ſaid Deponent) was concern'd with, in the cloathing the Army, and who had Acquaintance with Colonels in the Houſe, and ſome northern Members. That Colonel Goldwell (who was then dead) was the only Member he himſelf had given Money too; and that if he was allow'd a little time to peruſe his Papers, he could recollect farther.

Acton's Examination.

He then deliver'd in a Paper to the Committee, containing the Names of ſeveral Perſons, and the Sums he had diſtributed amongſt them: By which it appear'd, that the Money entruſted to Craggs was 4540 l. and the Sum given to Goldwell, 1000 l. But all the other Particulars, his own 2000 l. and 1300 l. more for his Expences included, amounted to no more than 5753 l. ſo that 707 l. remain'd wholly unaccounted for.

Bates was ſummon'd before the Committee the ſame Day: But tho' he had been ſeen paſſing thro' Weſtminſter-Hall between Five and Six in the Afternoon, he could not be found that Evening: This produc'd an Order for his being taken into Cuſtody: And being the next Day taken, and examin'd accordingly, depos'd, That Firebrace had apply'd to him for his Intereſt to obtain a Charter; had ſaid, the Company would be very grateful for it; but that he could not remember any particular Sum was nam'd. That he did accordingly uſe his Intereſt with the Lord-Preſident, who ſaid, He would do what Service he could, agreeable to the Opinion which he had deliver'd in public, viz. That he thought the Charter ought to be confirm'd, and that the Forfeiture was a Hardſhip: That the Lord-Preſident had often Bates's Examination.

A. D. 1693. ſhew'd himſelf his Friend: That he did receive the Notes in queſtion: That he ſent a Servant to receive the Money, but could not ſay at what time. That he told the Preſident of it, and would have paſs'd it upon him; but he refus'd it: That, hereupon, in regard he could not very well tell Money himſelf, he aſk'd his Lordſhip's Leave for his Servant to tell the Money: That his Lordſhip giving Leave, Monſieur Robart, his Servant, did accordingly receive the Money: That he had not the Notes till after one Charter was paſs'd: That they were given at one time: That he gave no Counter-Notes for them: (But of this, on farther Examination, he did not ſeem to be poſitive) That he thought, when he firſt enter'd into Treaty with Firebrace, the Latter did ſay he ſhould have a Sum, and that he nam'd a particular Sum. That the 500 Guineas was receiv'd before June, and the 5000 afterwards. That the Notes were never out of his Poſſeſſion till the time that he gave them to Monſieur Robart to receive the Money: That the ſaid Robart brought him the Money: That it had remain'd in his Poſſeſſion till he return'd 4400 Guineas thereof to Sir Baſil: That theſe 4400 Guineas were in four Bags, of 1100 each, as brought to him by Robart, within a Month laſt paſt. That as to the 600 Guineas, remaining of the 5000, he had ſpent the ſame: (But this he did not perſiſt in; for being preſs'd, he ſaid, He might have ſpent ſome of them, but the Reſidue were in his Study) That his Reaſon for returning the 4400, was the Noiſe it made, and his Apprehenſion, That People might think he did not deſerve them. That the whole 5000 were for his own private Uſe; and that he might have given them to his Footman.

A. D. 1693.

Thus Bates appear'd as ſolicitous to cover his Patron, as Firebrace to make his own Peace, by expoſing him: It was, therefore, incumbent on thoſe who had the Management of the Latter, to bring him forward again, and to put him on ſuch farther Explanations, as would beſt anſwer the great Purpoſe they had to ſerve.

Accordingly, being again brought before the Committee, ſuch Queſtions were put to him, as led him to ſay, That Cooke being apprehenſive the Charter ſtuck with the Duke of Leeds, he, the Deponent, thereupon apply'd to Bates, who would not pretend to talk of his Grace, but ſaid, He muſt be told what the Company would do. That he, the Deponent, reply'd, He thought a Preſent might be made of 2 or 3000 l. That Bates, at their next meeting it muſt be ſuppos'd, ſaid, He had been at St. James's, had ſpoke to his Friend, and more had been offer'd by the other Side. That, at another time, he ſaid, more was offer'd by one Side; and, at laſt, 5000 l. had been offer'd by another Hand of the ſame Side: That the Deponent acquainting Cooke with this Propoſal, the Latter ſaid, If it was inſiſted on, it muſt be done: That it was agreed to make an Offer of 5000 Guineas. That this being imparted to Bates, he ſaid, This was nothing to him.—

Firebrace re-examin'd.

He

A. D. 1695. He ought not to be employ'd for nothing. That this occaſion'd a new Application to Cooke, and a new Reſolution to give him 500 Guineas beſides. That after all Bates would undertake no farther, than that the Duke ſhould not oppoſe; as not being certain whether he had not pre-engag'd himſelf, by having ſpoke on the other Side: That the Deponent objected to this, becauſe he would not diſpoſe of the Company's Money for nothing, and it would reflect on him if nothing was done. That, hereupon it was agreed, that in caſe the Duke did act in favour of the Company, he ſhould have 2000 and 3000 Guineas, and Bates 500 for himſelf; and that he, the Deponent, would have delay'd the Payment of his 500 to the laſt, to induce him to be the more active in the Cauſe; but Bates reply'd, His Friend would have his 500 Guineas paid firſt.

Having proceeded thus far to ſhew that Bates was no more than a Factor between the Company and the Duke, he produc'd a Copy of his Counter-Note for the 3000 Guineas, in which he promis'd not to receive or alter the Property of Cooke's Note, till ſuch time as the Charter then depending before their Majeſties, for making Regulations, Alterations, and Additions, &c. ſhould paſs the great Seal of England; and to vacate the ſaid Note, in caſe it did not paſs.

He alſo depos'd, That a like Counter-Note had been given for the other Note of 2500 Guineas, but that he had not taken a Copy thereof: That on the paſſing the firſt Charter, he gave Bates Notice, that he might call for the Money: That in two or three Days he did call for it accordingly: That the other Note was paid in a Week after the paſſing of the ſecond Charter: That from the time the Notes were given, they had free Acceſs to the Lord-Preſident, and found him eaſy and willing to give them Aſſiſtance. That Bates, in the Courſe of the Treaty, had been ſhy, and ſpoke only of his Friend at St. James's: That theſe Words, in caſe the Lord-Preſident did not aſſiſt the Company in paſſing the Charter, being inſerted in the firſt Note, the Form was alter'd to the Form quoted above. That about a Week before the Money was return'd, Bates took an Opportunity to tell the Deponent, it was all for himſelf. That on the Saturday or Monday before, that is to ſay, the 20th or 22d Inſtant, Bates being at his own Houſe, ſaid, He had not the Money by him, but he would fetch it; and that the Money he thought was in Silver; but that afterwards he told this Deponent, It was only a Miſtake, and he had brought as much Gold as by computation came to the ſame Sum: And that when the Deponent told him Cooke would not take the whole back, Bates ſaid, He could not give an Anſwer till he had ſpoke with his Friend.

The Lord-Preſident being thus involv'd in the Guilt and Infamy of the Job, the ſame communicative Evidence was led to be almoſt as communicative, with regard to ſome other active Men of the ſame Party.

For in the next Place he proceeded to A. D. 1695. confeſs, That Sir John Trevor, ſince the Commencement of this Enquiry, had refunded 500 Guineas, which had been given him by Cooke, in the Deponent's Preſence, under Colour of an Arrear for four or five Years, (annual Perquiſite muſt be underſtood) as a Commiſſioner of the great Seal: That at another time 200 Guineas had been given to the ſaid Trevor, by Sir Joſeph Herne, as a New-Year's Gift. That as to 20,000*l.* of the 30,000*l.* before-mention'd, it was not actually paid till after Lady-Day of the then current Year: That he had the other 10,000*l.* ſtill remaining in Eaſt-India Stock. That his Purpoſe was to diſtribute the whole 30,000*l.* in this manner, viz. 10,000*l.* to Sir J. Trevor, Sir Edward Seymour, and Mr. Guy; 10,000*l.* to the Merchants-Interlopers, and 10,000*l.* to himſelf. That having told Guy, that the paſſing the Charter and Act of Parliament would be worth 10,000*l.* amongſt them, Guy anſwer'd, They did not deſire to meddle with the Stock, but would do any Service they could, to promote the Charter. That Seymour meeting him afterwards, chid him for making this Propoſal; and ſaid, if ever he did the like again, he would have no more to do with him: That upon this he intended to keep the Third, thus rejected by Seymour, for himſelf: And that Trevor had given him ſome Hints, That he expected to be put in Poſſeſſion of what had been promis'd him.

Having thus made all the Uſe they deſir'd to make of Firebrace, the next Perſon they call'd upon was Sir Joſiah Child, who depos'd, That, to his Remembrance, he had never diſpos'd of ten Pounds of the Company's Money: That he had, indeed, recommended Acton as an honeſt Man, and as one that might do Service becauſe of his Acquaintance: That he alſo recommended the making of a Preſent to his Majeſty of 50,000*l.* on condition an Act of Parliament might be paſs'd for ſettling the Company, which, as Mr. Tyſſon told him, the King refus'd to meddle with. That he knew nothing of the 40,000*l.* paid to Firebrace: That he knew there was a kind of Committee, which ſat from Day to Day to deſtroy the Company; and that he had told Cooke he look'd on Sir Baſil as the fitteſt Perſon to divide them. Sir J. Child's Examination.

Mr. Atwell, the Goldſmith, on whom the Notes given to Bates were drawn, then made his Appearance before the Committee; and having produc'd his Caſh-Books, Entries were found therein of 5451*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* paid to Bates, October 9, 1693, October 10, 2181*l.* 5*s.* 0*d.* and November 16, 3275*l.* by the Order of Cooke.

Bates himſelf alſo, being re-examin'd, acknowledg'd, That he believ'd the Money might be paid as the ſaid Books expreſs'd: That he had not 4400 Guineas in his Houſe on the Monday Night before; and that the 4400 Guineas, which he paid back to Firebrace, were brought to him by Monſieur Robart, on Tueſday Morning at Eight o'Clock. Bates re-examin'd.

Tyſſon

A. D. 1695. Tyſſon's Examination.

Tyſſon was call'd next, and confeſs'd, That he did receive a Note of 50,000 l. from Cooke and Child to be preſented to the King, on the Condition above ſpecify'd: And that he acquainted the Lord Portland with it, who ſaid the King would not meddle with it.

Being aſk'd, Whether he had offer'd the ſame to Lord Portland? He anſwer'd in the Negative; adding, If he had, he muſt never have ſeen his Face any more: Which is more ſtrange than credible, conſidering in how much Haſte his Lordſhip was to be rich; what a rapacious Uſe he made of the King's Favour, and the Prevalence of Venality at this Criſis, which this very Story has render'd ſo plain and undeniable.

Craggs's Examination.

Laſtly, Craggs being call'd in, and examin'd, deny'd, That he had ever paid any Part of the 4540 l. he had receiv'd from Acton to Members of Parliament; and deliver'd in a Paper, containing all the Explanations which he thought fit to make; that is to ſay, That he had given one Wallis 1150 l. for his Solicitations, &c. That among four others Perſons, he had diſtributed 312 l. more, on the ſame Account: And that he had allow'd himſelf 1260 l. for his Expences in the Years 92, 93, 94. 350 l. as an Encouragement to himſelf and his Friends to ſubſcribe 7000 l. to the Company; and 1468 l. for his own Pains and Solicitations, to prevent a New, and eſtabliſh the Old Company.

On the 27th all this Matter was reported to both Houſes; where it was receiv'd as the ſeveral Parties were diſpos'd either to moderate or enflame the Charge; to diſgrace or acquit the Perſons.

Debates in the Houſe of Commons on the Report.

Among the Commons, in particular, it ſoon appear'd, That the Lord-Preſident was to be the Scape-Goat of his Party: It was ſaid with great Vehemence, That Arts and Practices had been us'd to ſtifle the Diſcovery: That, nevertheleſs, a more notorious Bribery had never been diſcover'd before: That it was a Blemiſh, if not a Scandal, to the Revolution itſelf, &c. On the other Hand, it was aſk'd, By what Law it was a Crime to take Money at Court? It was ſaid, Where there was no Law, there was no Tranſgreſſion. That before the Houſe proceeded to impeach, they ought to aſcertain the Nature of the Offence, &c. And upon the whole, it was reſolv'd, 1. That there was ſufficient Matter to impeach Thomas Duke of Leeds, of high Crimes and Miſdemeanors. 2. That he ſhould be impeach'd thereupon: And it was order'd, That Mr. Comptroller Wharton ſhould accordingly impeach him at the Lords Bar, in the Name of the Houſe, and of all the Commons of England.

Votes againſt the Duke of Leeds.

During this Interval, the Lord Privy-Seal Pembroke having alſo made his Report, the Lord-Preſident roſe up in his Place, and, having declar'd upon his Faith and Honour, as before, That he was not guilty of any ſuch Corruptions as were laid to his Charge; as alſo, That if the whole Truth was laid open, it would be to his Honour and Advantage; profeſs'd to lay open that whole Truth, ſo far as he was concern'd, viz. That Bates had introduc'd Firebrace to him: That he had ſeveral Conferences with him upon the Subject of the Eaſt-India Company: That, ſome time after, Bates inform'd him, he had receiv'd 5000 Guineas; and, in Acknowledgment of the many Favours he had receiv'd at his Hands, made an Offer of them to him: That he refuſing, Bates preſs'd him to accept of Half, or a Quarter: That he perſiſted not to touch a Penny, with this Addition, That they were his own; and that he with'd him good Luck with them. That this put him in Mind of what had once paſs'd between him and Mr. Harry Saville, for whom he had a great Reſpect, and which he thought neceſſary to be told their Lordſhips on that Occaſion; namely, That when he was Treaſurer, the Exciſe being to be farm'd, and many Perſons putting in for the Contract, Saville, to whom they had all apply'd for his Intereſt, deſir'd, That he would tell all of them he had ſpoke in their Favour; alledging, to obviate his Scruples, That in ſuch Caſe, whoſoever obtain'd it, would think he ow'd it to his good Offices, and would make him a ſuitable Acknowledgment. "Accordingly, my Lords, "proceeded his Grace, when the Men came, "I told them all, one after another, Sir, "you are very much oblig'd to Mr. Saville; "Sir, Mr. Saville has been very much your "Friend: A little after, when the Thing "was ſettled, Mr. Saville came and thank'd "me for what I had done, and told me, "That he had got the Preſent which he "expected; which I told him I was glad "of, and wiſh'd him good Luck with it, "as I did now to Mr. Bates. And thus "I was then a Shadow to Mr. Saville, as I "was now to Mr. Bates."

A. D. 1695. And alſo before the Commons.

His Speech in the Houſe of Lords.

The Duke was come thus far in his Speech when he receiv'd private Intimation, That the Commons were proceeding to impeach him: Upon which he broke off ſomewhat abruptly; and immediately quitting the Houſe of Peers, preſented himſelf at the Door of the other Houſe; and by the Means of one of the Members, caus'd the Houſe to be inform'd, That he deſir'd to be heard; which being comply'd with, he was admitted, with the uſual Compliments of a Chair, and Leave to be cover'd; after accepting of which he roſe, and putting off his Hat, expreſs'd himſelf to the following Effect: That he was heartily thankful to the Houſe for the Favour of giving him a Hearing: That innocent as he was, he would have attended ſooner, if he had been ſooner inform'd what the Houſe was upon: That he could have wiſh'd they had not been altogether ſo quick in their Proceeding: That the two Votes of the Houſe upon the Report of the Committee, were the Occaſion of his coming: That tho' he was not appris'd of the Particulars, finding himſelf concern'd, he was impatient to juſtify himſelf, to the End, that he might not lie under the Diſpleaſure of either or both Houſes: That it was a bold Word, but a Truth, That the Houſe would not have been ſitting at this time but for him: That he had been formerly

A. D. 1695. formerly perſued by that Houſe for being in the French Intereſt, and for Popery; that if he might have been heard, he could then have juſtify'd himſelf: That he hop'd he had juſtify'd himſelf ſince, and that he ſhould continue to do ſo by all the Actions of his Life.—That as to the preſent Matter, it was true Firebrace had been introduc'd to him by the Means of Bates; but that even Bates himſelf, unleſs he was much deceiv'd in him, would not have been concern'd in an ill thing: That the Evidence was but Hear-ſay; that he hop'd they would not condemn upon Hear-ſay: That he avoided entering into Particulars, becauſe he would not take up their Time: That as well as a Treaty-part, there was alſo a Money-part: That as to the Latter, much that had been depos'd was falſe: That what was true, he had made no Secret of: That, upon his Faith and Honour, he had neither directly nor indirectly touch'd one Penny: That a great deal of Pains had been taken to hook and draw in this Matter by a Side-wind: That this Firebrace would have it thought he had Merit enough to deſerve 10,000*l.* and 30,000*l.* That the 5000 Guineas were no Part of that 40,000*l.* That whereas the other Witneſſes had been call'd for by the Committee, Firebrace came in the ſecond time, at his own Inſtance, and thereby ſhew'd himſelf, at leaſt, a willing Witneſs: That he had a Thread, which he hop'd to ſpin finer ſtill: That he hop'd to make it appear, that this was a Deſign laid againſt him long before the naming the Committee: That Warning had been given to him ſome time ago that this Matter would be improv'd againſt him: That Firebrace had been told he ſhould be excus'd, in caſe he charg'd him: That he aſk'd no Favour but their favourable Juſtice: That it would be a moſt unfortunate thing in point of Time, to be under the Diſpleaſure of the Houſe, or of the Nation: That he pray'd no ſevere Senſe might be put on what would bear a candid one: That the Houſe would re-conſider what had been done, or at leaſt preſerve him from Cruelty; and not let him lie on the Rack, and under a Blaſt, till a Parliament ſhould ſit again: That if they would proceed, it might be ſpeedily; for that he had rather want Counſel, want Time, want any thing, than lye under their Diſpleaſure, or that of the Nation: And, laſtly, he concluded with a Repetition of his former Thanks, and a farther Prayer, That if they would not re-conſider, the Matter might be brought to a Determination; and that he might have ſpeedy Juſtice.

Remarks thereon. The Duke being withdrawn, ſome bitter Remarks were made upon his Speech. It was ſaid, the Point in Queſtion was now become, Whether the Houſe would arraign the Committee of both Houſes, or go on with their Impeachment? It was ſaid, he made no Excuſe as to Facts, nor any Defence but by Recrimination: It was ſaid, The Argument he made uſe of to prove the Contrivance, namely, that the 5000 Guineas charg'd on him, was no Part of the 40,000*l.* Firebrace was to account for, was rather an Aggravation of the Crime: For Cooke had a double Account, one with and one without the 5000 Guineas; whence it follow'd, That if there was any Contrivance in the Caſe, it was not on the Side of the Committee, but on Cooke's, to ſtifle the Enquiry, and conceal the Corruption. It was ſaid, The ſpeedy Juſtice of the Houſe was, indeed, to be wiſh'd and deſir'd; as alſo, That if any ſuch Contrivance appear'd, any ſuch Thread, as was mention'd by the noble Lord, the Houſe, where he was impeach'd would clear him. And, laſtly, it was ſaid, The Self-contradictions of Bates were of more Weight than the poſitive Evidence of Firebrace.

It appears, however, that notwithſtanding the Current of the Times bore ſo hard againſt the Duke, he did not want for Friends, who had Addreſs enough to give it ſuch a Direction, as, under the Pretence of overwhelming, had a Tendency to ſave, him.

Thus while Mr. Wharton, attended by ſeveral of the moſt eminent of his Party, went up to the Lords with the Impeachment, ſome of them mov'd, That the Articles ſhould be propos'd forthwith; and that the Committee, already join'd with the Lords, ſhould withdraw for that Purpoſe, and make their Report on Monday; all which was comply'd with by the Houſe, and an Order was made accordingly: For thoſe who had more Zeal than Knowledge, did not perceive the Snare that was laid for them, were not aware that there was a material Defect in the Order, which did not authoriſe them to ſend for Perſons and Papers, as was uſual on the like Occaſions; and had no Notion, that in endeavouring to gratify his Grace with a ſpeedy Juſtice, they ſhould gratify him in earneſt with a ſpeedy Deliverance.

But either the Commitee themſelves were not involv'd in the Artifice which occaſion'd this Miſtake, or they manag'd very dextrouſly: For they complain'd that Orders ſhould be made in their Abſence; and on the Monday obtain'd the neceſſary Authority to ſend for Perſons and Papers, which had been omitted before; but for want of Time, it muſt be ſuppos'd did not make any material uſe of it: For the Articles were fram'd on the Evidence already recited, and charg'd him with high Crimes and Miſdemeanors, in that, being Preſident of the Council, and ſworn to give their Majeſties true and faithful Advice, he had, contrary to his Oath, Office and Duty, and in Breach of the great Truſt repos'd in him, by himſelf, his Agents or Servants, corruptly and illegally treated, contracted and agreed with certain Merchants, trading to the Eaſt-Indies, who had either forfeited their Charter, or apprehended they had, to procure a Charter of Confirmation, a Charter of Regulation, &c. for the Sum of 5500 Guineas, &c. Abſtract of the Articles.

They had, indeed, added the uſual Proviſo of ſaving to the Commons the Liberty of exhibiting any farther Accuſation or Impeachment; but without the leaſt Specification of any

A. D. 1695. any new Matter: And as to the Requiſition they concluded with, it was in theſe Words, That the ſaid Duke of Leeds might be put to anſwer the ſaid Crimes and Miſdemeanors, and receive ſuch Puniſhment as the ſame ſhould deſerve: And that ſuch Proceedings, Examinations, Trials and Judgments might be every one of them had and us'd, as was agreeable to Law and Juſtice.

The ſame Day that theſe Articles were reported to the Houſe, they were agreed to; they were order'd to be engroſs'd, and were ſent up to the Lords; upon which Occaſion the Duke, by way of Extenuation, was pleas'd to ſay, That he admitted Firebrace at the repeated Inſtances of Bates, and merely to befriend him againſt his own Judgment, as believing him to be an ill Man: That the Storm which was now fallen upon him, had been long gathering; that it was promoted by a Faction who had a Pique againſt him: That he had an original Letter to produce, which gave him an Account of it, ſome time before it broke out: That it appear'd to be directed only againſt him, becauſe none elſe were proſecuted: That they ſtopp'd when they came to this Part of the Affair: That Firebrace was treated with, only for this Purpoſe: That on the Merit of this Diſcovery, he was excus'd from proceeding any farther: That the ſaid Faction could not conceal the Satisfaction they took in it, and that the King's Buſineſs had been delay'd, purpoſely, that they might indulge it.

The Duke's Speech on their being recall'd by the Lords.

His Grace then pray'd for a Copy of the Articles, and of the Report of the Committee, both which were granted of courſe: And the next Day, having again declar'd before God, and upon his Conſcience, That he was greatly wrong'd by the Accuſation, put in the following laconic and evaſive Anſwer, viz.

His Anſwer.

"This Defendant, ſaving to himſelf all "Advantages of Exceptions to the ſaid Ar- "ticles, humbly ſaith, That he is not guilty "of all or any the Matters by the ſaid Ar- "ticles charg'd in Manner and Form, as the "ſame are by the ſaid Articles charg'd a- "gainſt him."

The ſame Day the ſaid Anſwer was communicated to the Houſe of Commons, by Meſſage, who directed their Committee to prepare a Reply: But this could not be done, it ſeems, with ſo much Expedition as the Caſe requir'd. It was ſaid that M. Robart's Evidence was neceſſary to render their Reply complete; and he being the Servant of a Peer, and having the Privilege of that Houſe to plead for his Protection, it became a Doubt, whether the Orders of the Commons could reach him.

The next Day, viz. May the Firſt, this Difficulty was communicated to the Houſe, who, inſtead of determining upon it, by their Authority, refer'd it back to their Committee, to conſider what the proper Method was, to compel Witneſſes to come in, and to give their Evidence upon Trials by Impeachment.

A Doubt ariſe in anſwering Articles.

Thus a whole Day was loſt, when ſcarce a Minute could be ſpar'd: And to ſhew yet farther what a diſingenuous Spirit had now taken Poſſeſſion of the Legiſlature, it is to be obſerv'd in the next Place, That during this Interval, the Lords had come to a Reſolution, That it was their Opinion that the Diſcovery made by Sir Thomas Cooke, was not ſo full or ſatisfactory, as to entitle him to the Benefit of the Act made to indemnify him: That this Reſolution had been imparted to the Commons by Meſſage, together with a Signification of their Lordſhip's Deſire, That the Commons would concur in it: That the Commons did paſs a like Vote accordingly: That, hereupon, the Lords prepar'd and paſs'd a Bill for impriſoning Cooke, Firebrace, Bates and Craggs, and reſtraining them to alien their Eſtates, to which they alſo deſir'd the Concurrence of the Commons. That this Bill was ſent down by the Lords, and read the firſt time by the Commons, on the 28th of April: That on the 30th it was read the ſecond time; that on the firſt of May it was paſs'd, with Amendments, and ſent up to the Lords: And that on the 2d the Duke of Leeds, when the Amendments were taken into Conſideration, was pleas'd not only to complain of the Delay of the Houſe of Commons, alledging, That the Impeachment was only to load him with Diſgrace, and that they never intended to try him; but alſo, of the Partiality of the Faction againſt him, which he ſaid was apparent, 1ſt, Becauſe they did not intend to enquire after others, and, 2dly, Becauſe, in their Amendments, they had provided Firebrace ſhould be admitted to Bail, to which Favour he had no other Pretence than the Merit of being a Witneſs againſt him.

A. D. 1695.

A Bill for impriſoning Cooke, &c.

The Faction he ſpeaks of, on the other Hand, affirm, That the Duke's own Friends and Relations voted for thoſe Amendments as well as they: That when the Lords return'd the Bill, as they thought fit to do, with their Diſagreement to theſe Amendments, they were the Perſons who divided the Houſe, (tho' without Succeſs) for inſiſting upon them: And that as to the Charge of Partiality laid againſt them, it had no other Ground, than the Duke's own Importunity for ſpeedy Juſtice; ſeeing it was impoſſible for the Committee to prepare the Charge againſt him, and proſecute their Enquiry againſt others, at the ſame time.

What is yet more remarkable than all, the Sally which the Duke had ſuffer'd to eſcape in one of his Speeches, concerning the wilful Delay of the King's Buſineſs, refer'd only to the Money-Bill, (for laying certain Duties on Glaſs, &c.) which the Commons had then to diſpatch: And yet tho' the Delay of a Bill of Supply was the Method which had been always us'd by that Houſe to obtain Juſtice from the Crown, againſt any notorious Delinquent, or the Redreſs of any crying Grievance; and tho' it was plain there was now no other Method of anſwering the Expectations they had rais'd, ſuch Uſe was made of that miniſterial Reproach, that a finiſhing Hand was ſoon after put to the Bill; and by ſending up to the Houſe

A. D. 1695. of Lords, where the Crown is usually treated with an Excess of Complaisance, the King was enabled to close the Session when he pleas'd.

And this brings us to the last Scene of this miserable Farce; For on the 3d of May, when it was known to both Houses, that the King would, in a few Hours, put an End to the Session, the Prosecutors seem'd to be in more Haste than ever to overtake Justice, and the Prosecuted to manifest his Innocence.

Thus when it was mov'd in the House of Lords to pass the Money-Bill just mention'd, the Duke of Leeds rose up, and express'd himself to this Effect, That it griev'd him that he, who was as much as any Man for the Dispatch of the Money-Bill, and never oppos'd any, should now do it: That he hop'd the Lords would consider his Case, not only as his, but as what might be the Case of any other Lord; for that it was in the Power of a Tinker (supposing, it seems, that Tinkers might represent the People) to accuse a Peer at the End of a Session, in which case he might languish under it, without Remedy: That since they, the Commons, had delay'd the said Bill, by Mismanagement, for six Weeks, the Consequence would not be very prejudicial, if it was delay'd a Day or two longer: That, therefore, he made it his earnest Request, That if the House of Commons did not reply, the Impeachment might be discharg'd: That if it were not, he might lie under the Reproach of it all his Life: That he believ'd the Commons would do nothing in it; for tho' they had appointed a Committee to prepare the Charge against him, they had met but once, and that only for Form sake, &c.

The Duke of Leeds desires to have the Impeachment discharg'd.

It does not, however, appear, that the Lords were for postponing the Consideration of the Bill, for the Sake of gratifying the Duke's Impatience, under a Charge which had been enter'd against him in form but six Days: And, on the other Hand, the Speaker acquainted the House of Commons, That M. Robart was not to be found, either at the Duke of Leeds's or elsewhere: That his Messenger had been inform'd by his Grace's Porter, that he had not been seen these three Days: That he believ'd he was gone into the Country, but where, he could not tell; and that the said Messenger had left with him a Copy of the Order of the House.

As this might have been foreseen, and consequently prevented, it was reasonable to think that there was almost as much Collusion in the Management of this Enquiry, as there was Corruption in the Matter enquir'd into: And, indeed, Bishop Burnet, who slurs over this remarkable Tranfaction in so perplex'd and indiscriminate a Manner, admits, That it was intended to hang up the Matter till another Session.

Besides, on receiving this Intelligence from the Chair, instead of passing such a Vote as might serve to justify their own Proceedings, and to render the Duke answerable for the Disappearing of his Servant, they contented themselves with agreeing to the following Paper, which was to be deliver'd to the Lords at a Conference, by Montagu, Chancellor of the Exchequer, viz.

A. D. 1695.

That the Commons would make good their Charge against the Duke of Leeds, and were desirous that Justice be done without any manner of Delay: But that in the Preparation of the Evidence against the Duke, their Committee met with an Obstruction: That Monsieur Robart who appear'd by the Depositions before the Committee of both Houses to be a material Witness, was withdrawn since the Impeachment was carried up, which had been the Reason the Commons had not yet acquainted their Lordships when they could be ready to make good the said Impeachment.

Paper deliver'd at a Conference by the Commons.

Moreover, to carry on the Feint of a Prosecution, and thereby to save Appearances, they order'd the Report of the Committee to be read; and not only affected to proceed against other Persons therein nam'd, but actually mov'd for an Impeachment against Sir John Trevor: And when a Motion was made to adjourn, by those, it must be suppos'd, who were either asham'd of such a Mockery, or unwilling that their Adversaries should derive any Benefit from it, over-rul'd it by a considerable Majority.

Lastly, when the Paper deliver'd to the Lords, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was reported to the House, it was mov'd and agreed, without any Debate, or any Opposition from the Duke of Leeds, That an Address should be made to the King, to issue a Proclamation for stopping the Ports, and seizing Monsieur Robart, which was accordingly done; tho', it ought not to be forgot, that the Proclamation was not publish'd till nine Days afterwards.

Address for a Proclamation to apprehend Robart.

His Grace, however, then rose up once more, and, after blaming the Commons for doing such an unheard of, and unprecedented thing, as to charge a Man with Crimes, before they had all the Evidence to make it good, proceeded to urge, That it was strange they should say they wanted a material Witness, and lay it upon him to produce this Witness; as if a Person were oblig'd more to produce Evidence to accuse himself, than to answer such Questions by which he accuses himself: That, in Truth, he had sent Monsieur Robart to see his Daughter Leinster, and order'd him to call at Minns, to see his Daughter Plymouth, where the Messenger of the House of Commons might have known he was gone, if he had ask'd: That his Grace, that there might be no Mistake, sent a Messenger on purpose for Robart: That Robart return'd about Two of the Clock on Sunday Morning: That his Footman, upon his Arrival, wak'd him, (for which he was very angry) to let him know he was come: That he told the said Footman, he would speak with Robart in the Morning: That accordingly enquiring for him at that time, the Footman said he was gone, having first enquir'd whether the News was true, That his Lordship was impeach'd, and Defet in prison, which, he believ'd, had frighted him

A. D. 1695. him away. That his Chaplain had ſince ſhewn him a (y) Letter from Robart, deſiring him to acquaint his Lord, that he was on his way home to Switzerland through Holland, from whence he would ſend a true Account of the whole Tranſaction: That he, the Duke, knew by the Manner of the Letter, by the Temper of the Man, and by a particular Knowledge he had both of him and of the Thing, that he would not be ſeen here again in haſte: "So that, my Lords, (proceeded his Grace) if this Man be inſiſted upon as a material Evidence, and that my Trial is to be delay'd till he is forth-coming, when am I likely to be try'd? I humbly move your Lordſhips, that you will come to ſome Reſolution, that, if this Matter be not immediately proceeded upon, ſo that I may be try'd before the Ending of this Seſſion, the Impeachment ſhall fall."

Here is Grace ended; and it is remember'd, that ſome few Lords cry'd out, well mov'd: But ſurely that Out-cry of theirs was rather a Mark of Scorn than Approbation: For tho' the Duke, by ſending away his Servant, had depriv'd his Adverſaries of that legal Proof which was neceſſary to Conviction, enough had appear'd to prove him guilty in the Opinion of the whole World: And if any thing could be added to the Reproach which he had brought on his Character, on the high Office he poſſeſs'd, and the Government he ſerv'd, it was the ſolemn Proteſtation of Innocence he had ſet out with, and the Contumacious Demand of a ſpeedy Trial, which he knew neither could or would take place.

Even Burnet, who, ſpeaking of the Act of Grace, which paſs'd at the Cloſe of the Seſſion, takes care to remember, it contain'd an Exception as to Corruption, (which, however, is too general an Expreſſion; for all the Exceptions of that kind, are confin'd to this very Affair of the Eaſt-India Company) acknowledges the whole Diſcovery was let fall: "And, continues he, it was believ'd too many of all Sides were concern'd in it; for, by a common Conſent, it was never reviv'd."

The whole Proſecution dropt.

On the ſame Day, and almoſt in the ſame Hour, that the Duke was ſo preſſing with the Peers for a Trial before the End of the Seſſion, or a Diſmiſſion of the Impeachment, the King came to the Houſe, to put a Period to it: But before we ſpecify the Bills paſs'd that Day, or the gracious Speech from the Throne, it will be fit to take a Review of ſome other parliamentary Tranſactions, which have not as yet been mention'd, and which are nevertheleſs of Importance to a right Underſtanding of theſe Times.

Complaint of the Lancaſhire Gentlemen to Parliament.

And among the Principal of theſe ought to be reckon'd, 1. The Application of the Lancaſhire Gentlemen for Juſtice againſt the Witneſſes, Proſecutors, &c. who, according to their Allegations, had enter'd into a Conſpiracy againſt their Lives, Honours, and Eſtates. And, 2dly, The Efforts made by the Malcontents in the Houſe of Lords, to render the ſtationing and continuing ſo large a Part of the Fleet ſo long in the Mediterranean, obnoxious to the Public. A. D. 1695.

The Lancaſhire Gentlemen having ſo clearly and effectually baffled the King's Evidence, as even to bring over the King's Council to their Side, thought themſelves entitled to a higher kind of Juſtice than a mere Abſolution, and for that Reaſon brought their Complaints before the Houſe of Commons; where finding Friends to eſpouſe them, they perſuaded themſelves, That the Cry which prevail'd in their Favour without Doors, would have procur'd them Relief within: But in this Meaſure they rather conſulted their Paſſions than their Reaſon, and rather expos'd themſelves to a new Inſult, than put themſelves in the way of obtaining Reparation: If ſome of the King's Miniſters had ſhewn rather too vindictive a Spirit in the Proſecution of this Plot, and ſome few Individuals had ſuffer'd by their Rigour, the Majority were unwilling to have Reprizals made on the Government; and thought it more adviſable to connive at a private Injury, than to gratify the Injur'd with the Redreſs they ſought, at the Expence of their Rulers.

And from theſe, and other leſs warrantable Reaſons, it was, that, after an Examination, which laſted between ſix Weeks and two Months, the Commons not only reſolv'd, that it did appear to them, That there were ſufficient Grounds for the Proſecution and Trials at Mancheſter; but alſo that a dangerous Plot had been carry'd on againſt the King and Government.

That they might, moreover, ſet a particular Mark on Mr. Standiſh, of Standiſh-Hall, who was one of thoſe whom the Anger of the Court was more particularly levell'd at, and who had diſtinguiſh'd himſelf by taking upon him to be the principal Agent in this parliamentary Appeal, they order'd him to be taken into Cuſtody; and, upon his abſconding, addreſs'd his Majeſty to iſſue out his Proclamation to apprehend him, which was iſſued accordingly.

Laſtly, That they might brand the Cauſe as well as the Man, they order'd an Act of the pretended Parliament of Ireland, held in the Year 1689, for recogniſing King James, and alſo two Proclamations ſet forth in the Name of the ſaid Prince, to be burnt by the Hands of the common Hangman.

The Plaintiffs did not, however, put their whole Confidence in the Commons; on the contrary they alſo had recourſe to the Lords; and in the Earls of Nottingham and Rocheſter found two very able and zealous Advocates, who left no Expedient untry'd to (y) The Duke had this Letter on Wedneſday the 18 of May, but took no Notice of Robert being gone, or that it was in his Power to be a Witneſs for or againſt him till now, which was after the Conference.

A.D. 1695. to carry that Point for them indirectly, which they knew could not poſſibly be carry'd any other way.

Thus, taking the Hint from the abandon'd Characters and flagrant Proſtitutions of Lunt, and the other Witneſſes, they brought in a Bill to make wilful and corrupt Perjury, in the like Caſes, Felony; which having been receiv'd, read, and amended, was dropt on the Queſtion, whether it ſhould be engroſs'd; which gave Riſe to a Proteſt, in which ſeveral Lords of both Parties join'd, for the following Reaſon, viz. "Becauſe it appear'd, by too many Inſtances, not only in former Times, but alſo very lately, how great Need there was for ſuch a Bill as this, to deter Men from thoſe pernicious Crimes of Perjury and Subornation."

Secondly, the Judges having been interrogated, as to their Behaviour in the Proceedings and Trials in Lancaſhire, and the Queſtion which was put thereon, whether they had done their Duty according to Law, having been reſolv'd in the Affirmative, another Proteſt was enter'd, for the two following Reaſons, viz. 1. "Becauſe we conceive that a Perſon, who, in open Court, did twice miſtake the Priſoner at the Bar, againſt whom he was a Witneſs, ought not to be recommended from a Judge to a Jury as a Witneſs not to be excepted againſt. 2dly, Becauſe there appear'd ſeveral hard Circumſtances in their Proceedings, and particularly the refuſing to cauſe the Witneſſes to be examin'd apart, when deſir'd by the Priſoners, which, in a Conſtitution where the Judges ought to be of Council for the Priſoners, ſeems to be contrary to the Intent of the Law, for the Security of the Innocent; and that in Conſideration, it may be of too ill Conſequence to receive Countenance in this ſupreme Court."

But, notwithſtanding theſe and many more Refinements, on putting the Queſtion whether the Government had ſufficient Cauſe to proſecute the Lancaſhire and Cheſhire Gentlemen, it was reſolv'd in the Affirmative.

And thus both Parties had ſeverally their Turns of Triumph: The Malcontents triumph'd in the Deliverance of the Accus'd; the Creatures of Power in blaſting their Appeal, which was call'd by the Latter a full Proof of the Plot; and gave out, that the Perſons concern'd had eſcap'd by the very Practices which they endeavour'd to faſten upon the Government.

Thoſe Perſons, however, did not ſink under theſe Diſcouragements; and by not doing ſo, had once more an Opportunity to wreſt the Victory out of the Hands of their Adverſaries: For at the Seſſions held at Lancaſter in the Auguſt following, Lunt, Wombal and Wilſon were found guilty of Perjury, and were thereupon indicted by the Crown for a Conſpiracy againſt the Lives and Liberties of the ſaid Perſons; not, indeed, for the Sake of proving the Crime, or puniſhing the Criminals, but for the Sake of making a like Example of the Witneſſes who appear'd againſt them: But the Lancaſhire Gentlemen being aware of this Purpoſe, and not caring to abide the Experiment, refus'd to aſſiſt in making it; and thus the whole Affair was brought to a Period. A.D. 1695.

This Examination, ſays B. Burnet, was brought on with much Noiſe, to give the more Strength to the Bill of Treaſons, or, as he ſhould have call'd it, the Bill for regulating Trials concerning Treaſons, which had been now again brought in by the Commons, and ſent up to the Lords.—His Lordſhip alſo ventures to ſay, "That the Progreſs of the ſaid Examination turn'd ſo much againſt them, who had made this Uſe of it, that it appear'd there was no juſt Occaſion given by the Trial to alter the Law."

We are not, indeed, to wonder that, contrary to what has been above and formerly advanc'd, he ſhould make ſo home an Aſſertion, when we farther recollect, that, treating of the ſaid Bill, and utterly forgetting the Hardſhips which State-Priſoners had been expos'd to, and which had been ſo liberally complain'd of in the two preceding Reigns, he farther ventures to ſay, "The Deſign of it ſeem'd to be to make Men as ſafe in all treaſonable Conſpiracies and Practices as was poſſible: Two Witneſſes were to concur to prove the ſame Fact at the ſame time: Council in Matters of Fact, and Witneſſes upon Oath, were, by it, allow'd to the Priſoners: They were to have a Copy of the Indictment, and the Pannel, in due time." But tho' the Deſign of the Bill was, according to him, injurious to Government, and theſe Particulars are inſtanc'd as ſo many Proofs of that Deſign, his Lordſhip nevertheleſs proceeds thus: "All theſe Things were in themſelves juſt and reaſonable; and if they had been mov'd by other Men, and at another time, they would have met with little Oppoſition." The latter Part of which Sentence is as untrue as the former is unreaſonable: For a good Cauſe ought not to be loſt, becauſe the Advocate for it was not in the good Graces of the Judge: And it cannot be forgot, that this very Bill had been already defeated ſeveral times.

The Public was, however, for ſome time amus'd with an Expectation of its paſſing into a Law: The Lords made the ſame Proviſion as they had contended for before, That every Peer ſhould be try'd by the whole Peerage: The Commons held this to be as unreaſonable as it would have been for every one of the People to inſiſt on being try'd by the whole People: When therefore the Bill was ſent down to them with this Amendment, they refus'd to admit it, and gave their Reaſons at a Conference: Theſe Reaſons were not ſatisfactory to the Lords, who ſignify'd as much at another Conference; and the Commons adhering to their Point, the Bill, as had been foreſeen, was loſt.

The Meaſure of ſending a fleet into the Mediterranean argu'd.

As to the Proceedings of the Lords, in relation to the Mediterranean-Squadron, they aroſe from a double Motive; that is to ſay, to diſgrace Ruſſel, and thro' him the whole Adminiſtration of our naval Affairs.

A. D. 1695. Russel's Character.

Russel, who was esteem'd the most popular Officer in the Fleet, when he was first preferr'd to the chief Command, it is said, had, by this time, lost all his Credit among the Seamen, thro' an Excess of Pride, Passion, Partiality, and Avarice: For it is in such forbidding Colours as these he is painted, even by some of his own Party, tho' Party-Principles, and Party-Merit, except the most gross and fulsome Flattery, were the most effectual Title to his Favour: Every Malcontent under his Command had his Correspondent at home; and the whole Body of the Tories lay in wait for every Fact and every Calumny which had a Tendency to blast his Credit, or affect his Power. It is so much the less to be wonder'd, therefore, that the same Arts which had prevail'd against Killegrew and Delaval, were now turn'd against him, with this only Difference, That, whereas they were suspected of leaning to King James, and of favouring his Interest, from the disinterested Dictates of Affection and Inclination, Russel was accus'd of having no Principle at all, or measure of Action but the Profit it produc'd; and on this extravagant Prejudice a Notion was propagated, That the Fleet was not safe in his Hands; and that if he did not sell or sacrifice them to the French, the whole Reason would be, because they did not come up to his Price.

Kennet, &c.

Debate in the House of Lords on the Mediterranean Expedition under his Command.

It must not, however, be understood that the Debate took this personal Turn in the House of Lords; on the contrary, the Topics insisted upon there, were such as seem'd to regard the Interest and Safety of the Nation only. Under the Former of those Heads it was urg'd, That Nations ever so nearly and closely ally'd to each other, were liable to no farther Demands of Assistance, than were specify'd in the Treaties by which they were so ally'd: That neither by the seperate Treaties subsisting between the two Kingdoms, nor the general Confederacy, was England laid under any Engagement to furnish so great a Fleet either to serve or save any of the contracting Parties: That in every Article of the Land-Service we had already exceeded our Stipulations: That in order to satisfy the Cravings of our Friends, we were in a fair way to beggar our Posterity: That the Burden was already grown too heavy to be borne: That we were no longer in a Condition to make such prodigal Complements, which reflected more on our Discretion, than they did Honour to our Generosity; and that if the common Cause could no otherwise be maintain'd, the Adventure ought to be made at the common Expence; or, at least, that Spain, as we had done to the Dutch, should pay for her own Preservation. Secondly, under the Head of Safety, it was urg'd, That while so great a Part of the Navy was thus employ'd in foreign Service, and to cover a foreign Coast, our own Service was neglected, and our own Coasts were expos'd. That in the West-Indies our Colonies had been insulted; that our Trade had suffer'd for want of Convoys; and that if, either in case of an Engagement with the Enemy, or of such a Storm as that in which Wheeler was lost, the Fleet should be destroy'd, or render'd unserviceable, the Enemy might be emboldened to meditate a Descent once more, and the very Attempt might throw us into Confusion. A. D. 1695.

Whatever Truth there was in these Suggestions, (and that there was some, may be gather'd even from Burchet, who, not without some Mixture of Indignation, intimates, That while the Dutch had a Subsidy from Spain in ease of their Share of the Expence, certain occasional Supplies of fresh Provision, was the whole of the Consideration allow'd to us) little or no Regard was paid to them. As it was chiefly for the Sake of embarrassing the Measures of those in Power that this Vein of Opposition was open'd, all that was endeavour'd by their Adversaries, was to vindicate the Measure in dispute, so plausibly at least, as should countenance them in closing it again.

Accordingly, it was said, That in Undertakings so extensive in their Nature, and so important in their Consequences, it was impossible to be govern'd by the Letter of any Treaty whatsoever: That as the Winds veer'd, and the Sands shifted, the Pilot must steer its Course: That the several Parties of the Confederacy were no longer to be consider'd as so many seperate Powers, but in the Aggregate, as one great Body, having but one general Interest: That every one of those Parties was entituled to the Protection of the whole: That if Spain was to be left to the Mercy of the Enemy, the Confederacy would be instantly dissolv'd, and every Member of it would accept the best Terms he could get. That in the feeble Condition that Kingdom then was, nothing but a maritime Force, superior to that of France, could give it the Protection it stood in Need of: That the Event had justify'd the Experiment: That England herself had found her Account in it, both in Point of Honour and in Point of Interest: That the Apprehensions of our Mediterranean and Turkey Traders were, in a great Measure, at an End: That the Sight of the English Flag, in those Seas, had induc'd the Republic of Venice, the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and other Powers of Italy, to acknowledge his Majesty's Title, which they had never done before: And if, while so great a Part of the Fleet was usefully and honourably employ'd, any other Service was neglected, it would more become the Wisdom of Parliament to increase our naval Strength, than censure the Application of what Strength we had, because it would go no farther.

As there was no want of Matter to furnish out a Reply, the opposing Lords did not fail to make the most of it: But without Effect: The Sense of the House was against them: And that all Europe might know it was, after a solemn Enquiry into the

A. D. 1695. State of the (z) Fleet, &c. inſtead of a Remonſtrance againſt the Meaſure complain'd of, they agreed to the following Addreſs.

The Addreſs upon the Iſſue.

"We, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament aſſembled, having reſolv'd, by the unanimous Vote of this Houſe, That the ſending ſo great a Fleet into the Mediterranean, and continuing it in thoſe Parts, A. D. 1695. has been to the Honour and Advantage of your Majeſty and your Kingdoms; and having ſpent ſome time upon Conſideration of the Condition of the Fleet, both at Home and Abroad, and of the great Increaſe of the Naval Force and Strength of our Neighbours,

(z) But without ſhewing any Regard to the miſerable Condition of the brave, poor Wretches who mann'd it, which about this very time was ſet forth by Robert Creſſfield, their faithful and zealous Advocate, in a Petition to their Lordſhips, under the following Articles.

1. Many of them are turn'd from Ship to Ship, that have Money due in three Ships, to this Day unpaid.

2. Some thouſands have been ſet off Shore ſick, and many of them either dying or continuing ſick; and ſome ſent to the Hoſpitals, and yet for not going on board their Ships again, they are made a Run.

3. Some that their Ships going away before they were well, and they not being able to get to their Ships, have gone on board of other Ships, are made Run, altho' ſtill in his Majeſty's Service.

4. Some that have been preſt away, while their own Ships have been in the Dock to mend, or otherwiſe, and carried on board of others of his Majeſty's Ships, have yet been made a Run.

5. Sometimes when Men are either a Preſſing, or on Shoar about the Ship's Buſineſs, or with the Captain's Leave, are by the Clerk of the Check made Run.

6. Sometimes when a Man hath 20 l. due in a Ship, and is diſcharg'd by the Captain, and hath a Ticket given him for his Pay, yet by the Clerk of the Check he is made Run, altho' he was enter'd the next Day on board another Ship.

7. It is of late, it ſeems, ſo ſeverely carry'd on againſt the poor Seamen, that if they have an R—— on the laſt Ship, they are made Run for the other Ships they were in before.

8. By that means it is not ſafe for Landlord, or Chandler, or Tradeſman to truſt the Families of the diſtreſs'd Seamen for Rent, Cloaths, or Bread, ſince if that a Seaman be honeſt, he may be turn'd over out of the firſt Ship into another Ship, and in the ſecond Ship he may fall ſick, and be ſet on Shoar, and there dye, and he made Run; as is viſible now right or wrong, to put a ℔. or an R. on their Names; and at Pay-day, if none were there before, if they return not to their Ship's again, and that they cannot do, if Sickneſs or Death prevents; or alſo, if their Ships be gone to the Streights, or to the Weſt-Indies, that it is impoſſible to follow them; or if they are preſt on board of other Ships, and loſe their Pay for the Former, it will be miſerable, and look like great Cruelty.

9. Another Miſery is, that the Captains of Ships make out Tickets for ſeveral of them, and keep them; and the poor Wretches that are the Seamens Wives, know not of them; and ſo are put by their Pay, at Pay-day, for the Captains, or others, having their Tickets.

10. There is no Law made to puniſh the Captains for keeping the Tickets, whereby the Miſery of the Seamen is great and deplorable, and like to continue, if not reliev'd.

11. When Seamen are turn'd over into other Ships, the Captain of the laſt Ship demands the Tickets for the other Ship; and ſo if the Seamen would get either Bread for their Families, or Cloaths for themſelves, on Credit of their other Pay, they have been ſometimes hindred, and ſometimes loſe the Payment at Recals alſo.

12. When the Seamen ſee that thoſe that go to Newcaſtle have ſix or ſeven Pounds a Voyage, and it may be it is earn'd in a Month; and others in Merchants Ships have fifty Shillings or three Pounds the Month, and their Families have a conſtant Supply; and they that ſerve the King, ſo ſerv'd by one Miſery or another, or by their Captains knavery their Tickets detain'd, then it may be ſome Seamen do, in good earneſt, run away; and under the Notion of Theſe running away, there are ſome thouſands of others made Run, or have a ℔. put to their Pay, which muſt be petition'd for, or their Pay loſt, as if they were run indeed.

13. It is in the Power of the Captain, or the Captain's Clerk, or the Clerks of the Office, or the Clerk of the Check, or the Purſers to put a ℔. or an R. on any poor Seaman's Pay, and that is as bad as an Execution almoſt; ſince if a Man have a ℔. or an R. in one Book, and ſtands clear in all the reſt, is made Run in all the reſt, ſometimes; and none that I ever heard of, is call'd in queſtion why the ℔. or R. was put on.

14. The poor Seamen's Wives, or Friends, it may be, know not of it until Pay-day, and then loſe their Payment; and after waiting two or three Years, are forc'd to begin again; and it may be they live in Scotland, or in the North or Weſt of England; and when they hear of it, to come up to petition, it may be the poor Wretches are,

15. Forc'd to wait ten or twelve Weeks to get a Petition anſwer'd; and, at laſt, it may be, they cannot ſend to the Streights, or Weſt-Indies, for to have Certificates from the Commanders, or to get the Tickets from their Commanders, and ſo are in danger to loſe all at laſt; and that is poor Relief, and I fear the Cries will reach to Heaven.

16. After the Seamen have had all this Affliction, and thoſe that have truſted them are many of them broken and gone away, yet there are ſome Commanders ſo unreaſonable, as to hinder thoſe that truſted them from coming on board to receive their Money at Pay-day, but ſet Centries to threaten to ſhoot thoſe who come on board to look for their own Money.

17. Some Commanders have ſet Centries to keep away thoſe from coming on board that had Cloaths to ſell for the Seamen at Pay-day, threatning to ſhoot them, or ſink their Boats, whereby the Seamen cannot ſafely be truſted before Pay-day, neither furniſh'd ſo plentifully and cheap, as they might at Pay-day, to the Diſcouragement of Trade, and hindrance of the Seamens having Choice of Goods.

18. A Tradeſman might have gotten a Clerk to receive the Money due on Bills from Seamen at Pay-day, for one Shilling in the Pound; and,

19. Now the poor Seamens Wives might have had their Huſbands Pay receiv'd by a Clerk at Pay-day, for one Shilling in the Pound, and now the Clerks are hindred from that; whereby a poor Seaman's Wife may go to Portſmouth, and wait a Month, ſpend forty Shillings going and coming, and give one as much more to look after, and provide for her Children in that time, to receive a Ticket's Money of five Pound, that might have been receiv'd for five Shillings by the Clerks.

20. The Seamens Families were in ſuch great Diſtreſs before, that they ſold their Pay, ſome of them, at half Loſs; and there being none appointed to hear their ſad Complaints, and to relieve them againſt ſuch as extorted their Pay at half Loſs, neither to call thoſe Captains to Account that kept their Tickets, or receiv'd their whole Pay wrongfully: Others, ſince that, have extorted their Pay at half Loſs ſince; and alſo ſome Commanders have detain'd their Tickets ſtill, altho' I am afraid the Groans and Cries of their Miſery hath cry'd in the Ears of God and Man; and it could never be ſuppos'd, that they that ſold their Pay at half Loſs, could ſerve ſo freely next time, ſeeing none regarded to relieve them.

21. Near 20,000 have dy'd in their Majeſty's Service ſince this War, as by the ſeveral Ships-Books will appear, if examin'd, by the Sword or Sickneſs; many of whom have been made Run, and ſome that have had their Runs taken off, with great Difficulty or Loſs.

Laſtly, it may be ſaid, That their Miſery exceeds the Miſery of the pooreſt of all the Poor of England: For whereas the Latter are paid their Earnings weekly, the Seamen are ſo ill paid, that ſometimes it is four Years before they receive their Wages.

Thus far Mr. Creſſfield: And as a proper Supplement to this Remonſtrance of his, it is fit to add a Paſſage, tho' a very bitter one, out of a Treatiſe of Forbin's, formerly quoted under the Title of A Brief Account of ſome of the Depredations of the Dutch upon the Engliſh, which nationally conſider'd, was more worthy the Attention of Parliament than all the reſt.

"The next Attempt I charge them with is ſtill more heinous, and infinately more to our Diſgrace, being not only an Invaſion upon our Trade, but upon the Liberty of our Perſons. For by an unprecedented and unparallel'd Inſolency, the like whereof no Nation did ever pretend to exercife towards, and over, the Subjects of this Kingdom, they demand and exact a Tenth Man out of every Ship of ours that goes into their Ports, for and towards the manning of their Fleet; and to juſtify themſelves in the doing hereof, they pretend to be authoriz'd by King William's Order. This they have practis'd for theſe two Years paſt, only they are grown more rampant, tyrannous, and oppreſſive this laſt than they were the Former. For whereas in the Year 1694, they were contented with one Man out of ten, or fifteen Guilders in lieu thereof, and for his Rantom they have, in the Year 1695, requir'd and taken a Man out of every Ship of ours, that went into their Ports, tho' the Sailors were never ſo few, or elſe they have exacted twenty-five Guilders for the excuſing and redeeming him from their Service. So that if it be but a Hoy, which is ſail'd with a Maſter, one Man, and two Boys, yet they demand one; and upon its being replied, that the Veſſel cannot be ſail'd if one be taken out, they pretend it a Condeſcention and Favour to compound at twenty-five Guilders for

A. D. 1695. bours, conceive it to be our Duty to your Majesty and the Kingdom, humbly to represent, That the Honour and Safety of this Nation, under the Providence of God, chiefly depends upon your Strength at Sea. And whereas by the long Continuance of this War, the Number of your Ships must have been diminished, and those remaining greatly impaired, we think it of the highest Importance to your Majesty's Service, and the Security and Interest of your People, that you would be pleased to give such speedy and effectual Directions, for the Repair and Increase of your Royal Navy, as may enable your Majesty not only to continue a Strength in the Mediterranean during this War, which may be superior to that of our Enemies, but likewise to maintain such a Force here at Home, and in the West-Indies, as shall be a Security for our Coasts and Plantations, and a Protection of our Trade; and sufficient both for the Annoying of our Enemies, and for the protecting and convoying all such Stores and Provisions as must be sent to the Fleet in those Parts; upon the effectual and timely providing whereof, the Safety of that Part of your Majesty's Navy does so much depend."

To which his Majesty was pleas'd to return a most gracious Answer to the Effect following:

"I am very sensible how much our Safety depends upon our Strength at Sea; and therefore cannot but desire the Increase of it.

And I shall not be wanting to do what is in my Power, as to the Matters mention'd in your Address."

Another from the Commons about our Expences might be upon an equal Footing with those of our Allies.

But this Advantage obtain'd in one House, was, in some respect, ballanc'd afterwards, by an Address of a very different kind, that was presented by the Other; namely, "That his Majesty, in his great Wisdom, would be pleas'd to take care, for the future, That this Kingdom be put upon an equal Foot and Proportion with the Allies, in bearing the Charge of the present War." To which his Majesty was graciously pleas'd to answer, "In this, as in every thing else, I shall always endeavour to have a due Regard to the Interest and to the Honour of the Nation." A. D. 1695.

The ill State of the Coin, and the Growth of a fictitious Wealth, two other Points of Opposition.

The ill State of the Coin by Diminution on one Hand, and Adulteration on the other; and the Plan which had been laid for circulating a sort of fictitious Wealth, such as Exchequer-Tallies, Bank-Bills, and Government-Securities, instead of Gold and Siver, were two other Points which took up the Attention and excited the Concern of every thinking Man, who either lov'd his Country, or who made it his Study to distress the Government.

That Ministers, by means of the Bank, had a Resource at hand for all the Money which the Parliament authoris'd them to raise, on moderate Terms, as they were then call'd, did not satisfy those of the first Class, so much as the apparent Danger of such an Intercourse alarm'd and disgusted them. Loans too easily obtain'd they knew were great Incitements to Extravagance: They knew great Frauds might be committed in the Negotiation of them: They saw the Issues of Specie and Bullion, for the Support of the War, exceeded the Supplies which was furnish'd by the several Channels of Trade: The Difference, they knew, was to be drawn out of the Reservoirs which had been made in the Course of so many Years of almost uninterrupted Peace. These Reservoirs, they knew, would, in time, be exhausted, and which, if possible, shock'd them more than all; they knew that the Persons who alone could ascertain the Progress of the Consumption, and warn the Nation of the Dangers to be apprehended from it, would be most concern'd to keep the infamous Secret; and by the gradual Increase of that fictitious Wealth, would be able to do so, till every Vein of the Kingdom should be exhausted.

This was the distant Prospect of Things; and nearer hand, they saw their Specie melting before their Eyes; for what had Weight had not Firmness, or what had Firmness had for his being excus'd, which is fifty Shillings of English Money: Nor do any Ships escape without doing the one or the other, and for which they alledge their having King William's Authority. And these Things they are so far from concealing, or seeking to extenuate the Injustice and Criminalness of, by the Necessity of their Condition, that they glory in it both in their Treacle-bottles, and in all Places of Society and Concourse, as the Badge of their Exaltation and Triumph over us, and of our Subjection to them. The Method in which this Force and Hostility over us is practis'd is this, namely, before any Ship can be clear'd at their Custom-house, the Master must go to the Lords of the Admiralty, and bring from thence a Certificate to the Custom-house, of having given a Man out of the Vessel's Crew to their Service, or of having compounded at the Value I have mention'd for his Redemption. Surely it will not be unreasonable now to ask, Whether we be in Terms of Hostility with the Dutch, or of Alliance? Seeing we are not treated by them in this as Friends, but as Enemies: Nay, it will be needful that we consult both our Understandings and Memories, whether England be not tributary to Holland, and when and how it came to be so? For as much as they deal not with us as with a free and independent Nation, but as with a Province which they have subdu'd, and brought into Vassalage: And if we be not Slaves, but remain yet a free People, this Hostility in them ought to be hostily repell'd by us: And in the Place of accounting them any longer our Confederates, we ought to esteem and take them for our Enemies, and every where to assault them accordingly. And for our Belgick King to authorise the Dutch to do what I have mention'd, is to assume a Power over the Liberties and Persons of the People of England, which no rightful King did ever pretend unto: For our Persons and Liberties being under the Custody of the Laws, no King can claim a larger Jurisdiction over them than what the Laws give him; unless he will renounce to govern by Law, and take upon him to rule Despotically: And the Prince of Orange may, with as good a Right, transplant all the People of England to the Desarts of Arabia, or send them to work in the Mines of Peru and Mexico, as to authorise the Dutch to seise upon one Man that is either a native Subject here, or under the Protection of English Laws, to navigate either their Ships of War, or their Vessels of Commerce and Traffick: Nor has he any more Right to deprive me of my Liberty, save when, where, and in what Cases the Laws have declar'd me to have forfeited it, than I have to break into the Prince of Orange's Closet at Loo-groyen, and to snatch from thence the Testimonials of his Reconciliation to the Church of Rome. But by these little spiteful Prohibitions of the young Cub, we may guess what we are to expect from the Animal when grown up to the full Strength and Vigour of a Tyger, or a Lion." P. 53, 54.

Lastly, tho' a Bill was, this Session, brought into the House of Commons for the Encouragement of Seamen, it was not able to make its way thro' the House: And, on the other Hand, when a Bill for the naturalization of foreign Seamen was sent down to them from the Lords, they rejected it.

A. D. 1695. had not Weight: Every Man became, in ſome Senſe or other, a Robber of the Public: For he that neither debas'd nor diminiſh'd, either hoarded or ſold what fell into his Hands undebas'd or undiminiſh'd: Every Nation in Europe, that we had any money'd or commercial Connections with, and more particularly our Allies and Half-Brothers the Dutch, drew ſome Advantage from a Calamity, which, like the Sweating Sickneſs of old, was peculiar to us: And which was of ſo nice and critical a Nature, that either to connive at its Progreſs, or to try any State-Practice, in order to put a Stop to it, ſeem'd to be equally fatal.

Thoſe alſo of the ſecond Claſs, had the like Conceptions of the Caſe, but did not propoſe to treat it the ſame way: The Former were for purifying the Habit, and reſtoring the Vigour of the Common-Wealth; the Latter were only for reading Lectures over the Patient, for the Sake of expoſing Thoſe who had quack'd her into a Condition ſo truly deplorable, and recommending their own Noſtrums.

At the Head of Theſe, Burnet makes no Difficulty to place the Earl of Rocheſter, who, having fill'd the high Office of Lord-Treaſurer with great Ability, was conſider'd as a practis'd Man in Money Matters, and was heard with a ſuitable Reſpect, whenever any Point

M. S. of that Nature was in queſtion: But the Warmth and Impatience of his Temper were of more Advantage to his Adverſaries, than his own Knowledge and Experience to himſelf and his Party: For after he had given the Debate ſuch a Direction as ſufficiently countenanc'd the high Opinion which his Friends entertain'd of his Abilities, any Practice upon his Paſſions from the other Side, which was rarely, if ever, omitted, threw him into ſuch a Tranſport, as, in a manner, depriv'd him of the Uſe of his Reaſon, and from being formidable, render'd him ridiculous.

But how inartificial ſoever he was by Nature, or how artificially ſoever he ſtudy'd to embroil the Government, even Burnet himſelf acknowledges, The State of our Coin gave him but too great a Handle for it.

Biſhop Burnet's Account of the Coin Affair.

"We had, ſays he, two Sorts of Coin, the one was mill'd, and could not be practiſed on; but the other was not ſo, and was ſubject to clipping: And in a Courſe of ſome Years, the old Money was every Year ſo much diminiſh'd, that it at laſt grew to be leſs than the half of the intrinſic Value. Thoſe who drove this Trade, were as much enrich'd, as the Nation ſuffer'd by it: When it came to be generally obſerv'd, the King was adviſ'd to iſſue out a Proclamation, That no Money ſhould paſs, for the future, by the Tale, but by the Weight; which would put a preſent End to clipping. But Seymour, being then in the Treaſury, oppos'd this: He adviſ'd the King to look on, and let that Matter have its courſe; the Parliament would, in due time, take care of it: But, in the mean while, the Badneſs of Money quickned the Circulation, while every one ſtudied to put out of his Hands all the A. D. 1695. bad Money; and this would make all People the readier to bring their Caſh into the Exchequer, and ſo a Loan was more eaſily made. The Badneſs of the Money began now to grow very viſible; it was plain that no Remedy could be provided for it, but by recoining all the Specie of England; and that could not be let about in the End of a Seſſion. The Earls of Rocheſter and Nottingham repreſented this very tragically in the Houſe of Lords, where it was not poſſible to give the proper Remedy: It produced only an Act, with ſtricter Clauſes and ſeverer Penalties, againſt Clippers: This had no other Effect, but that it alarm'd the Nation, and ſunk the Value of our Money in the Exchange; Guineas, which were equal in Value to twenty-one Shillings and Six-pence in Silver, roſe to thirty Shillings; that is to ſay, thirty Shillings ſunk to twenty-one Shillings and Six-pence. This public Diſgrace put on our Coin, when the Evil was not cur'd, was, in effect, a great Point carry'd, by which there was an Opportunity given to ſink the Credit of the Government, and of the public Funds; and it brought a Diſcount of above 40 per Cent. upon Tallies."

Animadverted upon.

Thus at the ſame time that we are given to underſtand, that the King himſelf connivd at the Growth of this deſperate Evil, for the Sake of completing his Loans ſo much the more eaſily, we are nevertheleſs to conclude, that both the Advice, and the Miſchiefs it occaſion'd, ſprung from the Tories; who were alſo unfair enough to derive Matter of Complaint from their own Works, and to increaſe the Malady, under the Pretence of eſtabliſhing a Regimen by way of Prevention.

But all the while that Seymour was of the Treaſury, Lord Godolphin was firſt Commiſſioner; and in our Times, at leaſt, it has been uſual for him that was at the Head, to preſcribe to the Board: Beſides, it is expreſsly ſaid, That he, Seymour, was turn'd out for not anſwering the King's Expectations: M. S. Montagu, all the while, ſerv'd under the ſame Commiſſion, had been Chancellor of the Exchequer almoſt a Year, and conſequently was liable to his Share of the Cenſure paſs'd on this iniquitous Advice: And, laſtly, the Writers on the other Side, agreeable to what has been above ſuggeſted, make no Difficulty to aſſert, That tho' the Evil had been a long time growing, it quicken'd its Progreſs every Year after the Revolution: That the Remittances for the Charge of the War, every Year carried out of the Kingdom, from a Million and a Half to two Millions of Money, either in Specie or Bullion, which was the ſame thing: That all this Wealth not only center'd in Holland, but was negotiated there a thouſand ways to our Prejudice: That as our Coin degenerated from bad to worſe, they either refus'd to take it at all, or took it by Weight, which generally reduc'd the Value to half its Denomination: That the heavy Part of it they firſt clipp'd as cloſe as poſſible, and then remitted it hither again, where it was

A. D. 1695. current by Tale: That the Light they melted down and debas'd into their own Schellings, which became the Currency of the Army, and by which they had all the Profits of the Coinage, &c. That when the Bank of England, in virtue of a Clauſe in their Charter for that Purpoſe, would have erected a Mint in Flanders, in order to have ſecur'd that Branch of Profit to themſelves, the Dutch not only refus'd to grant them that Privilege in any Province of theirs, but prevail'd on their Neighbours to refuſe it too. That whereas in the Beginning of the War they allow'd forty-three Schellings for a Pound Sterling, they gradually lower'd that Conſideration to twenty-eight: That a great Part of our baſe Coin was minted in Holland, and from thence obtruded upon us: That after having beat down the Value of Guineas Abroad to nineteen Shillings Sterling, they remitted them to England, where they were current for thirty: That all foreign Gold, riſing in its Value in exact Proportion to this Riſe upon Guineas, they took the Advantage to buy up our Grain and Manufactures with it, and thereby enable themſelves, at our Loſs, to foreſtall and underſell us in all the Markets of Europe: And, laſtly, that ſo long ago as the Year 1691, Sir Dudley North (who thought both Juſtice and Policy were equal Sufferers in the Conſequences of ſo immenſe an Evil) ſet forth a Book, under the Title of Diſcourſes upon Trade, principally directed to the Caſes of Intereſt, Coinage, Clipping, and Encreaſe of Money, in which he recommended two Remedies, viz. One, That above-mention'd, to change the Currency from Tale to Weight; and the Other, which was the worſt, to call in the clipp'd Money, in order to a Re-coinage, and throw the Loſs on the Public.

Beſides, it is not over truly ſaid, that the Bill againſt Clippers, which his Lordſhip is pleas'd to ſet ſuch a Brand upon, was not brought in by the Lords till towards the End of the Seſſion: For it was ſent down to the Commons on the 19th of March, and the Parliament continued to ſit till the 3d of May: Nor is this all; the Affair had been under the Conſideration of a Committee of the Commons from the 8th of January: That Committee had deliver'd in a Report, (in which, among other Things, they gave it as their Opinion, That the Silver ought to be re-coin'd, in order to put a Stop to the Clipping; and that the Laws againſt Clipping ſhould be farther enforc'd) and yet the Houſe came to no Reſolution upon it, till they receiv'd the ſaid Bill from the Lords: Upon which they proceeded to take it into Conſideration; and having ſelected a Clauſe or two, added them, by way of Amendment, to the Bill: With theſe Amend-

A. D. 1695. ments the Lords concurr'd: And thus, inſtead of being call'd a Party-Bill, it ought to be eſteem'd the beſt Expedient that could as yet be obtain'd from the Government: For the ſame Committee which recommended a Re-coinage, recommended alſo a Proviſion, That it ſhould be penal to give more for any Silver Coin, than it ought to go for by Law; which ſhew'd not only that they were aware of what afterwards happen'd, but alſo, That their Purpoſe was to prevent it, as far as it could be done by Law.

A Deſign againſt the Bank, which miſcarries.

The Hiſtorian of his own Times moreover charges the ſame obnoxious Party with a Deſign to ruin the Bank, merely becauſe of its flouriſhing Credit, and becauſe that Credit was of ſingular Service to the Government: But tho' it may, and ought to be forever admitted, That the Intentions and Practices of Oppoſitions are frequently as blameable as thoſe of the Miniſters they oppoſe, it is nevertheleſs certain, that many of the moſt ſagacious and beſt meaning Perſons in the Kingdom join'd with them in this Deſign, on the ſame laudable Principles of Jealouſy, which, for the Conſtitution Sake, had led them to oppoſe the Eſtabliſhment of that Corporation: But whatſoever the Motives of this Deſign were, it miſcarry'd in both Houſes; where the Majority acted as if they were jointly of Opinion, That it was of more Conſequence to provide for the Security of the Government, than the Security of their Birthrights, on a Suppoſition, That in providing for the Former, they alſo provided for the Latter.

Other ineffectual Attempts of both Parties.

Several other Attempts of the ſame Tendency, tho' not of the ſame Nature, are alſo plac'd to the Account of the ſame Party; ſuch as the Bill touching free and impartial Proceedings in Parliament; and more particularly that for veſting the forfeited Eſtates in Ireland in his Majeſty, to be apply'd to the Uſe of the Public: But for whatever Purpoſe theſe Attempts were made, they were either ſo feebly urg'd, or ſo powerfully oppos'd, that they fail'd of Succeſs; as did alſo two other Bills to oblige Craggs and Harnage to diſcover the Diſpoſition of certain Sums appointed for cloathing the Army, and for puniſhing the corrupt Practices of the two Pounceforts, before mention'd.

But tho' the Influence of the Court was, for the general, ſtrong enough to defeat the Meaſures of the Oppoſition, it was not always ſtrong enough to carry their own. Thus a flaming Bill to diſable all ſuch Perſons from voting in parliamentary Elections, who ſhould refuſe to take the Oaths, and another of a ſimilar Nature, which was ſent down from the Lords, were both loſt: And, laſtly, the ſame Fate attended another Bill to regulate Printing Preſſes; or, in other Words, to deſtroy the Freedom of the Preſs.

And now having ſufficiently explain'd the moſt material Tranſactions of the Seſſions, (for as to the Marquis of Normanby's Concern in the Affair of the Convex Lights,

and

A. D. 1695. and the (a) Charge brought againſt him by his Enemies, That it was a City-Job, and that he obtain'd of the Citizens a Leaſe of certain Lands, by way of Conſideration for it, it is of too private and perſonal a Nature to merit a Place in this Work) it is time to ſhift the Scene.

In diſcourſing of the Impeachment againſt the Duke of Leeds, and of the Clipping-Bill, it may be remember'd, That the 3d of May was nam'd as the laſt of the Seſſion; and when the King came to put an End to it, the Language he was pleas'd to uſe, in parting with a Parliament which, on ſo many critical Occaſions, had gone ſuch unprecedented Lengths to ſerve and oblige him, was as follows. A. D. 1695.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

I am come to give you Thanks for the Supplies provided for carrying on the War in which We are engag'd; and, at the ſame time, to conclude this Seſſion, which cannot be continued longer, without manifeſt Prejudice to the Ends for which theſe Supplies was granted: The Seaſon of the King's Speech at the Cloſe of the Seſſion.

(a) On putting the Queſtion, Whether there appear'd any juſt Cauſe of Cenſure upon the Lord Marquis, it paſs'd in the Negative: And in the Proteſt which was enter'd by the Lords Manchester, Torrington, Coalmandeley, Effex, Stamford, Aylesbury, and Monmouth on this Occaſion, we find a Brief of the ſaid Charge as follows:

Diſſentient

Becauſe we humbly conceive it to be an Offence of an high and extraordinary Nature, that any Peer ſhould preſume to deliver the Opinion of this Houſe, without Doors, to Perſons whoſe Cauſe has been pleaded at this Bar, ſo as to induce them to compound their Intereſt, or oblige them to unwilling Compliances, more eſpecially in a Matter depending before us, in a Bill agreed to by the Houſe of Commons.

Which we humbly conceive to have been plainly made out againſt the Marquis of Normanby, by the Depoſitions of Mr. Hobbs, Sir Thomas Millington, Mr. Nutt, and Mr. Lilly.

Mr. Hobbs having inform'd this Houſe, upon Oath, that he was abſent and ſick, and reſolv'd to come to an Agreement with Hutchinſon; but that Sir Thomas Millington had ſometime afterwards given him this Account, that the Marquis of Normanby came out ſeveral times from the Houſe of Lords, aſſuring him the Bill would not paſs, unleſs an Agreement were immediately made with the ſaid Hutchinſon; which, with the Clamours without Doors, were the Reaſons that compell'd him, and thoſe others that ſign'd, to agree.

Sir Thomas Millington having declar'd, upon Oath, That he was forc'd and compell'd to ſign the aforeſaid Agreement, by frequent Intimations and Aſſurances given by the Marquis of Normanby, that the Bill ſhould, or would not paſs, unleſs he and his Partners did agree with Hutchinſon; as likewiſe by the Clamours without Doors, of thoſe concern'd for the paſſing of the Orphans Bill.

Mr. Nutt (agent for the Orphans) likewiſe depoſing, That he heard the Marquis of Normanby tell Sir Thomas Millington, the Bill would be loſt, unleſs the aforeſaid Agreement was concluded; both affirming, that no other Member of the Houſe of Lords, to their Knowledge, gave any ſuch Intimation or Account.

Mr. Lilly alſo depoſing, That all preſent were forc'd to ſign a Paper, (which he hop'd would prove no Agreement) becauſe they were compell'd to it by the Tumults at the Doors of the Houſe of Lords, being afraid of Violence from the Orphans Agents and Solicitors, in caſe they had not ſign'd it.

Which irregular Proceedings of the Marquis of Normanby, we conceive, fully prov'd by Witneſſes of undoubted Reputation, who acted in purſuance of the Account they gave upon Oath; which are the more remarkable, becauſe it appears that Roman Raſſell, Servant and Agent to the ſaid Lord, had one thirty-ſecond Part made over to him, immediately before the Hearing in the Houſe of Lords; which Share was aſſign'd to Mr. Moore, by Mr. Hutchinſon, to be made over for the promoting his Intereſt in Parliament, and was, to that Purpoſe, (as the Writing teſtifies) diſpos'd of to Roman Raſſell, which we conceive, by the Proofs, valuable 2000 l.

Which Share, Mr. Moore depoſes, was given to Roman Raſſell, and Raſſell confeſſes to have receiv'd for no other Conſideration (but having been Servant to many Lords) to ſolicit and apprize them of the Caſe; yet it appears, by his own Confeſſion, he knew not the Merits of the Cauſe, nor could name any other Lord whom he had apply'd to, but the Marquis his Maſter, who brought in the Petition for Hutchinſon, Roman Raſſell having acquainted him he had a Concern with him.

We likewiſe proteſt againſt the Vote in relation to the Second Part of it, which concerns the Leaſe made by the City to the Marquis of Normanby.

Becauſe we conceive it a Preſent avowedly given to the ſaid Marquis, for gratifying him for Services done to the City in the Houſe of Lords, and for the Expectation of like Services for the future, and by him receiv'd as ſuch; which we are humbly of Opinion is ſufficiently proved, and in ſuch manner as we apprehend is highly to the Diſhonour of this Houſe.

Firſt, This appears by the Entries in the City-Books, where it was agreed by the Committee of the City Lands, to demand an extraordinary Power of the Common-Council, to grant a Leaſe under ſuch extraordinary Conditions, as were not agreeable to their common Methods: In which Entry, the only Motive and Agreement that appears in the Books, is expreſs'd in theſe Words, viz.

Com' Concil' tent' 24° Die Jun. 1693.

At a Common-Council a Motion was made for gratifying a Perſon of Honour, who had been very friendly to the Intereſt of the City in the Houſe of Lords, and likely to continue ſo, with a long Term of Years in about two or three Acres of the City-Ground, lying and being in Cauſeit-Mead, behind Clarendon-Houſe.

The Queſtion being put, Whether this Court will empower the Committee for ſetting and diſpoſing the City-Lands, to grant unto the ſaid Lord an additional Term in the ſaid Ground, at and under ſuch Rents, Covenants, and Conditions, as the ſaid Committee ſhall approve of?

It was carried in the Affirmative.

And referred to the ſaid Committee accordingly.

As likewiſe the ſame is again enter'd in the Books, in the laſt Determination of the Committee for City Lands, as the only Motive to induce them to make ſuch a Grant, in theſe Words, viz.

It being, by ſpecial Order of this honourable Court, refer'd to us, in order to the gratifying a Perſon of Honour, who hath been very friendly to the Intereſt of the City in the Houſe of Lords, and is likely to continue ſo, &c. and ſigned by Sir Robert Clayton, and ſeveral of the Parties conſenting to this Leaſe, who were ſummon'd as Witneſſes by the Marquis of Normanby.

It being further made evident, (as we humbly conceive) by the Oaths of Mr. Love, the City Comptroller, Mr. Meriton, a Member of the Houſe of Commons, and Mr. Ballow, one of the Committee, who depoſed the Arguments made uſe of for this Leaſe, in ſeveral Meetings of the Committee, were the Services done, and like to be done the City by the Marquis of Normanby, particular mention being made in their Depoſitions of his Aſſiſtance in ſinging out Colſton's Bill, and his helping that of the Orphans.

And we further conceive, (with great Deference to this honourable Houſe) that the Motives and Conſiderations, ſworn by ſeveral of the Committee Men, who were conſenting to ſuch Grant or Leaſe, as Inducements to them to paſs it, appear, upon Examination, to be no valuable Conſiderations.

As to the building a great Houſe of thirty or forty thouſand Pounds upon the Lands, the ſecuring their Water Pipes, the obtaining ſeveral Years Arrear of Rent, the making a Brick-Drain; which alledged Conſiderations ſeems to us of no Weight, the Marquis being under no Covenant in his Leaſe to build ſuch Houſe, the Pipes of their Water being ſecured for ſeventy Years to come, by their former Leaſe, the Arrears having been paid, not by the ſaid Marquis, but by the Tenants under the firſt Leaſe, when demanded.

And, moreover, in our humble Opinion, there is little room to doubt, but that the ſaid Leaſe was given and taken as a Gratification. Mr. Love giving it in upon Oath, from the Marquis of Normanby's own Mouth, that he look'd upon the Leaſe as a preſent to him from the City for his Kindneſſes and Services, and that they were matters to him, not he to them.

Finally, we are the rather confirm'd of it, becauſe the Depoſitions of Mr. Love, Mr. Meriton, and Mr. Ballow, are ſuitable to the Entries in the City Books, which moſt of the Evidence ſummon'd for the Marquis of Normanby have in their Hands to, where no reaſons is made of thoſe other Matters ſworn by them to be Conſiderations inducing them to grant ſuch Leaſe.

Induced by theſe Parts of the Evidence recited, having enter'd the whole upon the Book; that nothing may be concealed which may any way tend to the Juſtification of the noble Lord concern'd, and for the Reaſons aforeſaid, we proteſt againſt this Vote, not being able to ſatisfy ourſelves, that this high Court of Honour and Juſtice were led on juſt Grounds to paſs ſome Cenſure on the Marquis of Normanby, upon the Evidence given to this Houſe, on the Matters of the Coventry Letter and City-Leaſe.

A. D. 1695. the Year making it so necessary for me to be Abroad, that it were to be wish'd our Business at Home would have allow'd me to have been there sooner.

I will take care to place the Administration of Affairs, during my Absence, in such Persons on whose Care and Fidelity I can entirely depend: And I doubt not, my Lords and Gentlemen, but every one of you, in your several Stations, will be assisting to them. This is what I require of you; and that you may be more than ordinarily vigilant in preserving the Public Peace."

But notwithstanding the Provision which had been made in the Triennial Act for the Dissolution of this Parliament on the 1st of November, it was, for the present, only prorogu'd to the 18th of June: And as to the Disposal of the Administration, agreeable to the Hint in his Majesty's Speech, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord-Keeper Somers, the Lord Privy-Seal Pembroke, the Lord-Steward Devonshire, the Duke of Shrewsbury, Secretary of State, the Lord-Chamberlain Dorset, and the first Commissioner of the Treasury, Godolphin, were appointed Lords Justices of the Kingdom during his Majesty's Absence.

A Regency appointed.

The Princess of Denmark neverthel'd.

That the Princess of Denmark (who had almost a Claime to be associated with his Majesty in the Throne, on the Death of her Royal Sister) was not vested with this (b) Trust, or, at least, that her Consort was not plac'd at the Head of the List, we are not to wonder, when we consider how extremely jealous his Majesty was of the high Dignity he had acquir'd, and in how scanty a manner he suffer'd the Queen herself to share in it.

But then, neither are we to wonder that the Partisans of the Princess made use of this Incident to suggest, that the Reconciliation which had taken place on the Death of her Majesty was not over sincere.

When also we reflect, that the Duke of Leeds was not permitted to hold a Place amongst these Royal Delegates, it may be surmis'd, That his Character having been so recently blasted by the Peculation in a manner prov'd upon him, by the Confessions of Firebrace and Bates, the Flight of Rebart, and even his own Conduct, with regard to the Impeachment, his Majesty had wisely dismis'd him from his Service, and thereby purg'd himself from all Suspicion of having fully'd his own royal Hands with the Wages of Corruption. But this was far from being the Case: For tho' it was not thought expedient, while the Clamour was yet echoing thro' the Kingdom, to constitute him one of the Regents, he was nevertheless continued at the Head of the Council-Board. A. D. 1695.

As to the second principal Secretary of State, it is fit the Reader should know, that Trenchard was no longer the Person who held that high Office: For Death had removed him, (whether by a Course of Vexations, arising from the Miscarriage of his Plot, or in the natural way, is not specified) and Sir William Trumball, who had [illegible] Embassador to the Port, and Envoy in France, was advanc'd to act the like Under-part in the Secretary's Office in his room: For, as we have seen, neither was he admitted to be of the Royal Junto, nor was his Attendance thought necessary on his Majesty Abroad; which is so much the more extraordinary, since Bishop Burnet, with a View to illustrate the modest Use they made of the Authority they were cloath'd with, observes, "That they took care to keep within Bounds, and to do nothing but in Matters of Course till they had the King's Orders, to which they adher'd exactly." And it might have been Matter of doubt, whether those Orders were strictly legal, since they had neither the Sanction of the Privy-Council, nor of the Secretary's Office.

Lastly, after what manner this Board of Regency, which was then a new Expedient in Government, were to be directed by the Advices of the Earl of Sunderland, to whose Conduct, with regard to domestic Affairs at least, we are told, the King had, in so great a Measure, resign'd himself, or upon what Terms, or thro' what Channel that Nobleman corresponded with his Majesty, we are not furnish'd with sufficient Light to make a probable Conjecture.

On the very Day the Parliament was prorogu'd, the Regency was declar'd: But notwithstanding the Necessity urg'd by his Majesty for that Prorogation, That he might be at Liberty to go Abroad, it was nine Days longer before he set out from Kensington, in which Interval the Enquiry might have been perfected, and some wholesome Resolutions might have been taken upon it.

But what the Nation, with Reason, expected, the Courtiers had as much Reason to apprehend: And having got rid of the Difficulty, were little concern'd for the Reproach which the Skreen that was provided for them, brought upon the Government.

At the same time also that his Majesty labour'd under the Pressure of this ugly Affair in his English Parliament, he was also oblig'd to advise with his Ministers upon some Temperament for the Satisfaction of his Parliament of Scotland: To defer a Session there any

(b) It is so much the more remarkable, that the late Dutchess Dowager of Marlborough, in her Account of the Indignities offer'd to her Mistress, did not mention this, which seems to be one of the greatest of all, because the Historian of his own Times had long before written of it as follows.

"Yet the Princess came soon after (the Death of the Queen, that is to say) to see the King; and there was after that an Appearance of a good Correspondence between them: But it was little more than an Appearance. They liv'd still in Terms of Civility, and in formal Visits: But the King did not bring her into any Share in Business, nor did he order his Ministers to wait on her, and give her any Account of Affairs. And now, that he was to go beyond Sea, she was not set at the Head of the Council, nor was there any Care taken to oblige those who were about her. This look'd either like a Jealousy and Distrust, or a Coldness towards her, which gave all the secret Enemies of the Government a Colour of Complaint. They pretended Zeal for the Princess, tho' they came little to her; and they made it very visible, on many Occasions, that this was only a Disguise for worse Designs." Vol. II. P. 149.

A. D. 1695. any longer was impracticable, becauſe the Funds granted for the Maintenance of the Army were expir'd; and the Death of the Queen had render'd it more and more hazardous to proceed by any new Expedient that border'd upon Will and Pleaſure.

P. 156. "The Maſſacre of Glencо (ſays the Hiſtorian of his own Times) made ſtill a great Noiſe; and the King ſeem'd too remiſs in enquiring into it: But when it was repreſented to him, That a Seſſion of Parliament could not be manag'd without high Motions and Complaints of ſo crying a Matter; and that his Miniſters could not oppoſe theſe without ſeeming to bring the Guilt of that Blood which was ſo perfidiouſly ſhed, both on the King and on themſelves: To prevent that, he order'd a Commiſſion to be paſs'd under the Great Seal, for a Precognition in that Matter, which is a Practice in the Law of Scotland of examining into Crimes, before the Perſons concern'd are brought upon their Trial. This was look'd upon as an Artifice to cover that Tranſaction by a private Enquiry."—And we may add, That an Artifice it certainly was, both to ſoften the Report and defeat the Puniſhment; conſequently it was not calculated to prevent, but faſten the Guilt of that Blood which had been ſo perfidiouſly ſhed upon thoſe whoſe Duty it was to puniſh it.

But this Precognition was not the only Artifice made uſe of on this Occaſion: The whole People of Scotland, as well as the Malcontents in the Scottiſh Parliament, intereſted themſelves in the Glencо Affair; and to reconcile them to the Diſappointment that was preparing for them, it was neceſſary they ſhould have a ſuitable Gratification: And accordingly, we ſhall find, that a gilded Bubble was already prepar'd for them; and that in the Purſuit of the one, they utterly forgot the other.

A Seſſion of Parliament in Scotland.

King's Letter.

May the 9th, the Seſſion was open'd by the Marquis of Tweedale, in quality of King's Commiſſioner; and in the Preamble to his Majeſty's Letter, Care was taken to ſignify, That the Continuation of the War ſtill hindering him from perſuing his Reſolution of being amongſt them in Perſon, he had been oblig'd to call them together once more in his Abſence. It contain'd alſo a very ſtrong Panegyric on the Capacity, Experience, Fidelity, Zeal, and long Services of his Grace the Commiſſioner: And as to the principal Points in the ſubſequent Paragraphs, they were to this Effect.

"That his Majeſty had fully intruſted him with his Mind, and given him Powers to paſs all ſuch Laws, for the Good of that his Majeſty's antient Kingdom, as had been propoſed to his Majeſty at this time. That the Marquis was to aſk nothing of them in his Majeſty's Name, but that which the Intereſt of the Country made neceſſary to be done: That therefore his Majeſty need not to mention to them, That the Subſidies for paying the Forces were now expir'd; and that their Peace and Safety requir'd the renewing of them during the War: That his Majeſty was glad of any Appearances of a Diſpoſition to Moderation and Union about Church Matters; and hoped they would encourage and promote it, by removing the Subjects of Differences as much as they could: That he was not unmindful of their Letter to him, in the Cloſe of the laſt Seſſion: That the known Interruptions, which he had had in Buſineſs this Winter, had been a great Hinderance to him; but he was reſolv'd to do whatever he might for the Security of the Government, and the Satisfaction of his good Subjects. In the Concluſion, his Majeſty recommended to them Calmneſs and Unanimity in their Proceedings, not doubting but they would act ſuitably to the Confidence he had put in them, in calling them again in his Abſence."

A. D. 1695.

But his Grace, the Commiſſioner, was much more particular: For in his Speech he proceeded to tell them, "That his Majeſty's tender Care and Concern for their Safety and Welfare did evidently appear, in minding every thing that might contribute thereto; particularly as to the Church, that all Differences might be compos'd, it being his Majeſty's Purpoſe to maintain the Preſbyterian Government in the Church of Scotland, and that the Peace and Security of the Kingdom, againſt foreign Invaſion and inteſtine Commotion, be provided for: That if they found it would tend to the Advancement of Trade, that an Act ſhould be paſs'd for the Encouragement of ſuch as ſhould acquire and eſtabliſh a Plantation in Africa or America, or any other Part of the World, where Plantations might be lawfully acquir'd, his Majeſty was willing to declare, That he would grant to the Subjects of this Kingdom, in favour of theſe Plantations, ſuch Rights and Privileges as he granted in like Caſes to the Subjects of his other Dominions: And that the Judicatories higher and ſubaltern be ſo regulated in their Proceedings, as that Juſtice might be adminiſtered with the greateſt Diſpatch and leaſt Charge to the People: That theſe Things had taken up ſome Part of his Majeſty's Time and Thoughts theſe Months paſt, and had been frequently diſcourſed by him, and then put in the Method of Inſtructions and Directions for his Grace's Behaviour: That therefore it only remain'd for them to take theſe weighty Affairs into conſideration, and to conſult of the beſt Ways and Means to enable his Majeſty to perfect ſo good Deſigns, by granting him Supplies for maintaining the preſent Land-Forces, and for providing and entertaining a competent naval Force, for the Defence of the Coaſt and ſecuring of Trade: That in order thereto, his Majeſty had granted a Commiſſion of Admiralty for managing the the Affairs thereof; not omitting to take care for the other unavoidable Contingencies of the Government, wherein the Civil-Liſt came ſhort: And, laſtly, That the Diſpatch of theſe great Affairs, with Cheerfulneſs and Alacrity, would perfect a good Underſtanding, and perpetuate a Confidence between the King and them."

The Commiſſioner's Speech.

Still there remain'd another Sweetner to be adminiſter'd, which was left to the Earl

A. D. 1695. of Annandale, Lord-Preſident of the Parliament, who having taken Notice of the freſh Aſſurances given them of his Majeſty's firm Reſolution to maintain the Preſbyterian Government of this Church, proceeded to ſay, "That he hoped the Moderation and Calmneſs, that ſhould, at this time, appear in all their Proceedings in Church-Matters, would ſatisfy the World, That this is the Government moſt agreeable to the Temper and Inclination of this People, and moſt ſuitable for the Intereſt and Support of their Kingdom, the Civil Government, and Peace of this Kingdom." And in the Cloſe of all, having touch'd on the ſad and irreparable Loſs they had ſuſtain'd of the beſt of Queens, he call'd upon them to ſhew their juſt Senſe of it, by doubling the Forwardneſs of their Endeavours to ſerve his Majeſty, in whom the whole Sovereignty was now lodg'd, &c.

To talk of the Effect of theſe Speeches, is to talk Nonſence: In theſe Days of ours, the Reſolutions of great Aſſemblies are not fix'd by the Powers of Eloquence, whatever was formerly the Caſe; and the Diſpoſitions they ſhew, ought to be deduc'd from ſome prior Conſideration. In ſhort, Majorities are ſecur'd (if they are to be ſecur'd at all) before Seſſions are open'd; and Speeches are fram'd for very different Purpoſes than the forming of Opinions, or the gaining Proſelytes.

When, therefore, we ſay, That the Parliament of Scotland immediately apply'd themſelves to do all that his Majeſty thought fit to require of them, we are to preſume, That all was ſo underſtood and agreed before hand; or that the Bell-Weathers, at leaſt, had anſwer'd for the Flock.

An Addreſs of Condolance on the Death of the Queen.

The firſt Inſtance of their Complaiſance conſiſted in an Addreſs of Condolance to his Majeſty, on the Death of the Queen, whom, they ſaid, could not be too much or too long lamented: And when the Committee for the Security of the Kingdom made their firſt Report, it was reſolv'd, thereupon, Nem. Con. That all Supplies, now neceſſary, be given to the King, for the Defence of the Nation and Support of the Government: When, alſo, the ſaid Committee farther reported, That a Grant of 1,440,000 l. Scots, was neceſſary for the Maintainance of Land-Forces, Cruiſers and Convoys, it was agreed to with the ſame Unanimity; and a ſuitable Proviſion was made for raiſing it by a general Poll-Tax, by a ſix Months Ceſs out of the Land-Rents, an additional Exciſe, and a farther Ceſs on the Land of three Months more.

All neceſſary Supplies voted.

An Enquiry into the Maſſacre at Glenco demanded.

In the mean time, however, the ſame Committee of Security mov'd the Houſe for an Enquiry into the Affair of Glenco; upon which Occaſion the Commiſſioner acquainted them, That the King had already given Commiſſion to ſeveral Perſons to make ſuch an Enquiry: And it being demanded that the ſaid Commiſſion ſhould be produc'd, it was produc'd and read accordingly.

This was done the ſame Day that all neceſſary Supplies were voted; and the next Day, but one, it being mov'd, That the Parliament ſhould deſire the Commiſſioner to A. D. 1695. tranſmit their humble Thanks to his Majeſty for his Care to vindicate the Honour of the Government, and the Juſtice of the Nation, by granting ſuch a Commiſſion, the ſame was carry'd in the Affirmative, Nem. Con.

By the way, the Commiſſion which was thus unanimouſly acknowledg'd, was directed to the Commiſſioner himſelf, in his Capacity of Chancellor, the Lord-Preſident Annandale, John Lord Murray, Sir James Stuart, King's Advocate, Adam Cockburn, Juſtice Clerk, two other Members of the College of Juſtice, Sir James Ogilvy, Solicitor, and Andrew Drummond, of Maſſgins, all of them Dependents on, or actually in the Service of the Court; and the Scope of it was to take Precognition by whom, and how, and by what Colour of Authority the Slaughter was committed.

It is ſaid, That Mr. Secretary Johnſton was the Adviſer of this Commiſſion; as alſo, That his Grace the Commiſſioner had ſecret Inſtructions not to produce it unleſs it was call'd for; and that having a latent Purpoſe to ruin Dalrymple, the Maſter of Stair, who was his Rival in Power, he, Johnſton, caus'd his own Creatures in the Parliament to make that Call: For as to the Honour of his Maſter, he made no Difficulty to ſacrifice it, in order to ſubdue an Enemy.

Secretary Johnſton ſaid to be the firſt Mover of it.

Gallianus Red. 4to. p. 13.

This is certain, That in the Midſt of the moſt uniform Acquieſcence to the good Pleaſure of the King, ever manifeſted by any Parliament in any Reign, a Motion was made for the Commiſſioners to exhibit an Account of their Proceedings; and that when the Queſtion had been poſt-pon'd to another Day, the ſame Perſons grew ſo impertinent, that they repeated their Motion the next Day but one; and Care was taken to certify in the London-Gazette, That this ſecond time it was very much preſs'd.

No. 3091.

The firſt Connection between him and the Parliament.

Indeed, There was a ſort of natural Alliance between Johnſton and the Majority of this Parliament: For as the Tenure of Johnſton's Power depended, in a good degree, on his Aſcendancy over them, ſo the Continuance of the Preſbyterian Syſtem, which they had reſtor'd, depended almoſt as much on him: They had carry'd their Seats in the firſt Surprize of the Revolution; and in caſe of a Diſſolution, they had good Reaſon to conclude thoſe Seats would know them no more. Now Dalrymple, they knew, was a Latitudinarian, both in Politics and Religion, and being at Enmity with them, as well as their Patron, had no Expedient in reſerve ſo likely to anſwer his Ends againſt the Latter, as the Re-eſtabliſhment of Epiſcopacy: Thus it was equally the Intereſt both of the Secretary and the Parliament, to render him ſo odious on one Hand, and ſo obnoxious to Puniſhment on the other, That neither ſhould he dare to aſpire again, nor the King to employ him: And as well from the whole Courſe of the Enquiry, as from the Manner in which it was ſuſpended, it is alike manifeſt, That this was all that was intended by it.

On

A. D. 1695. On the 18th of June the Motion was firſt made; on the 20th it was repeated; and on the 24th the Report, conſiſting of the King's Inſtructions, Dalrymple's Letters, the Depoſitions of Witneſſes, the Opinion of the Committee, &c. was laid before Parliament by his Grace the Commiſſioner, with a Signification, "That it had been ſent to his Majeſty the Thurſday before; and that he made no doubt, That in caſe they thought fit to make any other Uſe of it, it would be with that Deference and Submiſſion to his Majeſty, as became ſo loyal and zealous a Parliament, in Vindication of the Juſtice and Honour of his Majeſty's Government."

Of the Depoſitions it contain'd.

Of the Depoſitions, ſo much the leſs need be ſaid, becauſe they relate principally to the Fact which is already before us: But of the King's Inſtructions, and Dalrymple's Letters, which are the Authorities which gave Riſe to it, much remains to be ſaid, becauſe they have not as yet been touch'd upon.

Narrative of the Maſſacre. State Tracts, Vol. III.

In the firſt Place, then, the Report admits, That the Lairds of Glenco and Auchirtriten, who were the Chiefs maſſacred, had agreed to the Ceſſation aſſur'd to the Clans by the Earl of Braidalbin: That Glenco did repair to Colonel Hill, Governor of Fort-William, about the End of December, in order to take the Oaths: That Hill recommended him, by Letter, as a loſt Sheep recover'd, to Sir Colin Campbell, of Ardkinlas, the Sheriff of Argyle: That in repairing to the ſaid Sheriff, he was not only retarded by bad Ways and bad Weather, but was detain'd in Cuſtody twenty-four Hours by Captain Drummond: That the ſaid Sheriff making a Doubt, whether he ought to adminiſter the Oath to him, becauſe the Time was elaps'd, Glenco, with Tears, beſought him not to take the Advantage of a Lapſe, which was the Effect of Neceſſity and Misfortune: That the ſaid Sheriff, having at laſt been prevail'd upon, did adminiſter to him the Oath; and by Letter to Colonel Hill not only ſignify'd his taking it, but caution'd him, the Colonel, That Glenco's Friends and Followers might not ſuffer, till the King and Council's Pleaſure ſhould be known: That he alſo diſpatch'd a Certificate of what had paſs'd, together with a Copy of Colonel Hill's Letter, to Colin Campbell, Sheriff-Clerk of Argyle, then at Edinburgh, and requir'd to be inform'd, by the ſaid Sheriff-Clerk, whether Glenco's Submiſſion was allow'd: That the ſaid Sheriff-Clerk did make a Tender of the ſaid Certificate, &c. to the Clerks of the Council, who refus'd to accept it, becauſe dated after the Day appointed by the Proclamation: That the ſaid Sheriff-Clerk did then apply to the Lord Aberuchil, a Privy-Counſellor, and made it his Requeſt, That his Lordſhip would adviſe with other Privy-Counſellors thereon: That the ſaid Lord did afterwards intimate he had done ſo, and partly to the Lord Stair, (Dalrymple's Father) whoſe Opinion ſeverally it was, That the ſaid Certificate could not be receiv'd without a Warrant from the King; and that it would be neither ſafe for the Sheriff, Ardkinlas, nor profitable to Glenco, to give in the ſaid Certificate: That hereupon the ſaid Sheriff-Clerk, in the Preſence of the ſaid Lord, Mr. John Campbell, and Mr. David Moncrief, Clerk of the Council, did delete or obliterate the ſaid Certificate; and being ſo obliterated, did deliver it to the ſaid Moncrief: And, laſtly, That it did not appear the Matter was ever brought before the Council, for the Opinion of the Council-Board, according to the Intention of the Sheriff Ardkinlas, and his expreſs Deſire to know their Lordſhips Pleaſure. A. D. 1695.

Of the King's Inſtructions.

We come now to the Inſtructions to Sir Thomas Levingſton, who had the chief Command of the Forces: And we find mention is made of two ſeveral Sets, bearing two ſeveral Dates, viz. The Firſt January 11, 1692, and the Second January 16. By the Firſt, Sir Thomas was authoris'd and order'd to march againſt the Rebels, who had not taken the Benefit of the Indemnity, and to DESTROY THEM BY FIRE AND SWORD: Which, ſay the Court-Scots, is the actual Stile of our Commiſſions, againſt intercommun'd Rebels: But then their Adverſaries aſſert, That no ſuch dreadful Words of Courſe, were ever made uſe of by any of our native Kings.

Narrative. State Tracts, Vol. III. P. 607.

Gall. Red. P. 13.

The Latter moreover ſuggeſt, That Dalrymple having communicated the firſt Inſtructions to the Duke of Leeds, after they were ſent, his Grace took an Opportunity to appriſe the King, That in a Country govern'd by Laws, a Commiſſion to deſtroy with Fire and Sword would ſound very harſhly; and that this Remonſtrance of his, produc'd ſome Mitigation in thoſe which follow'd.

But the Truth is, That the Inſtructions of the 11th, contain'd the following Clauſe, viz. "That the Rebels may not think themſelves deſperate, we allow you to give Terms and Quarters; but in this Manner only, That Chieftains and Heritors, or Leaders, be Priſoners of War, their Lives only ſafe, and all other Things in Mercy; they taking the Oath of Allegiance: And the Community taking the Oath of Allegiance, and rendering their Arms, and ſubmiting to the Government, are to have Quarters and Indemnity for their Lives and Fortunes, and to be protected from the Soldiers." And it is alſo true, That thoſe of the 16th, together with a Repetition of the like Indulgence, (if a Surrender on ſuch Terms can be call'd one) contain'd the following inhuman Exception.

"As for Mac-Kane, (or Mackean) of Glenco, and that Tribe, if they can be well ſeparated from the reſt, it will be a proper Vindication of public Juſtice to EXTIRPATE the Sect of Thieves."

Now it is admitted on all Hands, That theſe ſeveral Inſtructions were both ſuper-ſign'd and counter-ſign'd by the King himſelf; which was ſuch a Departure from the ordinary Method, as argued either, That the Secretary did not think it ſafe in ſuch an Inſtance, to perform the Duty of his Office, or that this double Signature was meant

A. D. 1695 to ſhew, That his Majeſty would admit of no Excuſe for Diſobedience.

And yet Biſhop Burnet (forgetting that in another Place he has ſoften'd this Inſtruction, from the EXTIRPATION of the GLENCO-TRIBE, to the making SOME EXAMPLES of them: And that to excuſe the King's ſigning and counter-ſigning it, he ſaid his Majeſty did it in an Hurry, without making any Enquiry about it) has dar'd to aſſert, That the King's Orders carry'd nothing in them that was in any Sort blameable: Another Writer of the ſame Stamp, yet bolder, is poſitive, That the Maſſacre did not at all reflect on King William's Juſtice, who never gave, nor intended any ſuch Orders: A Third, the Anſwerer by Authority of a Book frequently quoted in the Courſe of this Work, call'd Great-Britain's juſt Complaint, pronounces, That a milder Order never was given: And what is yet more ſurprizing than all, we ſhall find theſe abandon'd Aſſertions more than countenanc'd by the Voice of the Scotiſh Parliament.

Mem. of N. Britain, 1701. P. 99.

As much Pains has, however, been taken to make Dalrymple the Author of the Advice, as to purge the King from the Odium of it: And it muſt be own'd, that in the Courſe of his Letters to Sir Thomas Levingſton, and Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton, he appears to have the Execution as much at Heart, as if it was a Service altogether as laudable in itſelf as acceptable to his Majeſty.

Of Secretary Dalrymple's Letters and Orders.

Two of theſe to Hamilton are in particular cited by the King's Commiſſioners in their Report to the Parliament, to ſhew that he had a Grudge againſt the Macdonalds, and that he had pre-concerted their Deſtruction with that Officer, almoſt a Month before the Indemnity expir'd: The Firſt of theſe is dated December 1, and treats with much Bitterneſs of their marring the Bargain which the Earl of Braidalbin was driving with the Highlanders, and of their Deſpite to him: The Second is dated the 3d of the ſame Month, and ſays, "That ſince the Government cannot oblige them, it is obliged to ruin ſome of them, in order to weaken and frighten the reſt; and that the Macdonalds will fall into this Net."

Again: The ſaid Commiſſioners farther obſerve, That, previous to the Inſtructions above-mention'd of the 11th and 16th of January, Dalrymple writ to Levingſton as follows, viz. January 7, "You know in general, That the Troops poſted at Inverneſs and Inverlochie, will be order'd to take in the Houſe of Innergairie, and to deſtroy intirely the Country of Lochabar, Locheal's Lands, Kippoch's, Glengary's, and Glenco's;" and then added, "I aſſure you your Power ſhall be full enough, and I hope the Soldiers will not trouble the Government with Priſoners." And, again, afterwards, "(c) We have an Account, That Locheal, Macnaughton, Appin, and Glenco, took the Benefit of the Indemnity at Inverary; and Kippoch and others at Inverneſs." Thoſe who remain of the Rebels, are not able to oppoſe; A. D. 1695 and their Chieftains being all Papiſts, it is well the Vengeance falls there: For my Part, I could have wiſh'd the Macdonalds had not divided; and I am ſorry that Kippoch and Mackean of Glenco are ſafe." In a Third Letter of the 11th of January, ſent with the firſt Inſtructions to Sir Thomas Levingſton, he proceeds thus, "I have no great Kindneſs to Kippoch nor Glenco; and it is well that People are in Mercy. Juſt now my Lord Argyle tells me, That Glenco hath not taken the Oath, at which I rejoice: It is a great Work of Charity to be exact in rooting out that damnable Sect, the worſt of the Highlanders." In a Fourth of the ſame Date with the additional Inſtructions, after ſaying, "The King does not at all incline to receive any after the Diet but on Mercy," he, nevertheleſs, adds, "But for a juſt Example of Vengeance, I intreat the thieving Tribe of Glenco may be rooted out to purpoſe." And to confirm this, in his Letter of the ſame Date, ſent with the Duplicate of the firſt, and the additional Inſtructions to Colonel Hill, after having written, "That ſuch as render on Mercy might be ſaved;" he repeats, "I ſhall intreat you, that, for a juſt Vengeance and public Example, the Tribe of Glenco may be rooted out to purpoſe. The Earls of Argyle and Broadalbin have promis'd that they ſhall have no Retreat in their Bounds; the Paſſes to Ronoch would be ſecur'd, and the Hazard certified to the Laird of Weems to reſet them; in that caſe Argyle's Detachment, with a Party that may be poſted in Iſland Stalker, muſt cut them off; and the People of Appin are none of the beſt."

Thus we find that nothing was wanting, on the Secretary's Side, to ſecure his Purpoſe: The ſame Expreſs who carry'd the Orders to the Commander in Chief, was alſo charg'd with the like Orders to Colonel Hill; and he, the Secretary, had not only maintain'd a Correſpondence with Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton, as we have ſeen, but ſignified to Levingſton, ſo early as the 7th of January, That the ſaid Hamilton was to be the Perſon employ'd in the Execution of the Glenco-Men: This was made appear by Levingſton, on his Examination before the Commiſſioners: And in order to purge himſelf, as far as poſſible, from the Odium which his Obedience to ſuch Orders carry'd along with it, he farther depos'd, That when he receiv'd them, he was but juſt return'd from London: That he knew nothing of any Soldiers quarter'd in Glenco: That his Meaning only was to proſecute that Clan as Rebels ſtanding out, by fair Hoſtility: And that, agreeable to it, he had made uſe of the ſame Words and Orders written to him by the Secretary; that is to ſay, in his own Orders to Colonel Hill, and to Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton; to the Latter of whom he ſignify'd, That it was judg'd good News, That Glenco had not taken the Oaths of Allegiance

Levingſton's Orders.

(c) Mr. Tindal, in his Account of this Affair, has omitted this remarkable Paſſage, as well as ſeveral others.

A. D. 1695. Allegiance within the Time prefix'd: And that Secretary Stair had, in his laſt Letter, made mention of him, the ſaid Hamilton, (as the Perſon to do the Job, muſt be underſtood) after which his very Words are as follow, "For, Sir, here is a fair Occaſion for you to ſhew that your Garriſon ſerves for ſome Uſe: And, ſeeing that the Orders are ſo poſitive from Court to me, not to ſpare any of them that have not timely come in, as you may ſee by the Orders I ſend to your Colonel, I deſire you would begin with Glenco, and ſpare nothing which belongs to him; but do not trouble the Government with Priſoners."

Hamilton's Colonel here mention'd is Hill, the Governor of Fort-William, to whom Glenco had firſt repair'd in order to take the Oath, and who had recommended him as a loſt Sheep to Campbell the Sheriff of Argyle, who, according to his own Depoſition, not liking the Buſineſs, and being, on the contrary, very much griev'd at it, thought himſelf nevertheleſs ſufficiently abſolv'd, by leaving the Management of it to Hamilton, and by penning the Orders he ſent him, in the following artful manner.

Thoſe of Hill. "Sir, you are with 400 of my Regiment, and the 400 of my Lord Argyle's Regiment, under the Command of Major Duncanſon, to march ſtrait to Glenco, and there put in Execution the Orders you have receiv'd from the Commander in Chief."

But while the Orders were in this Courſe of Propagation, and the Execution was ſo long in ſuſpence, the Secretary, Dalrymple, diſpatches two other Letters of the ſame Date, viz. January 30; one to Levingſton and the other to Hill: In the Former he ſays, "I am glad that Glenco did not come within the Time prefix'd: I hope what is done there may be in carneſt, ſince the reſt are not in a Condition to draw together to help. I think to hurry (that is to drive) their Cattle, and burn their Houſes, is but to render them deſperate lawleſs Men, to rob their Neighbours; but I believe you will be ſatisfied it were a great Advantage to the Nation, that thieving Tribe were rooted out and cut off. It muſt be quietly done, otherwiſe they will make ſhift for both their Men and Cattle. Argyle's Detachment lies in Lotrickneel, to aſſiſt the Garriſon to do all of a ſudden." And in the Latter thus: "Pray, when the thing concerning Glenco is reſolv'd, let it be ſecret and ſudden, otherwiſe the Men will ſhift you; and better not meddle with them, than not to purpoſe to cut off that Neſt of Robbers, who have fallen into the Mercy of the Law, now when there is Force and Opportunity, whereby the King's Juſtice will be as conſpicuous and uſeful, as his Clemency to others. I apprehend the Storm is ſo great, that for ſome time you can do but little; but ſo ſoon as poſſible I know you will be at work; for theſe falſe People will do nothing, but as they ſee you in a Condition to do with them."

Thus it appears, That the Secretary had the Damon of Cruelty ever at his Elbow; that he could not reſt till he had put his Commands in execution: And how proper Hamilton was to be his Agent in it, will appear from his own Letter to Major Duncanſon, which was as follows. A. D. 1695.

"Sir, purſuant to the Commander in Chief, and my Colonel's Orders to me, for putting in execution the Service againſt the Rebels of Glenco, wherein you, with a Party of Argyle's Regiment, now under your Command, are to be concern'd: You are, therefore, to order your Affairs ſo, as to be at the ſeveral Poſts aſſign'd you by Seven of the Clock To-morrow Morning, being Saturday, and fall in Action with them; at which time I will endeavour to be with the Party from this Place, at the Place appointed them. It will be neceſſary that the Avenues, minded by Lieutenant Campbell on the South Side, be ſecur'd, that the old Fox, nor none of his Cubs, get away: The Orders are, THAT NONE BE SPAR'D, NOR THE GOVERNMENT TROUBLED WITH PRISONERS." Hamilton.

This is the laſt (d) written Order which the Commiſſioners thought fit to cite in their Report; tho' there was ſtill another behind, which will be brought forward in its Place: And, upon the whole, they proceeded to give it as their Opinion, 1. That it was a great Wrong, that Glenco's Caſe and Diligence, as to his taking the Oath of Allegiance, together with the Sheriff's Certificate of his having ſo done, Hill's Letter to the ſaid Sheriff, and the Sheriff's Anſwer, were not preſented to the Lords of the Council: That thoſe who adviſ'd the not preſenting thereof, were in the Wrong, and ſeem'd to have had a malicious Deſign againſt Glenco: That it was a farther Wrong that the ſaid Certificate was obliterated after it came to Edinburgh: And that being ſo obliterated, it ſhould neither have been preſented to, or taken by the Clerk of the Council, without an expreſs Warrant from the Council. 2. That it appear'd to have been known in London, and particularly to Dalrymple, in the Month of January, by his own Letters, that Glenco had taken the Oath, tho' after the Day prefix'd. 3. That there was nothing in the King's Inſtructions to warrant the committing the ſaid Slaughter, even as to the Thing itſelf, and far leſs as to the Manner of it; ſeeing all his Inſtructions did plainly import, That the moſt obſtinate of the Rebels might be receiv'd into Mercy, upon taking the Oaths of Allegiance, tho' the Day was long before elaps'd; and that he order'd nothing concerning Glenco and his Tribe, BUT, THAT IF they COULD BE ſeperated from the reſt, it WOULD BE a proper Vindication of the public Juſtice to extirpate that Sect of Thieves; which plainly intimated, That it was his Majeſty's Mind, that they COULD NOT be ſeperated from the reſt of theſe Rebels, unleſs they ſtill refus'd his Mercy, Opinion of the Commiſſioners upon the whole.

(d) And even this Mr. Tindal has chuſe to omit.

A. D. 1695. Mercy, by continuing in Arms and refuſing the Allegiance; tho' even in that Caſe, they were only to be proceeded againſt in the way of publick Juſtice, and no other way. 4. That the Secretary's Letters were no ways warranted by the King's Inſtructions, which they greatly exceeded: And, laſtly, That this was yet farther confirm'd by two more of his Letters to Colonel Hill, after the Maſſacre, which they cited, and in which, having ſaid, That there was much Talk at London that the Glenco Men were murder'd in their Beds, after they had taken the Oath of Allegiance, he proceeds thus: "For the laſt, I know nothing of it; I am ſure neither you, nor any body impower'd to treat or give Indemnity, did give Glenco the Oath; and to take it from any body elſe, after the Day was paſt, did import nothing at all. All that I regret is, that any of the Sort got away, and there is a Neceſſity to proſecute them to the utmoſt." And another from the Hague, the laſt of April, 1692, wherein he ſays, "For the People of Glenco, when you do your Duty in a thing ſo neceſſary to rid the Country of thieving, you need not trouble yourſelf to take the Pains to vindicate yourſelf, by ſhewing all your Orders, which are now put in the Paris Gazette. When you do right, you need fear no body: All that can be ſaid is, that, in the Execution, it was neither ſo full nor ſo fair as might have been." That his Majeſty's Inſtructions, touching the Highland Rebels, did contain a Warrant of Mercy to All, without Exception, who ſhould take the Oath of Allegiance, and come in upon Mercy, tho' the Day prefix'd by the Proclamation was long before elaps'd; and that, therefore, theſe Inſtructions contain'd no Warrant for the Execution of the Glenco Men.

But having gone thus far towards the clearing his Majeſty, they nevertheleſs voted the ſaid Execution to be a Murder, which gave riſe to a Diviſion of Opinions: For a Motion being made to enquire who were the Authors of it, as alſo in what manner they ſhould be proſecuted, it was twice poſtpon'd: Thoſe who thought the beſt End which could be anſwer'd by an Enquiry, namely, to exculpate the King, was already anſwer'd, were for proceeding at once to authenticate their Complement by a ſolemn Addreſs; but thoſe who had ſtill other Ends to anſwer, were for proſecuting that Enquiry, before they proceeded to addreſs: And this proving to be the Senſe of the Majority, they firſt took Dalrymple's Letters into Conſideration, and, agreeable to the Report of the Commiſſioners, having ſtated a Queſtion, whether they did exceed the King's Inſtructions, it was carry'd in the Affirmative.

A Paper ſet forth by Dalrymple's Betters.

But while the Affair was in this Situation, the Preſident inform'd the Parliament, That there was a printed Paper diſpers'd, under the Title of Information for the Maſter of Stair, reflecting upon the Commiſſion for enquiring into the Slaughter of the Glenco Men, and arraigning a Vote of Parliament; and mov'd, That an Enquiry might be made after the Author; as alſo, that both he and it might be cenſur'd. This drew an Acknowledgment from a Brother of Dalrymple's, a Member, That he was the Author, accompany'd with a Declaration, That he intended no Reflection on the Commiſſion, and that the Paper could not poſſibly arraign a Vote of Parliament, becauſe it was writ before the Vote was paſs'd, tho' not publiſh'd till afterwards. But if the Acknowledgment expos'd him to the Reſentment of the Houſe, the Declaration was not thought ſufficient to exempt him from the Conſequences: As to himſelf, he was order'd to aſk his Grace the Commiſſioner and the Parliament Pardon; and as to the Paper, it was voted falſe and calumnious, and enter'd as ſuch in the Minutes. A. D. 1695. Cruſ. Pa.

This little Interruption being thus got over, the Queſtions next ſtated were thoſe that follow, viz. 1. Whether Livingſton had reaſon to give ſuch Orders as were contain'd in his Letters to Hamilton, which was carry'd in the Affirmative, Nem. Con. 2. If from what appear'd to Parliament Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton be free from the Murder of the Glenco Men, and whether there be Ground to proſecute him for the ſame? Upon which it was reſolv'd, That he was not free, and that there was Ground to proſecute him. 3. As to Major Duncanſon, at that time in Flanders, If the King ſhould be addreſs'd either to cauſe him to be examin'd there about the Orders he had receiv'd, or his Knowledge of that Matter, or that he ſhould be order'd home, to be proſecuted therefore, as his Majeſty ſhould think fit; which paſs'd in the Affirmative. And, 4. As to Glenlyon, Captain Drummond, Lieutenant Lindſay, Enſign Lunday, and Serjeant Barber, If it appear'd that the ſaid Perſons were the Actors of the Murder under Truſt; and that his Majeſty be addreſs'd to ſend them home, to be proſecuted for the ſame, according to Law, which alſo paſs'd in the Affirmative.

The drawing up this Addreſs was referr'd to the ſame Committee of Security, which hath already been ſo frequently mention'd: And the Reſidue of the Glenco Men having been encourag'd to petition for ſome Relief from the Diſtreſſes brought upon them by the military Execution they had been ſerv'd with, the ſaid Committee was inſtructed to recommend their Caſe accordingly.

The Matter having been already ſettled, but little Time was requiſite for molding it into form: Accordingly, on the ſecond Day after it was referr'd to the Committee, the Addreſs was reported to the Houſe: Some Amendments were offer'd with relation to Dalrymple, but rejected by the Majority, who were in all Reſpects, and upon all Occaſions, no more than the Echoes of the Committee.

As to the Inſtrument itſelf, having already had a Summary of the Ingredients of which it was compos'd, we need only tranſcribe from it ſuch Gloſſes and Refinements, as the ſaid Committee thought fit to beſtow upon it.

Thus

A. D. 1695 The Address of the Parliament to the King, which was the Rise of the whole Affair.

Thus in the Preamble we find it repreſented to his Majeſty, That they thought it their Duty, for the more ſolemn and public Vindication of the Honour and Juſtice of the Government, to enquire into the barbarous Slaughter committed in Glenco, which had made ſo much Noiſe, both in Scotland and his Majeſty's other Dominions: But that, being inform'd by his Commiſſioner, They were prevented by a Commiſſion under the Great Seal for the ſame Purpoſe, they had unanimouſly acquieſc'd to his Majeſty's Pleaſure, they return'd their moſt humble Acknowledgments for his Royal Care in granting the ſame: And they only deſir'd the Diſcoveries which ſhould be made, might be communicated to them, to the End, that their Zeal in the ſame Proſecution might be added to his Majeſty's: That the Vindication might be national, as the Reproach had been; but principally, That they, from whom it was moſt proper, might teſtify to the World how clear his Majeſty's Juſtice had been in the whole Matter.

The ſecond Paragraph ſets out with an Intimation, That it was not without their repeated Inſtances the Commiſſioner had communicated to them a Copy of the Report, which he had tranſmitted to his Majeſty: And having, in their way, declar'd his Majeſty's Inſtructions contain'd a Warrant for Mercy to all without Exception, and no Warrant for the Execution, agreeable to the Opinion of the Committee, they proceeded in theſe Words, " And here we cannot but acknowledge your Majeſty's ſignal Clemency upon this Occaſion, as well as in the whole Tract of your Government over us: For had your Majeſty, without new Offers of Mercy, given poſitive Orders for the executing the Law upon the Highlanders, that had already deſpis'd your repeated Indemnities, they had but met with what they juſtly deſerv'd."

In the next Place they pronounc'd, in the Words of the Committee, That the Execution of the Glenco Men was a Murder; and that, on comparing his Majeſty's Inſtructions with the Matter of Stair's Letters, it appear'd the ſaid Maſter of Stair had exceeded thoſe Inſtructions, towards the Killing and Deſtruction of the ſaid Men of Glenco:

As, alſo, That Leving ſton had reaſon to give ſuch Orders for cutting off the Glenco Men, upon the Suppoſition they had rejected the Indemnity, and without making them new Offers of Mercy; being a thing in itſelf lawful, which your Majeſty might have order'd, &c.

That Hill was free and clear of the ſaid Slaughter.

That Hamilton (who had diſappear'd, and whom they had order'd to be ſeiz'd wherever he could be found) was not clear, &c.

That Duncanſon being abſent in Flanders, they could not extend their Enquiry to the Orders he had receiv'd from Hamilton: But that it was one Point of their Addreſs to refer his Examination to his Majeſty.

That the Depoſitions of the Witneſſes were clear againſt Campbell of Glenlyon, Drummond, &c. the Actors in the Slaughter.

And, upon the whole, they expreſs'd themſelves in theſe Words, viz. " We humbly beg, That conſidering that the Maſter of Stair's Exceſs in his Letters againſt the Glenco Men has been the original Cauſe of this unhappy Buſineſs, and hath given occaſion, in a great Meaſure, to ſo extraordinary an Execution, by the warm Direction he gives about doing it by way of Surprize; and conſidering the high Station and Truſt he is in, and that he is abſent, we do, therefore, beg, That your Majeſty will give ſuch Orders about him, for Vindication of your Government, as you in your Royal Wiſdom ſhall think fit: And likewiſe conſidering, that the Actors have barbarouſly kill'd Men under Truſt, we humbly deſire your Majeſty will be pleas'd to ſend the Actors home, and to give Orders to your Advocate to proſecute them according to Law; there remaining nothing elſe to be done for the full Vindication of your Government, of ſo foul and ſcandalous an Aſperſion as it has lain under on this Occaſion.

We ſhall only add, That the remaining of the Glenco Men, who eſcap'd the Slaughter, being reduc'd to great Poverty by the Depredation and Vaſtation that was then committed upon them, and having ever ſince liv'd peaceably under your Majeſty's Protection, have now apply'd to us, that we might intercede with your Majeſty that ſome Reperation may be made to them for their Loſſes, we do humbly lay their Caſe before your Majeſty, as worthy of your Royal Charity and Compaſſion, that ſuch Orders may be given for ſupplying them in their Neceſſities, as your Majeſty ſhall think fit."

Some Remarks upon it.

Thus we have before us what the King's Commiſſioners were pleas'd to report, and the Parliament to repreſent, concerning this moſt iniquitous Affair: And now it remains to be conſider'd whether it contains any ſuch Vindication, as the Court-Advocates would have us underſtand it does.

And firſt, as to what is aſſerted concerning the King's Inſtructions, That they contain'd no Warrant for the Execution of the Glenco Men; but a plain Intimation that they could not be ſeparated from the reſt, it rather ſerves to ſhock than convince thoſe that read it: For notwithſtanding the artful Ambiguity of Expreſſion in that Paſſage which relates to them, the obvious Senſe of it is, That if any Pretence could be found to extirpate that Sect of Thieves, they ſhould be extirpated: For if that Paſſage had not been an Exception to the general Warrant of Mercy ſo ridiculouſly glory'd in, if it was his Majeſty's Mind that they could not be ſeperated from the reſt, what Neceſſity, or what Expediency was there for inſerting it at all? But the ſaid Paſſage, by Implication, condemns that very Warrant of Mercy, in preſuming, That a Sacrifice was neceſſary for the Vindication of Juſtice: It was, beſides, preſag'd by the Secretary, That all would not come in, and with that Foreſight he had previouſly appriz'd Leving ſton, That his Powers ſhould be full enough, and that he hop'd the Soldiers would not trouble the Government

A. D. 1695. ment with Prisoners: And in that Letter of his to the said Commander in Chief, in which he acknowledges, That an Account had been receiv'd of Glenco's taking the Oaths at Inverary, with this execrable Addition, "For my Part I could have wish'd the Macdonalds had not divided, and I am sorry that Kippoch and Mackean of Glenco are SAFE," were some Words which seem to indicate, That his Majesty was not so much in the Dark as to the Case of the Glenco Men, or the Nature of the Instruction, as the Historian of his own Times would have us believe: The Words are these, I have been with the King, who says your Instructions shall be dispatch'd on Monday: This Letter was dated January 9. The Instructions were accordingly dispatch'd Monday the 11th; and what is not altogether unworthy Notice, tho' the Commissioners, in their Report, quoted some Passages from the said Letter, they did not think fit to meddle with this, possibly because of the Mention made of his Majesty: For the same Reason also (whatever was suggested in the Report) it may be suppos'd, the Orders from Duncanson to Glenlyon were not produc'd, which ran in the following merciless Stile, "You are hereby order'd to fall upon the Rebels, the Macdonalds of Glenco, and put (e) all to the Sword under Seventy: You are to have special Care that the old Fox, and his Sons, upon no account escape your Hands; you are to secure all the Avenues, that no Man escape: This you are to put into execution at Five o'Clock in the Morning precisely; and by that time, or very shortly after it, I'll strive to be at you with a stronger Party: If I do not come to you at Five, you are not to tarry for me, but to fall on. This is by the King's special Command, for the Good and Safety of the Country, that these Miscreants may be cut off Root and Branch. See that this be put in Execution without Feud or Favour, else you may expect to be treated as not true to the King and Government, nor a Man fit to carry a Commission in the King's Service."

Gall. Red. P. 4. 5.

Then as to the Exceedings charg'd upon Dalrymple, if the Paragraph in the Instructions ought to be understood as an Exception to the general Warrant of Mercy, it will follow, That the said Charge had more of Craft than Candour for its Foundation.

Even to cut off Root and Branch, is but a Paraphrase on the Word extirpate: And from the Blood-hound Impatience which rages thro' the whole Series of the Secretary's Letters, it would have been more rational, perhaps, to have made him answerable for the Paragraph, than for an Excess which even Duncanson himself could scarce be said to be guilty of.

Indeed, whoever gave the Advice, it was not altogether unnatural for a Man who had been much longer a General than a King to embrace it; and instead of extending the Sceptre, to employ the Sword.

But we are not to think it extraordinary, A. D. 1695. That those who made no Scruple to vote that King James had forfaulted the Crown, should now be so tender in commenting upon an Action to every way inexcusable, which had all the Sanctions (except that of the Privy-Council of Scotland) that the Royal Prerogative could give it, when we further reflect, That they observ'd a sort of Management even as to Dalrymple himself: For having voted, That the King gave no Warrant for the Execution, that Dalrymple's Letters exceeded his Majesty's Instructions, that, nevertheless, *Leven*gston might very well understand those Instructions in the restricted Sense which the said Letters had given them, and that the said Excess was the original Cause of this unhappy Business, they immediately soften their Conclusion from these Premisses, by adding, That the said Secretary had, in a great Measure, given occasion to so extraordinary an Execution, by his warm Directions for doing it by way of Surprize; and they submitted both the Crime and Criminal to the good Pleasure of his Majesty.

Now the Words, in a great Measure, imply, that there wants something more to the Completion of this Barbarity, than these warm Directions; and yet, they will not allow us to look for it in the Conduct of *Leven*gston. He, they tell us, was ignorant of the peculiar Circumstances of the Glenco Men, and only gave his Sanction to the Secretary's Orders, as a Matter of Course. But it appears by Dalrymple's Letters, That he could not be wholly ignorant of their Circumstances; because in that of the 9th, which preceded even the first Paper of Instructions, the Secretary informs him, That Glenco had taken the Oaths at Inverary, and how sorry he was for it: And in that of the 30th following, to the same Commander, he adds, I am glad that Glenco did not come in within the time prefix'd, which contain'd an Acknowledgment that he was come in; and if the King's Instructions contain'd a Warrant of Mercy to all, without Exception, who came in, tho' the Time prefix'd by the Proclamation was past, as they are express'd, it did, it will follow, That *Leven*gston partook of Dalrymple's Crimes, and had exceeded his Instructions too.

We come now to Hill's Part in this Transaction; and tho' it should be admitted, that he manag'd artfully enough, in restraining it to the single Circumstance of directing Hamilton, to obey the Orders he had already receiv'd from the Commander in Chief, he was far from being innocent: He was in the whole Secret of Glenco's Behaviour; and as well for the Honour of the Government, as the preventing so black a Tragedy, he ought to have suspended his Obedience, till he had certify'd all he knew to the Regency of Scotland.

On the other Hand, tho' we find it pronounc'd, That Hamilton was not clear of the (e) The like Words were in Hamilton's Orders to Duncanson, tho' omitted in the Report.

A. D. 1695. the Murder, &c. it is plain he was no otherwise guilty than as Dalrymple's Inſtrument; and if there was Ground to proſecute the one for it, there was much more to proſecute the other: But tho' it was thought convenient to make thus free with Hamilton's Character, it does not appear that they had any real Deſign againſt his Perſon: For he made his Appearance before the Commiſſioners, tho' not before the Parliament, and conſequently might have been ſecur'd, if there had been any Purpoſe to make him an Example.

Then as to Duncanſon, Glenlyon, &c. who were the immediate Actors of the Murder, they had Orders upon Orders for their Juſtification; and were only anſwerable for the ſeveral Circumſtances of Perfidy and Cruelty with which they committed it.

Laſtly, tho' in the Preamble of the Parliament-Addreſs, it is ſaid, that the Enquiry was ſet on foot for the more ſolemn and public Vindication of the Honour and Juſtice of the Government, and tho' ſome were ſelected to bear the Guilt of the reſt, not a Man of them was ever call'd to account; but on the contrary, ſeveral of them were preferr'd, and as many of them as thought it worth their while to apply for a Pardon, obtain'd it.

So that upon the whole, we have a right to ſay, that the Honour and Juſtice of the Government were rather expoſ'd than vindicated by this Proceeding: And it is reaſonable to think, that both the Report and even the Addreſs itſelf, (tho' ſo frequently referr'd to by the Creatures of the Court, as an Anſwer in full to all that either has or can be alledg'd againſt it) were conſider'd by the Perſons moſt concern'd, as having a Tendency of the ſame Nature: For they were never ſuffer'd to be made public during the Life of the King: And if any Advantage could have been drawn from publiſhing them, it is out of all doubt they would have been tranſmitted to every Gazette in Europe.

Of a Commiſſion given to the Earl of Braidalbin, to purchaſe the Submiſſion of the Highlanders, mention has more than once been made; as alſo of a Quarrel between him and Glenco, which was ſaid to have been the Occaſion of breaking the Treaty, and to have produc'd the Orders for Glenco's Death.

The ſame Party that was for diſgracing Dalrymple, were alſo for diſgracing Braidalbin, becauſe of his Connection with the Former. Accordingly, while the Commiſſioners were yet upon their Enquiry, they procur'd a Copy of the ſaid Treaty, and laid it before Parliament, together with certain Depoſitions of the Laird of Glengary, and Colonel Hill, amounting to a Charge of High Treaſon againſt his Lordſhip, which Depoſitions are thus explain'd by Biſhop Burnet, viz. That while he was ſo treating with the Highlanders for their Submiſſion, He, Braidalbin, had aſſur'd them, That he ſtill adher'd to King James's Intereſt, and that he preſs'd them to come in, only to preſerve them for his Service till a more favourable Opportunity. Diſcoveries of this and the like Nature were the main of what was laid to his Charge: But the Majority were of Opinion, That it contain'd Matter of High Treaſon, and order'd him to be committed to the Caſtle of Edinburgh: Burnet alſo ſays, That he cover'd himſelf with his Pardon; and that it being prov'd theſe Diſcourſes were ſubſequent to it, he alledg'd, he had ſecret Orders from the King to ſay any thing that would give him Credit with them, which the King, (continued his Lordſhip) own'd ſo far, that he order'd a new Pardon to be paſt for him. A. D. 1695.

But we are not to wonder at his Eſcape; for it is ſaid, he was as ſubtle as a Serpent, and as ſlippery as an Eel: That he had no Attachment of any kind, but to his own Intereſt; that he was not only Jacobite and Williamite by turns, but both at once; and that he play'd this double Part with ſo much Succeſs in the Highland-Treaty, that he receiv'd the Thanks of King James for having preſerv'd his People whom he could not ſuccour, and was rewarded by King William, for having reconcil'd to his Government thoſe Deſperadoes whom he found it ſo difficult to ſubdue. His Character. M. S.

And now having fairly and fully explan'd every material Circumſtance which had any relation to the black Affair we have been treating of, what comes next under conſideration, was the Bait hung out to the Scots, and which they ſo greedily faſten'd upon; namely, a Project for erecting a trading Company on ſuch an extenſive Plan, and with ſuch extenſive Privileges, as in Spite of Situation, and all other Diſadvantages, ſhould enable that People to vie in Wealth with the moſt wealthy of their Neighbours.

Such, at leaſt, were the Boaſt of the Projectors, and ſuch the Expectations it rais'd.

Paterſon (before ſpoken of, as the main Inſtrument in forming and eſtabliſhing the Bank of England, and afterwards of another ſimilar Deſign of making the Orphans Fund a Fund of Credit, tho' not with the ſame Succeſs) was at the Bottom of this Affair; and had engag'd not only ſeveral of thoſe Engliſh Merchants, who had hitherto miſcarry'd in their Endeavours, to ſet up a new Eaſt-India Company, to co-operate with him in it, but the Scotiſh Miniſters, and as many other conſiderable Perſons as were neceſſary to give it all the Countenance and Credit that was neceſſary. Paterſon's Project to eſtabliſh a Colony at Darien.

Of the Miniſters, Mr. Secretary Johnſton was, in virtue of his Office, the firſt to be conſulted, who receiv'd the Overture with more than ordinary Satisfaction; both becauſe of the Glenco-Affair, which was to be expiated, and becauſe of the Difficulty apprehended in prevailing with the Scots Parliament to grant the neceſſary Supplies for maintaining and recruiting their Forces. Eſpous'd by the Miniſters for Purpoſes of their own.

There was, however, a Difficulty in the way which was not eaſy to be ſurmounted: All Grants in relation to the Eaſt-Indies, could not but give Offence, both to the Engliſh and Dutch; and in relation to the Weſt-Indies, to the Spaniards. Now Paterſon's Project had relation to Both: For his Purpoſe was to make one Settlement at Darien, on this Side the Iſthmus of America, and another Difficulties attending it.

A. D. 1695. ther over againſt it, in the South-Sea; by the Means of which he hop'd to have diverted a great Part of the Treaſures of both Indies, thro' that Channel into Scotland: And it is remarkable, that the Hiſtorian of his own Times, in his Narrative of this Tranſaction, after acknowledging, That Paterſon had this double Object in view; and that he deſir'd the Weſt-Indies might be nam'd in the Act, proceeds in theſe Words, "Johnſton told the King, That he heard there was a ſecret Management amongſt the Merchants for an Act in Scotland, under which the Eaſt-India Trade might be ſet up: So he propos'd and drew up an Inſtruction, impowering the Commiſſioner to paſs any Bill, promiſing Letters Patents for encouraging of Trade, yet limited ſo, that it ſhould not interfere with the Trade of England."

Not fully repreſented to the King.

Now, if this was all the Information the King receiv'd concerning the Undertaking he was to authoriſe, it is plain he was not fully or ſufficiently inform'd: Paterſon requir'd the Weſt-Indies to be nam'd in the Act: Johnſton talk'd, it ſeems, only of the Eaſt: It was ſcarce poſſible ſo to reſtrain a Scotch Eaſt-India Company as that it ſhould not interfere with the Engliſh: And it is reaſonable to think, that if the Name of Darien had been mention'd to his Majeſty, he would have been almoſt as cautious in what regarded the Spaniards, as in what regarded the Engliſh and Dutch.

Cautious way of proceeding in it.

But this is certain, that all imaginable Care was taken, that nothing ſhould tranſpire at London, by Authority at leaſt, of the Proceedings of the Scots Parliament in the Affair. It was, indeed, acknowledg'd in the Gazette, That the Preſident, Annandale, had made a Speech to them on the Occaſion of their Meeting; but not the leaſt Hint was ſuffer'd to eſcape of the Particulars: And in all the ſubſequent Articles from Edinburgh, which profeſs to treat of thoſe Proceedings, all that relates to the Eſtabliſhment of the Darien Company, is contain'd in theſe two Paragraphs, viz. 1. "Then (the 12th of June, that is to ſay) they read the Draught of an Act for a general Poll; and an Act was brought in and read for ſettling a Trade in the Weſtern Plantations." 2. "The Parliament met again Yeſterday, (the 21ſt) and paſs'd an Act for ſettling and encouraging a Trade with the Weſtern Plantations."

But what Managements ſoever were obſerv'd with regard to the Public in the Conduct of this Affair, ſome Writers have advanc'd ſuch Things concerning it, as, if true, muſt argue, That the King was, to the full, as deep in the Secret, as any of his Miniſters.

The Project aſcrib'd to Foreigners.

In a Pamphlet, for Example, call'd, Some Conſiderations on the late Act of the Parliament for Scotland, &c. and of which Act the whole Scope and Drift of the ſaid Pamphlet is to demonſtrate the Wiſdom, Juſtice, and Equity, it is aſſerted, P. 4, "That the Original of the Deſign of ſettling a Company of Commerce for Strangers as well as Scotchmen, was not from Scotland nor from hence, but altogether from foreign Parts." As alſo, That he had his Information from good Hands.

A. D. 1695. And the Jacobite avow'd, who writes that ſhrew'd Invective, entitled, A Brief Account of ſome of the Depredations, &c. of the Dutch upon the Engliſh, ſo often quoted, undertakes to unfold this Myſtery, by revealing a Secret committed to his Diſcretion, he ſays, P. 58. 59. not to his Honour or his Conſcience, in a private Converſation, which he does in theſe very Words, namely, "That the Dutch being afraid, That, either thro' the Prince of Orange's Death, or thro' King James's Reſtoration, theſe Nations may be awaken'd to conſider how they have firſt been deluded and miſled, and then wrong'd and injur'd by the Hollanders; and thereupon may be provok'd to demand Reparation, and grow enraged to purſue Revenge, they have therefore ſtudied and concerted how to ſeparate the Kingdoms of England and Scotland the one from the other: And have proceeded ſo far therein, as in either of the foregoing Caſes to have Allowance for it, from William's Dutch Minions and Confidents, which is equivalent to the having it from himſelf. And accordingly they have treated with ſome of the Scotch Nation about it, whom they have not only gratified with Money to make them pliable, but have given them Aſſurance, That there ſhall be three or 400,000 l. ready to bribe and gain the chief and moſt leading Men of that Kingdom to comply with this Deſign, at what time it may be needful for the Dutch to have it put in execution." He then proceeds to ſay, That it was in Purſuance of this Project, that the Scots Company was eſtabliſh'd: The Privileges granted to them being ſuch as the Engliſh would never be induc'd to give way to, nor the Scots to relinquiſh: Conſequently the Intereſt of the two Kingdoms being thus irreconcilably divided, both would be ſo diſtracted at Home, and ſo weaken'd Abroad, that nothing need be apprehended from either.

How far this Account is to be depended upon, muſt be gather'd from the Reaſon and Nature of Things: And in Aid of our Conjectures, it may be proper to add, That, according to the Manuſcript-Authority occaſionally referr'd to in this Work, and which was compos'd by the Command and for the Information of a great Prince, the Government of Scotland, during this Reign, was plac'd in ſuch Hands, and underwent ſuch an Inſpection, that it was next to impoſſible that his Majeſty ſhould be kept in Ignorance of any material Tranſaction paſſing there, or any material Circumſtance relating to it.

To make this evident, it is ſaid, That the Earl of Portland was plac'd at the Head of that Kingdom in effect, tho' not in Name, with a Power almoſt as full and unlimited, as if he had been King himſelf; and his Miniſter in Chief, or Vice-Roy, was Mr. Colſtairs, formerly mention'd in the Reign of King Charles II. for his Concern in the Conſpiracy, ſaid to be forming at that time againſt the Government, by the Malecontents of both Nations.

What he knew concerning it, which was far from anſwering the Expectations of the Court,

A. D. 1695. Court, they tortur'd out of him: And what Bishop Burnet adds to his Account of that Incident, is abundantly more fit to be inserted in this Place, than to be inserted at all by him, who was as much of an Apologist for one Party, as he was an Accuser of the other.

Vol. I. P. 585. His Words are these, "But Carstairs had, at this time, some Secrets of great Consequence from Holland, transmitted to him by Fagel, of which they had no Suspicion; and so they ask'd him no Questions about them: Yet Fagel saw by that, as he himself told me, how faithful Carstairs was, since he could have sav'd himself from Torture, and merited highly, if he had discover'd them: And this was the Foundation of his Favour with the Prince of Orange, and of the great Confidence he put in him to his Death."

Being at last enlarg'd, he retir'd to Holland, where he recommended himself as effectually to the Favourite Bentinck, as before to his Master: The Consequence was, That after the Revolution, he was appointed Chaplain to the King for Scotland; the Revenue of one of the Scottish Bishopricks was assign'd him for his Maintainance; as also 500 l. per Annum for his Attendance on his Majesty in the Field, which he constantly paid every Campaign; and was, on all Occasions, so openly and highly favour'd by him, that he was call'd at Court by the Name of Cardinal Carstairs.

Indeed, so acknowledg'd was his Power, and so absolute his Ascendancy, that few Scotsmen, how great soever, had access to his Majesty, except introduc'd by him; and not a Measure or an Office of any kind was bestow'd or embrac'd, except by his Advice and Recommendation.

Add to all this, that the Ingredients of his Character were altogether as extraordinary as his Credit and Influence: For with the utmost seeming Frankness, he had Reserves which no body could penetrate; and when he had a Purpose, to ruin a Man, his Custom was to lay his very Suspicions to sleep, with an Overflow of Professions and Promises.

And the Direction being thus in the Hands of Persons so closely and firmly attach'd to the King, all the Posts of Consequence being also fill'd with their Creatures, it is but fair to conclude, That if the Government of Scotland in his Time was serv'd by Halves, no Government can ever hope to be serv'd as it ought to be.

We come now to the Act itself, which instead of being call'd an Act for settling a Trade with the Western Plantations, as it had been call'd in the London-Gazette, was said to be, An Act for a Company trading to Africa and the Indies: A Title which also partook of Ambiguity; but which was made sufficiently plain by the Act itself, as may be gather'd from the following Abstracts of the most material Articles, viz.

Abstract of the Act. The King, considering the late Act for encouraging foreign Trade (which receiv'd the Royal Sanction in 1693, and provided, That Merchants might raise Companies for the carrying on Trade to the East and West-Indies, the Mediterranean, Africa, &c. and should have Letters Patents for the same) did Statute, That when Societies or Companies of Merchants should be form'd upon the usual Principles of trading on a joint Stock, his Majesty, with the Advice and Consent of the Estates of Parliament, did allow and approve the same, did give them all Rights, Powers, and Privileges, that by the Laws were given to the Companies of Manufactories; and understanding that several Persons, as well Foreigners as Natives, were willing to engage themselves with great Sums of Money, in an American, African, and Indian Trade, if enabled and encouraged thereto, did constitute John Lord Bellhaven, Adam Cockburn, Lord Justice Clerk, Mr. Francis Montgomery, Sir John Maxwell, Sir Robert Chiesly, John Swinton, George Clarke, Robert Blakewood, and James Balfour, Merchants in Edinburgh, John Corse, Merchant in Glasgow, William Paterson, James Foulis, David Nairn, Thomas Deans, Esqrs. James Chiesly, James Smith, Thomas Coutts, Hugh Frazer, Joseph Cohen d'Azevedo, and Walter Stewart, Merchants of London, and such others as should join with them by the 1st of August, 1696, to be a Body-Corporate, by the Name of the Company of Scotland trading to Africa and the Indies, provided, That half, at least, of the Fund or capital Stock should be advanc'd by Scottish Men; and that no one Person advanc'd less than 100 l. or above 3000 l. Sterling.

His Majesty did moreover authorise and empower the said Company to freight their own or hired Ships, for ten Years, notwithstanding the (Scots) Act of Navigation from any of the Ports or Places of that Kingdom, or from any other Ports or Places in Amity, or not in Hostility with his Majesty, to any Lands, Islands, Countries, or Places in Asia, Africa, or America, and there to plant Colonies, hold Cities, Towns, or Forts, in or upon the Places not inhabited, or in or upon any other Place, by Consent of the Natives or Inhabitants thereof, and not possess'd by any European Sovereign, Potentate, Prince or State, to furnish themselves with Arms, to make use of those Arms in their own Defence; to make Reprizals for Damages, or to negotiate Treaties of Peace with the Proprietors of the Lands so planted and settled, with an exclusive Right against all Persons not of the said Company, provided that all the Ships so freighted by the said Company, should make their Returns to Scotland, on pain of Confiscation, except in case of Necessity.

By other Clauses in the Act it was granted, That the Company should hold their Right in Sovereignty (in consideration of yielding and paying a Hogshead of Tobacco yearly to the Crown, if requir'd) to the Colonies they should plant, and the Settlements they should make, together with all manner of Treasures, Products, and Profits thereof; as also, with the Rights of Government and Admiralty, with Licence to delegate what Rights, Powers, Properties, and Immunities, and

A. D. 1695. and exact what Customs and other Duties they should think expedient. That they might treat for, procure, and purchase such other Rights, Liberties, Privileges, Exemptions, &c. as should be thought of Consequence to their Proceedings, from any foreign Prince or State in Amity with his Majesty, for which the general Treaties of Peace and Commerce betwixt his Majesty and several Princes and States, should serve for sufficient Security. " And if (these are the Words of the Act) contrary to the said Rights, Liberties, Privileges, Exemptions, Grants or Agreements, any of the Ships, Goods, Merchandize, Persons, or other Effects whatsoever, belonging to the said Company, shall be stopt, detain'd, embezzled, or away taken, or in any sort prejudged or damnify'd, his Majesty promises to interpose his Authority to have Restitution, Reparation, and Satisfaction made for the Damage done, and that upon the public Charge, which his Majesty shall cause depurse, and lay out for that Effect."

The Act farther provided, That the Company's Effects, Ships, &c. should be free from all manner of Restraints, Impositions, Taxes, Duties, &c. (except for foreign Sugar and Tobacco) for twenty-one Years; that they might entertain Soldiers; that they should have the Disposition of all their Offices, Civil and Military, and the Command over all Persons in their Service: That all Persons concern'd should be free Denizons of the Kingdom; and that they should be put in immediate Possession of all the said Powers, Privileges, &c. by Letters Patents under the Great Seal.

Such was the Act; what it produc'd we shall see in due Time and Place; and as to the other Acts of the Session that deserve mention, they were as follow, viz. 1. One in favour of such of the episcopal Clergy as should enter into such Engagements to the King as were by Law requir'd, by a Provision, that they should continue in their Benefices under the King's Protection, without being subject to the Power of the Presbytery. " This, says the Historian of his own Time, was carry'd with some Address, before the Presbyterians were aware of the Consequences of it. For it was plainly what they call Erastianism: A Day was limited to the Clergy for taking the Oaths; and by a very zealous and dextrous Management, about (f) Seventy of the best of them were brought to take the Oaths to the King; and so they came within the Protection promis'd by the Act." 2. An Act for raising 9000 Men yearly, to recruit the Scots Regiments in the Service Abroad. And, 3. An Act for erecting a public Bank.

Other Acts of this Session.

The last of these Acts was touch'd with the Sceptre, (which was the Scots Manner of expressing the Royal Assent) on the 17th of July; and then his Grace the Commissioner having first given them Thanks for their ready and hearty Compliance with his Majesty's Demands, and recommended the Preservation of the publick Peace to their Care, adjourn'd the Parliament to the 7th of November following. A. D. 1695.

Of Ireland something still remains to be said, for the Sake, at least, of presenting such an Outline of Government at this Period, as may serve to give a satisfactory Idea of the whole: And upon this Topic it must be own'd, that Bishop Burnet seems to be actuated by that Spirit of Truth and Plainness, which ought to actuate an Historian: His Words are these, " In Ireland the three Lords Justices did not agree long together: The Lord Capel study'd to render himself popular, and espous'd the Interests of the English against the Irish, without any nice Regard to Justice or Equity: He was too easily set on, by those who had their own Ends in it, to do every thing that gain'd him Applause. The other two were Men of severe Tempers, and study'd to protect the Irish when they were oppress'd; nor did they try to make themselves otherwise popular, than by a wise and just Administration: So Lord Capel was highly magnify'd, and they were as much complain'd of by all the English in Ireland. Lord Capel did undertake to manage a Parliament so as to carry all Things, if he was made Lord-Deputy, and had Power given him to place and displace such as he should name. This was agreed to; and a Parliament was held there, after he had made several Removes."

State of Ireland.

Lord Capel, once a Patriot, undertakes to manage a Parliament there.

Now it cannot be forgot, that this very Lord Capel was the very Capel who had distinguish'd himself in the Reign of King Charles II. at the Head of the Exclusionists, and during that whole Course of Opposition, seem'd to be under the Direction of such a Spirit, as Kings and Courts had no Circle to hold, nor Charm to subdue: Yet here we find him represented, by a profess'd Apologist for the Whigs, as a forward Undertaker for the Cabinet in the corrupting of Parliaments; as giving a Party-Bias in all Things to the Motions of the Government; as bidding for Power with an avow'd Purpose to abuse it: And we also find a Whiggish Ministry represented by the same Apologist, as not only lending an Ear to Capel's unjust Proposals, but embracing them, and displacing those two Associates of his who had acted like Men, who regarded their Consciences more than their Commissions, for the Sake of those Jobs which were to be the Price of his Promotion: Nor are we at Liberty to conclude, That the King himself was not a Party in this Concert: A Deputy of Ireland is always nominated in full Council by the King himself: And it is not to be suppos'd, That those who undertook for the Alteration, did not make Merit of the many good Things it was to produce.

On the 26th of May his Excellency received the glad Tidings by an Express from Ireland: And having been recogniz'd in form,

A. D. 1695. form, on the 30th he set forth a Proclamation to ascertain and authorise the Value of foreign Coin by Weight, in order to prevent Exportation: The Rise of Bullion and Specie in England having occasion'd the exporting such great Quantities, as created an Apprehension, That enough would not be left to carry on the Commerce of the Kingdom.

On the 17th arriv'd the Bills from Court, which his Excellency had undertaken for, accompany'd with the necessary Instructions for calling a new Parliament, and making such a new Disposition of Power, as should procure them a safe and easy Passage through the two Houses: The Former of these his Excellency immediately imparted to the Council; and a Faction appearing against them, he almost as soon proceeded to make use of the Latter: For on the 19th following, having strengthen'd his Party by the Admission of the Lord Montrath, Sir John Hanmer, and Richard Aldworth, Esq; to the Council-Board, he caus'd the Writs of Summons to be issued that Evening, and appointed the 27th of August for the Day of meeting: Of the Course of Elections in that Kingdom, there is no need to speak: If the Returns had been made by Prescription, not Choice, they could scarce have been more agreeable: The Commons, when met with general Consent, preferr'd Rochfort, the King's Attorney-General, to the Chair; and having presented him to the Lord-Deputy for his Approbation, his Excellency was pleas'd to open the Session with a Speech, setting forth the Obligations of that Country (or rather the Protestant Part of it) to his Majesty, who, at his own personal Hazard, had restor'd them to their Religion and Estates; requiring them to make him suitable Returns; intimating what those Returns ought to be; and acquainting them, That the Revenue had fallen so far short of the Establishment, that both the Civil and Military Lists were greatly in debt: That it was not without Difficulty, nor even without stopping all manner of Payments, but such as were indispensably necessary, that the Army had been hitherto subsisted: That the Accounts which would be laid before them of the Crown-Debts, would inform them what Supplies were necessary for the Discharge of these Debts, and the Support of the Government: That his Majesty had sent them a Bill for an additional Excise, and expected them to find out such other Ways and Means as would answer the Demands of the Service: That the Money they gave, they might be assur'd should be apply'd to the Uses for which it was given: That the repairing and rebuilding their Churches, was a Tribute due to Almighty God for their late Preservation and Deliverance, and would be one of the best Means they could think of, to preserve the true establish'd Religion, and to provide against future Rebellion: That they would find some of the Bills which had been re-transmitted from England, provided more effectually for their Security, than had ever been done before; "And it will be your Fault, as well as your Misfortune, (preceeded his Excellency) if you neglect to lay hold of the Opportunity now put into your Hands by our great and gracious King, of making such a lasting Settlement, that it may never more be in the Power of your Enemies to bring the like Calamity again upon you, or to put England to that great Expence of Blood and Treasure it hath often been at, for securing this Kingdom to the Crown of England."

Strengthens his Party in the Council, and calls a new Parliament.

His Speech.

A. D. 1695.

In the Irish Parliament Addresses of Thanks were already Matters of Course; and These were follow'd by two Resolutions, the First unanimous, That they would, to the utmost of their Power, stand by and assist his Majesty and his Government against all his Enemies, foreign and domestic: And the Second, To give his Majesty a farther Supply, as well to discharge the Debts of the Crown, as to maintain the present Establishment.

Between the two Votes they had pass'd the Bill for an additional Excise, which is the Reason the Supply in the Second is call'd a farther Supply: And the same Day that the Royal Assent was given to the said Bill, the other Bills alluded to in his Excellency's Speech were also pass'd into Laws, namely, An Act for taking away the Writs de Haretico Comburendo: An Act declaring all Attainders, and all other Acts in the late pretended Parliament, (that held by King James, that is to say) to be void: An Act to restrain foreign Education: An Act for the better securing the Government by disarming Papists: And an Act for the better settling Intestates Estates.

Acts pass'd.

By the 6th of September all this Business was dispatch'd; and on the 9th following they resolv'd, Nem. Con. That a Sum not exceeding 163,325*l.* be given to his Majesty. But tho' they were unanimous in the Grant, they were not so as to the Ways and Means of making it good. At last, however, they agreed on a Poll Bill, as also on certain additional Customs: And because the Product of Both was not likely to answer in full the Expectations of the Courtiers, they also agreed to continue the additional Excise till Christmas, 1698.

Thus far the Projects of the new Deputy had been successful enough: "But this good Temper, says the Historian of his own Times, was quickly lost by the Heat of some who had great Credit with Lord Capel. Complaints were made of Sir Charles Porter, the Lord Chancellor, who was beginning to set on foot a Tory-Humour in Ireland, whereas it was certainly the Interest of the Government to have no other Division among them but that of English and Irish, and of Protestant and Papist: Lord Capel's Party mov'd in the House of Commons, that Porter should be impeach'd: But the Grounds upon which this Motion was made, appear'd to be so frivolous, after the Chancellor was heard by the House of Commons in his own Justification, that he was voted clear from all Imputation by a Majority of two to one. This set the Lord-Deputy and the Lord-Chancellor, with all the Friends of both, at Faction form'd.

A. D. 1695. so great a Diſtance from each other, that it put a full Stop for ſome time to all Buſineſs."

Theſe are the Hiſtorians own Words; and the plain Engliſh of them ſeems to be, That the Chancellor having been joſtled by the new Deputy out of all Confidence at Court, took Advantage of the over-violent Spirit diſcover'd by his Excellency againſt the native Iriſh, to ſet up for Popularity, by eſpouſing their Cauſe, and contending for more moderate Meaſures: And as to the Stop put to all Buſineſs, the Pretence aſſign'd for it, was the Deſire of both Houſes to adjourn, till the Bills tranſmitted to England ſhould be ſent back, with a Signification of the Royal Pleaſure thereon: It was certain both Houſes did make ſuch a Requeſt, and were permitted to adjourn accordingly, for the Time ſpecify'd by the Biſhop: As alſo, that the Acquital of the Chancellor did not ſo far impair the Credit of the Deputy with the Commons, but that they were prevail'd upon, at the End of the Seſſion, to ſend over an Addreſs of Complement to his Majeſty, for the Sake of gratifying his Subſtitute with the following Teſtimonial of his good Behaviour: "And we muſt ever acknowledge to your Majeſty the great Benefit we do and our Poſterity ſhall receive by thoſe ineſtimable Laws, given us by your Majeſty in this Seſſion of Parliament, held under your Majeſty's Deputy and our excellent Governor the Lord Capel, whereby not only our Religion and legal Rights are confirm'd to us, but this your Majeſty's Kingdom of Ireland is firmly ſecur'd to the Imperial Crown of England."

Complements to the Deputy at the End of the Seſſion.

And as if this was not enough to countenance his Excellency and his Creatures under their late Defeat, the Speaker of the Commons, on preſenting the Bills for continuing the Exciſe, took occaſion to expreſs himſelf in the Name of the Houſe as follows: "We are truly ſenſible of the Happineſs and Benefits we reap under his Majeſty's Government, among which (pardon me SIR) I crave Leave to enumerate that of your Excellency's being placed over us: Your Fidelity to the Crown is unqueſtionable; and we muſt own, that under your Adminiſtration, we enjoy the Rights of Engliſh Subjects: Our Church, as by Law eſtabliſh'd, is ſafe, our Liberties and Properties ſecure: And you, SIR, have made a conſiderable Progreſs towards the accompliſhing what was ſo honourably deſign'd by your noble Brother [the Earl of Eſſex] for the Preſervation and Advancement of the Proteſtant Intereſt in this Kingdom, of which this Age enjoys the happy Beginnings; and for which Poſterity will have Reaſon to celebrate your Memory."

But which ſoever of the Parties were moſt in the Right, or beſt deſerv'd the Favour of the Public, the Author laſt quoted takes occaſion from this Diſpute in Ireland, to make this general Remark on the general State of Things, and his Majeſty's Conduct in relation to it, viz. "Thus Factions were form'd in all the King's Dominions; and he being, for ſo much of the Year, at a great Diſtance from the Scene, there was no Pains taken to quiet theſe, and to check the Animoſities which aroſe out of them: The King ſtudy'd only to ballance them, and to keep up among the Parties a Jealouſy of one another, that ſo he might oblige them all to depend more entirely on himſelf."

A. D. 1695. A general Remark of B. Burnet.

And now it is time to wait upon his Majeſty to Holland; and from thence to that fatal Theatre, which, his Enemies would make us believe, was ſtill kept open, that he might act a principal Part in the Tragedy of Europe.

Foreign Affairs.

France had ſtill continued to negotiate, if not ſolicite, a Peace thro' the ſeveral Channels of Sweden and Denmark: And when appris'd thro' the Former, by the Imperial Court, That no Treaty would be open'd, unleſs with the joint Participation of every one of the confederated Powers; and that no Peace would be accepted, which did not contain an Acknowledgment of the King of England then reigning: M. d'Avaux was authoris'd to reply, in the King his Maſter's Name, That his Majeſty did not propoſe any Treaty but a general one; and that in caſe the Affair of England was not ſettled to the Satisfaction of the Prince of Orange, the whole Negotiation ſhould be void.

Declaration of France concerning Peace.

Actes & Mem. des Nég. de la Paix de Ryſwick, Tom. I.

This Declaration had been made at Stockholm in January, and conſequently time enough to have given the Operations of the Year a pacific Biaſs, in caſe the Principal of the Confederates had been ſo diſpos'd. But as France had been reduc'd to act chiefly on the Defenſive during the laſt Campaign, it was believ'd ſhe would ſcarce be able to defend herſelf any longer: For the People were as loud in their Complaints, as the Court were unmerciful in their Impoſitions. Francis de Montmorency, Duke of Luxemburgh, their military Saviour and Protector was now no (g) more; and the King had publicly declar'd, That a greater Loſs could not have befallen him. Among all the French Generals, there was none eſteem'd ſufficiently accompliſh'd to ſupply his Loſs; and ſo much the nearer an Equality they ſeem'd to be in point of Merit, ſo much the more difficult it was to give the Preference to any one of them.

Death of M. de Luxemburgh.

The Choice, at laſt, fell on the Marſhal Duke de Villeroy, for the chief Command; and M. de Boufflers was appointed to command a ſeperate Army, but ſo as to be ſubject to the Orders of M. de Villeroy. According to M. de Fouquieres, the King was directed in this Choice by his own Judgment only; but then he alſo declares, that his Judgment miſled him ſo egregiouſly in it, that it had like to have been the Ruin of France.

M. de Villeroy appointed Commander in Chief.

He

(g) He died of a Pluriſy at Verſailles, January 4, N. S. in the Sixty-ſeventh Year of his Age; and left behind him ſo dazzling a Character, as a Soldier and a General, that his private Vices were forgiven, and the habitual Barbarity of his public Life was forgot.

A. D. 1695. But order'd to act in the Defensive.

He adds, however, that his Majesty did not extend his Confidence in Villeroy so far, as to entrust him with a discretionary Power: On the contrary, apprehending that the Confederates would have the Superiority, and that their General in Chief would endeavour to retrieve his Character, at the Expence of his new Opponent, he restrain'd his Commission to the Defensive only; in conformity to which, a new Line was drawn from Courtray to Avalghem, between the Lys and the Schelde; and a Disposition was made to cover Dunkirk, Ipres, Tournay, and Namur, upon one of which Places it was expected the Storm would fall.

It was the 26th of May, N. S. that M. de Villeroy arriv'd at Valenciennes, with the final Orders of his Master for the opening of the Campaign; and on the 3d of June following, his Majesty of England took the Field: But before we trace the Progress of the War on this Side, it may not be improper to dispatch those other Branches of it, which, tho' so widely spread, and seemingly so unconnected, were nevertheless united at the Root, and were cultivated on the same Principles.

We have already seen, that as it was the greatest Endeavour of the maritime Powers to mediate a Peace between the Sultan and the Emperor, that his Imperial Majesty might be at liberty to turn his whole Force against France, so it was equally the Endeavour of France to keep the Breach open: And that, under so long a Series of ill Success, and with the Cry of the Populace against it, the French Ministers found Means to keep the Divan, and all the several Factions that in turn presided in it, in a Humour to reject the good Offices of the Mediators, must argue, That they were very lucky in their Negotiations, or very profuse in their Purchases.

Lord Paget, Embassador from England, arriv'd at Adrianople in the Beginning of February, full charg'd with Instructions relating to Peace: But before it was possible for him to obtain the Favour of an Audience, the Grand Signor (Achmet) dy'd; and Mustapha, his Nephew, eldest Son of Mahomet IV. was declar'd Emperor in his stead; who began his Reign with a Declaration, That his Purpose was to take the Field in Person; and by a course of wise Councils, and vigorous Measures, both to recover the Glory of the Ottoman Throne, and to be aveng'd on the Enemies of the Ottoman Empire. He did not, however, at first, make any material Alterations in his Ministry; but having learn'd that the Grand Vizier, and others of his Court, had shewn some Inclination to raise the Son of the late Sultan Ibrahim to the Throne, he remov'd them all from their Places, confiscated their Effects, and distributed his Favour, Trust, and Power entirely amongst those who were, or seem'd to be, entirely at his Devotion.

The Sultan dies, and his Successor resolves to take the Field in Person.

Thus all Hope of Peace was at an End on that Side: And that the new Sultan might be sensible how useful an Ally he had in his Most Christian Majesty, the French Ministers took sufficient Care to keep alive the Animosities which rag'd among the Polish Grandees, and the Factions in the Polish Church: For so much the less the Tartars had to apprehend from the Poles, so much the more serviceable they could be to the Turks in Transilvania or Hungary.

A. D. 1695.

His Polish Majesty did, indeed, summon a Diet; but then it was compos'd of such as seem'd more intent on cutting one another's Throats, than to provide either for the Honour or Interest of their Country: Such, indeed, was the Fury of the two Parties, that even before they could proceed to the Election of a Marshal, Sabres were drawn, Wounds were given, and all imaginable Violences committed: So that the whole Time being wasted in Broils, which by the Polish Constitution for the Dispatch of the public Business, the Assembly was dissolv'd in Confusion: And tho' the King persisted in his Resolution of not accepting a seperate Peace, and made a Shew of providing for the Support of the Army, by such other Expedients as were within the Grasp of his Prerogative, the Tartars reliev'd Caminiec in the very Beginning of the Year, and afterwards made an Incursion into Poland, as far as Leopold, under the Walls of which Place they attack'd the Crown-General, with an Army of 70,000 Men; which, if the Polish Accounts are to be depended upon, he had the Honour to repulse in thirteen several Attacks, tho' he had no more than 3000 under his Command.

Polish Diet again breaks up in Confusion.

But if the Fact was altogether equal to the Representation, it produc'd no Consequences: The Poles continued as much divided as before; the Year pass'd over like the last, without any Attempt to countenance a State of Hostility: And it is surmis'd, that even the King himself was in part chargeable with this shameful Inactivity: For his Queen was wholly in the Interest of France; she had a good deal of Power over him; the Abbe de Polignac, the French Resident at Warsaw, had almost as much over her: And as the Most Christian King was pleas'd to make the two Sons of his Polish Majesty Knights of the Holy-Ghost this Year, it can scarce be suppos'd that the Complement was not properly acknowledg'd.

This Inactivity on the Side of Poland was, however, in part made up by a Power which, as yet, had scarce been esteem'd of any Figure or Consequence in the System of Europe: For the Czar Peter, on the Death of his Brother becoming sole Monarch of Russia, and being ambitious of procuring himself a Name in Arms, and of obtaining that Consideration among the Potentates he was surrounded with, which he thought was within his Reach, laid hold on the Opportunity presented to him by the Hungarian War, to invade the Crimea; where meeting with little or no Interruption, he laid Siege to Asoph: And tho' he did not carry it this Year, he carried several Forts, which serv'd as Outworks to it; and found so much Employment for the Tartars, that they could not send such and besieges Asoph, &c.

A. D. 1695. Assistance to the Turks on the Side of Transylvania and Hungary, as the Sultan requir'd of them.

Burnet insinuates, that it was in consequence of a Treaty with his Imperial Majesty, that the Czar went upon this Expedition: But if the current Advices of the Times are to be rely'd upon, it was a Measure of his own, which he did not so much as impart to the Powers at War, till he was actually embark'd in the Execution of it.

Indeed, if such was really the Case, it can never be sufficiently wonder'd at: For no Incident so favourable to the common Cause, could have fallen out on that Side of the World; and on the other, there is scarce a Circumstance to be trac'd in the subsequent Transactions in the Year, that will warrant the Belief of any such Concert, as, in case of such a Treaty, it is natural to think must have been establish'd among the several Adventurers, who, at this Period, had the same Point in View; that is to say, of aggrandizing themselves by the Spoil of the Turkish Empire.

As the Poles were disabled by their own Dissensions and Corruptions, the Imperial Ministers had more Business on their Hands than they had Means to manage, even by the Assistance of Spain, the Maritime Powers, and the Contributions they rais'd in Italy; and, as usual, lost that Time in Preparation, which should have been employ'd in Action.

Dilatory Proceedings of the Court of Vienna.

One of their great Points was to induce the Elector of Saxony to accept the Command in Hungary, that for the Sake of his own Glory, he might contribute so much the more to the Service; and he did accept it accordingly; the Terms being settled by a formal Convention, in which, among other Things, it was provided, That he should be invested with the same Power and Authority as had been given to the Elector of Bavaria: That his Electoral Highness should repair to Vienna, to receive his Instructions: That his own Contingent of Troops (which was to consist of 8000 Men) should be accommodated both in the Field and in Quarters, in the same Manner as the Imperialists: That he should be furnish'd with the like Sums for Recruits: That he should not be oblig'd to send any Forces to the Rhine: And that His Imperial Majesty should endeavour to obtain of the Maritime Powers an Augmentation of the Subsidies they were already oblig'd by Treaty to furnish him with.

Now whether the Maritime Powers were not in a Humour to be practis'd upon by these Endeavours of his Imperial Majesty, or what other Difficulties remain'd to be surmounted, his Electoral Highness did not repair to Vienna till the 15th of June: General Caprara, who was to have the Command under him, did not set out for Hungary till the 21st of July: On the 25th the Saxon Infantry, who had been suffer'd to halt a few Days at Vienna, by way of Refreshment, embark'd on the Danube for Hungary, and did not reach the Camp till the 14th of August: The Elector himself arriv'd but four Days before: And tho' the Brandenburghers had join'd the Army on the First, a Body of Danish Auxiliaries were still upon their March, and did not come up till after the Saxons.

A. D. 1695.

The Grand Signor and Grand Vizier, by this Time, had not only taken the Field, but were in a Condition to act offensively. According to their first Motions, it was apprehended they design'd to lay Siege to Peter-Waradin: But while a Detachment of Imperialists were filling up the Retrenchments which they had made before that Place the preceding Year, Advice came, That they had thrown two Bridges over the Danube, between Visovize and Bonzova; and that part of their Forces had actually pass'd the River. This creating an Apprehension, That their Design was upon Transylvania, Orders were sent to General Veterani, who commanded in that Province a strong Body of Horse and Dragoons, to observe their Motions: And when it was confirm'd, That the whole Ottoman Army had pass'd the Danube, it was resolv'd at a Council of War to decamp, and hold such a Course as should enable them both to secure Lippa, and hold the Enemy in check, till they could join Veterani; who by another Express was not only appris'd both of the Enemies Motions and theirs, but directed to make his own Dispositions accordingly. But the direct Road to Lippa being found impracticable, by reason of Morasses, Defiles, &c. so much Time was lost in passing and re-passing the Theysse, that the Ottomans got before that Place on the 7th, and attacking it immediately with their whole Force, at four Places at once, carry'd it Sword in Hand, tho' not without considerable Loss, and put the Garrison, which consisted of 1500 Men, to the Sword.

The Turks pass the Save.

past the Danube.

Form Lippa,

Taking Advantage also of the Absence of the Imperial Army, a little Fleet of armed Barks was dispatch'd about the same time from Belgrade to Titul, which they also car- and Titul, ry'd, demolish'd, and abandon'd.

On the 16th, while the Elector was still on his March towards the Enemy, he receiv'd Advice of this last Misfortune; as also, That the Sultan being inform'd of his Approach, in order to give him Battle, had alter'd his Measures: For, instead of garrisoning Lippa, as he had at first design'd, he caus'd it to be burn'd; and that having order'd a large Detachment to proceed towards Transylvania, he was on the Point of returning towards Temeswaer.

This gave occasion to the holding another Council; and it being esteem'd equally dangerous to leave General Veterani without Succour, or Hungary expos'd to the Attempts of the Sultan, it was resolv'd, That the two Generals, with the Imperial Cavalry, should continue their March towards Transylvania, and that the Foot, with the Brandenburg and Saxon Cavalry, should return towards the Danube.

On the 20th this Measure was put in Execution; and on the 26th, when they had advanc'd as far as Geno, they receiv'd Intelligence, by Express, That on the 21st the

A. D. 1695. the Turks had attack'd General Veterani in his Camp near Lugos: That tho' they were 40,000 ſtrong, and his whole Force did not exceed 6500, he had defended himſelf, and repulſed the Enemy, from Morning till Evening: That being then over-power'd, and himſelf mortally wounded, they forc'd his Camp: That his Infantry, which did not exceed 900 Men, having, nevertheleſs, made a ſort of Fortification of their Baggage, deſperately maintain'd their Ground, till they were moſt of them cut to Pieces upon the Spot: That the Horſe had, by this Means, time to rally, and having rally'd accordingly, made an orderly Retreat to Caranſebes: And that General Truchſes, on whom the Command devolv'd on the Death of Veterani, having ſtrengthen'd himſelf with the Garriſon of that Place, had taken Poſt near the Iron Gate, in order to defend that Paſs; where he remain'd expecting Orders.

and forces the Camp of General Veterani, who is ſlain.

So much the more affecting this Intelligence was, the greater the Neceſſity appear'd of proſecuting their March with all poſſible Expedition: But ſuch was the Inclemency of the Weather, and the Difficulty of the Ways, that it was the 3d of October before they reach'd Deva in Tranſilvania: And then they had the Satisfaction to find, That the Enemy, either ſatisfy'd with their Succeſs at Lugos, or afraid to run the Hazard of a ſecond Venture, inſtead of advancing farther, had caus'd Caranſebes, which the Imperialiſts had abandon'd, to be demoliſh'd, and were retir'd towards Orſowa.

Thus, inſtead of being forc'd to accept of a diſhonourable and deſtructive Peace, by the Superiority of his Enemies, the new Sultan had the Glory not only of holding them at Bay, but of claiming the Superiority over them, and thereby opening to his Subjects, a Proſpect of carrying on the War more advantageouſly for the future.

There appear'd alſo more of Wiſdom in his Conduct, than in that of his immediate Predeceſſors: For he had practis'd on the Venetians, in the Beginning of the Year, the ſame kind of Artifice which ſucceeded ſo well, a ſecond time, with the Imperialiſts in Hungary. By making a Feint to beſiege Peter-Waradin, he was enabled to reduce Lippa, and cut off Veterani: And by pretending to give over, or at leaſt to ſuſpend all Thoughts of recovering Scio, he lull'd the Venetian Commanders into ſuch a State of Security, that he obtain'd a ſignal Advantage over them; in manner thus: Signor Zeno, who commanded for the Republic in Scio, depending on the Advices he had receiv'd, order'd a general Careen, with an Exception to five Ships, which were thought ſufficient for the Defence of the Coaſt: But while they lay in this unprepar'd Condition, the Van of the Ottoman Fleet, which conſiſted of twenty Men of War, beſides Gallies, Fire-ſhips, &c. was deſcry'd in the Channel of Scio, bearing down upon them with a fair Wind, having their Fireſhips in front, ready to let looſe Deſtruction amongſt them; and no better Expedient could be thought of in the preſent Extremity, than to expoſe the five Guard-ſhips, in order to ſave the reſt: Accordingly, they ſtood out to Sea, and engag'd the whole Turkiſh Fleet, which ſurrounded them on all Sides; and after an obſtinate Reſiſtance, burnt two, ſunk one, and ſo ſhatter'd the other two, that it was with the utmoſt Difficulty they made their way thro' the Enemy, and recover'd the Port.

They ſurpriſe the Venetian Fleet at Scio.

A. D. 1695. and deſtroy ſeveral Ships.

It was owing, however, to this deſperate Effort, that the Reſidue of the Fleet was ſav'd: For the Turks ſuffer'd ſo much in it, and the Venetians made ſo good a Uſe of the Time it laſted, that they got their Fleet into fighting Order, and the next Day fell in with the Enemy near the Caſtle of Crim?: Another Engagement enſued, which was very bloody, tho' it laſted but two Hours; and tho' the Venetians clam'd the Victory, the Event ſeems to indicate, that their Title to it was not over clear: For tho' it ſhould be acknowledg'd that the Turks loſt a few Gallies, and ſome thouſands of Soldiers and Seamen; as alſo, that they ſent their diſabled Ships to Smyrna, the Venetians, who had juſt before the Engagement given out, That they not only hop'd to maintain all the Conqueſts they had made, but alſo to make more, reſolv'd to abandon Scio, and did abandon it accordingly: Pretending that it was not for fear of the Enemy, but for fear of being ſtarv'd; which appears ſtrange enough, when we reflect, That when they firſt got Poſſeſſion of the Iſland, they talk'd of nothing leſs than ſtarving Conſtantinople.

The Venetians abandon Scio.

It is certain General Zeno, together with his Command, loſt the Eſteem and Affection both of Senate and People on this Occaſion; and on his return to Venice, was committed to Priſon, under a Suſpicion, That the French had brib'd him to betray the Honour and Intereſt of his Country.

From Scio the Fleet, Tranſports, and Troops return'd to Napoli-di-Romania; and ſoon after a grand Convoy of Proviſions, Recruits and Money arriv'd there, for the Service of the Campaign. The Turks had given out they would make a new Attempt on Ciclut, in Dalmatia: But while General Delfino was preparing to give them a proper Reception, it appear'd that their true Deſign was on the Morea, which the Baſhaw of Negropont invaded with an Army of near 20,000 Men, in hope not only to penetrate as far as Napoli-di-Romania, but to carry that Place in the Abſence of the Venetian Fleet, which was ſail'd to the Gulph of Egina, in order to give the Enemy a Diverſion. But the new Captain-General (Molino) having receiv'd Intelligence of their Purpoſe, return'd time enough to reinforce General Stenian, who had the Command in thoſe Parts, with ſuch a Body of Troops, as enabled him to go in queſt of the Enemy, whom he came up with on the 10th of June, in the Neighbourhood of Argos, and after a warm Engagement of ſeveral Hours, oblig'd them to retire with ſo much Precipitation, that they left their Cannon, Tents, and Baggage behind them.

The Turks defeated in the Morea.

Both Sides, however, ſuffer'd ſo much, that neither made any new Attempt by Land

A. D. 1695 during the Reſidue of the Campaign: And tho' the two Fleets were twice engag'd, and the laſt time for ſeveral Hours, nothing deciſive happen'd. The Venetians had, indeed, the Name of a Victory, but it appears to have coſt them more that it was worth: For tho' it is ſaid that the Enemy had three Ships ſunk, and four diſabled, the Victors, inſtead of perſuing the Enemy, found it adviſable to retire the next Day towards Napoli-di-Romania, and to lay up their Fleet till another Year.

Another Sea Fight, in which the Venetians have the Advantage.

A ſecret Intercourſe between France and Savoy.

As it was the Intereſt of the Maritime Powers to labour a Peace between the Courts of Vienna and Conſtantinople, that the Former might be at Leiſure to turn their whole Force againſt France, ſo it was equally the Intereſt of France to divide Savoy, if poſſible, from the Confederates, that ſhe might be ſo much the more able to take Advantage of the Weakneſs of Spain on the one hand, and the Dilatorineſs and Diſagreements of the Germans on the other. But what the Maritime Powers had not addreſs enough to effect at the Port; France, on the Side of Italy, had never any Reaſon to deſpair of: For his Royal Highneſs had all along kept an Ear open to her Overtures; and without ſuppoſing that he was greatly influenc'd by them, or by the Douceurs which from time to time accompany'd them, it is utterly impoſſible to account for his Conduct.

Promoted by the Pope and Princes of Italy.

The Pope, and ſuch of the Princes of Italy who had ſmarted under the Exactions of the Imperialiſts, were, at once, as eager as France for a Peace, and as uneaſy as the Confederates, at ſeeing the War conducted in ſuch a way as ſerv'd only to prolong it. Had the great Purpoſe of the Confederates, which was to make France itſelf the Stage of Action, been anſwer'd, they had not been liable to the Demands which they were now forc'd to comply with; and which, from the whole Courſe of the Duke of Savoy's Proceedings, and the known Drift of his Politics, they knew nothing but a Peace could deliver them from.

When, therefore, the French Emiſſaries renewed their Applications to them, to take a Part in the Quarrel which had proved ſo injurious to them, they conſtantly directed them to buy off the Duke of Savoy, as the moſt reaſonable and practicable Expedient; and for themſelves, they would be perſuaded to undertake no farther than to uſe their good Offices in promoting the Bargain, and ſoftening the Terms.

On all Sides the Management was kept a profound Secret: For the Duke, whoſe Intention was to make the moſt of his old Friends before he abandon'd them, would not hear of a Negotiation except on that Footing; as well knowing, that the Moment his Services became precarious, their Subſidies would become the ſame; and that the leſs Hold he had on them, the lower he ſhould render his own Market.

As, therefore, Matters were not as yet ripe for an Explanation, his Buſineſs was, ſo to balance his Conduct during the Campaign between his Engagements and his Intentions, that he might neither defeat the one, nor forfeit the other. A. D. 1695

Accordingly his Miniſters at all the Courts of the Allies, rather enlarg'd the Expreſſions of their Maſter's Zeal and Cordiality for the common Cauſe than otherwiſe: And at all Councils of War, he himſelf, as well as his Generals, cover'd their Backwardneſs to engage in any Enterprize of Moment, with ſuch Pleas and Refinements, as became the Subtilty of Italian Wit: And which, tho' they did not ſatisfy thoſe to whom they were addreſs'd, were yet of Force enough to obviate all open Cauſe of Complaint.

His own Project was to open the Campaign with the Siege of Caſal, which had been long held in Blockade: And tho' it was not approv'd either in England or in Holland, (where it was foreſeen, That it would be the Buſineſs of the Summer, and conſequently in caſe the French did not think it worth their while to relieve it, would leave them at Liberty to make a better Uſe of their Forces) it was nevertheleſs admitted, and the neceſſary Proviſions were made accordingly: But ſo ſlowly on the Part of his Royal Highneſs, under ſuch frequent Interruptions and Procraſtinations, that the Place was not formally beſieg'd till the 26th of May, N. S. And yet, tho' the French had render'd it one of the ſtrongeſt Places in Europe, and the Garriſon were abundantly ſupply'd with all manner of Proviſions, it was ſurrender'd by Capitulation on the 9th of June following; to the inexpreſſible Surprize of all the confederate Powers, except the Duke himſelf, who had proceeded on much better Grounds of Aſſurance, than are, in general, the Warrant of ſuch Undertakings.

The Surrender of Caſal one of the Fruits of it.

The Place belong'd, of right, to the Duke of Mantua; and while the Siege was depending, the Reſident of that Prince at Vienna was importunate with the Imperial Court, that in caſe it was reduc'd, it might be reſtor'd to his Maſter. Over Cunning ſometimes operates like Folly: The Stiffneſs of the Duke in confining the Operations of the Campaign to the Reduction of that Place, join'd to theſe Importunities of the Mantuan Miniſter, concerning the Diſpoſal of it when it ſhould be won, confirm'd the Suſpicions which had been entertain'd of his Royal Highneſs during the Courſe of the War: But the Articles of Capitulation were of ſuch a Nature, as might have put the Matter out of Diſpute: For they were ſuch as, in a Manner, demoniſtrated a Pre-concert: The Fortifications of the Town, Citadel, &c. were to be demoliſh'd; the Out-works at the Charge of the Allies, and all the reſt by the French, except the Town-wall, which was left rather as a Boundary than a Means of Defence: The Garriſon was to remain in the Place till the Demolition ſhould be completed; and his Royal Highneſs was to have Poſſeſſion of the Out-works: A Proviſion was made for reſtoring it to the Duke of Mantua: And, laſtly, Hoſtages were exchang'd by way of reciprocal Security on both Sides.

Terms of Capitulation, and ſecret Article of Pre-concert.

A. D. 1695.

Bishop Burnet adds, That a Truce was also agreed to, which was to last as long as the Business of dismantling lasted: And if that was the Case, it is no wonder that the two Parties, who began to understand one another so well, did their best to prolong it, till they had tir'd themselves as well as the Public with Promises and Disappointments.

In short, it was the 18th of September before the French quitted the Place; and the two Armies not only continued quiet in their Quarters all the while, but his Royal Highness was once more attack'd by his Ague, which furnish'd him with a Pretence for absenting himself from the Army, during the Residue of the Campaign.

Proceedings of the united Fleet.

As it is impossible to forget that England had a royal Fleet, under the Command of Admiral Russel, lying in the Port of Cadiz all the Winter long, in order to be ready for the Mediterranean Service, as soon as the Season of Action came on, so it is scarce conceivable, that such an expensive Measure should be entertain'd, merely for the Sake of confining the Fleet of France within the Harbour of Toulon, without any provisional Concert with the Courts of Spain and Savoy, for acting offensively against the Enemy; or for such a Correspondence of Action as might render the Attempts to be made in Catalonia and Piedmont interchangeably subservient to each other.

And yet such will appear to be the Case: For as his Royal Highness of Savoy thought only of amusing the Confederates by the Siege of Casal, so the Court of Madrid bestow'd their chief Attention on putting a Stop to the Progress of the French in Catalonia.

Russel made Captain-General, and furnish'd with 4500 Land Forces.

Russel, indeed, had a very extraordinary Commission bestowed upon him, namely, that of Admiral, Chief Commander, and Captain-General of all his Majesty's Ships employ'd, or to be employ'd, both in the Narrow Seas and Mediterranean; and it may be supposs'd, that this Commission was accompany'd with as extraordinary Powers: He was also furnish'd, some time after, with a Body of Land Forces, amounting to 4500 Men, which were to serve on Shore as Auxiliaries occasionally, under the Command of Brigadier General Stewart: And the Emperor was induc'd, no doubt, for a valuable Consideration, to suffer a Body of his Troops to be draughted from Italy for the Defence of Catalonia, to which the Spaniards were to join 2000 from Naples, and as many more from the Milanese as would make up the whole Detachment 7000 Men.

But the more Assistance they receiv'd, the more they requir'd. Thus instead of preparing their Fleet either to join the Allies, or to cover the Embarkation of these Troops, which was to be made from Final, they did not so much as careen a single Ship; and his Catholic Majesty, by Letter, requir'd Mr. Russel to provide both Transports and Convoys for the said Embarkation.

Requir'd of the King of Spain to furnish Transports,

On what Ground this Requisition was made, it is utterly impossible to explain: That there was no public Article to warrant it in any of the Treaties subsisting between the two Crowns, may be taken for granted; and therefore, that the Admiral had any Instructions to authorise his Compliance, is scarce to be suppos'd.

A. D. 1695.

The Conduct he observ'd upon it, was, however, of the middle Kind: For having given his Catholic Majesty to understand, That Men of War were not fit for such a Service, he recommended the hiring a sufficient Number of Transports at Genoa, and in such case engag'd to furnish a proper Convoy, provided he might be inform'd precisely of the Time the Troops would be in readiness to embark; and that the Secret might be kept in such a manner, as might secure them from any Interruption from the Enemy.

which he complies with in part.

The Spanish Ministers, however, adher'd to the main of their Point; for having undertook to embark 2000 from Naples, they again call'd upon the Admiral to undertake for the rest: And the Governor of Cadiz, thro' whose Hands the Negotiation past, having maintain'd, That Genoa was not the fittest Place to hire Transports, the Admiral offer'd to assist in providing Transports at Cadiz, and to furnish a Convoy, altho' even that would greatly obstruct his Measures.

This last Temperament was accepted: The hiring of Transports at Cadiz became a joint Measure; but not being perfected by the time perfix'd, they were kept in Pay, till the whole Fleet was ready to sail, which was not till the 8th of May; tho' Admiral Nevil was detach'd, in the mean while, with a strong Squadron to prevent the French from passing the Streights, in case they had thought fit to make any such Attempt.

But they had no such Thoughts: Two of their Men of War, of sixty and seventy Guns, had, in the Beginning of the Year, fallen in with a small Squadron of English Ships, under Captain Killegrew, and were both taken, after a smart Engagement, in which Killegrew was slain: And believing the more they ventur'd, the more they should lose: As also, That the Land-Forces from England, embark'd on board the Fleets, were design'd for some extraordinary Enterprize either on their Ports or the Coast, all they attended to, was to provide for its Security as well as they could, and in particular so to fortify their Harbours, as should deter the Admiral from making any Attempt upon them.

and employs R. Admiral Nevil on that Service.

The Transport Service from Final to Barcelona, was committed to Admiral Nevil, with a Squadron of five Third Rates English, three Dutch, and certain small Vessels: And he was also charg'd with a Letter to the Earl of Galway, from Mr. Russel, desiring his Lordship "To let him know WHETHER there was a Probability of doing any Service with the Fleet at the French Ports; and particularly IF with our Troops, and such Strength as the Duke of Savoy could add

to

A. D. 1695. to them, they and the Fleet together might not attempt even Toulon itself with Hopes of Success."

P. 519. This is Burchet's Account of the Admiral's Letter, and then he proceeds as follows: "This Letter was communicated to his Royal Highness and the Marquis Leganez; whereupon a Council being call'd, it was determin'd, That not any thing could be done therein: For that they thought it reasonable to adhere to their former Resolutions to attack Casal."

A Proof that there was no thorough Concert among the Allies.

Here, therefore, we have a Proof, that there was no such thorough Concert among the Allies, in relation to the Service on that Side, as might have been expected, if all the Parties had been equally sincere. And as it appears by an (b) original Letter from Lord Galway to Rear Admiral Nevil, dated June 14, and inclosing this Resolution of the Council, to be forwarded to Mr. Russel, that the said Resolution was taken twelve Days before the Trenches were open'd in form; as in the Opinion of the best Judges, there was then no apparent Likelihood of their carrying the Place; as the mere Continuance of the Blockade was alone sufficient to render the Possession of it in a manner useless to the French; and as M. Catinat was not in a Condition to give the Allies any material Interruption, the Refusal of the Admiral's Offer ought not only to be plac'd to the Duke's Account, but as an Instance of the Perfidy, which he had already began to practise.

The French greatly alarm'd.

It is certain the French hardly ever manifested more Terror than upon this Occasion: For several of their Parties having been worsted in Catalonia, the Spaniards having blockaded both Ostalric and Castel-Follit, and M. de Noailles having been recall'd on account of the ill Condition of the War under his Conduct, it was fully believ'd, that the Embarkation from Final was an offensive Measure; that a Descent was intended; and that too many Precautions could not be taken for the Security of Marseilles, and even Toulon itself.

What these Precautions were, not only the Gazettes of those Times, but the Dutch Historians, with much Ostentation set forth; as if it was Matter of sufficient Glory to the Allies to make France confess, That she did not think herself invulnerable.

But how plainly soever this Confession was made, or what Signs soever appear'd of an universal Pannic, as often as the united Fleet approach'd the Enemy's Coast, they only approach'd it, without making the least Attempt to countenance their doing so.

But no Attempt made.

It is true we are told by Burchet, That Rear-Admiral Mitchel, and the Dutch Vice-Admiral Evertzen, accompany'd by Brigadier Stewart, and Sir Martin Beckman, the Engineer, were order'd with a sufficient Squadron to look into Marseilles, but were prevented by a great Storm, which rose the next Day, and drove the whole Fleet fifty Leagues to the Southward: And that afterwards it was resolv'd at a Council of War, to proceed either to that Place or Toulon, in order to make an Attempt either on one or other of those Places, in case the Duke of Savoy would be induced to co-operate; which it was suppos'd reasonable to think he would, since Casal was now taken.

A. D. 1695.

But this Resolution was never follow'd; for the Viceroy of Catalonia having requir'd the Captain-General to proceed to Blanes, with all or Part of his Fleet, he did so; having first sent home the Turky Fleet, together with their Convoy, under the Command of Sir John Munden, and so many other Ships (which, upon a Survey, were judg'd incapable of lasting another Winter, if continued at Cadiz) as reduc'd the united Fleet to forty-four Ships of the Line: For of the Dutch Quota, several Ships which had been detain'd as Convoy for 3000 Men to be sent from Flanders for the Service in Catalonia, were not as yet come into the Mediterranean.

About the End of June the Forces from Final, under the Convoy of Admiral Nevil, were landed at Barcelona; as also a Part of those from Naples: On the 29th of July, the Captain-General himself, with the Residue of his Fleet, came into the same Port: And the French, now under the Command of the Duke de Vendosme, fearing to be overpower'd, demolish'd Ostalric and Castle-Follit, and retir'd to Palamos.

As therefore all Thoughts of returning to the Coast of Provence were at an End, it was propos'd, with the Assistance of the Troops from on board the Fleet, to force the Enemy, if possible, to a Battle, and to reduce Palamos: And Mr. Russel gave his Consent, with a Proviso, That the Effort was made within six or seven Days, which was the longest time he could allow the said Troops to be on Shore, for fear the Enemy should come out of Toulon, and fall upon them with their whole Strength, which was now superior to his.

The Admiral sends a Remonstrance to the Court of Spain.

At the same time, however, he dispatch'd a sort of Remonstrance to the Court of Spain, complaining of their Non-compliance with the Promises made to him at Cadiz, of sending their Men of War and Gallies to his Assistance, agreeable to the Treaty between the two Crowns; and signifying, That he thought the King his Master had been very ill us'd: That the Affairs committed to his Charge, had been very much obstructed by their dilatory Proceedings; and that, in case no considerable Enterprize could be immediately undertaken and perform'd, he should be oblig'd to take such Measures as were most agreeable to the Interest of his Master; or, in other Words, to leave their Affairs to their own Management.

What Answer he receiv'd, has not been explain'd: But whatever it was, the Admiral

A. D. 1695. ral landed his Forces on the 9th of Auguſt, and the whole Army advanc'd towards the Enemy: The next Day they came in ſight, the Engliſh having the Van, and took Poſſeſſion of the Ground aſſign'd them near Palamos, without Interruption, tho' they had a Defile to paſs, and the Enemy abounded in Horſe: It was then their Buſineſs to encamp, which, we are told, they did, as well as any Body of Men could do, who had not any one thing neceſſary for it: For they had no Tents; and if they had not furniſh'd themſelves with Spades, Pickaxes, &c. from on board, could not have cover'd themſelves with an Entrenchment: This took up the firſt Night; and the next Day the Enemy not only appear'd in Battalia, but, as the Deſerters gave out, intended to come to Action; which, to the Spaniards, who knew how little while they were to have the Aſſiſtance of their Auxiliaries, ought to have been eſteem'd no bad News. But they, it ſeems, were for reducing the Town without hazarding an Action; and in the mean time treated thoſe Auxiliaries, as if they ſet no Value on them, nor expected any Service from them: It was the Fourth Day before the Enemy ſuffer'd them to take any Reſt; and during the whole time of their being aſhore, they were without Bread, which the Spaniards had undertaken to furniſh them with: This gave the Soldiers a Diſguſt to the Service; and it is probable they were not over ſolicitous to conceal it, ſeeing the Officers were as much neglected and as much diſguſted as themſelves.

The Engliſh and Dutch Auxiliaries diſguſted.

The Admiral's Meſſage to the Spaniſh Viceroy.

Brigadier Stewart, in the mean time, ſent Advice of all that paſs'd to the Admiral; who ſeeing no Probability of ſuch an Iſſue from the Adventure, under ſuch Conduct, as would juſtify the perſuing it any farther, gave the Viceroy to underſtand, That, according to his Opinion, the Purpoſe of the Enemy in offering Battle, was only to prevent the Siege: That, therefore, if his Army was not numerous enough both to face the Enemy and attack the Place, the moſt adviſable thing he could do, would be to march back to his former Poſt; and that in ſuch caſe, he would endeavour to lay the Town in Aſhes.

How this Opinion of the Admiral was reliſh'd by the Viceroy, is another of thoſe Things which Burchet does not think fit to ſpecify: But in all Probability, the Spaniards had ſome Cauſe of Complaint as well as we: For it was known to both thoſe Commanders, that the Forces from Flanders, before mention'd, were then upon the Coaſt, under the Convoy of five Dutch Men of War: And if any Expedient could have been found to have reconcil'd their ſeveral Views, till thoſe Forces arriv'd, which they actually did on the 23d, Palamos might have been attack'd, and the Siege cover'd at the ſame time, according to the Admiral's own Suggeſtion.

The Place bombarded.

The Fact, however, was, That the Viceroy withdrew his Army from before the Place: The Bomb-Veſſels were ſet to work: Above 1500 Bombs were thrown into the Town and Caſtle: Both were greatly damag'd: And with the ſole Merit of having ruin'd, not recover'd, one of the Spaniſh Towns, the Admiral ſet ſail once more, on the 27th, for the Coaſt of Provence; having receiv'd Advice, That the French Fleet, conſiſting of ſixty ſail, were on the Point of putting to Sea in queſt of him. But Provence, it ſeems, was to him unapproachable: For ſcarce was he come in ſight of it, before he encounter'd ſuch violent Storms, accompany'd with Rain, Thunder, and Lightning, (theſe are Burchet's Words) as render'd a Continuance there very hazardous; ſo that the Admiral judg'd it adviſable to retire down the Streights, (without any farther Concern for what might happen to the Coaſt of Spain, from a French Fleet of Sixty Ships) and, arriving in Cadiz-Bay towards the latter End of September, transferr'd the Command of Eight Third Rates, and as many Fourths, together with a ſuitable Number of Frigates, Bomb-Veſſels, &c. to Sir David Mitchel, Rear Admiral of the Red, with general Orders to employ them in ſuch manner, as he judg'd might be moſt for the Service, till the Arrival of Sir George Rooke, who was to ſucceed to the Command, and who was expected in that Port with a freſh Squadron from England.

A. D. 1695.

The Admiral ſets ſail for the Coaſt of Provence.

But meeting bad Weather returns to Cadiz.

Thus ended the Adventures of Admiral Ruſſel, as an Auxiliary to Spain, with the high Title of Captain-General and Commander in Chief: And as no mention is made by Burchet of any Complements or Acknowledgments paid him by the Spaniſh Court at his Departure, but, on the contrary, that the Governor of Cadiz refus'd to admit the ſick Seamen into his Hoſpital, without an expreſs Order from his Court, we muſt conclude, That both his Catholic Majeſty and his Miniſters were as diſſatisfy'd with him, as he with them.

The Dutch alſo left ſeven Ships, from ſeventy four to fifty Guns, to co-operate with Mitchel: And about the Beginning of November, the Remainder of the united Fleet arriv'd in England.

and from thence to England.

But the Glory of inſulting the French Coaſts on the Mediterranean Side, and confining the French Fleet within the Harbour of Toulon, which was all we had to balance the extraordinary Expence of our Undertakings on the Behalf of Spain, was not the whole of our Marine Syſtem for this Year. On the contrary, it being ſuppos'd, that this Glory of ours would be conſiderably augmented if we alſo renew'd our Attempts on their Ports in the Britiſh Channel, it was reſolv'd to begin with St. Malo's, tho' it was foreſeen that the Attempt would not be attended with any extraordinary Succeſs.

A new Deſign on the French Ports in the Channel.

Accordingly, the Command of this Undertaking, as in the Year before, was given to Lord Berkley of Stratton: But when he came to carry it into Execution, he was inform'd by the Dutch Admiral Allemonde, That tho' he had Orders to act under his Command, and to co-operate in whatever ſhould be thought reaſonable by a Council of War, yet thoſe Orders were accompany'd with a

A. D. 1695. Proviſo from the King himſelf, That they began with Dunkirk firſt.

This was a new Proof that the Dutch Intereſt was always uppermoſt, and occaſion'd a new Demur: For his Lordſhip was not at firſt ſtrong enough for the Enterprize in queſtion without their Aſſiſtance; and when ſufficiently reinforc'd by order of the Lords Juſtices, he propos'd, That the Dutch might be at Liberty to act by themſelves againſt Dunkirk, while he acted againſt St. Malo's, the Dutch Admiral refus'd the Expedient, and declar'd againſt acting at all without the Concurrence of the Engliſh.

However, it being repreſented at a Council of War, that there was no hope of ſucceeding at Dunkirk till the Machines and other Preparations carrying on by Mr. Meeſters (the Dutch Engineer, ſo famous for his Non-performances the Year before) were ready, which as yet they were not, Allemonde was induc'd to give up his Majeſty's Proviſo, and to ſuffer St. Malo's to undergo the firſt Viſitation.

St. Malo's bombarded. On the 4th of July, about Ten in the Morning, they came before the Place, and the following Diſpoſition was made for the Attack, viz. Five Bomb-Veſſels were order'd to batter the Fort on Quince Rock, and four others Fort d'Ambour; between which two Places is the Channel of the Town; which the nine remaining were, at the ſame time, to batter, under the Cover of ſeveral Frigates and other ſmall Veſſels, and attended by all the Boats which could be ſpar'd, to tow off ſuch as ſhould be diſabled: Two Dutch Ships were appointed to cruiſe in the Offing, and the reſt of the Fleet were ſtation'd as Convenience and Probability of Uſefulneſs directed.

About Noon the Signal was given for beginning the Attack, which was continued againſt Quince-Fort till Eight in the Evening; with good Succeſs ſays the London-Gazette, with no great Succeſs ſays Burchet. No. 3096.

At Four the next Morning the Bomb-Veſſels being again let looſe againſt the two Forts above ſpecify'd, Captain Benbow, with the Frigates, &c. ſtood into the Channel, and came to anchor within half a League of the Town, having the nine Bomb-Veſſels between him and it. In two Hours the Bombardment began, in the Preſence of Lord Berkley, and the Admirals Allemonde and Shovel, (who came up in their Boats to examine the Diſpoſition, and encourage the Seamen) and was continued with great Vigour and Reſolution till Seven in the Evening; in which time the Aſſailants having conſum'd the whole Stock of Bombs and Carcaſſes, (which they had been ſupply'd with from the Store-ſhips) and which amounted to about nine Hundred, having ſet fire to Fort-Quince, by the means of two Fire-ſhips which were driven upon it, as alſo to the Town, which continued burning for ſeveral Hours; and having received conſiderable Damage themſelves, the Signal was given for a Retreat, which was perform'd, without any other Loſs than that of one Bomb-Veſſel, which being too much ſhatter'd to be brought off, was ſunk to prevent her falling into the Hands of the Enemy. A. D. 1695.

The next Day, being the 6th, Colonel Richards and Captain Benbow were order'd to make the like Attempt upon Granville, a conſiderable Town in the Neighbourhood: And on the 8th it was perform'd, much more effectually, without the Loſs of a Man.

On the 9th the Fleet ſet ſail, as if with a Purpoſe to pay the ſame Complement to Havre-de-Grace; but in the Evening alter'd their Courſe, and bore away for Portſmouth, in order to refit the Bomb-Veſſels, and make all ready for their Viſit to Dunkirk.

In nine Days time this was done, and the Fleet once more at Sea: On the 19th they came to anchor in the Downs, and having taken on board 400 Land Soldiers, ſet ſail again for the French Coaſt on the 23d. That they ſail'd no ſooner, as Burchet ſuggeſts, was the Fault of Meeſters and his Pilots, who did not attend the Service ſo ſoon as they ought to have done: The ſaid Meeſters is alſo reproach'd by the ſame Author, for having retir'd to the Downs inſtead of repairing to Graveling, which was the Place of Rendezvous, in caſe of Seperation by ſtreſs of Weather, or other Accident; and alſo for ſtanding in need of poſitive Orders to join the Squadron, before he took Courage to do ſo.

On Meeſters and his Preparations, in ſhort, the King, as it was ſuppos'd, had grounded his Hopes of Succeſs, not on the Conduct of his Officers, or the Valour of his Men: And this ſuppos'd Partiality, together with the Averſion conceiv'd by both the Latter for an Attempt which they held to be impracticable, not only render'd the Service odious, but probably contributed to its ill Succeſs.

A fruitleſs Attempt on Dunkirk. On the firſt of Auguſt however, the Experiment was made agreeable to the Plan agreed upon at the Council of War; That is to ſay, the Bomb-Veſſels were firſt ſent in, under the Protection of the Frigates; the Latter to keep off the Enemies half Gallies, Boats, &c. which were very numerous, and the Former to play upon the Ris-Bank, and the Forts adjacent: Theſe were follow'd by certain other Frigates with the Dutch Pilots on board, who had two Fire-ſhips, and as many Machines or Infernals under their Conduct; all of which were deſign'd to be laid along-ſide the ſaid Forts, together with four Dutch Men of War of fifty Guns each: Mention is alſo made of as many more Fire-ſhips and Machines that were to be ſent on the Back of the Brake, and of four Smoke-ſhips that were to blind the Enemy, while the Fire-ſhips and Machines laid them along-ſide: But all this Diſpoſition, formidable as it may be thought, ſignify'd little or nothing. The Bomb-Veſſels play'd their Parts till Five o'Clock, during which time, it is ſaid, ſeveral of their Shells fell into the Ris-Bank, and upon the Pier-Heads, and three of the French Gallies were ſunk: And as to the Smoke-ſhips, one of them ran a-ground, and the Other were ſet on fire in their Approach: And the Iſſue of all is thus ſumm'd up in the

A. D. 1695. the London-Gazette: "But the Enemy having secur'd the Ris-Bank and wooden Forts with Piles, Booms, Chains, and floating Pontoons mounted with Cannon, the Machine-Vessels could not come near enough to have any Effect."

That this Disappointment occasion'd great Heats and Animosities among the Parties, is pretty evident from the subsequent Conduct of Meesters, who withdrew from the Squadron with his Machines that Night; and when sent for to assist in another Attempt upon Calais, declin'd the Service: It is besides acknowledg'd, That Lord Berkley afterwards exhibited a Complaint against him before the Council; and that he recriminated upon the Sea-Officers: As also, that the Matter was more than once taken into Examination. But which Party soever was in fault, the Nation had not Interest enough to obtain Justice against either; and consequently became liable to be worse serv'd than ever.

Another at Calais.

However, tho' Meesters refus'd to co-operate, Lord Berkley proceeded with his Squadron to Calais, before which Place he came the 16th: But here, it seems, as well as at Dunkirk, the Enemy, who expected the Visit, had made extraordinary Preparations for his Reception: For they had erected a new wooden Fort at the Entrance of the Pier-Heads, mounted with fourteen Pieces of heavy Cannon, and several other Batteries to the West, suitably provided, which render'd the Approach both difficult and dangerous. With this wooden Fort therefore, it was resolv'd to open their Process; and for the more Security, in the Night: But so much time was lost in making the necessary Preparations to fill up two Well-Boats with Combustibles for that Service, that it was Eleven o'Clock in the Morning before the Attempt was made; and then it was thought advisable for Colonel Richards to commence the Bombardment of the Town at the same time: Of these Well-Boats however, which occasion'd this Delay, and the wooden Fort they were to assail, we hear no more: And all that is remember'd of the Action amounts to no more than this, That in two Hours after the Bombardment began, the Town was on fire in several Places: That the Enemies half Gallies, and other armed Vessels coming out in order to annoy the Bomb-ships, were driven back in Confusion by the Brigantines, &c. which Lord Berkley sent to oppose them: That about Two o'Clock one of our Bombs set fire to their Magazines on the Ris-Bank, which occasion'd so great a Disorder, that they gave over firing: That our Bombs continued playing three Hours longer: That about 000 Shells were discharg'd into the Place: That our Bombardiers behav'd extremely well: And that our Loss was very small.

A Squadron sent to co-operate with the Spaniards in Hispaniola.

Lastly, to complete the Efforts of the Year, and that while we were insulting the Coasts of France on all Sides, they might not insult our Plantations, as they had done the preceding Year, a Squadron of Ships compos'd of one Third Rate, three Fourths, one Fifth, and two Fire-ships, together with twelve Transports, having on board 1200 Men, and spare Arms for as many more, were sent, in the Beginning of the Year, to the West-Indies: The Command of the Squadron was given to Captain Robert Wilmot, and of the Land Forces to Colonel Luke Lillingston. But the Secret of the Voyage was entrusted to neither of them: For the Commodore had express Orders not to open his Instructions, till he came in the Latitude of 40 Degrees; and then he was to open them in the Presence of Lillingston. A. D. 1695.

Instructions to the Commodore.

The general Purport of these Instructions were, That they should repair to Jamaica, and there concert with the Governor of that Island the most effectual ways of proceeding against the Enemy at Petit Guavas, and their other Settlements in Hispaniola, according to the best Informations they could get, and with such additional Strength as the said Governor could furnish them with; and that in case they should carry the Place, they should endeavour to keep possession of it if possible.

That He, the Commodore, should give Notice of his Arrival to the Commander in Chief for the Crown of Spain in Hispaniola, and desire his Assistance to destroy the Enemy, both on that and the adjacent Islands: And that in case the Preparations there, were in a sufficient Forwardness for an Attempt, he was to proceed against the Enemy, before he proceeded to Jamaica.

That after he had done his utmost to annoy the Enemy, and for the Security of Hispaniola, he was to remain thereabout no longer than two or three Months, unless for some special Service: But that in his return home, if the Season of the Year was not too far advanc'd, he was to call at the French Settlements in Newfoundland, and endeavour to destroy their Fisheries both there and at the Bank.

And that, since the Success of the Expedition very much depended on the good Agreement between him and the Commander of the Land Forces, he was, by all means, to prevent any unnecessary Scruples or Difficulties on that account.

Of the Expedition itself, two Accounts are extant, one given by Burchet in his naval History, and the other by Lillingston, which was occasion'd by the Former.

According to Burchet the Miscarriage of it was owing chiefly to the Dilatoriness and insignificant Scruples of the President of St. Domingo, and the Unruliness of the English Soldiers. According to Lillingston, (who represents the said President as a Man of Honour and Punctuality) it was owing to the Perfidy, Rapine, and Villany of the Commodore: And this he endeavours to prove by a Variety of Instances, which tho' publish'd immediately after the first Publication of Burchet's Book, remain unconfuted to this Day.

Wilmot, for example, stands charg'd by the Colonel with having open'd his Instructions in an unwarrantable manner; with His ill Conduct.

A.D. 1695. having made an expreſs Propoſal to the Colonel, to ſerve themſelves inſtead of the Public; with having acted agreeable to that Propoſal, tho' diſcountenanc'd in it by the Colonel; with having plunder'd Fort Francis, which had been abandon'd by the Enemy, on the Approach of the Land Forces, before the ſaid Forces could come up; with having done the ſame at Port de Paix, tho' the Land Forces were firſt in Poſſeſſion of it; and with having ſo diſguſted the Spaniards by theſe and the like piratical Exploits; and ſo diſabled our own Men, by expoſing them to unneceſſary Hardſhips, that neither of them were inclin'd to perſue ſo unprofitable an Adventure, in ſuch (i) Partnerſhip any farther.

Thus, inſtead of making the Reduction of Petit Guaxas, the great Object of his Attention, he never attended to it at all, till it was too late to attempt it: And upon the whole Matter, the deſtroying the two Places already mention'd, together with all the Settlements they cover'd, and committing as much Spoil and Waſte as 200,000*l.* ſterling would ſcarce repair, were all the Fruits of an Expedition, which, if it had been conducted as wiſely as it was projected, might not only have been a means of transferring the French Settlements of Hiſpaniola to us, but of preventing the Eſtabliſhment and Extenſion of that Commerce, which is already become ſo dangerous a Rival to our own.

That he did not repair to Jamaica, and augment his Forces with the Strength of that Government, before he proceeded to Hiſpaniola, is ſaid to be owing to a Letter from the Spaniſh Governor which he met with at Savona, inviting him to come on that Coaſt, and aſſuring him of his Aſſiſtance againſt the Enemy: And the Enemy themſelves have fallen with ſome Severity, and perhaps Juſtice, on the Jamaica People, for not concurring as Volunteers in the Enterprize, or at leaſt for not improving this Opportunity to make a Diverſion with their whole Force elſewhere.

But however faulty their own Conduct was, they were very free in cenſuring that of the Commodore, and gave him but an indifferent Reception when he arriv'd amongſt them in his Return from Hiſpaniola; in which they were more directed by their Paſſions than their Policy: For it was but the 23d of July when he arriv'd; and conſequently there was time enough before them for ſome new Attempt, if there had been a proper Diſpoſition to make uſe of it. But Councils of War ſerv'd only to widen the Breach between the Sea and Land Officers, and to demonſtrate the Impracticability of any Meaſure under ſuch a Direction: And as to the Commodore, he was more intent in finding a Market for the Plunder he had made, and in contriving like a Merchant how to double his Profits by the Returns to be made to England, than the Service of his Country, or the Duty of his Office. All which important Buſineſs being diſpatch'd, on the Beginning of September he ſet ſail for England, without beſtowing a Thought, for aught that appears, on that other Part of his Inſtructions, which requir'd him to viſit the French Settlements in Newfoundland by the way. But the Wealth he was ſo infamouſly determin'd to acquire, he did not live to enjoy: For an epidemical Diſeaſe (perhaps the Scurvy in its laſt malignant ſtage) having taken poſſeſſion of his (k) Ships, he was one of the firſt who was ſwept off by it: And ſuch Numbers follow'd him, that, according to Burchet, it was almoſt a Miracle the Ships got home. One of them, the Winchelſea, a Fourth Rate, was actually loſt on the Sholes of Cape Florida, it is ſaid, for want of Hands to trim her Sails. The reſt were driven by Streſs of Weather into Virginia; and in their way to England were again diſpers'd: It was December before the firſt of them arriv'd; and every one of them in ſucceſſion confirm'd the Particulars of their own calamitous Story. A.D. He dies on his Return.

But ſuch was either the lax or encumber'd Condition of the Government, that no Enquiry was made into the Cauſe of the Miſcarriage, tho' Colonel Lilingſton made no Secret of what he knew concerning it; tho' the Murmurs of the Colonies, and all Thoſe concern'd in the Commerce of them, were too loud to be ſtifled; and tho' the Commodore left a Booty of 160001. behind him in his Ship, which it coſt his Family a long and expenſive Law-Suit to recover out of the Hands of him who ſucceeded to the Command of her. No Enquiry made into his Conduct.

Laſtly; as if to complete the Mortification of the Year, with reſpect to our naval Affairs, while we were making a Parade of our Superiority in the Channel and the Mediterranean, the Enemy let looſe all the Privateers they could man upon our Commerce; and tho' many of them were taken by our Cruizers, many more of them ſucceeded to the Height of their Expectations. It is in particular acknowledg'd by Burnet, that many of our Barbadoes Ships fell into their Hands; as alſo, no leſs than five of our Eaſt-India Ships; that is to ſay, two, 150 Leagues out at Sea, and three others near Galway, on the Coaſt of Ireland. "These five Ships, continues the Biſhop, were valued at a Million; ſo here was great occaſion of Diſcontent in the City of London. They complain'd, that neither the Admiralty nor the Government took the Care that was neceſſary for preſerving the Wealth of the Nation. A French Man of War, at the ſame time, fell upon our Factory on the Coaſt of Guinea: He took the ſmall Fort we had there and deſtroy'd it. Theſe Misfortunes were very ſenſible to the Nation, and did much abate the Joy which ſo glorious a Campaign would otherwiſe have rais'd; and much Matter was laid in for ill Humour to work upon." Several of our Barbadoes and East-India Ships taken by the Enemy.

But

(i) The Spaniards furniſh'd 1700 Men, and three Men of War.

(k) The Dunkirk, the Winchelſea, the Experiment, and the Terrible and Firedrake Fireſhips.

A. D. 1695. But tho' these Misfortunes did really happen to our Trade, and the Profits arising to France by them, more than countervail'd the Mischiefs done to their Ports by our Bombardments, it would be highly unjustifiable to lay the whole Blame to the Charge of the Government: For they had, this Year, been more than ordinarily careful of our Navigation: And, over and above the Convoys and Cruizers destin'd for particular Services, had appointed Admiral Hopson, with one Squadron, to scour the Channel; and the Marquis of Carmarthen with a second, to ply off of Scilly, for the Security of our Homeward-bound Ships. But he mistaking a Fleet of Merchant-men for the French Navy, withdrew to Milford-Haven, and so left the Sea open to the Enemy.

If, therefore, the Government was in any respect blameable, it was for a Defect of Discipline: For tho' they did afterwards justify themselves, by producing the Instructions given to the Marquis, and proving the Fault he had committed, they did not make him such an Example as was necessary to appease the Resentments of the Sufferers, and to exact a more punctual Obedience for the time to come.

Campaign on the Rhine.

Such was the Conduct of our naval Affairs: Such the Success: And what lies next before us, is to dispatch what remains to be said of the Course and Issue of the Campaign.

On the Rhine, both Parties were backward enough with their Preparations: But, as usual, the Germans the most: Prince Lewis of Baden was a long while indispos'd with the Gout, or affected to be so, that he might not be importun'd to enter on the Duties of a General, without an Army: For the Court of Saxony, by Agreement, was to furnish no Troops for that Service: That of Sweden, having undertook to mediate a Peace, was deaf to the repeated Instances of the Imperial and Dutch Ministers, for the 6000 Men which his Swedish Majesty was to furnish as a Party in the grand Alliance; as also for his Contingent as a Prince of the Empire: And as to the Troops of the Palatinate, Lunenburgh, Hesse, and Munster, which could not excuse themselves from repairing to the general Rendezvous, their several Commanders most precisely obey'd the Orders they had receiv'd from their Principals, not to harrass their Troops by over hasty Marches, or to expose them unnecessarily, by their taking the Field too soon.

On the other hand, the Marshal de Lorges had also his Mortifications; for he was sunk both in his Health and Credit: The appointing the Marshal de Joyeuse to be his Collegue, was a Proof, that his Abilities were no longer as highly rated as they had formerly been: And the narrow Limits of his Commission shew'd, that little Stress was laid on his Services.

The French pass the Rhine at Philipsburgh.

However, that he might draw some Advantage from the unprepar'd Condition of the Enemy, or, at least, excite such Apprehensions on that Side, as might deter the German Princes from being too forward in parting with their Troops for the Service in Flanders, he took the Field in the Beginning of June, and, having review'd his Army on the Third, march'd to Philipsburgh on the Morrow; pass'd the Rhine on the two following Days; and took post at Bruchsal; from whence he sent out his Parties on all Sides, to waste the Country almost as far as Hailbron, which they perform'd with great Success; the Germans being in no Condition to give them any material Interruption.

A. D. 1695.

On the other Hand, it was the 11th of June before the Prince of Baden join'd his Army, which was strongly posted near Stoppach; the Margrave of Bareith, who, till his Arrival, had the Command, having secur'd all the Passes, and taken all the other Precautions that were necessary against the Approach of a superior Enemy: To dispatch Express after Express, in order to quicken the Advance of the Troops that were marching to join him, was all, therefore, that remain'd to be done: But whatever was the Speed of his Expresses, the Troops were either so far behind, or advane'd so much at their Leisure, that he was forc'd to continue behind his Works till the 4th of July: But then having receiv'd Advice, that they were within two or three Marches of him, he order'd his Army to decamp early the next Morning; and on the 8th the Junction was happily made near Wiselock.

It was, nevertheless, the 20th before it was thought advisable to proceed against the Enemy: For as the Latter had not ventur'd to attack the Germans in their Camp, and on the contrary apprehended, that the Germans, when they were strong enough, would not fail to attack them, so they had fortify'd their Camp also, and remain'd on the Defensive, as the Germans had done before.

At last, however, all the Forage within their Reach being consum'd, it became necessary to dislodge, which they did accordingly on the 19th at Night, as silently as possible; and as soon as the Prince of Baden had Intelligence of it, which was in a few Hours afterwards, he resolv'd to follow them: Accordingly, having given Orders to decamp, he went out with a Party of Horse to observe what Course the Enemy took, and in what Order they march'd; and on his Return, made the best Disposition that the Ground would admit, for a March, in order to give them Battle. At Walhorf he receiv'd other Intelligence, That the Enemy were drawn up in Battle, in the Plain of Hockenum, behind a Wood which lay before him: And in conformity thereto, he drew up his Foot in two Lines, and placing the Horse in the Rear, advanc'd to the Wood, with the same Purpose as before: But they, who had their Scouts abroad as well as he, and who were too wise either to run the Risque of an Action with a River behind them, or to pass it with an Enemy so near them, broke down the Bridges which they had laid over it at Ketch, and order'd their Boats to Manheim, towards which Place they also continued their March, not without some Precipitation.

A. D. 1695. And now it appear'd, That the Prince of Baden was altogether ſo intent on coming to an Engagement, as they to make their Eſcape: For, on the Receipt of this laſt Advice, he ſuffer'd his Troops to halt in order to refreſh themſelves; and being farther inform'd, that they had taken Poſt near a Rivulet call'd Swekinger, gave out, that he would proſecute his March by Dawn of Day; whereas they took Advantage of the Night once more, and having reach'd Manheim the next Day, had time enough to entrench, and thereby to ſecure their Paſſage, which they perform'd on the 23d, without any Interruption.

And repaſs it at Manheim.

And thus, it may be ſaid, ended the Campaign on that Side: For immediately after, the French ſent off a large Detachment to Flanders; Prince Lewis did the ſame; and nothing on either ſide was afterwards attempted, ſignificant enough even to make an Article in the Gazette.

The Campaign in Flanders.

And now we are at laſt at liberty to enter that Theatre where the Tragedy of War was perform'd with the moſt Splendor and Majeſty, and where the Event, according to Biſhop Burnet, was crown'd with the moſt Glory.

But of this, it muſt be own'd the military Critics are the beſt, if not the only Judges: And of thoſe, perhaps, it will be moſt reaſonable to follow M. de Feuquieres; who could not have ſtronger Prejudices againſt King William, than he had againſt the Marſhal de Villeroy, on whom, as we have ſeen, the chief Command devolv'd, on the Death of the Duke of Luxemburgh.

Tom. I.

Now, according to him, the Conduct of the Campaign at the opening, was as follows.

The French King reſolves to keep on the Defenſive.

As the moſt Chriſtian King, ſays he, in ſubſtance, was determin'd to ſuſtain the Defenſive this Year in Flanders, and was aware that the King of England would be as active as poſſible, his Majeſty's Vigilance was equally extended to Dunkirk on the Sea, Namur at the Confluence of the Sambre and the Meus, Tournay on the Scheld, and Ypres near the Lys; the two firſt of which Places compos'd the Right and Left, and the two laſt the Center of that Country which his Armies were to protect.

That ſuch a Diſpoſition, therefore, might be made as would beſt anſwer the whole of his Purpoſe, he order'd M. de Boufflers to aſſemble his Forces near Mons, that he might be ready to cover Namur, into which Place he was directed to throw himſelf, with a large Body of Dragoons, in caſe of a Siege: And M. de Villeroy was to poſt himſelf between the Scheld and the Lys, in order to cover Tournay, Ypres, and Dunkirk. M. de Montal was alſo poſted with a Body of Troops, conſiſting of thirty-ſix Battalions and twenty Squadrons, at the Abbey of Loo, between Dunkirk and the Fort of Knocque, as well for the Succour of thoſe Places as of Ypres: And M. de Crequi was charg'd in particular with the Defence of Tournay.

As this Diſpoſition ſufficiently declar'd his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's Purpoſe to remain on the Defenſive, (f) King William reſolv'd to perſue an oppoſite Conduct; and by availing himſelf of his prefent Superiority, to ſnatch ſome Advantage. A. D.

K. William reſolves to lay Siege to Namur.

Namur was the Place which he reſolv'd to attack: But then to conceal this Reſolution, he had recourſe to ſeveral Feints and Refinements, which were abundantly more fortunate than diſcrete: For in the firſt Place he ſupply'd the Elector of Bavaria with an Army which aſſembled on the Upper Dender, and poſted themſelves ſoon after between the Scheld and the Lys: And this Motion oblig'd M. de Boufflers to advance and cover the Lines of Courtray; as alſo to appoint a Body of Horſe to obſerve M. de Overkirke, who was poſted on the great Cauſey near Ekrus. Secondly, The King himſelf advanc'd with his main Army to Becelaer, on the Heule: And, Thirdly, He detach'd the Duke of Wirtemberg with twenty-two Battalions and ſome Squadrons, to inveſt Fort Knocque. His Purpoſe was, by theſe ſeveral Motions, ſo to amuſe the French, that they might entertain equal Apprehenſions of all; and that by a ſuitable Diviſion of their Forces, he might find an Opportunity to carry his own Point ſo much the eaſier.

His Feints to amuſe the Enemy.

But while he was thus intent on circumventing them, he was not aware how much he expos'd himſelf. By the Motion which M. de Boufflers had made to guard the Lines at Courtray, the whole French Army, which were in poſſeſſion of almoſt all the Country from the Scheld to Fort Knocque, might have been re-united in ſix Hours, and would have had it in their Choice either to overpower the King at Becelaer, where he was encamp'd very diſadvantageouſly, or the Elector of Bavaria before the Lines of Courtray, from whence he had not any Communication with his Majeſty: Beſides which, M. de Montal might have forc'd the Duke of Wirtemberg in his Camp before Fort Knocque, even without putting either M. de Villeroy or M. de Boufflers to the Trouble of ſuſtaining him: And in caſe either of theſe Enterprizes had ſucceeded, the Armies on both Sides would have been reduc'd to an Equality, the Deſign upon Namur could not have been proſecuted, and, inſtead of continuing any longer on the Defenſive, the French would have been enabled to hold the Allies in check during the Reſidue of the Campaign.

Dangerous to himſelf.

But either M. de Villeroy did not diſcern theſe Advantages, or, which is more likely, for fear of a Miſcarriage, deliberated till the Opportunity was loſt: It muſt not however be forgot, that it is obſerv'd, the King remain'd in this expos'd Condition for eight Days together, which he durſt not have done for one, if M. de Luxemburgh had ſtill been his Oppoſer.

But not diſcover'd by the Enemy.

During this Interval, however, the Elector of Bavaria reduc'd a Windmill, which ſtood on

A. D. 1695. a rising Ground without the Enemy's Lines; and the Duke of Wirtemberg made himself Master of a Redoubt, and lodg'd himself in the Entrenchment of a little Bridge, upon the Canal over-against Fort Knocque: But as no Attempt was made to dislodge M. de Montal, who had an open Communication with the Place, it was manifest, that no Stress was laid on that Enterprize. The French also, on their Side, employ'd a Detachment to surprize the Bread-Waggons, &c. which were on their way to the Army from Ghent: But Intelligence having been receiv'd of their Purpose, the Earl of Essex was sent with a Party to reinforce the Convoy; and the Earl of Portland, with another, had orders to beat up the Enemy, which he did in the Night, at a Village call'd Moorsale; and being greatly superior to them, found it no very difficult matter to put them to the Rout.

Disposition for the Siege of Namur.

At length the Preparations against Namur being complete, and the Opportunity favourable, his Majesty call'd upon the Elector of Bavaria to take his Part in the Enterprize, directed the Duke of Wirtemberg to retire from before Knocque, and made all the necessary Dispositions for investing the Place, for covering the Siege, and for forming an Army of Observation to protect the maritime Part of Flanders.

The French immediately took the Alarm; and as the first Motions were towards Charleroy, M. de Harcourt pass'd the Maes near Dinant, with a Body of Dragoons, and threw himself into that Place: But when it was known that the Earl of Athlone, who had the Direction of those Motions, had pass'd the Sambre at Chasselet below Charleroy, and continued his March down towards Namur, their Concern center'd on the Latter only; and M. de Boufflers, at the Head of seven Regiments of Dragoons, and Major-General Megrigny (after M. Vauban, esteem'd the best Engineer of France) at the Head of a large Corps of Engineers, Miners, Gunners, Bombardiers, &c. posted with all possible Expedition to re-inforce the Garrison of the Place.

M. de Boufflers throws himself into the Place.

Nor could a Commander of less Activity have succeeded in that Service: It was the 1st of July when he cross'd the Sambre at Solre: About Ten that Night he arriv'd at Philippeville: At Two the next Morning he set out again; and, having cross'd the Maes at Dinant, and halted about a League from thence to bait his Horses, recover'd Namur-Bridge at Six in the Evening; by which time Lord Athlone, Count Tilly, Baron Heyden, and other General Officers, with more than half the Horse of the Army, had invested two Thirds of the Place; and another large Detachment was coming up to complete the Inclosure, and were only retarded by the vast Circuit they were oblig'd to take, and the difficult Ground they had to pass.

As to the Condition of the Place, it was computed, That the Garrison now consisted of 15000 Men, completely furnish'd with all the Stores and Provisions they could possibly have occasion for: And as no Art, no Cost, no Labour had been spar'd to augment the natural Strength of the Place, to complete all that Coherne had left unfinish'd, and to supply whatever had escap'd his Notice, it was believ'd the Town could scarce be carry'd: And as to the Castle, so confident were the Holders it was impregnable, That they caus'd the following Inscription to be engrav'd over one of the Gates, Fidei quidem, sed vinci non potest. It may be so for'd, but can never be reduc'd. Boyer.

The Plan invaded.

On the 3d of July the King took up his Quarters at the Village of Flerwen: And, according to M. de Feuquiere's Account of his Disposition, the Elector of Bavaria form'd the Siege with the Infantry of his own Army, together with that of several German Princes, and a Body of Cavalry: The King with all his Forces, and the Cavalry that M. d'Overkirke had commanded on the grand Causey before Namur was invested, form'd a cautionary Army without the Mehaigne, and in a Condition to pass it, in order to sustain the Siege whenever it should be found necessary: And the Prince of Vaudemont, with above (m) sixty Battalions, and about fifty Squadrons, encamp'd near Dynet, between the Lys and the Mandel, to cover such Places in Flanders as were most expos'd to the Enemy.

Errors committed by M. de Villeroy.

The same Author also observes, that M. de Boufflers, having remitted all the Forces under his Command, except the Regiments of Dragoons which followed him into Namur, to M. de Villeroy, the Army of the Latter became sufficiently numerous to attempt the Relief of Namur, with a very great superiority, (to the cautionary Army under the King must be understood) without any Apprehensions of the Prince of Vaudemont, and the Forces under his Command: But the Latter having posted himself very inconsiderately within three Leagues of the French Camp, and, on the coming up of the Duke of Wirtemberg from Fort Knocque, who had orders to join him, and to co-operate in the same Service, having detach'd thirty-two Battalions to reinforce the main Army, M. de Villeroy thought it more adviseable to leave the Besiegers unmolested, and to fall on this seperate Corps in their Camp, which seem'd destin'd as a Sacrifice to his Power, if not to his Glory.

But tho' M. de Feuquieres indirectly censures the Marshal for not making an Attempt to raise the Siege, he acknowledges, That his Motions to amuse the Prince of Vaudemont were very judicious, and his Marchs towards his Camp so well concerted, that the French Army were, at Five in the Morning,

(m) According to the Accounts from P. Vaudemont's Camp, but thirty-two Battalions, and forty-eight Squadrons. See London-Gazette, No. 3096.

A. D. 1695. ing, within two Muſket-ſhots of the Prince's Left, before he had any Suſpicion of their Advance.

The Motions he alludes to were theſe: On the 12th of July the Head of the French Army, conſiſting of about 12000 Horſe, paſs'd the Lys at Courtray and Harlebeck, and in the Courſe of their March ſeem'd to incline towards Cordes, which the Prince being advis'd of, the Concluſion he made, was, That they intended to relieve Namur; and that the King might be prepar'd to give them a proper Reception, he forwarded the ſame Advice to his Majeſty, who thereupon did actually ſend out ſome Squadrons of Horſe to obſerve their Motions, and furniſh him with Intelligence accordingly. But then that the Prince ſhould be ſo little aware of the Poſſibility of a Feint, as to be wholly unprepar'd in caſe it ſhould happen, is ſcarce excuſable: Becauſe, on the 13th in the Morning, he was inform'd the Marſhal himſelf, with the reſt of his Army, which had been re-inforc'd from all the neighbouring Garriſons, had paſs'd the Lys over five Bridges: As alſo, That M. de Montal, with the Forces under his Command, was on the March to join the ſaid Marſhal, whoſe Army would then conſiſt of about ninety Battalions of Foot, and one Hundred and fifty Squadrons of Horſe; which was ſuch a Superiority as he had every thing to apprehend from, and as he could not take too many Precautions againſt.

It is nevertheleſs acknowledg'd, in effect, That it was Eleven o'Clock in the Morning before he was appriz'd of M. de Villeroy's true Purpoſe: For it was not till then that he gave the Signal to his Troops to put themſelves in order of Battle: And the only Excuſe aſſign'd for this Delay, is the Uncertainty he was in concerning it; and his Apprehenſion, that, in caſe he made too precipitate a Motion, to prevent the Relief of Namur, he ſhould leave the Maritime Towns of Flanders expos'd: And that in caſe he chang'd his Situation, to cover them ſo much the more effectually, the Enemy might have gain'd two Marches upon him, in their way to the Beſiegers.

For what follow'd on the unſuſpected Advance of the French Army to that of the Prince, M. de Feuquieres farther obſerves, That between the Left of the Latter, and the Infantry of the Former, a Rivulet took its Courſe, which was not above two Yards broad, and which might have been inſtantly bridg'd over with the Doors of the neighbouring Houſes: That, conſequently, if that or the like Expedient had been made uſe of, the ſaid Infantry might have forc'd the Prince's Camp, before his Soldiers would have had time to open their Eyes: That, nevertheleſs, the Marſhal thought this Brook ſuch an Impediment, that he order'd the whole Army to file off to the Left, in order to paſs the Mandel at Iſenghen, a League and a half higher; declaring, at the ſame time, That he was determin'd not to advance in a Column againſt a Camp in flank: And that in this Interval, the Prince having taken the Alarm, decamp'd with all poſſible Expedition, and had leiſure, if he had improv'd it properly, to remove entirely out of the Reach of Danger. But, as the ſame Author farther obſerves, one would have thought the two Generals were emulous to ſurpaſs each other in the Art of Blundering: For the Prince halted, as ſoon as he had attain'd the Height of Aerſele, and took poſt there, having the Village of Entergben or Wenterghen in front, his Left to the Mandel, and his Right entirely uncover'd: And as to the Marſhal, having paſs'd the Mandel, he advanc'd with all the Cavalry of his Right, and the Brigade of French Guards, and left the Infantry, together with the reſt of his Cavalry, behind, with orders to reduce (n) three or four little Caſtles which cover'd the Front of the Camp the Enemy had abandon'd, and which they had not as yet evacuated.

A. D. 1695

This little Piece of Service was ſoon perform'd, tho' not without the Help of Cannon: And then the whole Army waited in a Column, as they had march'd, in Expectation of orders to advance, till Two o'Clock; whence it follow'd, that they did not arrive in ſight of the Enemy till Ten in the Evening, who were ſo poſted, that it was very difficult to charge them in front: But then, continues the Marquis, the Cavalry of our Right, and a Body of Infantry, might eaſily have paſs'd the Mandel, to attack the Left Flank of the Enemy, while the reſt of the Army, marching to the Left, might have fac'd the Enemy's Right within the Diſtance of two Muſket-ſhot. Every Circumſtance ariſing from the Preſumption of the Enemy, ſeem'd conducive to the Glory of the Marſhal; or, at leaſt, to furniſh him with an Opportunity of atoning for his paſs'd Miſconduct: But he was as blind as Fortune herſelf, who ſo undeſervedly beſtow'd this Opportunity upon him: And when the Enemy were a ſecond time in his Power, reſolv'd a ſecond time to defer the Attack till the next Day, in Oppoſition to all the Inſtances that could be made to the contrary, by all the Officers about him.

The Prince, in the mean time, who had every thing to apprehend from the Marſhal's Superiority, kept his Troops under Arms all Night, caus'd Entrenchments to be thrown up both in Front and Flank, and in that Poſture reſolv'd to expect the Onſet.

The Morning came; and the Marſhal put his Troops in motion: But, inſtead of diſpoſing them for an immediate Action, he had directed M. de Montal to wheel about by the way of Thielt, towards Curegen, in order to throw himſelf between the Allies and Weinik, and waited for the Effect, that while

A.D. 1695. while he, M. de Montal, fell on their Rear, the reſt of his Army might force the Entrenchments with ſo much the more Eaſe, both in Front and Flank; and that the Prince by the ſame meaſures, might find his Retreat cut off to Ghent.

The ſame Retreat of the Latter.

But no ſooner did his Highneſs obſerve the Van-guard of that Body beginning to ſhew itſelf on his Right Flank, and that every other Motion of the Enemy had a Tendency to ſurround, than he wiſely alter'd his Reſolution from Fighting to Retreating, and made his Diſpoſition accordingly.

He had the Day before ſent off his heavy Baggage to Deynſe, in the way to Ghent; and now he directed his Cannon to take the ſame Rout. He then order'd his Infantry to file off in two Columns thro' the Entrenchment, with their Pikes and Colours trailing; and at the ſame time caus'd the Right Flank of the ſaid Entrenchment to be lin'd with Horſe, that the Motion of the Former might be imperceptible to the Enemy: Nor was it perceiv'd till the Horſe quitted their Poſt; which they were not permitted to do, till the Foot were ſo far advanc'd, and ſo thoroughly form'd, with each Column a ſufficient Body of Horſe to bring up their Rear, that they had little to apprehend from a Perſuit: He alſo directed M. d'Overkirke, with the Right Wing of the Horſe, intermix'd with ſome Battalions of Collier's Brigade of Foot, to face about and form a Line, as if to oppoſe M. de Montal, in caſe he made any Attempt on his Rear; but with orders to march thro' Wiink to Nivel, at the Inſtant that the Foot quitted the Entrenchment, and took the Road to Winterghen: As all theſe Orders were communicated with the utmoſt Exactneſs, ſo they were obey'd with the utmoſt Regularity: The French with Amazement ſaw a whole Army vaniſh, as it were, from before their Eyes at once: And the Prince himſelf, together with the Duke of Wirtemberg, who remain'd in the Camp till the laſt, at the Head of the Line of Horſe which ſuſtain'd the Right Flank, had the Pleaſure to be Eye-witneſſes of the Confuſion it caus'd.

Some feeble Attempts, indeed, they made to retrieve the Advantage they had loſt, by falling in with certain Squadrons of Dragoons on thoſe Parties which brought up the Rear; but the only one which had any Succeſs, ow'd it to a Stratagem: For having put green Boughs in their Hats, which was the Diſtinction of the Confederate Troops in the Day of Battle, and ſpeaking both Engliſh and French, they were miſtaken for Friends, and had thereby an Opportunity of cutting off about 400 Men, before ſuch a Stand could be made as oblig'd them to give over their Enterprize. A.D. 1695.

The Conduct of the Prince was, however, eſteem'd ſo excellent on ſo trying an Occaſion, that this little Miſadventure left no Stain nor Blemiſh upon it: And there was ſo general a Diſpoſition to do it Juſtice, that even the Recollection of his Imprudence in expoſing himſelf and his Army to ſuch an Extremity, ſerv'd only to draw down the heavier (e) Cenſure on M. de Villeroy, who was not qualify'd to draw any Advantage from it. The King, as we have formerly had occaſion to obſerve, was not over liberal in his Acknowledgments of Military Merit: And yet even he could not forbear expreſſing his Senſe of the Prince's Service, in more explicit and lively Terms than were natural to him, as appears by his Letter to that Commander, which is ſtill extant; and in which, after acknowledging he was much oblig'd to him, he adds, For in this Retreat you have manifeſted more of the General conſummate in the Art of War, than if you had won a Battle.

Exact unuſual Acknowledgments from the King.

Towards the Cloſe of the Evening the Prince reach'd Deynſe; and having left a Garriſon in that Town, proceeded on to the Plain of Oyendonck, where he deſign'd to have taken Poſt: But recollecting, tho' late, a Maxim of that great General Charles IV. Duke of Lorrain, his Father, That when an Army is retreating, it muſt be ſure to retreat out of the Enemy's Reach, he alter'd his Mind; and after his Troops had taken ſome little Repoſe, continued his March all Night, with ſuch Diligence, that by Nine in the Morning the whole Army reach'd Mary-Kirk, under the Walls of Ghent; from whence he detach'd twelve Battalions and twelve Pieces of Cannon, under the Command of Lieutenant-General Bellaſiſe, and the Marquis de Miremont, Major-General, to ſecure Newport and the Canal of Paſquendale, which they effected by the Aſſiſtance of the Duke of Wirtemberg, who was appointed with thirty-eight Squadrons of Horſe and Dragoons, to ſuſtain them: For M. de Montal, who thought to have found but a ſmall Garriſon in that Place, being convinc'd of his Miſtake on his coming before it, and ſeeing the whole Country laid under Water by the opening of the Sluices, which was fatal to ſome of his Troops, did not think it adviſable to make any Attempt.

Boyer.

M. de Montal diſappointed in his Deſign upon Newport.

From Newport, however, he proceeded to Dixmuyde, which being ſtrongly garriſon'd,

(e) Biſhop Burnet's Account of this Affair, imperfect as it is in other reſpects, containing a Circumſtance in favour of the Marſhal, which is to be met with no where elſe, I have thought fit to inſert it as follows.

"Prince Vaudemont manag'd his Army with ſuch Skill and Conduct, that as he cover'd all the Places, on which he thought the French had an Eye, ſo he march'd with that Caution, that tho' Villeroy had above double his Strength, yet he could not force him to an Engagement, nor gain any Advantage over him. The military Men that ſerv'd under him, magnify'd his Conduct highly, and compar'd it to any thing that Turenne, or the greateſt Generals of the Age had done. Once it was thought he could not get off; but he march'd under the Cannon of Ghent without any Loſs. In this Villeroy's Conduct was blam'd, but without Cauſe: for he had not overſeen his Advantage, but had order'd the Duke of Mayne, the French King's beloved Son, to make a Motion with the Horſe which he commanded; and, probably, if that had been ſpeedily executed, it might have had ill Effects on the Prince of Vaudemont. But the Duke de Mayne deſpis'd Villeroy, and made no Haſte to obey his Order: ſo the Advantage was loſt, and the King of France put him under a ſlight Diſgrace for it." Vol. II. P. 151.

A. D. 1695 fon'd, tho' ſlightly fortify'd, it was expected might have held out a Fortnight: But Major-General Ellenbergher, who commanded in it, tho' a Soldier of Fortune, who had rais'd himſelf by his diſtinguiſh'd Bravery, not being at all ſkill'd in the Aſſault and Defence of Towns, and judging it impoſſible for a Body of 4 or 5000 Men to hold out againſt a Royal Army, beat a Parley on the third Day of the Siege, tho' the Enemy had not approach'd the Glacis, nor had thrown above thirty Bombs into it, and together with the Place ſurrender'd himſelf, his Officers and (p) Garriſon, Priſoners of War.

But carries Dixmuyde,

He had, nevertheleſs, the Precaution to ſtipulate for the Benefit of the Cartel, ſettled at the Beginning of the War: As alſo, that the Gariſon ſhould not be remov'd out of the Countries conquer'd ſince the Year 1672: And to provide for the Security and ſafe Conduct of the Baggage to Newport.

and Deynſe; which are both diſmantled.

The Place M. de Villeroy order'd to be immediately diſmantled; and while this was doing, M. de Montal had Orders to reduce Deynſe, which was even a leſs difficult Taſk than the Former: For the Governor, O Farrel, ſurrender'd at Diſcretion, without firing a Gun: After which the like Orders were given with regard to the Works of that Place, as had been given before, with regard to thoſe of Dixmuyde: And if the London-Gazette deſerves Credit in Articles of this Nature, not only the Houſes of the Inhabitants, but even the Convents and Churches would have been laid in Ruins, if they had not been redeem'd with a Sum of Money.

No. 3102.

That they refus'd to ranſom the (q) Gariſon, according to the Demand of the Prince of Vaudemont, and the Terms of the Cartel above ſpecify'd, is admitted on all Hands: And as they acted perfidiouſly in that Reſpect, ſo advantage was taken of it by the Confederates, to lay abundantly more to their Charge than they were realy guilty of.

It was ſaid, for example, That by the Dint of ill Uſage, they had oblig'd the Soldiers to enter into their Service: That ſuch as refus'd, they had ſent into Catalonia, and other remote Services: And that they had obtain'd the two Towns by bribing the Governors.

But the Event ſhew'd, That all theſe latter Particulars were untrue: And even Biſhop Burnet ſpeaking of the Trial of theſe unhappy Gentlemen, and the Sentence paſs'd upon them, admits, That their ill Behaviour was owing not to Corruption, but to Cowardice and want of Senſe.

Indeed, in this very act of Juſtice he is not altogether as juſt as he ought to be: For Ellenbergher, in the Courſe of twenty-one Campaigns, had acted with as much Reſolution as any Man he had either ſerv'd with, or againſt: And as to the Defects of his Underſtanding, the Blame deſervedly fell on thoſe who gave him a Truſt which he was not qualify'd to diſcharge: Then as to O Farrel, he demonſtrated that, in the Condition it was, the Place was untenable: That if the Works had been perfect, 5000 Men would have been neceſſary to defend them, whereas he had but 950: And that if the French had known how ſmall his Strength was, they would have granted him no Conditions at all.

A. D. 16[illegible]

Ellenbergher was, however, beheaded, according to the Sentence of the Court-Martial; and at the Place of Execution declar'd, he was condemn'd to Death for other Reaſons than his Behaviour at Dixmuyde; and wiſh'd that his Death might be a means to divert all Diſorders and Misfortunes from his Majeſty's Army.

The command-ing Officers puniſh'd.

Several of the Officers under him were condem'd to be caſhier'd; as was alſo O Farrel: And what Ellenbergher meant by the Words other Reaſons, we may ſafely underſtand to be, for the ſake of Example; ſeeing that the Hiſtorian-Biſhop laſt quoted, without any Diſcrimination, ſpeaks of the Officers try'd on this Occaſion as follows: "They were rais'd in the Army by ill Methods, and maintain'd themſelves by worſe: Corruption had broke into the Army, and Oppreſſion and Injuſtice were much complain'd of: The King did not approve theſe Practices; but he did not enquire after them, nor puniſh them with a due Severity: Nor did he make Difference enough between thoſe who ſerv'd well, ſold nothing, and us'd their Subalterns kindly, and thoſe who ſet every thing to ſale, and oppreſs'd all that were under them: And when Things of that kind go unpuniſh'd, they will ſoon make a great Progreſs."

The Trenches open'd before Namur.

In this Interval, the Trenches before Namur were open'd, and the Siege was carry'd on under the Direction of M. Coborne, with all imaginable Succeſs. The King had given it as his Opinion, that the Attack on the Town ſhould be made againſt St. Nicholas Gate, and the Diſpoſitions had been made accordingly: On the 12th of July the Batteries began to play: And between that and the 18th the Beſieg'd made two or three ſlight Sallies, with deſign to retard the Approaches of the Aſſailants: But, finding it neceſſary to act with more Vigour, if they hop'd for more Succeſs, on the 18th 1200 Horſe and four Squadrons of Dragoons paſs'd the Maeſe, attack'd the Trenches on the Right of the Bridge, and, having carry'd a Redoubt that was not finiſh'd, fell on the Beſiegers poſted in that Quarter, both in front and flank, and drove them from their Works: But the Latter being re-inforc'd by a ſtrong Party of Brandenburgh Horſe, the French were repulſed in their turn; and tho' they made good their Retreat, paid rather too dearly for their Experiment: For tho' the Loſs was in a manner equal on both Sides, the leſs Number was the moſt impair'd by it: Beſides,

(p) Which conſiſted of eight Battalions, viz. two of Engliſh, two of Germans, two of Spaniards, and two of Danes, in all 4046 Men, beſides Officers, which were 250.

(q) Computed by Biſhop Burnet at about 7000, but it is with amounting to no more than 5546.

A. D. 1695. Beſides, the King, as if incens'd at the Bravade, and reſolv'd not to wait a Moment for his Revenge, gave Orders to five Battalions of Foot-Guards, Engliſh, Scots, and Dutch, that were of courſe to relieve the Trenches, under the Command of General Ramſey and Lord Cutts, ſupported by the Troops which were ſo reliev'd, and which conſiſted of ſix Engliſh Battalions, commanded by Brigadier-General Fitz-Patrick, to ſtorm the advanc'd Works and Traverſes of the Enemy, on the Hill near the Bruſſels-Gate: Accordingly, while eight Dutch Regiments and ſeveral thouſand Pioneers kept the Enemy in play on the Left, the Attack was began by theſe ſeveral Corps, about an Hour before Sun-ſet, with great Intrepidity; and was ſuſtain'd as intrepidly by the Enemy: At length, however, the Odds of Numbers got the better of Situation: For, after an obſtinate Struggle, which laſted about two Hours, in the Preſence both of the (r) King and the Elector of Bavaria; and which was fatal to Numbers of brave Men on both ſides, the French were oblig'd to abandon the Forts on the Hill, and a large Retrenchment which led to the Town, being the moſt conſiderable of their Out-works on that ſide, and were perſued to their Glacis: On the Ground thus taken from the Enemy, two Batteries were immediately rais'd: And, not to give a Journal inſtead of a Hiſtory, by the 27th the Approaches were ſo far advanc'd on both Sides the River, and the ſeveral Batteries had play'd with ſuch Succeſs, that the King reſolv'd to ſtorm the firſt Counterſcarp without any farther Delay: Accordingly, by way of Prelude, all the Cannon and Mortars were kept roaring, without Interruption, till Five o'Clock in the Evening, and then the Engliſh began the Attack, under the Conduct of Major-General Ramſey, and Brigadier George Hamilton, with ſo manifeſt a Reſolution either to die or conquer, that notwithſtanding the Enemy ſprung three or four Mines fill'd with Bombs on the Glacis, which at firſt threw them into ſome Diſorder, and they were three ſeveral times repuls'd, they return'd to the Charge as often, drove the Enemy from their Poſts, and made themſelves Maſters of the ſaid Counterſcarp. The Dutch, however, it muſt be obſerv'd, had Orders to ſecond them; and while This paſs'd on the Right, They advanc'd along the Maeſe, and having taken the Enemy in Flank, came in time enough, to A. D. 1695. ſecure the Advantage which the Engliſh had thus hardily obtain'd: For, while the Workmen were endeavouring to make a Lodgment with Wool-ſacks, Gabions, and Faſcines, their Materials took Fire, and the Latter remain'd expos'd to the Shot of the Enemy from the Counter-guard and Demy-Baſtion of St. Roch, which annoy'd them greatly: But no ſooner had their Friends, by the Help of their Grenadoes, thus forc'd the Breach of the ſaid Counter-guard, and, notwithſtanding all the Efforts of the Enemy, lodg'd themſelves upon it, than They alſo had leiſure to complete their Lodgment; and thereby remain'd Maſters of all the firſt Counterſcarp from the Maeſe to the Sluice of the Town-moat.

A conſiderable Out-work ſtorm'd.

The Beſiegers carry the firſt Counterſcarp.

The King was all the while in the Trenches, within reach of the Enemy's Shot; and it is particularly remember'd, That among thoſe who ſuffer'd for partaking the Honour of being near his Perſon, at ſo dangerous a Criſis, was Mr. Godfrey, Deputy-Governor of the Bank, who had viſited the Camp, in order to furniſh, or to regulate, the neceſſary Remittances for the Army; and who was kill'd by a Cannon-Ball in his Majeſty's Preſence (s).

Mr. Godfrey kill'd in the King's Preſence.

The ſame Day, and at the ſame time, the Elector of Bavaria forc'd an advanc'd Poſt between the Sambre and the Caſtle Hill, in which the Enemy had about 400 Men, repuls'd four Squadrons of Horſe and Dragoons, that ſally'd out of the Caſtle to ſuſtain them, threw a Bridge over the Sambre, with very little Loſs, and reduc'd the Abbey of Salſines; which being a Poſt that greatly favour'd the Attack of the Lines rais'd by M. Vauban round the new Works of the Caſtle, the Beſiegers took care to entrench themſelves in, the next Day.

The Elector of Bavaria throws a Bridge over the Sambre.

The ſame Day, alſo, the French were drove from their Poſts next the Iron-Gate; as alſo from their Line of Communication near the Suburb of Jambe, which put it out of their Power to make any more Sallies from that Quarter. The next Undertaking was to drain the Town-moat, which was done by undermining and blowing up the Dam which kept it full: And on the 29th it was reſolv'd at a Council of War, That the Troops under the Command of his Electoral Highneſs ſhould attack the Lines abovemention'd, which extended from the Sambre to

---

(r) Who is ſaid to have laid his Hand often on the Elector's Shoulder, during the Conteſt, and to have exclaim'd in a Tort of Rapture, See my brave Engliſh! See my brave Engliſh!

(s) Tradition alſo adds, That a ſhort Parley had juſt before paſs'd between them, to the following Effect.

King. As you are no Adventurer in the Trade of War, Mr. Godfrey, I think you ſhould not expoſe yourſelf to the Hazards of it.

Mr. God. Not being more expos'd than your Majeſty, ſhould I be excuſable if I ſhew'd more Concern?

King. Yes; I am in my Duty, and therefore have a more reaſonable Claim to Preſervation.

As to the particular Buſineſs which made it neceſſary for the Depoty-Governor of the Bank to attend the Camp in Perſon, we have it no where explain'd: But, probably, the following Paſſage, which is taken from the Brief Account of ſome of the Dutch Encroachments and Depredations, may help us to ſome rational Conjectures concerning it, viz. "And it (the Profit of the Exchange, that is to ſay) was likewiſe the grand Motive why they refus'd to lend the 200,000 l. to the ſaid Bank, which they would have borrow'd of them the laſt Summer, towards the paying our Army's; and for which they offer'd Five per Cent. Intereſt, and not only to give their own Obligations for the Security of the ſaid Principal and Intereſt, and which they ſhould be aſſignable from one Perſon to another, as thoſe of the States of Holland are; but that King William himſelf ſhould, then' a Mortgage of his Revenue and hereditary Lands to the States, become Surety for the Payment of the ſaid Sum, and the Intereſt of it. Which tho' it would have been not only very profitable, but highly reputable to the Dutch, and diſgraceful to King William, and the Kingdom of England, yet upon the Score and Motive of their making a much larger Profit, than that would have amounted unto on the Remittion of Money from hence thither, by bills of Exchange, they laugh'd at the Overture, and ſcornfully rejected the Propoſal." P. 37, 38.

to the Maeſe: The Diſpoſition for this Attack was made the ſame Evening: And as ſoon as it was dark, the Corps order'd on this deſperate Service, advanc'd as near the Enemy's Entrenchments as, without being diſcover'd, they poſſibly could; and there reſted on their Arms till Day-break: At which time the Signals being given from the Camp, they again put themſelves in Motion, and began the Attack at three ſeveral Places at the ſame Inſtant: That is to ſay; The Elector in Perſon, aſſiſted by the Spaniſh and Bavarian Generals, as alſo by M. Coborne, attack'd the Retrenchments towards Salſines in flank; Major-General Swerin the Line in front; and General Fleming, and the other Brandenburgh Commanders, in flank on the Maeſe Side.

But, notwithſtanding the Diſpoſition was good, the Conduct of the Officers irreproachable, and the Behaviour of the Troops firm and reſolute, ſuch were the Difficulties they had to ſurmount, and the Dangers they were to incur, that even M. Coborne himſelf could ſcarce anſwer for the Event: They had a ſteep Hill to climb: The Enemy had planted eight or nine Pieces of Cannon at convenient Places, a good way beyond their Works: All Thoſe of their Fortifications were alſo extremely well pointed, and not ill ſerv'd: They had the Advantage of a Line of Communication, defended by one Redoubt and two Trenches: And, laſtly, they had Men enough to occupy all their Poſts, and Officers and Engineers of ſufficient Valour and Experience to direct and animate them in the Diſcharge of their Duty.

Such was the Proſpect the Aſſailants had from below: And as to the Beſieg'd above, tho' they did not pretend to ſay they could not be forc'd, they ſaid the Experiment would coſt the Confederates at leaſt 5000 Men.

And yet, with all theſe Diſcouragements before them, the Officer led, the Soldier follow'd with equal Fortitude and Perſeverance; and when they came to the Onſet, had ſtill ſuch a Reſerve of Spirit and Vigour, that the Beſieg'd, beginning to think, that nothing was impoſſible to ſuch Deſperadoes, ſhrunk by degrees from their Lines, and the Victors not only turn'd their own Cannon upon them, but, contrary to their Orders, perſued them as far as the Counterſcarp of Coborn-Fort, which they alſo attack'd and carry'd, but were not able to maintain: For the Enemy having ſeveral Pieces of Cannon laden with Cartouches, miſerably ſlaughter'd above 200 of thoſe, who, by this time, had forgot what Fear was; and 900 Men who had lain on their Bellies till that dreadful Diſcharge was over, ſuddenly riſing up, and attacking the Reſidue, they were forc'd to quit their new Acquiſition as ſoon as they had made it.

which are forc'd.

However, the Beſiegers continued Maſters of all the Out-works on the Caſtle ſide, from the Sambre to the Maeſe, which had been cut thro' the Rock with ſuch immenſe Labour and Expence, and which was all They propos'd to carry by this Attack.

The ſame Day alſo a Mine having been ſprung on the Town-ſide, which threw a good Part of the Dam into the Moat, whereby the Water was lower'd above two Foot, his Majeſty order'd the Miners to complete that Work as faſt as poſſible; and directed the neceſſary Preparations for ſtorming the Half-Moon, the cover'd Way, and the Demi-Baſtion at St. Nicholas Gate: Accordingly, all the Batteries, both of Cannons and Mortars, were ply'd inceſſantly for two Days together: And the Breach being eſteem'd practicable, on the Second of Auguſt, towards Evening, the Lord Cutts, with 200 Engliſh Grenadiers, and Brigadier Dedem, with as many Dutch, ſupported by the Battalions in the Trenches, were commanded on that Service, which they undertook with the ſame Bravery which had animated almoſt every Attack during the Siege: For tho' they were repuls'd no leſs than three times, and after they had once reach'd the Baſtion were driven back to the Second Counterſcarp, they nevertheleſs maintain'd their Lodgment there; and ſuch was the Slaughter made amongſt the Enemy, who now lay open on all Sides to the Fire of the Beſiegers, from their Cannon, Mortars, ſmall Arms, and Grenadoes; and ſuch the Apprehenſions of M. de Boufflers and M. de Guiſcard of a general Aſſault, which they ſaw the Confederates were now preparing for, that the next Day they hung out a white Flag, deſir'd to parley, and offer'd to capitulate for the Surrender of the Town: Which being agreed to, Hoſtages were immediately exchang'd; and the next Day the Conditions were ſign'd by the Elector of Bavaria, on the Behalf of the Confederates, and by M. de Guiſcard, Governor of the Place.

A. D. 169

Preparations made for a general Aſſault.

The Town capitulates.

The Gariſon had Permiſſion to retire into the Caſtle; but were allow'd no more than two Days to make their Retreat, inſtead of ſix demanded by M. de Guiſcard: Such of their ſick and wounded, as were not in a Condition to be remov'd, had alſo Permiſſion to ſtay in the Town till they were recover'd: An Article which provided, That the Horſes and Equipages of the Officers ſhould be conducted to Dinant, without being ſtopt or ſearch'd, on any Pretence whatſoever, was rejected wholly; and as to what concern'd the Proſecution of Hoſtilities from the Town and Caſtle againſt each other, no mention was made on either Side.

For the reſt, the Beſiegers were immediately put in poſſeſſion of one of the Gates: On the 6th, about Noon, the Gariſon withdrew into the Caſtle, and broke down the Bridge behind them: The Number of their Sick and wounded was 1430, of whom 1[illegible] were Officers: Their Dragoons were reduced to about one Third of their original Number; and their whole remaining Strength was computed at 6 or 7000 Men.

The Gariſon withdraws into the Caſtle.

On the 7th, towards the Evening, the Batteries were open'd againſt the Caſtle; and notwithſtanding the heavy and continual Rains which fell, all imaginable Meaſures were taken for proſecuting the Siege without Delay.

But while theſe Things were in agitation, M. de Villeroy paſs'd the Lys at Wacken, and croſs'd

A.D. 1695. croſs'd the Lines to the Schelde, which he alſo paſs'd, by the Help of four Bridges, at Eſcanaffe, and advanc'd to Ninove: The Prince of Vaudemont, on the other Hand, no ſooner receiv'd Advice of the Marſhal's Motion, than he alſo decamp'd from Ghent, and paſſing the Canal at Vilvoerd, and the Burnt Bridge, took Poſt at Dighen.

The French on their March had given out, That they were going to raiſe the Siege: But when it was underſtood, that they were attended by a long Train of Waggons, laden with Bombs and other Engines of Deſtruction; and that they were advanc'd to Enghien, the Prince diſcover'd, that their Deſign was upon Bruſſels, which could no otherwiſe be prevented, than by the Aſſiſtance of a very conſiderable Re-inforcement from the Army, and by taking Poſt in the Plain of Gigot and St. Pee: But the King, on Advice of the Marſhal's Motion, had already detach'd the Earl of Athlone and Count Naſſau, with thirty Battalions and forty Squadrons, to poſt themſelves between Waterlo and Genap, in order to oppoſe the Enemy's Paſſage at Braine le Chateau, and follow'd them in Perſon with twenty Squadrons more: So that nothing remain'd for the Prince to do, but to encamp his Infantry on the Eminence near Bruſſels, between Montzey and the Counterſcarp of Ixel: By which means the Communication was open between his Forces and thoſe of Waterlo; and he had it in his Power to throw ſeveral Battalions into the Out-works before the Gates of Flanders and Anderleck; and alſo to extend his Horſe and Dragoons along the Canal, to hinder the Enemy from paſſing it.

He comes before Bruſſels.

But all theſe Precautions were not ſufficient to defeat M. de Villeroy's Purpoſe: For having brought up his Army in ſight of Bruſſels, and taken his Quarters at Anderleck, he ſent a Letter to the Prince of Bergbem, Governor of that City, ſignifying,

His Letter to the Governor.

"That the Prince of Orange having ſent his Fleet upon the Coaſt of France, to bombard and ruin the Sea-ports, without any Proſpect of Advantage to himſelf, the King his Maſter thought he could no otherwiſe put a Stop to ſuch Diſorders, than by making Repriſals: That for this Reaſon he had ſent his Commands to him to bombard Bruſſels; and at the ſame time to declare, That it was with Reluctance his Majeſty was conſtrain'd to make uſe of this Expedient: As alſo, That as ſoon as he ſhould be aſſur'd his Sea-ports ſhould no more be bombarded, he would bombard the Towns of his Enemies no more, with an Exception to ſuch Places as ſhould be beſieg'd, which ſhould be liable to the ſame Treatment as before: That his Majeſty's Concern on this Occaſion was ſo much the greater, becauſe the Electoreſs of Bavaria had her Reſidence there: That if the Governor would let him know in what Quarter her Electoral Highneſs had her Abode, he would take care that his Batteries ſhould not be directed that way, agreeable to his Maſter's Commands: And that he ſhould ſtay for his Anſwer till Five in the Afternoon; after which time he ſhould obey the Orders he had receiv'd, without Delay." A.D. 1695.

By this time the Elector himſelf, who, on Advice of the Enemy's Deſign, had poſted from the Camp, was arriv'd; and M. de Villeroy's Letter having been imparted to him, the Anſwer he return'd was to this Effect, "That the Reaſon aſſign'd by the King of France for his Orders to the Marſhal, to bombard Bruſſels, did ſolely regard the King of England, who was before the Caſtle of Namur: That his Electoral Highneſs would acquaint him with it, and procure an Anſwer in twenty-four Hours, if that would be agreeable: And that as to the Conſideration which his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty had ſhewn to the Electoreſs, her Abode was at the Royal Palace."

He bombards the Place.

But the Marſhal having no Power to accept of this Expedient, and the real Purpoſe of the Bombardment being to create a Miſunderſtanding between the King and his Allies, in caſe he refus'd to quit the Siege of Namur, in order to cover the Place, or at leaſt to oblige the Laſter to interpoſe with his Majeſty to ſpare the French Ports for the time to come, he proceeded to raiſe his Batteries: And as ſoon as they were completed, began to fire upon the City, with twenty-five Mortar-pieces, and eighteen Pieces of Cannon, loaded with red-hot Balls. Between Six and Seven in the Evening this Scene of Deſtruction was open'd; and the Proceſs was continued with very little Intermiſſion, till the 15th in the Afternoon; in which time it was computed they diſcharg'd about 2000 Bombs into the Place, beſides Shot: Above 1500 Houſes, ſix Churches and Convents, and many other public Buildings, were laid in Ruins: For the Wind blowing ſtrongly from the Enemy, during the greateſt Part of the time, the Flames were communicated on all Sides, and probably would have conſum'd the whole City, if Numbers of Houſes had not been blow'd up, in order to prevent the Contagion. Nor was this the only Circumſtance which help'd to increaſe the Horror and Confuſion of the miſerable Inhabitants: For they, having maintain'd, from the Beginning of the War, a continual Commerce with France, thought themſelves exempt from any ſuch Viſitation; and for that Reaſon had remov'd none of their Effects: So that the Loſs in Goods and Merchandizes, was thought to equal, if not ſurpaſs, the viſible Deſolation of Buildings, &c.

The Prince of Vaudemont, who had fortified his Camp on a Hill, oppoſite to that occupy'd by the Enemy, had the Mortification to be an Eye-witneſs of the Tragedy which he was too weak either to prevent or avenge: And as to the Electoreſs, ſo little Confidence did ſhe place in the Marſhal's Complement, and ſo thoroughly was ſhe terrify'd with the Roarings of his Artillery, and the Deſtruction it caus'd, that ſhe miſcarry'd upon it: And according to Biſhop Burnet, of a Son, which, however, is a Circumſtance that is verify'd by no other Author.

A. D. 1695. The French Army comes in sight of the Confederates.

And now the Marſhal, having diſcharg'd his (t) Commiſſion on Bruſſels, and receiv'd Advice, That the Detachment from the Rhine was within a few Days March of him, he decamp'd from before this City, and return'd to Enghien, where he continued till the 20th, and then advanc'd to Soignies, having been re-inforc'd in his way by the Troops employ'd in raſing Dixmuyde and Deynſe, and all that could be ſpar'd out of all the Gariſons round about.

In all the Motions he made, he was narrowly obſerv'd by the Price of Vaudemont, who having join'd the Earl of Athlone at Waterlo, advanc'd firſt to Genap and then to Mazey, a ſtrong Camp within two little Leagues of the main Army, where he was join'd by the Heſſians and Lunenburghers, under the Command of the Landgrave of Heſſe, from the Rhine.

His Majeſty had return'd to the Siege of the Caſtle on the 12th: The ſame Night the Trenches were open'd: The next and the following Days the Beſiegers continued their Approaches with all poſſible Diligence; and the Beſieg'd omitted nothing that could contribute to their Defence: But ſo terrible was the Fire of the Former, and ſo great the Deſtruction it made among the Latter, that M. de Bouffiers finding it impoſſible to ſuſtain it long, and dreading a Capitulation almoſt as much, form'd a deſperate Deſign to break thro' the Confederate Camp with his Cavalry: But his Majeſty having receiv'd Intimation of it, caus'd ſuch ſtrong Guards to be plac'd at all the fordable Places both of the Sambre and the Maeſe, that the Marſhal did not think fit to make the Attempt: That his Stay might, however, be made as honourable to himſelf and as fatal to the Enemy as poſſible, on the 18th, towards Midnight, he caus'd a Sally to be made by 200 Dragoons mounted and 500 Grenadiers, in hope to ſcour the Trenches, and ruin the Works of the Beſiegers: But it fail'd of the deſir'd Effect: For part of the Dragoons, who began the Charge, were immediately repuls'd by the Bavarians; and the reſt who had oblig'd an advanc'd Guard of forty Engliſh to retire, not being properly ſupported by the Grenadiers, were driven by the Spaniſh and Bavarian Horſe back to the very Palliſadoes of the Caſtle.

A. D. 1695.

As yet Hoſtilities had not been commenc'd between the Town and the Caſtle; but on the 21ſt, as many Batteries were open'd againſt the Latter, on all Sides, as employ'd no leſs than 166 Pieces of Cannon, and 60 Mortars: And as if the Beſiegers had deſign'd to level the Walls like thoſe of Jericho, with one Blaſt, the dreadful Buſineſs of the Day was open'd with one general Diſcharge from all theſe Batteries at the ſame Inſtant, with ſuch an Effect, that not only the whole Circumference of the Caſtle, but the very Hill it ſtood on, ſeem'd to reel with the Shock, and to be loſt in the Cloud of Smoke and Duſt that follow'd it: Scarce could the Beſiegers themſelves ſuſtain the Horrors of their own Experiment; and as to the Beſieg'd, their Conſternation and Confuſion were inexpreſſible: Thoſe that eſcap'd could ſcarce believe they had eſcap'd, nor could prevail on themſelves to be thankful for their Preſervation: Every Object round about them wore a Face of Ruin; for burſting Bombs, fractur'd Battlements, dying Men, and Horſes ſtaking themſelves on the Paliſadoes, or plunging headlong into the Ditches, in a Fit of ungovernable Phrenzy, were the only Objects they were ſurrounded with: The ſame Experiment they knew would be repeated: The ſame Agonies they knew it would occaſion: Danger in a thouſand Shapes appear'd every where: Safety no where: And even to the Receſſes under Ground, which had been provided againſt ſuch a Storm as this, and in which the Marſhal himſelf, and his prime Officers, found it ſometimes neceſſary to take Refuge, both Deſpair and Deſpondency follow'd.

Such and ſo deſperate was the State of Things when M. de Villeroy, having firſt ſent off his heavy Baggage to Mons, and taken ſuch other Meaſures as are uſually the Prelude to an Engagement, came in ſight of the Caſtle with his Army; and by way of Signal of his Approach, and Encouragement to the Beſieg'd made a Diſcharge of ninety Pieces of Cannon, which was anſwer'd at Night by a great Light from the moſt elevated Part of the Caſtle. The 26th he took Poſt near the Army of the Allies, having Flerus on his Right, and Sombref on his Left: The next Day he was join'd by the Detachment

(t) The French Court thinking it convenient to ſet forth a ſort of Manifeſto in the Paris-Gazette on this Occaſion, the London-Gazette was authoriz'd to return the following Anſwer.

The Paris-Gazette, of the 20th of this Month, concludes with a long Article about the bombarding of Bruſſels, and would perſuade the World that the French King always diſlik'd ſuch Hoſtilities, and offer'd now to forbear them, upon Condition the Allies would promiſe the like on their ſide; but omits, what is very remarkable, that the Marſhal de Villeroy, who ſent that Meſſage to the Governor of Bruſſels, would not ſtay till an Anſwer could be had from his Majeſty, but began to fire ſo ſoon as his Batteries could be got ready, and thereby ſhew'd that he had no other Deſign in what he propos'd, than to delude ignorant People. One would have thought, that before the French had complain'd of the Allies having bombarded the Maritime Places of France, and pretended to ſo much Unwillingneſs to make Reprifals in the ſame kind, they would let us have forgot the Deſtruction of the City of Genoa in a time of Peace, and upon no other Provocation than their being diſſatisfy'd with the Conduct of that Republic; and the many Cruelties and horrible Deſolations which their Troops have made in the Palatinate, Piedmont, and other Places, to a Degree that the moſt barbarous Nations would be aſham'd of. But they are in Poſſeſſion of doing and publiſhing whatever may be for their Purpoſe, without thinking themſelves oblig'd by any Rule of Juſtice or Sincerity: As, among other Things, appears by the many ſhameful Falſities as are weekly printed by public Authority, to amuſe and keep up the Hearts of the People; and particularly by the Account which the Gazette of the 13th gives, That eight Men of War of Admiral Rooke's Fleet were ſunk, and fifteen unmaſted by the Storm that drove them to Sardinia: And it deſerves to be likewiſe taken Notice of, That while they boaſt to have bombarded Bruſſels, in the Sight of the Confederate Army, who would not venture a Battle, for which the Marſhal de Villeroy fought in an Occaſion, they do not remember how lately the French Army cover'd themſelves behind their Lines to avoid one, when they had an equal Force to deal with: But 'tis a Sign their Affairs are in an ill Condition, when they need ſuch Methods to ſupport them." No 3107.

A. D. 1695. ment from the Rhine, and the other Forces under the Command of the Marquis de Harcourt: So that the whole of his Army was now ſuppos'd to amount to near 100,000 Men: And it was the univerſal Expectation, That he would have forc'd the Allies to a Battle.

The King, on the firſt Advice of his Approach, left the Direction of the Siege to the Elector of Bavaria and the Duke of Holſtein-Ploen and repair'd to the Army, which was, at the ſame time, yet farther re-inforc'd with ten Battalions and twenty-two Squadrons.

On the 28th the Marſhal remov'd to Gembloux; and the next Day actually drew out his Forces, and advanc'd in Battalia as near the Allies as the Ground would give him Leave. His Majeſty, on the other Hand, quitted his Lines alſo, as if to accept the Challenge, and continued on Horſe-back from Four in the Morning till Eight at Night, in making his Diſpoſitions, and expecting the Approach of the Enemy; which was all that belong'd to him, unleſs his Superiority had been ſuch as might have commanded a Victory.

But tho' on the other Hand, it was incumbent on the Marſhal to begin the Attack, as being come to the Reſcue of a Place of great Importance, which was on the Point of falling into the Hands of the Enemy, either he was ſo cramp'd by his Orders, or he found the Taſk ſo difficult, that he not only forbore the Experiment, but decamp'd in the Night, as ſilent as poſſible, and coaſting along the Mehaigne, extended his Right to Perwys, and his Left to Boneffe.

The Allies alſo, on their Side, who had remain'd under Arms, by expreſs Order, all Night, in the Morning ſtretch'd on towards Oſtein and Long-Champ, to obſerve them: And M. de la Foreſt, who commanded a Body of Reſerve in the Plain of Boneffe, had Orders to re-join the Army, which it was high time for him to do, ſeveral Squadrons of the French Houſhold Troops having paſs'd the Mehaigne, in order to cut off his Communication with it: As it was, he could not wholly avoid the Inſult: But the Dragoons of Dopſt, being advantageouſly poſted at a Defile, to cover their Retreat, the Enemy did not think it adviſable to proſecute their Attempt any farther, but, facing about ſomewhat abruptly, repaſs'd the Mehaigne, and left the Allies to proſecute the Siege without further Moleſtation.

But avoids an Engagement.

On the very Day of this Retreat, it had been reſolv'd to make a general Aſſault; 3000 Grenadiers had been detach'd from the Army, to co-operate in it; and almoſt from Day-break till Eleven o'Clock, all the Batteries had been kept roaring without Remiſſion, to widen the ſeveral Breaches already made, and to render the Effort that was to be made, ſo much the more practicable.

But when the Diſpoſition for that dreadful Service was thoroughly form'd, and all the Commanding Officers were at the Head of their ſeveral Attacks, a Signal was made for a Parley by the Elector's Command; upon which the Cannon being ſilenc'd on both Sides, the Count de Horn, accompany'd by the Earl of Portland, were ſent to ſummon the Beſieg'd: And on the Side of the Latter, the Count de Laumont and Meſſ. de Grammont and St. Hermine, appear'd on the neareſt Baſtion to receive their Propoſals; which were to this Effect, "That the Marſhal de Villeroy, after continuing three Days in ſight of the Confederate Army, having thought fit to retire without coming to an Engagement, and conſequently all their Expectations of Relief being at an End, his Electoral Highneſs, for the ſake of preſerving the Lives of ſo many brave Men, as would otherwiſe be ſacrific'd, had ſent the Count de Guiſcard an Offer of honorable Terms, in caſe he conſented to ſurrender the Caſtle, and came to a Reſolution in a Quarter of an Hour, which was all the time of Deliberation he was allow'd."

The Caſtle ſummon'd.

The Count promis'd a ſpeedy Anſwer; and a Pauſe enſued, which was altogether as ſolemn and awful, as the Matter in debate was momentous: But twice the time prefix'd being elaps'd, the Count grew impatient, and preſs'd M. de Grammont to ſend a ſecond Meſſenger for an immediate Anſwer: A ſecond Meſſenger was accordingly ſent; but with no better Succeſs: For another Quarter of an Hour was conſum'd, and ſeveral Officers came down to view the Breach; which put an End to the Parley: For the Earl of Portland would wait no longer: And no ſooner were they return'd to the Elector's Quarters, than the Signal was ſtruck, the Batteries were ply'd with more Fury than ever, till near Two o'Clock: And then the ſeveral Parties iſſued ſeverally out of the Trenches to the general Aſſault, not only with an Ardor ſuitable to the Dangers they were to face, and the Difficulties they were to conquer; but with ſuch a Spirit of Emulation, as if the only thing they fear'd was to be ſurpaſs'd by one another.

But in vain.

A general Aſſault.

The Number of Troops employ'd on this Occaſion, amounted in the whole to 10,000, and were divided into four different Attacks: Lord Cutts, at the Head of the Engliſh, was commanded to lodge himſelf in the Breach of Terra-Nova-Fort; Count Rivera, at the Head of the Spaniards and Bavarians, had Orders to force two ſmall Breaches in the Angle of the Platform of Fort Coborne; Major-General la Cave, with the Dutch, and Major-General Sweerin, with the Brandenburghers, were appointed to ſtorm the Caſette, or Devil's-Houſe, by two different Approaches; and Count Marſilly, with 500 Men, as a ſort of Corps de Reſerve, was poſted in the Bottom, between Fort Coborne and Terra-Nova, to find the Enemy Employment, in caſe they ſhould make a Sally on that Side.

According to the Plan, all theſe different Attacks were to have been made at the ſame Inſtant; in hope that the Enemy, find themſelves equally preſs'd in ſo many Places at once, would have been thrown into Confuſion, and thereby would have been diſabled

A. D. 1695. abled from making any material Reſiſtance: But neither Time nor Manner were obſerv'd as they ought to have been: For Lord Cutts, at the Head of 300 Grenadiers, and ſome Engliſh Volunteers of Diſtinction, tho' he had 7 or 800 Paces to march to the Breach he was appointed to attack, puſh'd on with ſo much Impetuoſity and Raſhneſs, that the (u) Battalions appointed to ſuſtain him, were ſcarce got out of their Lines when he had mounted the Breach: Which was ſo much the more to be regretted, becauſe the Enemy, by reaſon of the great Diſtance of the Trenches from that Quarter, did not expect to be attack'd there, nor were prepar'd to make any Oppoſition: But when they diſcover'd how ſmall the Number of theſe Deſperadoes was, how remote the Battalions were appointed to ſupport them; and that the Spaniards and Bavarians had alſo made ſuch a Miſtake in the Conduct of their Attack, as left them nothing to apprehend from their Efforts, for a conſiderable time at leaſt, They drew together no leſs than 2000 of their beſt Foot and Dragoons in the Space between the two Forts, and falling on the Engliſh both in Flank and Rear, not only oblig'd them to retreat with Precipitation, but, following them thro' the Breach, routed Count Marſilly and his Party, and took him Priſoner. By this time, however, three of the other Battalions came up, and after having exchang'd no leſs than ſix Diſcharges, oblig'd the Enemy to retreat in their turn, but in ſo good Order, and after having done ſo much Execution, that the Aſſailants were not neither in a Condition to follow them, or to renew their Attempt on that Side.

The Engliſh repuls'd.

As to the Miſtake committed by the Count de Rivera and his Detachment, it conſiſted in this, That inſtead of marching to the Left of the Platform, he wander'd to the Right, towards the cover'd way, before the great Breach, which was well ſecur'd with ſtrong Paliſadoes, and thoſe again were ſo well lin'd with Muſqueteers, that for two Hours together, during all which time the Fire on both Sides were one of the moſt dreadful that ever had been ſeen, the Aſſailants were able to make no conſiderable Impreſſion, but, on the contrary, ſuffer'd extremely; the Count de Rivera, their Leader, being kill'd, as alſo moſt of his Officers, and numbers of the beſt and braveſt of his Troops.

At laſt, however, by the mere Dint of Reſolution and Perſeverance, they made a Shift to gain the outermoſt Retrenchment of the Point of Coborne-Fort, next the Sambre: But tho' they maintain'd their Poſt with the ſame Spirit with which they acquir'd it, they found it impoſſible to advance any farther: And while the Conteſt was prolong'd on both Sides, as if with a Purpoſe to deſtroy, not with a Hope to ſubdue one, another, Lord Cutts, having had a Wound, which he receiv'd in his Head, dreſs'd, return'd to the Aſſault, and thought it more adviſable to ſuſtain the Bavarians than to renew the Attack, in which he had miſcarry'd before. A. D. 1695.

Accordingly, having drawn out a Party of 200 ſuch Men, as, for the Sake of the Rewards promis'd by his Lordſhip, were daring and deſperate enough to follow Curtius himſelf into the very Gulph of Perdition, and found them a ſuitable Leader, one Lieutenant Cockle, he order'd them to attack the Face of the Saillant-Angle Sword in Hand, to force the Paliſadoes, and having enter'd the Cover'd-way, to make a Lodgment there: He alſo order'd Mackay's Regiment to ſuſtain them; and that they might alſo be induc'd to behave as gallantly as ever Men behav'd, he oblig'd their ſeveral Enſigns to march at their Head, and to plant their Colours on the Paliſadoes: He then rally'd the other Regiments, and completed his whole Diſpoſition as well as the preſent Exigence would allow: But while this was doing, Cockle, at the Head of his Deſperadoes, had perform'd all he undertook: The Paliſadoes bent like Reeds before them: The Defendants reel'd, as if with the ſame Motion; and, after a ſlight Reſiſtance, abandon'd the Cover'd-way, together with one of their Batteries, the Cannon of which Cockle, as ſoon as he had made his Lodgment, turn'd upon them.

The Bavarians, on the other Hand, feeling the Benefit of ſo ſeaſonable a Diverſion, renew'd their Efforts with ſuch Vigour, that they repuls'd the Enemy and ſecur'd their Poſt; which after ſo long and obſtinate a Struggle, was all they were able to do.

As theſe were the Attacks moſt apprehended by the Defendants, ſo they had here diſpos'd their beſt Troops, and hither they directed their principal Attention: Whence it follow'd, that M. la Cave met with little Reſiſtance in his Attempt on the other Cover'd way, and made his Lodgment without any conſiderable Loſs. and thereby facilitate M. la Cave's Attack.

How far Major-General Swerin's Attack on the Out-works of the Caſotte was facilitated by the ſame Conſiderations, has not been ſpecify'd: But it is acknowledg'd on all Hands, That none of the Commanders employ'd in this Service, ſurpaſs'd him in Conduct, or equal'd him in Succeſs: For having advanc'd with his Diviſion towards the Cover'd-way and Retrenchment between the Caſotte and the Maeſe, he drove the Enemy from their Poſts, ſecur'd all the Avenues, and made a very good Lodgment all along the ſaid Cover'd-way and Retrenchment, of about 300 Paces long, which he likewiſe extended to the Left, turning in towards the Coborne about 140 Paces more, in order to join it to that of M. la Cave, which reach'd to the Ravelin of the ſaid Fort. Boyer. The Out-works of the Caſotte cover'd by the Brandenburghers.

Thus, altho' for want of a due Correſpondence among the ſeveral Attacks, or thro' the Failure or Miſunderſtanding of the ſeveral Signals, the Aſſailants miſcarry'd in their great Deſign of taking the Caſtle, and all its prodigious

A. D. 1695. prodigious Outworks, by one general Storm. They had, nevertheleſs, this Conſolation, That a Lodgment of almoſt an Engliſh Mile in extent, was to the full as great an Acquiſition, as ever had been made at any Aſſault before.

A moſt Lodgment made.

Indeed, if it was conſiderable in the Poſſeſſion, it was alſo dear in the Purchaſe: For the Beſiegers own'd it coſt them near 2000 Lives, of which ſome were of Note: For beſides the Count de Rivera, already mention'd, were the Colonels Coultborp, Marſilly, Lindroſt, and d'Heckeren, Lieutenant Colonel Fabricius, and Captain Mitchel, of the Engliſh Guards: And among the wounded (beſides Lord Cutts and all his Voluntiers, viz. the Colonels Windſor, Stanhope, and Evans, and one Mr. Thompſon) were reckon'd, the Prince of Holſtein-Norburgh, Brigadier-General; the Prince of Heſſe-Homburgh, M. Eppingen, M. Zinzenburgh, M. Caunitz, M. Horne, Count Dona, M. Zurelburgh, M. Melun, Count de Denhoff, and M. Hamilton, all Colonels; and a long Liſt of Lieutenant-Colonels, Majors, Captains, &c. over and above.—But in the Trade of War, Lives are only put on the ſame Footing with Money in the ordinary Concerns of Life: And if they are laid out for their full Value, the Hero expects to be complemented for his Conduct, inſtead of being blam'd for his Extravagance.

It is, however, allow'd, tho' not in the London-Gazette, that the Elector of Bavaria partook of all the Dangers of the Attack in common with his Men: That by ſhewing himſelf fearleſs, he taught others not to fear: That by a liberal Diſtribution of his Gold among the Brave, he transform'd Avarice itſelf into Valour: That he was on Horſe-back during the whole time: That many Perſons were kill'd and wounded round about him; and that in all Reſpects his Behaviour was ſuch as became a great Prince, and an accompliſh'd General.

The next Day was wholly ſpent by the Beſiegers in perfecting the Lodgments they had made the Day before, and in making the neceſſary Preparations for another general Aſſault; which from Circumſtances one may gather, they were not however over forward to begin. For the Defendants having, on the Morrow, demanded a Truce for the Burial of their Dead, it was readily granted; and, at the ſame time, the whole Proceſs was in a manner at a ſtand, in Expectation of the King and Prince of Vaudemont, who were Both on their way from the Army in his Majeſty's Coach, in order to aſſiſt at a Council of War, in ſettling the Plan of the next Attack.

A Truce granted for the Burial of the Dead.

On the other Hand, if the Beſiegers had their Reaſons to be ſomewhat more cautious in their next Effort, the Beſieg'd were not willing to bear the Brunt of it: For when the Time of the Truce was almoſt expir'd, the Count de Guiſcard appear'd on the Breach, and deſir'd a Parley with the Elector of Bavaria, who immediately accepted the Invitation: The Count made an Offer of ſurrendering Fort Coborne, which his Electoral Highneſs refus'd, by ſaying, That if he deſir'd to capitulate, it muſt be for the whole. M. de Guiſcard reply'd, That the Marſhal de Boufflers commanded in the Caſtle: That he would acquaint him with what had paſs'd; and that he hop'd the Truce would be prolong'd till he ſhould return an Anſwer: To this the Elector agreed; as the Marſhal alſo did, to treat for the whole. On his Majeſty's Arrival in the Lines, Hoſtages were exchang'd, and the Marſhal ſent his Propoſitions: But having demanded, by way of Preliminary, That he might be allow'd ten Days to expect Relief, it was peremptorily refus'd; and thus the Event of the Treaty became once more as dubious as ever.

A. D. 1695

A Parley began.

The Beſieg'd demand a Reſpite for ten Days, which is refus'd.

But the Preſſures of a Siege will not admit of thoſe Refinements which are practis'd in Courts: When, therefore, the Marſhal was made ſenſible, that there was no Medium between an immediate Surrender and the Hazard of a Storm, he made the Former his Choice, and accepted ſuch Terms as among Soldiers are eſteem'd the moſt honourable: Theſe were ſettled the ſame Night, and ſign'd the next Morning by the Marſhal himſelf; M. de Guiſcard very prudently excuſing himſelf from that Ceremonial, becauſe he only commanded in the Out-works, and not in the Caſtle, during the Siege: What follow'd was the immediate Surrender of Fort Coborne, the Caſotte, &c. to the Beſiegers; and a Declaration of their good Succeſs to the French Army, by a triple Diſcharge of all the Artillery, and three Salvoes in a running Fire along the Lines; which M. de Villeroy had no ſooner heard, than he decamp'd from Gemblours, where he had poſted himſelf all this time, and paſs'd the Sambre, near Charleroy, with ſome Precipitation.

and capitulate on honourable Terms.

M. de Villeroy decamps.

On the other Hand, the King, on Advice of this Motion, order'd ſeveral Brigades towards Salſines, and alſo a Bridge to be laid over the Sambre, that he might be in a Condition to oppoſe the Enemy, in caſe they ſhould make any Attempt between the Sambre and the Maeſe, whilſt the French remain'd in poſſeſſion of Terra-Nova-Fort. But the Marſhal was now in Deſpair, it ſeems, of ſnatching any new Advantage from the Confederates to qualify the Diſgraces of the Year; and thinking it the whole of his Duty to be on his Guard againſt any new Misfortune, threw a Reinforcement of 2000 Men into Dinant, and proceeded with the reſt of his Army towards the Lines near Mons.

The 5th of September, being the Day propos'd by the Capitulation for evacuating the Caſtle, the ſeveral Corps of Horſe and Foot that were encamp'd between the Sambre and the Maeſe, were commanded to make a Lane on both Sides, from the Breach in Terra-Nova-Fort, through which it was agreed the Garriſon ſhould march out, to the Maeſe, being their ſhorteſt way to Givet, whither they were to be conducted: Which was no ſooner perform'd, than the Garriſon, or rather the Remains of it, (for they were diminiſh'd to 5538 Men) began

The Caſtle evacuated.

A. D. 1695 began their March: The Marſhal's Body-Guards and Domeſtics having the Van, and then the Marſhal appearing himſelf, accompany'd by M. de Gaiſcard, and attended by about eighty or ninety Dragoons.

The King (in a Coach, incognito, becauſe not acknowledg'd in his Royal Capacity by the Enemy) the Elector of Bavaria, the Landgrave of Heſſe, and all the principal Officers of the Army on Horſe-back, attended to ſee them paſs, within 200 Paces of the Breach, and were ſaluted by the Marſhal and the Count, after the military manner, with their Swords.

But this Ceremonial was ſcarce over, before M. Dykvelt, one of the States Field-Deputies, made up to the Marſhal, and deſir'd him to withdraw with him out of the Lines, becauſe he had ſomething of Conſequence to impart to him: The Marſhal, with ſome Emotion, reply'd, That having no ſuſpected Perſons about him, he might ſay what he pleas'd to him where they were: M. Dykvelt then drawing nearer, told him, He was the King of England's Priſoner, and that as ſuch he was to return to the Town. The Marſhal appear'd like one thunder-ſtruck, and dropt ſome broken Expreſſions that diſcover'd as much Rage as Confuſion: Some of his Officers appear'd alſo as much tranſported as he, and talk'd, at leaſt, as if they were ready to die in his Defence: But this was Madneſs: Thoſe who had not been able to defend themſelves behind the Ramparts of Namur, could not but know they were at Mercy now: Beſides, at this Inſtant Brigadier-General de l'Etang, at the Head of a Party of Horſe-Guards, coming up, demanded his Sword; and the Diſpoſition on all Sides convinc'd him, that Reſiſtance was impracticable. Inſtead, therefore, of a ridiculous Appeal to the Sword, he had Recourſe to Argument; he demanded the Benefit of a Capitulation, ſign'd by the Elector of Bavaria, in which he was comprehended by Name, and which he had, in no Reſpect, violated: Said, He had not deſerv'd ſuch Treatment; and that the King his Maſter would not fail to avenge it. M. de l'Etang anſwer'd like a Soldier, That his Buſineſs was to obey Orders, not to weigh Conſequences. But M. Dykvelt gave him to underſtand, That the Breach of Articles he complain'd of, was no more than a Reprizal: That his Maſter had himſelf ſet the Example, by detaining the Garriſons of Dixmeyde and Deynſe, who, as Priſoners of War, were entitled to their Liberty upon Ranſom, which had been offer'd and refus'd: That one Infraction authoris'd another: That his Britannic Majeſty would have been juſtify'd, if he had detain'd the whole Garriſon: That he did not, however, think fit to carry a Precedent to its full Extent which he did not approve; but, on the contrary, choſe to ſignify his high Opinion of the Marſhal, by chuſing to detain him as a ſufficient Security for thoſe Garriſons which conſiſted of no leſs than 6000 Men: And that he had his Majeſty's Orders to offer him his Liberty, if he would paſs his Word for the Reſtitution of the ſaid Garriſons, or to re-ſurrender himſelf as a Priſoner in a Fortnight."

M. Bouffliers arreſted by way of Reprizal for the Garriſons of Dixmeyde and Deynſe.

A. D. 16

The Marſhal did not, however, think fit to accept of his Liberty on ſuch Terms, nor could be reconcil'd to his Confinement by ſuch a Compliment. "I cannot, ſaid he, undertake for what is not in my Power to execute:—If I was at the Head of 50,000 Men, I would not be arreſted.—But as it is, I muſt ſubmit."

And thus ended the Controverſy: The Marſhal gave up his Sword, and ſubmitted to be re-conducted to Namur, while the Garriſon proceeded to Givet.

His Confinement, however, was not long, and Care was taken to render it as ſupportable as poſſible, by all the Reſpects and Civilities that could be ſhewn him: For he was ſcarce lodg'd in the Town before the Earl of Portland paid him a Viſit, and, after making him ſome Complements, renew'd the Offer which had been made him before by M. Dykvelt; but receiv'd much the ſame Anſwer. He ſaid, He did not know what Reaſons his Maſter had for detaining thoſe Garriſons, and therefore could not engage for any thing concerning them: By way of Expedient, however, he conſented to ſend the Captain of his Guards expreſs to his Court, to ſignify the State of his Caſe, and on what Terms he might have his Diſcharge: And during that Interval he was conducted to Maeſtricht; that the Mortification of ſeeing himſelf a Priſoner where he had ſo lately been Maſter, might be the ſooner forgot. But, indeed, he had ſcarce time to feel his Impriſonment at all: For ſuch Expedition did the Officer make in his Journey, and ſo readily did the Moſt Chriſtian King comply with thoſe Terms, that on the 13th following, the Confederate-Army being then at Limbeck, the Elector of Bavaria repair'd thither from Bruſſels, and gave his Majeſty to underſtand, That the Marſhal had let him know, His Maſter would releaſe the Garriſon, provided he was releas'd firſt: And he was releas'd accordingly, on paſſing his Word, That the ſaid Garriſons ſhould be ſent back, as ſoon as his Majeſty had Advice of his being arriv'd at Dinant. But King Lewis did not think the Conceſſion he ſo inſtantly made for the Recovery of the Marſhal's Liberty, a ſufficient Acknowledgment of his Merits and Services: On the contrary, he receiv'd him at his Return to Court, as if he had added a City to his Dominions: He embrac'd him in his Arms; he declar'd himſelf fully ſatisfy'd with his Conduct, in the moſt gracious Expreſſions he could uſe: He created him a Duke and Peer, and gave him 200,000 Livres towards the Purchaſe of a Ducal Eſtate: M. de Gaiſcard, M. de Megrigni, and every other Officer who had diſtinguiſh'd himſelf in the ſame Service, partook of the ſame Generoſity and Goodneſs; which were ſo truely worthy of a great King, and a thorough Politician, that they can never be too much applauded.

But treated with great Reſpect and Civility.

and diſcharg'd in Exchange for the ſaid Garriſons.

The generous Reception he met with from the King his Maſter.

With the Reduction of Namur ended this glorious Campaign: For the Confederates

A. D. 1695. were too much haraſs'd with the ſevere Duty they had undergone, to think of following M. de Villeroy, in order to force him to an Engagement. All, therefore, that remain'd for his Britannic Majeſty to do, before he left the Field, was to diſpatch Expreſſes to his Allies, with Advice of the great Exploit which had been perform'd, and Complements on the Share of Glory which their ſeveral Troops had acquir'd in it; to take a Review of his Army, in order to know the Total of his Loſs, and of the Recruits that were neceſſary; and to make ſuch a Diſpoſition of Winter-Quarters, as ſhould be moſt conducive to the Service, whether offenſive or defenſive, and moſt favourable to a general Rendezvous at the opening of the next Campaign: And all this being done, he left the Army at Limbeck on the 14th; and having paſs'd thro' Breda, and ſtay'd two Nights at Dicren, came to Loo on the 20th, where he was complemented by all the foreign Miniſters and Perſons of Diſtinction from the Hague, as if he had been another Alexander: And, indeed, by the Thankſgivings and Rejoicings made among the Confederates in general, (w) on the re-taking this ſingle Town, it was reaſonable to conclude, that a mortal Wound had been given to the Power of France.

King William leaves the Army.

Has an Interview at the Hague with the Elector of Brandenburgh.

On the 7th of October his Majeſty repair'd to the Hague, and was receiv'd in all Reſpects as a Conqueror: Here he had an Interview with the Elector of Brandenburgh, who arriv'd the next Day, and was entertain'd by the States with great Magnificence: The general State of Things; the Probability of obtaining a good Peace; or the Expediency of continuing a vigorous War; the Quotas to be furniſh'd by the ſeveral Powers; the Conditions of Service; the time of opening the Campaign; and the manner in which the whole was to be conducted, were probably the great Points diſcuſs'd in the Hours of Buſineſs, as well by them as their Miniſters. A. D. 1695.

And theſe having been ſettled, or at leaſt forwarded as much as the Nature of them would permit; and the States having, in the ſame Interval, agreed to the State of the War for the enſuing Year, his Majeſty, on the 19th, embark'd for England, arriv'd at Margate on the Morrow, lay at Canterbury that Night, and the next reach'd Kenſington; having been receiv'd in his Paſſage thorough London, with all that Uproar of Acclamation which oſtentatious Actions generally exact from an undiſcerning Multitude, utterly incapable of finding out their true Value, by comparing their Coſt with their intrinſic Worth.

A new Parliament ſumm'd.

On the very Night of his Arrival he held a Council: And, according to Biſhop Burnet, it was Matter of Debate, "Whether a new Parliament ſhould be ſummoned, or the old one be brought together again, which by the Law that was lately paſs'd, might ſit till Lady-day. The happy State the Nation was in, (proceeds his Lordſhip) put all Men, except the Merchants, in a good Temper: None could be ſure we ſhould be in ſo good a State next Year; ſo that now, probably, Elections would fall on Men, who were well affected to the Government: A Parliament, that ſaw itſelf in its laſt Seſſion, might affect to be froward: The Members, by ſuch a Behaviour, hoping to recommend themſelves to the next Election: Beſides, if the ſame Parliament had been continued, probably the (x) Enquiries into Corruption would have been carried on, which might divert them from more preſſing Affairs, and kindle greater Heats; all which might be more decently dropt by a new Parliament, than ſuffer'd to lie aſleep by the old one. Theſe Conſiderations prevail'd, tho' it was ſtill believ'd, that the King's own Inclinations led him to have continued the Parliament yet one Seſſion longer;

(w) The Article inſerted in the London Gazette on this Occaſion, (and which was accompany'd with a Proclamation for a ſolemn Thankſgiving) was as follows.

Whitehall, Aug. 30. On Thurſday laſt arriv'd here one of the King's Meſſengers, being diſpatch'd from his Majeſty's Camp on the 22d of this Month, with the good News of the Surrender of the Caſtle of Namur: For the Particulars whereof, the Public is referr'd to the Relation already printed, which contains all we have yet receiv'd.

The Lords Juſtices and Council, being met the ſame Day, appointed a general Thankſgiving to be obſerv'd all the Kingdom over: The great Guns were fir'd from the Tower; and at Night there were Bonfires and Illuminations in the Cities of London and Weſtminſter, with ringing of Bells, and other Demonſtrations of a general Joy, for the Preſervation of his Majeſty's Perſon from the many Dangers to which he has been expos'd, and for the glorious Succeſs of his Majeſty's Arms, in reducing a Place of ſuch Strength, which had in it a Garriſon conſiſting (according to the Paris-Gazette) of twenty one Battalions of Foot, ſeven Regiments of Dragoons, and one of Horſe, with a Marſhal of France at the Head of them, and in ſight of an Army of 120,000 Men, drawn together from the Rhine, their Sea-Coaſts, and other Parts; who inſtead of relieving it, contented themſelves with making ſome Motions towards the Mahaigne, and with being Witneſſes of the extraordinary Bravery and Courage of the Forces of the Allies, and particularly of the Engliſh and Scots, which appear'd in the laſt, as well as all the other Attacks during the Siege, to a Degree that cannot be expreſs'd as it ought, or ſufficiently commended.

'Tis probable the French will now be willing it ſhould be forgot with what Vanity and Boaſting they fill'd all their publick Relations, when they became Maſters of this Town ſome Years ago, ſeeing they could not defend it, after having fortify'd it with ſo many new and very ſtrong Outworks, and fill'd it with ſuch a Number of Troops, and ſuch vaſt Magazines, (part whereof was deſign'd for attacking the City of Liege) that they look'd upon the Place, eſpecially with the Aſſiſtance of ſuch a powerful Army, to be impregnable.

(x) The ſame Conſideration is alſo urg'd by Boyer, but in ſuch a manner, as ſhews that he was not over attentive to the Facts he pronounces ſo hardily upon: His Words are theſe.

"His Majeſty no ſooner arriv'd at Kenſington, but he call'd a Council, wherein he propos'd the diſſolving the preſent Parliament; which after a ſmall Debate being reſolv'd upon, a Proclamation was order'd to be publiſh'd for that Purpoſe; and for declaring a ſpeedy calling another, to be holden at Weſtminſter the 22d Day of November next. One of the chief Reaſons which induc'd him to diſſolve it, was the Proſecution of the Duke of Leeds, which in the whole Courſe of it had made his Majeſty very uneaſy, and which had more Spleen than Juſtice in it; it being certain, that if any Bribes enter'd his Houſe, they never were accepted by him; and that the only Aim of his Grace's Enemies, was to keep him out of the Patent wherein he was nam'd to be one of the Lords Juſtices. Now, as on the one Hand, his Majeſty could never have forgiv'd a Miniſter, to whom he not only ow'd his March with the late Queen, but who had likewiſe been the chief Wheel on which the Revolution turn'd, ſo, on the other Hand, there was no eaſier way to put a Stop to an Impeachment, which was ſtill impending, than the calling a new Parliament." Life of K. William, Vol III. p. 106.

A. D. 1695. longer; for he reckon'd he was ſure of the major Vote in it. Thus this Parliament was brought to a Concluſion, and a new one was ſummon'd."

It is, however, obſervable, that in the Proclamation no mention was made of the Triennial Bill, or of the Reaſons aſſign'd in the Preamble for paſſing it, viz. "That according to the antient Laws and Statutes of this Kingdom, frequent Parliaments ought to be held; and that frequent and new Parliaments tended very much to the happy Union and good Agreement of the King and People." But, on the contrary, the Reaſons therein aſſign'd were, "That the King's good Subjects might perceive the Confidence he had in their Affections; and how deſirous he was to meet his People, and have their Advice in Parliament."

The King indul'd to bid for Popularity.

All Parties, as uſual on the like Occaſions, made their Court to the People at each other's Expence: And thoſe in Power even prevail'd on the King to make ſome Advances towards Popularity, by a Royal Progreſs Northward; and by conſtraining himſelf to a little more Openneſs and Affability than was natural to him: Theſe are the Words of his own Apologiſt; and he alſo adds, But his cold and dry way had too deep a Root not to return too oft upon him: His Majeſty alſo, in the ſecond Stage of his Journey, condeſcended to pay a Complement to the Earl of Sunderland, by repairing from New-market to that Nobleman's Houſe at Althorp, which partook more of Gratitude than Policy: For as the firſt Mover of all the violent Proceedings in the Reign of the late King, no Man could be more obnoxious to the Nation as a Miniſter than his Lordſhip; and as the Betrayer of that King, no Miniſter could be more obnoxious as a Man. He was, moreover, ſo unlucky as to give ſome Diſguſt to one Univerſity, and to be diſguſted by the other: For the Vice-Chancellor, and Heads of Cambridge, having paid him a ſhort Complement at New-market on his happy Succeſs Abroad, and his ſafe return, gave him no Invitation to viſit them: And when he croſs'd the Country to viſit Oxford, where a magnificent Entertainment was provided for him, he refus'd either to eat or drink, becauſe the Duke of Ormond had receiv'd an anonymous Letter, which had been dropt in the Streets the Day before, intimating a Purpoſe to poiſon him.

Burnet. Vol. II. P. 160.

All Thoſe who were attach'd to the Princeſs of Denmark, were alſo diſpleas'd, that neither her Highneſs, nor the Prince her Conſort, were ſuffer'd to accompany his Majeſty in this Royal Parade; and found themſelves ſo much the more diſpos'd to complain of it, becauſe the Princeſs, having writ a very obliging Letter to the King on the Reduction of Namur, it had only ſerv'd to give him an Opportunity (ſays the Dutcheſs of Marlborough) of ſhewing his brutal Diſregard for the Writer: For he never return'd any Anſwer to it, nor ſo much as a civil Meſſage.

A. D. 1695.

During the whole time of Election, the Preſs was as fruitful as the Mud of Nilus was feign'd to be; every Day produc'd ſome Effort, either to raiſe or lay the Spirit of Oppoſition: And of Theſe the moſt remarkable is the Tract (y) ſaid to be written by the Marquis of Halifax, under the Title of, Some Cautions offer'd to the Conſideration of Thoſe who are to chuſe Members. Theſe Cautions are in Number twenty: But Thoſe which ſeem to have ariſen more peculiarly from the Criſis, and which alſo ſeem to be worth Attention at any Criſis, were the laſt ſix; viz. The 14th, againſt practiſing Lawyers; as having two Duties to attend, which were often inconſiſtent, and ſometimes irreconcileable with each other; as being us'd to argue on both Sides the Queſtion, indifferently for the ſame Conſideration; and as having an Eye to Preferment as well as Gain in all their Doings: The 15th, againſt violent Party Men; as being no longer free Agents; as having Liberty only for their Motto, but being in reality greater Slaves than any body deſir'd to make them; as having, even in times of Peace, and in Oppoſition to the original Contract and the Bill of Rights, ſubjected themſelves to the Dominion of a ſort of martial Law, by which, he that quitted his Colours, became liable to be treated as a Deſerter; as having neither Reaſon nor Reſolution of their own; as labouring under a political Hebetè; as having the Public always in their Mouths, and Self always at Heart: As reſembling more a Corporation of Merchant-Adventurers, than the Delegates of the People, to manage the Common Stock for the Common Intereſt, &c.: The 16th, againſt the Pretenders to exorbitant Merit in the late Revolution; as having no other Merit to recommend them; as bringing in longer Bills than ought to be allow'd, and making larger Claims than the Nation could pay: The 17th, againſt military Officers; as being out of their Element in the Senate-Houſe; as being diſqualify'd by their very Habits and Accoutrements (which were ſuch as might authoriſe the peaceable Part of the Aſſembly to ſwear, they went in fear of their Lives) from appearing there; as being no longer their own Men, and conſequently unfit to protect the Liberty of Others; and as ſerving two Maſters, whoſe Commands might be oppoſite, and irreconcileable, if not ruinous to each other: The 18th and 19th, againſt Penſioners and Placemen; as being Dependants on the Crown, not free Repreſentatives of the People; as being more liable to vote according to their own Intereſt, than according to the Intereſt of their Country: As not having the Aſpect of Freemen, if they had the Virtue to be ſo; and as ſtanding according to Equity, preſcrib'd by the Self-denying Bill which had paſs'd

Cautions to the Electors concerning the Choice of Members.

A. D. 1696.

I

(y) According to Biſhop Burnet that Nobleman dy'd in the April before; in which caſe it muſt be ſuppos'd, this Piece was prepar'd by him againſt a Diſſolution.

A. D. 1695. pass'd the House of Commons, tho' it had not the good Fortune to pass into a Law: And the 20th, against such as, for Reasons best known to themselves, had thought fit to oppose the Triennial Bill.

Lastly: Having done with his Cautions, he comes to a Close in these Words, "In the mean time, having told my Opinion who ought not to be chosen, if I should be ask'd, Who ought to be? My Answer must be, Chuse Englishmen. And when I have said that, to deal honestly, I will not undertake, that they are easy to be found."

As to the Operation of this, and the like Papers; and all the other similar Operations put in practice on similar Occasions, we must have recourse to Burnet, who says, "The Jacobites were so decry'd, that few of them were elected: But many of the Sourer Sort of Whigs, who were much alienated from the King, were chosen: Generally they were Men of Estates; but many were young, hot, and without Experience."

Burnet's Character of the Sourer Sort of Whigs.

Thus we are to understand, that the same Sourness which constituted Whigism, and all its Merit, in the Reign of Charles II. (when all the Expedients the Crown could offer to preserve the Succession in its natural Course, were scornfully rejected) became Matter of Reproach in the Reign of William III. As if all its Operations were to have their full Force only for his Sake, and were afterwards to be discontinued for ever.

But the whole Nation, it seems, had not as yet lost sight of the Purposes, which the Revolution was to have answer'd to them and their Posterity: And as their Deliverer was in Possession of all he could hope from the Adventure, those who had still the free Use of their Understanding, thought it but reasonable to elect such Representatives as were most likely to represent their Claims, and to insist on the Equity of their being answer'd.

Foley chosen Speaker.

The Day appointed for the Meeting was the 22d of November: And the Commons having again made choice of Mr. Foley for their Speaker, he was the next Day presented by the House to the King upon his Throne, for his Approbation: After which his Majesty made the following most gracious Speech to both Houses.

The King's Speech.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

It is with great Satisfaction that I meet you here this Day, being assur'd of a good Disposition in my Parliament, when I have had such full Proofs of the Affection of my People, by their Behaviour during my Absence, and at my Return.

I was engag'd in the present War by the Advice of my first Parliament; who thought it necessary for the Defence of our Religion, and for the Preservation of the Liberties of Europe: The last Parliament, with great Cheerfulness, did assist me to carry it on: And I cannot doubt, but that your Concern for the common Safety will oblige you to be unanimously zealous in the Prosecution of it. And I am glad that the Advantages which we have had this Year, give us a reasonable Ground of hoping for farther Success hereafter.

Upon this Occasion, I cannot but take Notice of the Courage and Bravery the English Troops have shewn this last Summer, which, I may say, has answer'd their highest Character in any Age: And it will not be deny'd, That without the Concurrence of the Valour and Power of England, it were impossible to put a Stop to the Ambition and Greatness of France. A. D. 1695.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

I think it a great Misfortune, that from the Beginning of my Reign, I have been forc'd to ask so many and such large Aids of my People; and yet I am confident you will agree with me in Opinion, That there will be at least as great Supplies requisite for carrying on the War by Sea and Land this Year, as was granted in the last Session; the rather, because our Enemies are augmenting their Troops, and the Necessity of increasing our Shipping does plainly appear.

The Funds which have been given, have prov'd very deficient.

The Condition of the Civil List is such, that it will not be possible for me to subsist, unless that Matter be taken into your Care.

And Compassion obliges me to mention the miserable Circumstances of the French Protestants, who suffer for their Religion.

And therefore, Gentlemen, I most earnestly recommend to you, to provide a Supply suitable to these several Occasions.

I must likewise take Notice of a great Difficulty we lie under at this time, by reason of the ill State of the Coin; the Redress of which, may perhaps prove a farther Charge to the Nation But this is a Matter of so general Concern, and of so very great Importance, that I have thought fit to leave it entirely to the Consideration of my Parliament.

I did recommend to the last Parliament, the forming some good Bill for the Encouragement and Increase of Seamen; I hope you will not let this Session pass without doing somewhat in it; and that you will consider of such Laws as may be proper for the Advancement of Trade; and will have a particular Regard to that of the East-Indies, lest it should be lost to the Nation: And while the War makes it necessary to have an Army Abroad, I could wish some way might be thought of to raise the necessary Recruits, without giving Occasion of Complaint.

My Desire to meet my People in a new Parliament, has made the Opening of this Session very late; which, I hope, you will have such Regard to, as to make all possible Dispatch of the great Business before you; and will call to mind, That by the long Continuance of the last Session, we did not only lose Advantages which we might have had at the Beginning of the Campaign, but gave the Enemy such an Opportunity, as might have prov'd very fatal to us. And I am the more concern'd to press this, because of the great Preparations which the French make to be early in the Field this Year.

My Lords.

I have had such Experience of your good Affections; and I have such an entire Satisfaction

A. D. 1695. faction in the Choice which my People have made of you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, that I promise myself a happy Conclusion of this Session, unless you suffer yourselves to be misled into Heats and Divisions; which being the only Hope our Enemies have now left, I make no doubt but you will entirely disappoint, by your Prudence and Love to your Country."

Now it is fit to observe in this Place, first, That the miscellaneous Invective against the King, his Ministers and Measures, occasionally quoted in the Course of this Work, under the Title of, A Brief Account of some of the Encroachments and Depredations of the Dutch upon the English, &c. was calculated as well to expose the Contents of this Speech, as to defeat the Purposes of the Session, and increase the Discontent of the Nation: And, Secondly, That this was not the only Effort of that Kind: For there was scarce a sore Place in the Government, which had not been prob'd and laid open by some Malevolent Pen; and that with all the Aggravations usually practis'd, when Facts are put to the Torture, in order to stretch them beyond their natural Sizes: False Lists and Calculations, for Example, of our Losses at Sea, (which, indeed, had been very great, and fell very heavily on our Commerce) were set forth: The Ships lost by our Merchants alone were computed at 4000; their Cargoes were said to be ineftimable: It was also said, That these Losses had been conniv'd at purposely, that the Dutch might run away with our Trade: That the Act of Navigation, and all the other Statutes enacted for the Encrease of Shipping, and the Enlargement of our home Manufactures, where, in Effect, no longer in force as to them: That every Coffee-house Table was cover'd with Advertisements of Dutch Commodities to be publicly sold, which were, by the Laws, prohibited: That the States, for the sake of covering and protecting their Navigation, had neither furnish'd their Quota to the combin'd Fleet, nor suffer the Ships they did furnish to act for the common Service in the Manner it requir'd: That their Wants and Deficiencies were many times supply'd out of our Stores and Provisions: (and, indeed, this Suggestion is sufficiently authoris'd even by Burchet himself) That instead of acting only in conformity to the Signals of the Commander in Chief, or the Resolutions of a Council of War, as in a joint Adventure they ought to have done, they detach'd their Ships of War to act as Guard-ships and Convoys to their own Trade, by their own seperate Authority: And that for resenting this Conduct of theirs, as became him, Admiral Russel had been coldly receiv'd at his Return, from his Mediterranean Expedition.

Subjects of popular Clamour.

Admiral Russel's cold reception.

But tho' it should be acknowledg'd, That such Aggravations are in general unfair, and that they argue more of Malice than Concern for Truth in those who made them, it is nevertheless true, That unfair Practices on one Side, warrant the like Practices on the other: And it is notorious the Arts of Defamation were never carry'd to a greater Length by any Set of Men whatsoever, than by Those who complain'd of them most, when they had got Possession of the Government. A. D. 1695.

We must not, however, pass over what has been dropt concerning the Reception which Russel met with at his Return: For if the Fact should be admitted, it is highly probable his Behaviour to the Dutch in that one Instance, was not the only Cause of his Majesty's Displeasure.

From what pass'd between him, the Admiral, and the Spaniards during that whole Service, it is very obvious, That the Latter had some secret Cause of Dissatisfaction with our Court, which render'd the very Efforts we made in their Favour disagreeable to them; and which created a Backwardness in making such Acknowledgments and Returns, as otherwise they could not have excus'd themselves from: But wherein it consisted, neither Burchet nor any of our other Historians explane; so that Conjecture was left to supply the Place of Information: And that the Admiral did not do all that was requir'd of him by his Catholic Majesty, that the Dutch insisted on being over paid for their Share in the Adventure, or that in the Direction of the Campaign, a sufficient Degree of Complaisance for the Interest of Spain, was not manifested either in Italy or Flanders, might have been confider'd jointly or seperately, as the Root of the Misunderstanding.

A Misunderstanding between the Courts of London and Madrid.

But in Admiral Nevil's Papers, there is one, which, under the Title of M. Schonenburgh's Case, helps to clear up this Mystery.

This Schonenburgh, a Jew by Birth, publicly known as such at Amsterdam by the Name of Belmont, and, by being born at Antwerp, a natural Subject of the King of Spain, had, so long ago as the Year 1678 or 79, been sent to Madrid, in quality of Agent to the Prince of Orange, to solicite the Payment of such Sums, as for Subsidies and Services were due from that Court to his Highness. Every body knows how obnoxious the Jews are in Spain: And it is easy to conceive, that neither the Family, nor the Religion, nor the Clames of the Prince his Master, could lessen the Prejudices which M. Schonenburgh had to struggle with on that Account.

Schonenburgh, the Dutch Envoy, the Occasion of it.

By the Dint of Importunity, however, and the Favour of the Times, which help'd to make his Highness of Consequence to the Court of Spain, he succeeded in his Suit: But by his Officiousness in prying into the Conduct of the Spanish Ministers, and his arrogant Expostulations on the Discoveries he happen'd to make, tho' in such Points as no way regarded his Mission, and his open Complaints of their ill Conduct, their Non-performance of their Engagements to their Allies, and the general weak and encumber'd Condition of their Affairs, he render'd himself out of measure odious to them all.

Notwithstanding which, on the Death of the Dutch Envoy, he was appointed to succeed him; and on the Strength of his additional Character, became more busy, more arrogant,

A.D. 1695. arrogant, and of courſe more obnoxious than ever.

All his Papers and Memorials were now preface'd with the Name of the King his Maſter, as well as of his Lords and Maſters the States-General; and all his Demands and Importunities back'd with their joint Authority. In particular, the Catholic Court having urg'd the Neceſſities of the War, as a ſufficient Reaſon for levying a heavy Indulto on the Effects of the Merchants, return'd by the laſt Fleet from the Weſt-Indies, he had remonſtrated ſo ſtrongly on that Head, and in Terms ſo diſagreeable to the Spaniſh Miniſters, that they thought fit to remonſtrate in as ſtrong Terms againſt him and his Conduct; and probably inſiſted on his being recall'd. But tho' it was thought proper, upon this, to proſecute the Affair of the Indulto no farther, Schonenburgh was continued, and continued to act in the ſame manner as before: So that his Enemies had no other Reſort, but ſome ſuch perſonal Miſcarriage as ſhould authoriſe them to rid themſelves of his Company, whether his Maſter would or not.

And it was not long before his Indiſcretion or Avarice, or both, furniſh'd them with the Opportunity they waited for.

There were two Brothers, Merchants of Holland, ſettled at Bilboa and St. Sebaſtians, their Names Moll, who, having ſhipp'd off all the Wool, Iron, and other Commodities which their Credit would reach, One of them follow'd the Goods to Holland, and the Other took Sanctuary in a Convent, till he could find means to convey himſelf to Madrid, where he repair'd to the Houſe of Schonenburgh, and under the Character of his Secretary, which in a few Days was beſtow'd on him, clam'd an Exemption from all Proceſs, and ſet his Creditors at Defiance. They, however, remonſtrated their Caſe to the Preſident of Caſtile, who is the ſupreme Judge of Spain, and by his Warrant Moll was arreſted and thrown into Priſon, in July.

Schonenburgh, on the other Hand, inſtead of leaving him to the Laws, inſiſted on the Validity of his Protection, put in Memorial after Memorial, made the Diſpute as public as poſſible, endeavour'd to embark all the foreign Miniſters reſident at Madrid in the Quarrel; and when the Court, agreeable to their own Maxim, That the Servants of ſuch Miniſters were not entitled to the Privilege of their Maſters, for Debts contracted, and Crimes committed before they were ſuch, continued immoveable, preſented a Paper to the Conſtable of Caſtile, in which he not only labours his Point with all the Arguments he could muſter, and ennumerates ſeveral Inſtances in which the Courtiers themſelves had departed from their own Rules, but calls the Detention of his Servant a Violation of the Immunities of public Miniſters, and a Breach both of the Articles of the Peace and of the Laws of Nations; which was ſo much the more heinous, becauſe the King his Maſter was at that very Inſtant expoſing his Life for the common Cauſe; a Life that was of more Conſequence to all Europe, than the Victories of many Years could be; and a Meaſure ſo much the more unadvis'd, becauſe of the diſagreeable Conſequences it might produce; ſeeing no Arguments could make him believe that the King his Maſter could be brought to tolerate, for any Conſideration, a Treſpaſs that touch'd his Honour in the moſt delicate Part, or to forbear ſuch Meaſures as, in the preſent Juncture, both Gratitude and good Policy ought to prevent. A.D. 1695

This Paper was dated Auguſt 15: And a ſufficient Time having been taken, to impart the whole Proceeding to the King in Flanders, to the Regency in London, and to the States-General, without Effect, about the latter End of September M. Schonenburgh receiv'd a Command from his Catholic Majeſty, to appear no more at his Court, or to exerciſe the Functions of Envoy or Agent; for that no farther Notice would be taken of him in thoſe Capacities: On the other Hand, he, reſolving to take no Notice of this Command, and inſiſting to act as formerly, till he ſhould have Letters of Revocation from his Principals, he was on the 8th of October arreſted in his Houſe, and carry'd to a Place three Leagues out of Madrid, where he was left, with peremptory Orders to return thither no more. He is order'd to appear no more at Court; and diſobeying, is arreſted and carry'd out of Madrid.

What follow'd was more ſuitable to the Rage of ſo turbulent a Man as Schonenburgh, than to the Obligations of a common Cauſe, and the Danger of a Diſunion: For ſo well heard, and ſo much countenanc'd were his Complaints, that the Spaniſh Miniſter reſident at London, was forbid to preſent any Memorial, or make his Appearance at the Court of his Britannic Majeſty, till Satisfaction was given him, with reſpect to the Violence which had been offer'd to the Perſon of his Embaſſador. King William forbids the Spaniſh Miniſter from appearing at his Court, till his own has Satisfaction.

Now, as it was the common Sentiment of all the Miniſters, who had any Remains of the Engliſhman left in their Compoſition, That this whole Affair was purely and ſimply a Dutch Concern, in which the Crown of England ought no otherwiſe to interpoſe, than as a common Friend and Ally, it is highly probable, That Admiral Ruſſel, at his Arrival, not only confirm'd them in this Sentiment, but gave it ſuch additional Authority, from the whole Current of his Obſervations, during his Intercourſe with the Court of Spain, as help'd to lay ſome Reſtraint on the Violence of the King's Indignation, and conſequently to draw it towards himſelf.

But however this may be, the Affair made ſo much Noiſe, that the Malcontents got hold of it: And it not only makes one Article in the Invective laſt quoted, but very probably help'd to create that Reſentment in the Breaſt of his Catholic Majeſty, and to form that Part in his Court againſt the Confederates, which afterwards concurr'd to make ſuch an Alteration in the Syſtem of Europe, as operates in the moſt fatal Manner, to this Day.

But to reſume the Courſe of our parliamentary Affairs, which this important Memoir has interrupted: The King's Speech being

A. D. 1695. being reported to the Commons, according to form, an Addreſs of Thanks and Congratulation was agreed upon in the following Terms.

The Commons Addreſs.

"May it pleaſe your Majeſty,

We your Majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Commons of England in Parliament aſſembled, reflecting upon the great Calamities from which we were deliver'd, and the many Benefits we daily receive, by the Protection and Influence of your Majeſty's Government, do (with all Thankfulneſs to Almighty God) congratulate the glorious (x) Succeſs of your Majeſty's Arms Abroad, the Preſervation of your ſacred Perſon from the many Hazards to which you have expos'd yourſelf, and the Bleſſing of your being return'd to us again in ſafety.

We beg Leave, at the ſame time, humbly to repreſent to your Majeſty our grateful Senſe of your Majeſty's Favour, in having given ſuch Demonſtration to the World and to us, that you repoſe an intire Truſt and Confidence in the Affections of your People, for which we know no way of making any Return ſo ſuitable, as by giving your Majeſty this Aſſurance, That we (and thoſe your moſt faithful Commons whom we repreſent) are reſolv'd to defend and ſupport your Majeſty and your Government againſt all your Enemies, both at Home and Abroad: And that we will effectually aſſiſt your Majeſty in the Proſecution of this preſent War, in which you are engag'd, for the Safety of England and the Liberties of Europe."

On the 29th, and not before, this Addreſs was preſented by the whole Houſe: And it is not altogether unworthy of Obſervation, That his Majeſty, in his Anſwer, puts in as broad a Claime to the divine Right of Kingſhip, as any of his Predeceſſors had ever done before him; and thereby countenances the famous Sermon of Dr. Lloyd, Biſhop of St. Aſaph firſt, and then of Litchfield, call'd, God's way of diſpoſing Kingdoms, which had been ſo often and ſo ſeverely (a) cenſur'd: Theſe were his Words. A. D. 1695.

"Gentlemen,

I heartily thank you for the Marks you give me of your Affection: Our Intereſts are inſeparable, and there is nothing I wiſh ſo much as the Happineſs of this Country, where God has plac'd me."

The Lords alſo made the like Offering at the Foot-ſtool of the Throne, which met with the like gracious Reception: And that the Proceedings of Parliament might wear ſuch a Face of Serioufneſs and Solemnity as became them, his Majeſty, at the Inſtance of the Houſe of Commons, not of the Bench of Biſhops, was pleas'd to appoint a Day of Faſting and Humiliation, for imploring the Bleſſing of Almighty God upon its Conſultations.

After which, and the ordinary Forms of appointing their ſeveral Committees, when the Courtiers thought only of proceeding to the Conſideration of the Speech, and the great Buſineſs of the Supply, their Antagoniſts got the Start of them, and brought in the Bill for regulating Trials in Caſes of Treaſon, and Miſpriſion of Treaſon, which had ſo often miſcarry'd before; no doubt, recollecting that Maxim of Coke's, which had not as yet loſt all its Authority, viz. That ſeldom or ever any good Bill or good Motion, which had once been enter'd in the Journals of the Houſe, tho' it miſcarry'd at firſt, was wholy loſt to the Nation: Or, perhaps, that Uſage of Parliaments, which is as old as Parliaments

Proceedings of the Bill for regulating Trials.

(x) Mr. Boyer, and after him Mr. Tindal, in Boyer's own Words, which he copies for two or three Pages together, is pleas'd to ſay, That the King, whom he calls the wiſeſt Politician, and moſt accompliſh'd General, by the Reduction of Namur, had ſtruck a Damp upon his Enemies Abroad, and diſcompos'd the Aſſurance of the Malcontents at Home. But the Malcontents, diſcompos'd as they were, had nevertheleſs the Aſſurance to diſcourſe of the Recovery of that Place in the following Words.

"And as they (the Dutch) make a large Gain by the Spoils, Loſſes, and Devaſtations, which their Confederates ſuffer and undergo, ſo they make no leſs Profit by their Victories and Succeſſes, even to the Preclufion of their Allies, and eſpecially the Engliſh, from all Advantage and Benefit by them: For as Namur is the only Conqueſt ſince the Commencement of this War in Flanders, that has been obtain'd over the French, ſo it is but a Recovery of what the Confederates had loſt during the preſent War, and not a new Acquiſition: And as it has coſt infinitely more in Men and Treaſure, than it and all the Dependencies upon it are worth; ſo theſe three Kingdoms, who contributed moſt to the taking of it, and had more of the Blood of their Men ſpilt, and more of their Treaſure and Ammunition expended and waſted in the winning of that City, than any one of all the Confederates, have reapt nothing by it but the enlarging the Barrier of the Dutch, and the putting a ſtrong and well fortify'd City into their Power and Poſſeſſion, to make them more inſolent unto and encroaching upon, their Allies. And when I conſider the Cuſtoms of the Spartans, who had an Order, That when any of their Generals compaſs'd his Deſigns by Policy and Treaty, he ſhould ſacrifice an Ox; but when by Force and Bloodſhed, only a Cock, I think that our many late Bonefires and Illuminations, and eſpecially our prodigal and fooliſh Expences in St James's Square, [meaning the Fire-works perform'd there] were ridiculous as well as waſteful Conſumptions: For as the diſtinct Values of thoſe Oblations of the Lacedemonians, do ſhew us (according to the Judgment of Plutarch) how much they preferr'd the Succeſſes of calm and ſober Councils, before thoſe of Force and Strength, ſo there was more Cauſe for Lamentations for the many and brave Men that had been loſt before the Town and Caſtle of Namur, e'er they fell into our Hands, (and which, in all probability, will, with leſs Coſt, be ſpeedily ſnatch'd from us again) than of vain, childiſh, and expenſive Triumphs for the gaining them. But to omit this, that which I am to repreſent and diſplay is, That the City and Caſtle, which were gain'd at the Price and Coſt of ſo much Engliſh Blood and Treaſure, are now conſign'd over to the Dutch, and ſtand mortgaged to them for the Repayment of what they have laid out and diſburſed in this War; which ſeeing there is no Likelihood that ever the Spaniards will be in a Condition to reimburſe them, that Town is conſequently become a Part as well as an Enlargement of their Territories, and is the Addition of an Eighth Province to the former Seven. Yea, out of Kindneſs to the Dutch, and Diſaffections to us, our Belgick Prince is ſo frugal of their Treaſure, and ſo prodigal of that of this Kingdom, that much of the Charges neceſſary for repairing the Fortifications of Namur is borne by us, and our Money remitted and tranſported to defray them: Which is ſuch a Bubbling of this Kingdom, that thoſe moſt engag'd in King William's Intereſt, cannot avoid reſenting it with Indignation." Encroachments and Depredations, P. 39, 40.

(a) In particular S. Johnſon, who had ſuffer'd ſo ſeverely in the Cauſe of Liberty, in a Paper of his addreſs'd to the Houſe of Commons, having mention'd that Paragraph in the Prince of Orange's Declaration which diſcovers the wicked Deſign imputed to him of conquering the Nation, makes uſe of the following Words by way of Comment upon it. "Conquering and enſlaving the Nation, which are equivalent Words, and both put together in the Declaration, was ſo wicked a Deſign, that his Majeſty was not capable of intending it, and diſclaims it with Abhorrence. How then come his Prieſts to tell him, and the whole Nation beſides, That this is God's way of diſpoſing Kingdoms, and that in this divine way he came by his Kingdom, and holds it by that Tenure?" Johnſon's Works, P. 267.

A. D 1695 liaments themſelves, of graſting popular Demands on Subſidy Stocks.

But whether National or Party Motives, a Purpoſe to diſtreſs the Government, or ſcreen themſelves, occaſion'd the Revival of this Bill, it is pretty plain, That the Reviſers of it (who were a Mixture of thoſe Whigs ſtigmatis'd for their Scurneſs by Biſhop Burnet, and thoſe Tories who, by this time, began to place the Sum of Patriotiſm in that Oppoſition which they had formerly condemn'd as diſloyal and ſeditious, and more deſerving of Puniſhment than Imitation) determin'd to make it the Price of the Supply, as far as in them lay: While, on the other Hand, the Courtiers, utterly forgetting how much they had ſuffer'd for want of ſuch a Law, when the Rod of Oppreſſion hung over them, or elſe deſirous of making their Enemies ſuffer as much, whenever Opportunity ſhould ſerve, either openly oppos'd it, as having a Tendency to make Men as ſafe as poſſible in all treaſonable Conſpiracies, according to Biſhop Burnet's Suggeſtion formerly quoted, or ſpecioufly argued, That the Security of the Subject was beſt provided for, when the beſt Proviſion was made for the Security of the Government: And that, therefore, the Law ought to continue on its antient Footing, at leaſt, till the War ſhould be brought to a Period.

But neither the Refinements of the Latter, nor the hardy Aſſertions of the Former, had the Effect deſir'd: (b) Thoſe who had brought it in, were reſolv'd to carry it thro' if poſſible; and were ſo countenanc'd by the Popularity of it, that the Courtiers, who did not care to make a falſe Step at the very Entrance of a new Parliament, thought fit to give it way, in hope that the Privilege claim'd by the Peers of being try'd by the whole Peerage, would create a new Conteſt between the two Houſes, and again be fatal to it.

But tho' the Peers did accordingly add this favourite Clauſe, and the Bill, after a long Delay, was return'd to the Commons with an Amendment, which till now had been held ſo unreaſonable, no ſuch Conteſt follow'd: On the contrary, they thought it adviſable to complement their Lordſhips with more than they were entitled to, on the common Level of Subjects, rather than leave themſelves and their Poſterity any longer expos'd to thoſe Severities which brought the Laws themſelves into Diſgrace, by eſtabliſhing a Belief, That they were equally calculated to entangle the Innocent and puniſh the Guilty.

Which paſſes both Houſes.

The firſt Difficulties which retarded the Progreſs of this Bill, were, however, no ſooner removed, than a Supply was voted, that is to ſay, on the 2d of December: And as the Eſtimates were deliver'd in, the general Committee proceeded to take them into Examination, and to deliberate on Ways and Means of making ſuch Proviſions as ſhould be ſuitable to the Service. It is true, the Malcontents alledge, That none of the Papers laid before the Houſe in relation thereto, did contain ſuch Informations as the Houſe had a Right to inſiſt on, or as were conſiſtent with that Integrity or Ingenuity that a Government ought never to depart from: That the ſubſidiary Treaties, for Example, communicated to them, did not agree with the ratify'd Originals, but were purpoſely ſophiſticated, in order to conceal ſuch Facts, and cover ſuch Frauds, as would not be admitted, and could not be excus'd: That not one of the Eſtimates was true and genuine: That the ſame might be ſaid of the Accounts of the Quotas to be furniſh'd by the Confederates: That on the Dutch Roll there were ſeveral Dutch Regiments that were on the Engliſh Eſtabliſhment, and paid with Engliſh Money: That as England rais'd above a Moiety of the whole Expence of the War, ſo not above a Moiety of what ſhe rais'd, was expended on her own Subjects: And that there was not one Regiment either of Engliſh or Scots in Flanders, into which his Majeſty, by his own abſolute Authority, and in Contempt of the Laws, had not introduc'd Aliens, both as Commiſſion and Non-Commiſſion-Officers.

Papers, &c. laid before the Houſe, ſaid not to be genuine.

A. D 1695.

But the ſtronger theſe Allegations are, the more requiſite it is to produce ſufficient Vouchers in ſupport of them; and, it is true, That in the Year 1692, the ſaid Eſtimates, upon Examination, were found ſo erroneous, that, inſtead of 1,805,671*l.* 15*s.* demanded for the effective Pay of the Army, but 1,453,549*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* was granted: Beſides, the Lords did this Seſſion addreſs the Throne for a Liſt of all the Officers in Engliſh Pay, with a preciſe Account of what Country each Individual was, which ſeem'd to indicate a Jealouſy, That ſome Irregularities had been put in practice: And it alſo appears, that the Commons had their Scruples too: For tho' Biſhop Burnet (who admits, That the Demand of the Supply was ſtill very high, and that there was a great Arrear of Deficiency) contents himſelf with ſaying, All was readily granted, and lodg'd on Funds that ſeem'd to be very probable, the Matter of Fact is, That (in lieu of 2,765,148*l.* 14*s.* demanded) they gave but 2,500,000*l.* for the Navy, beſides 16,972*l.* for two Regiments of Marines; and but 2,007,881*l.* for the Army, (which was to conſiſt of 87,440 Men, Horſe and Foot) and for the Staff, Ordnance, Forage, and Contingencies of all Sorts, 500,000*l.* which, on the three laſt Articles, was 184,859*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.* leſs than what was demanded.

Sums voted for the current Service.

By what Methods theſe great Sums were to be rais'd, we ſhall ſee hereafter: What lies Proceeding on the ill State of the Coin.

(b) Among whom was the Lord Aſhley, Grand-Son of the great Earl of Shaftſbury, at preſent famous for his moral Tracts entitled, Characteriſtics; who being return'd a Member for Poole in Dorſetſhire, and attempting to utter a premeditated Speech in favour of that Clauſe in the Bill, which allow'd the Priſoner the Benefit of Counſel, fell into ſuch a Diſorder, that he was not able to proceed: But having at length recover'd his Spirits, and together with them the Command of his Faculties, he drew ſuch an Argument from his own Confuſion, as more advantag'd his Cauſe than all the Powers of Eloquence could have done: For, ſaid he, "If I, who had no perſonal Concern in the Queſtion, was to over power'd with my own Apprehenſions that I could not find Words or Voice to expreſs myſelf, what muſt be the Caſe of one whoſe Life depended on his own Abilities to defend it?"

A. D. 1695. lies next before us is, the Proceſs on the ill State of the Coin, which, by a Continuance of the ſame ill Practices, was become an inſupportable Grievance, and what equally affected both the Government and the Nation.

It had been touch'd upon in the former Seſſion, but then it had been only touch'd upon: And tho' Numbers of Tracts had been ſet forth upon the Subject by Mr. Locke, Mr. Lowndes, and ſeveral other ingenious Men of almoſt all Profeſſions, it ſtill remain'd a Doubt with ſome Perſons, Whether an Attempt to remedy the Diſeaſe would not deſtroy the Patient: On the other Hand, thoſe who were all of one Mind, as to the Neceſſity of making ſuch an Attempt, found it extremely hard to reconcile their different Opinions, as to the manner in which it ſhould be made.

In ſhort, Selfiſhneſs of every kind, Pride, Caprice, Rapine, Avarice, Diſcontent and Diſaffection, never appear'd more viſibly or in more forbidding Shapes than upon this Occaſion. The Robber of the Public was againſt any Applications of any kind, for fear of loſing his Occupation: The Grumbler was equally afraid of loſing one of his favourite Topics of Complaint: All that the Jacobite deſir'd, was to ſee the Nation thrown into Convulſions; and whether it was done by ſuffering the Canker to continue gnawing, or by an unſkilful Attempt to remove it, he was indifferent: And to ſuppoſe that even the moſt zealous Undertakers for it had no Views of their own in a Project ſo intricate in itſelf, and ſo dubious in its Operations, would be ſcarce warranted by the Manners of the Times.

Mr. Montagu, Chancellor of the Exchequer, had the Honour to get the Start, if not to ſtand the Foremoſt of theſe Undertakers; and it will be no Diminution of that Honour to inform Poſterity, That he had the immortal Newton for his Adviſer in it.

But to proceed: The Lords took up the Matter firſt, and prepar'd an Addreſs to the Throne for a Proclamation to put a Stop to the Currency of clipp'd Crowns and Half-Crowns, which they communicated to the Commons, and deſir'd their Concurrence thereto: But the Latter probably being induc'd to believe, that this was a miniſterial Artifice to obtrude the Court-Plan upon them, under the Sanction of the Lords, made it their Choice to proceed by Methods of their own.

Accordingly a Committee of the whole Houſe was appointed to deliberate on the State of the Nation with reſpect to the Currency: And That being the ſame to the Body-politic as the Blood is to the natural Body, being alſo in the ſame State with the Blood in a Fever, when the Globules adhere to the Sides of the Veſſels, and only the Serum precipitates the Circulation, it muſt be ſuppos'd, That thoſe who apprehended the moſt Danger from the Criſis, and were moſt deſirous of applying proper Remedies, open'd the Debate with the faireſt and fulleſt State that could be given of the Caſe, accompany'd with ſuch Inferences as were moſt favourable to the Practice they came beſt prepar'd to try. A. D. 1695.

By a Variety of Experiments it appear'd that the Silver Coins, on a Medium, were diminiſh'd more than a Third, or, according to ſome, near half in half; and it was obvious, that in a ſhort Courſe of Time all the broad Money which remain'd, would undergo the like Diminution: On the other Hand, in exact Proportion as the Intrinſic of our Silver ſunk beneath its nominal Value, Gold roſe as much above it; and it was hard to ſay from which of the two Evils the Nation ſuffer'd moſt.

On theſe or ſuch like Premiſes, therefore, the firſt Queſtion ſtated was, Whether it was neceſſary or expedient to re-coin the Silver Money? The Courtiers undertook for the Affirmative; and when they happen'd to be moſt in the Right, met with as much Oppoſition, as when they were moſt in the Wrong.

Arguments for and againſt the Re-coinage.

Their Antagoniſts maintain'd, That this was no fit Conjuncture for a Re-coinage: That the Nation was engag'd in a burdenſom and doubtful War, by which the Kingdom had already greatly ſuffer'd, and of which it grew every Day more ſenſible: That, therefore, the People, on whoſe good Affection the Government ſo much depended, ſhould not be provoked by freſh Grievances, greater than any they had yet felt, as thoſe would certainly be, that muſt ariſe from the calling in the Silver Coin: That if this was done, however Things might be manag'd and accommodated at Home, it were impoſſible to maintain either the Commerce or the War Abroad; for neither the Merchant could pay his Bills of Exchange, nor the Soldier receive his Subſiſtence: That this was to lay the Ax to the Root, and to dig up the very Foundations of the Government: That if this Deſign was proſecuted, Trade muſt ſtand ſtill, for want of mutual Payments, whence ſuch Diſorder and Confuſion would certainly follow, as would diſcourage and diſhearten the People in the higheſt Meaſure, if not drive them to a perfect Deſpair, as Deſpair would to the moſt terrible Extremities: That therefore the Re-coining the Money at this time, was by no means to be attempted without hazarding All.

On the contrary, it was alledg'd by the Courtiers, That the Miſchief would be fatal, if a preſent Remedy was not found out and apply'd: That by Reaſon of the ill State of the Coin, the Exchange abroad was infinitely to the Nation's Prejudice: That the Supplies that were rais'd to maintain the Army, would never anſwer the End, being ſo much diminiſh'd and devour'd by the ſaid unequal Exchange, and exorbitant Premiums, before they reach'd the Camp: That this was the unhappy Cauſe that the Guinea advanc'd to thirty Shillings, and foreign Gold in Proportion: That, therefore, to the Nation's great Loſs, not only the Dutch, but, indeed, all Europe ſent that Commodity to this Market; and would continue to do ſo, till the Nation ſhould be impoveriſh'd and

This is the Sketch left us of the Arguments on both Sides: But we are not to preſume that the Debate on this Head was brought to a Cloſe without a Variety of Anſwers, Replies, and Rejoinders. Men are never more apt to be obſtinate than when they ſubſtitute Paſſion in the Place of Reaſon and Argument: And ſo much the higher the Malcontents had rais'd their Expectations, ſo much the more impatient they grew under the Proſpect of a Diſappointment. At length, however, the Majority were of Opinion, That the preſent Inconvenience would be the leaſt Evil; and on that Principle it was reſolv'd to put an inſtant Stop to the preſent pernicious Currency, and to proceed with all poſſible Expedition to a new Coinage.

As alſo for and againſt raiſing the Standard.

This Step being made, the next was to conſider whether the ſeveral Denominations of the New Money, ſhould have the ſame Weight and Fineneſs as the Old; or whether the eſtabliſh'd Standard ſhould be rais'd? And this Queſtion produc'd many Debates: Thoſe who, on the Authority of Mr. Lowndes, were for raiſing the Standard alledg'd, That the Price of an Ounce of Silver Bullion was advanc'd to ſix Shillings and three-pence; and therefore the Standard ought to be rais'd to an Equality: That the raiſing the Standard would prevent the Exportation of the Coin, which of late had been much practis'd to the great Prejudice of this Kingdom: That it would prevent its being melted down; and that thereby People would be much encourag'd to bring in their Plate and Bullion into the Mint.
